It was a morning of Christmas, 17—. The winter had been unusually clement, for the sycamores still retained a remnant of yellowing foliage, and the frosts were so light that they scarcely crisped the short meadow-grass. The day was brisk and sparkling, and before noon the mists, which had hung over the Falls since daylight, were dissipated by the sun and a low breeze from the south. The blackbird felt the time so pleasant that he puffed his golden throat, and whistled the first bars of a spring-tide carol: the effort naturally provoked the emulative disposition of his rival, the thrush, who, however, broke down in the effort, only to hear the crystal twitter of the robin from a neighbouring spray of holly. The Driscoll family, as they sat at breakfast, insensible, it must be confessed, to the vocal competition which had just taken place, felt that the season was mild, that the air was delicate, and the oaten bread delicious. So the lightest joke, the most trifling quibble, excited a fit of hearty laughter, with cries of "Tisn't half your best," "Arrah, what'll he say next?" and other complimentary incentives to the rustic humour.

The house occupied by the Driscolls was a large and respectable residence for a middle-class farmer of the period. It had two storeys; and, though the walls were seldom whitened, and the sashes and panes exhibited uncomfortable ventilating tendencies, the coat of thick thatch which shielded the roof, and the tufts of smoke which ascended from the chimneys, lent it an air of cosy indolence that was far from being disagreeable. As for its position, it defied criticism. It was a grassy eminence, which sloped to the river edge, and caught the last foam-wreaths that were hurled downward from the Falls. From the upper windows of the house one could obtain a good view of the "Jumping Hole," as it is called, and a goodly prospect of the rock-chafed river. Driscoll, senior, whom we do not pretend to quote as an authority on situation, was often heard to declare, that "all Ireland couldn't bate that spot for convaniance," and further, that a look at it on a heavy morning was "worth fifty pounds a year to a gauger."

The family group assembled at breakfast on the eventful Christmas morning we write of, consisted of old Denis Driscoll, his wife, and his two sons. Of John, the elder son, it would be hard to say much, as his character was of that negative description which offers little to the observer. Shrewd, active, and laborious, he was a faithful and valuable helper on the farm on week days, and "an out-and-out buckeen" on Sundays and holidays. Mike was the family genius; he drank more, danced more, and sang more than all his relatives put together. He never missed a fair or a pattern; he was the heavy man at all the local weddings, an indispensable assistant at the wakes, and the very deuce at "a trial of short-stick." To see Mike was to see the embodiment of humour. When he laughed his guffaw could be heard over a meadow; his great mouth would roll back, displaying a double line of shining teeth; his black eyes would literally flash with enjoyment, and every muscle of his face contributed some odd wrinkle or cunning fissure to intensify the jollity of his expression. Of Mike's good nature, no one was ever known to venture a doubt—his generosity was only limited by his ability; for he was always willing to oblige a friend with the loan of a shilling or the crack of a cudgel, as circumstances required. It is to be deeply regretted, that to all these shining qualities Mike did not unite profound religious principles. Not that his morals were ordinarily lax; but he had a constitutional passion for the open air, which occasionally induced him to neglect the solemn duties of religion. Then, Mike had been inoculated at an early stage of his career, with a fancy for card-playing, and was often known to sit up four-and-twenty hours, without winking, at his favourite amusement. When the family went to chapel on Sunday, Mike would invariably say, "Go on, father; I'll overtake ye—believe me, I'll overtake ye." But he seldom fulfilled his promise, preferring rather to turn into a deserted lime-kiln, which lay at a stone's throw from the rear of the house, where he met with a group of choice spirits, with whom he gambled till dinner-time.

"What are you drammin' iv, Mike," asked old Driscoll, eyeing his son, who appeared to have fallen into a brown study. "Eh, what are you drammin' iv? Some misfortunate caper, I'll go bail?"

"Musha, father, as ye're curious to know what I'll tell you. I'm drammin' of nothin' at all at all, so I am."

"Wid the blessin' of God," observed Mrs. Driscoll, "he's thinkin' of goin' with us to day instead of playin' cards. Wont you, Mike?"

"Yes," said Mike. "I'll just go and make myself a thrifle decent, and then I'll be wid ye."

So saying, Mr. Michael Driscoll rose and climbed the stairs to an upper room for the purpose of refreshing his toilet. His brother, it will be remembered, was a buckeen; but Mike had an intellectual contempt for the proprieties of costume, which no fraternal example, however brilliant, was capable of correcting. He hated shiny hats, despised cravats, repudiated broadcloth, but held buckskin in healthy esteem. Consequently, when Mike, "a thrifle decent," presented himself before his family, and announced himself ready, his attire was more picturesque than elegant. It consisted, if we may descend to details, of buckskin knee-breeches, blue stockings, and brogues; his coat, which was furnished with a cape, descended almost to his heels. On his head he carried a beaver hat, slightly indented about the middle; and the whole was completed by the addition of a coarse shirt, fastened at the throat with a large brass button. In this inventory we have purposely omitted mention of his stick—a short, thick ash cutting, which had performed several curious surgical operations in the hands of its owner, and is therefore entitled to a distinct sentence.

All being in readiness, old Driscoll mounted a favourite gray mare, and his wife was placed on a pillion behind him; the buckeen rode a blood horse, borrowed from a neighbour; and poor Mike a one-eyed mule, which he aptly described as "the most contankerous baste in creation." The little cavalcade set out slowly for the chapel, about three miles distant; and it was evident from the radiant looks of Mrs. Driscoll and the jaunty air of her husband that both were delighted at getting Mike, at long last, on the high road to duty. The road lay in part through a densely-grown shrubbery, whence it turned off, at a sharp angle, and emerged on the open country. As old Driscoll jogged along, a sudden impulse caused him to look in the direction of the farm house. A quick exclamation of surprise passed his lips.

"Mike, avick," he shouted with considerable energy; "ride back as fast as the mule's legs will carry you; the pigs are pullin' the whate in the haggard—bad luck to them, an' the Lord forgive me."

"Bad scannin' to them," said Mrs. Driscoll, "they're the quarrest pigs I ever seen. Whate, indeed! 'twould sarve them right if it choked them."

Mike cast a rapid glance at the haggard, and sure enough there were the whole litter, with the sow at their head, poking their noses into the corn-stacks, and munching the precious grain as only pigs and aldermen can munch. To turn back the mule's head and urge her to a canter was the work of a moment. "Don't lose no time, agra," shouted his mother, as he rode off to arrest the work of demolition.

"Honour bright, mother," replied Mike, and without further parley he provoked the mule into a gallop. On reaching the house he jumped over the haggard fence, and contrived, with the assistance of his stick, to disperse the offending animals. Having secured the gate, he looked around for the mule, but that quadruped, being inclined to excursiveness, had wandered from the road, and was disporting himself in a piece of ploughed land to the north of the farm. To make matters worse, Mick found it impossible to catch him. The cunning beast eluded every attempt which his owner made to capture his reins, and led him such a dance through the soft loam that the latter was obliged to sit down, defeated.

After some time he rose, and was making his way to the road, when the hum of well-known voices from the other side of the ditch reached his ear; and before he could fly, a number of young men, dressed in the provincial holiday gear, leaped into the field, and stood before him.

"Arrah, then, is it yerself? and my Christmas-box on you," said Jerry Toomey. "Is it huntin' the wran all alone you were, and the two best fivers in the country goin' to try it out at the kiln?"

Mike laughed a good-natured laugh, and shook his head.

"Maybe he's goin' courtin'," observed Tom Delany. "See how nate he looks, scooped out to the nines, as the man said to the new piggin. I'd bet ye a fi'penny bit, boys, he'd be ashamed to walk with us—wouldn't he Tony?"

The individual addressed as Tony, a little fat man, dressed in a faded hunting suit, here walked up to Mike, and, having made a circuit around him, clapped his hands in affected astonishment. "Why, thin Mike," asked the little man, placing his hands on his hips, and throwing back his head with the air of a horse-critic, "you didn't mane to bother us intirely, did you? New buckskins, as my grandfather was a gentleman; new brogues, new coat, new everything—the signs of money flying about him like snuff at a wake. I wonder did he pay the hansel yet?"

"Begor, then, he didn't so," said Tom. "an' more's the shame for him; but we won't forget it if he does. After all, it's reasonable of me thinkin' that Mike was goin' to mase, for he's turnin' pious iv late—a young saint, you know."

The young man laughed simultaneously, much to Mike's chagrin, and with a view to cover his reputation as a good fellow, he said:

"Troth, Tony, if ye'd like to know the ins and outs of it, I was on the look-out for ye, knowin', as I knowed for the last two weeks, that ye'd have a bit of divarsion to-day, and now an' iver I'm as good a man as any o' ye."

"More power to your potato cake," cried Tony, slapping Mike encouragingly on the back. "When the Driscolls give up sportin', ye may burn all the cards and shoot all the race-horses in the country. Come along, honey, for there's no time to be lost."

When the little party arrived at the kiln, they found it already in the occupation of a dozen of persons, who were disputing loudly over an alleged neglect on the part of some one present.

"Bring us all this way," cried one, "and when we come, there's not a card to play with."

"Dat Ted Nealon," said a sharp, wiry voice, "is de most in-sonest boy in de barony. He tink of notin' except atin' and drinkin', and gutlin'. 'Tis neider here nor dere, but 'twas a bleedin' shame to lave de cards to him."

"How'd yer totigue, Tim," said a manly young fellow, who appeared deeply dejected; "ye'd talk from this to Michaelmas, ye would. Look, min, there's only one thing for us. Draw lots to know who'll go to the village to buy a sixpenny pack at Betty Houlihan's."

The proposition was received with delight. A number of straws of various lengths were placed in Tony's hat, and the gamblers drew one each. On comparing them, Mike's was found to be the shortest of the lot. The result startled him not a little, but there was no help for it.

"Dere, you're de lucky man, so you are," said Tim, "and you're well deservin' of the honour, so you are. Take to your pins, now, and don't cry crack till you're back again wid us. And beware of de Good People."

With many recommendations "not to spare his heels" ringing in his ears, Mike left the kiln. An hour later, with the cards in one of his capacious pockets and a bottle of whikey in the other, he left the village and bent his steps homewards. He was in the highest spirits, for he anticipated rare sport; nor was his mind troubled by the reflection that he had sacrificed a solemn obligation to human respect for his companions. Whether it was that he had imbibed too much of the contents of the bottle, or that some unusual cause contributed to the elasticity of his temperament, we know not; but it is asserted, that whilst threading his way through Doonas Wood, the gay fellow carolled like a bird, and flourished his stick more than once with playful ingenuity. The extreme beauty of a little lawn, a place know as "The Fairies' Wake," hidden in a verdurous paling of holly trees, arrested his steps as he was about to cross it. The grass seemed to Mike to be grass of a softer and fresher texture than he had ever before seen; the trees, too, were of slenderer trunk and lovelier outline; and the patch of sky overhead was of deeper and richer blue than the sky usually wore at that season. "Surely," thought Mike, "if the Good People—Lord between us and harm—wanted a party place to foot a double reel, 'tis here they ought to come, and not to the old raths, where two cats couldn't dance comfortably barrin' they held their tails in their mouths. Well, at any rate, though the place is nice, I must say it's cowlid; and faith a dhrop would improve a boy's acquaintance with it." Having expressed this opinion, Mike raised the bottle to his lips and swallowed a copious draught of the fiery liquor. At the same time, he became sensible that the cards had fallen from his pocket and were scattered in a brilliant litter on the sward. Placing the bottle in his pocket, he stooped to pick them up, but to his astonishment they wouldn't wait for his fingers; they appeared to be suddenly endowed with life, for they hopped and skipped about in all directions with such liveliness of manner and such variety of motion that it was evident, as Mike subsequently remarked, "The Ould Boy's children had their Daddy's luck."

"Ah, thin, will ye be aisy, will ye, and stop yer easers," he cried, for the potent spirit had deadened his reverence for the supernatural to a degree bordering on disbelief in its existence. "Say ye'll come iv ye'll come, if ye don't, don't, for the deuce a one of me ud be bothered huntin' ye about for tin times yer worth. Knave of Spades, bad luck to me, but I'll twist yer neck, you dirty blackamoor, if you go on that way makin' a fool o' me. Queen of Diamonds, there's a darlint—thuch, thuch, thuch—an' she's goin' to let me take her, isn't she? Arrah, only mind how she cuts, head over heels—whoo! will she ever put a stop to her gallop. By japers, she's in debt to her house painter, and takes me for a bailiff. That's a decent, respectable man, the King of Hearts—a very decent man. Av coorse, he remembers the night when he won me the last trick of that murtherin' forty-five, when I bate Ned Hegarty to babby-raga. Yerra, look how he comes to me, faugh-a-balla, Five of Clubs, you pock-marked thief, and make way for his majesty. Yere gone agin, King of Hearts. Ye're gone, you shabby deceiver, with your ould petticoats streelin' to your heels. Farragh-adho, if you come forminat me now and stood and said, 'Take me, Mick Driscoll, take me,' I'd say, 'gerout, you ould bundle of tatters, I'd like to know who'd put you in their pocket?' Musha, Queen o' Spades, 'tis yourself that's a purty colleen, and proud I'll be to take you under my protection, with your nate curls hanging down your rosy cheeks, and the crown o' gold shinin' bright on your head. Whoo! jewel, how she foots it, as if she was dancin' at Billy Leonard's hop for a wager. Oh, the deeshy dawny little feet of her! and the lily hands, and the white tin fingers, so long and so taper, for all the world like two hanks o' candles! I have you, achora, I have you. Arrah, shoot me, but she's gone, like the rest iv 'em—gone clean, as Joe Bolster said, when he polished his brogues and pawned them afterwards. Honest woman, honest woman, I say you don't know me, or you'd behave yourself a thrife better. I'm Mike Driscoll, o' Doonas, I'd have you know. 'Tisn't myself that would say it, but there's not a girl in the barony that wouldn't cock her cap at me, if she thought 'twas any use for her. Do you hear that, Queen o' Spades! do you? go over to your ould bocceugh of a husband, that's makin' a fool iv himself in the bushes, tryin' to coax out the Queen o' Diamonds, iv you please, and tell him I said so. O! thin, murther, what's the matter with them at all at all? There they're flutterin' about, like leaves at harvest time, and all the art o' man couldn't lay hands on one o' their ugly carcasses. Not a hair I care anyhow, for they'll soon get tired in spite iv 'em, and then twill be easy enough to go up and talk wid them. Go on, go on, ye varmint, I wouldn't look after ye for the good iv ye. Whoo! that's right; when the somebodies dance mooneens, their father, av coorse, pays the piper."

During the delivery of this strange address, the speaker was busily engaged chasing the cards on his hands and knees, from place to place; but his labours proved fruitless. Sometimes a king card would dance within an inch of his hand, but when he stretched forth that member to capture the royal truant, the latter would bound a foot high from the grass, and roll away a dozen feet or more, when it would stand, as if inviting fresh pursuit. The queens insisted on sustaining the reputation of their sex for profound skill in coquetry. They would advance with a winning gait and fascinating air, towards the poor fellow, who used all his eloquence to induce them to return to his custody, and then prostrate themselves on the sward. But, strange to tell, when Mike laid hands on them, they would manage to glide out of his grasp, and go spinning about the lawn like humming-tops. The knaves were eminently successful in provoking Mr. Driscoll's indignation. The rogues would stride up to him, with a look which meant to convey—"Can't you put us in your pocket; then advancing their fat fore-legs, like a row of footmen at a Lord Mayor's dinner, and closing their left eyes, would gaze in his face so imploringly, that Mike was fain to pity them. Still, when he attempted to put them in his pocket, the merry young gentlemen would wheel round on their right heels, shake their wigged heads, and march off towards the trees, the skirts of their coats sticking out, and their swords dangling from their waists. As for the inferior cards they seldom came near him, contenting themselves with executing some mysterious movements under a neighbouring holly. Mike was disgusted with the whole business, and he was preparing to retire, when his ear was caught by a strain of unearthly music, which appeared to float up, thin and bodiless as the morning mist, from the Falls below; and having hovered overhead for a moment, died out in a chain of bell-like vibrations along the shores of the river. As he turned his eyes in the direction from which the music came, he saw that the sun had long gone down, scarcely a trace of twilight lingered in the skies, but a fragment of the moon had risen to the left, and filled the far-stretching landscape with a tender and melancholy brightness. Only a few stars were visible "in the intense inane;" the roar of the Falls was hushed, and a solemn stillness pervaded the air. The impression which the scene produced on the mind of the bewildered beholder was notably increased by the marvellous change which was taking place in the character and constitution of the cards. Some unseen magician had surely waved his wand above them, and transformed the slips of paper into the fantastic shapes which they were assuming. The four queens were quickly changed into winged fairies, which soared up gracefully from the sward, their airy draperies and wings, spotted with peacock's eyes, gleaming in the imperfect moonlight. Then the kings were divested of their uncouth robes, and transformed into slender elves, each with a blue bell on his head for a crown. The knaves, by a similarly confounding process, were changed into little old men, with hard, wry, rogues' faces, and decrepit bodies. They wore odd little hats, with triangular brims, and such queer jerkins and breeches, that Mike laughed outright as he watched them. As for the common cards, they were transformed into a brood of small fairy-like forms, whose backs and breasts were thickly spotted with clubs, spades, hearts, and diamonds. These latter tumbled about on the sward with uproarious merriment, and indulged in the quaintest grimaces and the shrillest of laughs. Suddenly a fresh burst of music rose from the Falls; this time a gay dancing measure. Directly the card fairies formed sets and chose partners, and fell to tripping one of the gayest double reels which Mike ever witnessed. A couple of elves, mounted on the backs of black-winged bats, sailed about in the air, and eventually ran a race to the corner of the moon for a dewberry handicap. The queen of hearts and diamonds, applying two fox-glove blossoms to their mouths, gave the signal for the start, and away went the jockeys. At the same time, the queen of spades and clubs flew over Mike's head, and dropped golden furze blossoms on his hat, which, as they rolled off the leaf, tickled his ears, and caused him to roar from a sense of exquisite enjoyment. Meanwhile, the elves continued to foot it feathily on the delicate tops of the slender brome grass, and with such dexterous energy, that Mike felt it impossible to suppress his admiration, and cried out at the top of his voice, "More power to ye, the devil a better!"

The words were scarcely uttered when the King of Hearts, a dapper little fellow, who was stretching his legs on a leaf of wild lavender, marched up to him, and, placing his hands behind his back, exclaimed;

"Musha, is that you, Mike Driscoll? Happy Christmas to you, Mick; but arn't you afeard of catchin' cowl'd on the broad o' yer back, there?"

"Sorra afeard," replied Mike; "the night isn't hot surely, but it isn't cowl'd, and—"

"Maybe," says the king, "ye'd have no objection, ma bouchal, to a dhrop o' the native. We keep the best you ever clapped eyes on, and betune you and me, it never paid duty either."

"If it's convanient, I could dispinee with it," said Mike: "but none o' yer thricks, mind. Isn't it the quarest thing on airth," he continued, "that I got the whole lock, stock, and barrel o' ye for a few pence from Betty Houlihan this morning, and here ye're caperin' and flutterin' about in such grand style as if yer had the riches of Daymur at yer backs."

"Keep yer insinivations to yerself," says the king, and his face grew red with anger. "Yer dirty hints wont sarve you here, I can tell you, Mike Driscoll. If you wish to behave dacent, we'll thrate you dacent; and to show you that we mane right, have a dhrop o' comfort afore we go farther." So saying, the king handed Mike a bottle with centuries of cobwebs clogged around its neck and sides.

Before putting the bottle to his mouth, something prompted Mike to look into it. Instead of being full of whiskey it contained a blue vapour, in the middle of which he perceived, floating about, the resemblance of a little girl, who, it was assumed, had been stolen by the fairies from her parents more than six years before. As he was opening his lips to speak to her, she motioned him to keep silent, and then whispered, "Mike, darlint, beware, and don't ait nor dhrink with them." He laid the bottle down in astonishment, and looked at the king.

"Ye're very temperate iv late, Mike," said the latter. "Is it because you don't like the colour iv it?"

"Troth, and it's not bad at all," replied Mike, "but I'd rather not take it jest now. If yer majesty will lave it to me a while, I promise to finish it before the night is over."

"Faith, an' you're more than welcome to it. Put it in yer pocket, Mike, and step across here till I have the honour and glory of introducing you to the Queen."

Mike followed the King across the grass to where her majesty was rocking herself to sleep on a bit of crowfoot.

"Are you awake, darlint," said the King; "bekase if you are, I'd like ye'd make the acquaintance of this fine fellow here."

The Queen, who was decidedly handsome, opened her eyes languidly and gazed on Mike. "Would you be after dancin' a double with me, young man?" she asked.

Mike bowed to the ground. "Would a cat drink new milk, ma'am?" was his reply.

"Ye're a flattherer, Mike Driscoll," said the Queen, blushing to the eyebrows. "Faith, ye're great at the blarney, anyhow. Ted," she continued, addressing the King, "will ye put yer finger in yer mouth, and whistle for the prime minister."

The King smiled and obeyed. In less than a minute the Knave of Hearts made his appearance.

"Ye're not dhrunk yet, are you?" asked the queen, thoughtfully.

"Dickens a dhrop more than two I tuk," replied the knave, and as he spoke both his ears shot up like a pair of straight horns at each side of his head.

"Thin as ye're not," said her majesty. "pick out the purtiest pair o' pumps in the chest o' dhrasers, and put them on Mr. Driscoll, for he's condescended to dance a double with your mistress."

"Oh, ma'am!" ejaculated Mike, "faith, as for the condescension, it's all the other way, indeed."

"Hould your bladdherin'," says the Queen, "hould your bladdherin', will you?"

The knave, who had disappeared, returned in a moment, and fitted Mick in a pair of beautiful pumps, with green heels, and rosettes at the insteps.

"Tis nate they look, Mr. Driscoll," observed her majesty, "but a plumper pair o' calves than yours I never seed afore. Och, 'tis you must play the dickens intirely with the girls, it is."

"Axin' your ladyship's pardon," exclaimed Mike, "but I'm as innocent as the babe unborn."

"Ha! ha! ha!" roared the knave, giving, at the same time, a diabolic grin, which distended his mouth almost to his ears! "ha! ha! ha!"

With a look of supreme contempt at the ugly scoffer, the queen gave Mike her hand, and led him to the middle of the lawn, where they mingled with the other royalties, male and female.

"Have a dhrop before you begin, Mike," said the Queen of Diamonds, who glittered from head to foot with shining jewels, at the same time pointing to the bottle, the neck of which was visible above his pocket.

Mike bowed. "I'm as thankful to you, ma'am, as if I tuk it; but it's nayther here nor there until the blood gets heated; when that biles, I'll cool it."

Diamonds smiled graciously. "May I make bould to ax yer hand for the next set?" she asked.

"Faix, an' you may, and welcome. When the Queen o' Hearts gets wake, I'm yer man, my lady. Whoo! there's the music."

An unseen orchestra struck up a lively tune, and Mike, having led his partner up and down in approved fashion, placed his arms a-kimbo, and began to foot it with an energy which astonished the denizens of fairy land around him. Now he flung up his right hand, snapped his fingers with a great thwack, which made the grasses tremble; now he retired, throwing his heels right and left, and making the long tails of his coat fly about distractedly.

"He's a rare jewel," says the Queen of Spades.

"Did you ever see the likes of him?" says her Majesty of Clubs.

"Remember your promise to me, Mike," whispered the Queen of Diamonds.

And the kings swore he was the best fellow in their dominions, and the knaves grinned with inextinguishable laughter, whilst the common cards went bobbing up and down, with the most comical gravity imaginable. Suddenly, the Queen of Diamonds gave a little shriek, and ran limping to a bed of wild thyme, where she lay down in apparent agony.

"What ails my delight?" screamed her royal consort, rushing to her side; "what's the matter, avourneen?"

"O, nothin' at all, at all," says the Queen.

"It's ill said of you," says the King, "and by my twelve retainers, I'll know the ins and outs of it."

"Troth, an' as ye're so curious, I'll tell ye; Mr. Driscoll throd on my corns—there."

"The flamin' blackguard," says the King. "Boys," said he to the Knaves, "take that boccaugh, and baste him green with nettles; bad look to his ugly crubeens, to-night."

The other royal personages hastened to interpose in behalf of Mike; and after a great deal of solicitation, backed up by the prayers of the wounded Queen, he was pardoned.

"It'll be all right, darlint," said the Queen of Hearts, banding over the beautiful invalid. "Put a bit o' brown soap to it, and 'twill be well afore ye're twice married."

Kneeling down at the poor Queen's feet, Mike took her foot in his hand, and began to chafe it, an operation which appeared to afford the sufferer no small delight. At the same time, a dapper little gentleman, in an oddly shaped hat, commenced to tickle the left side of his nose, whilst a pair of elves attempted to pull the bottle from his right pocket, and others poured showers of gold doubloons into his bosom.

"Does it pain you much, ma'am?" he asked, with a languishing look at the royal sufferer.

She smiled. "Begor, Mike," she said, "pain from you is a thrate. Are you tired o' dancin'? bekase, if you're not, I'd like to thry a minuet with you."

"You're welcome to it for a whole hour," replied Mr. Driscoll. "What'll be plasin' to you?"

"A minuet, Mike, a minuet."

"Oh, consarnin' the time, I lave that to yourself; but what would ye like? Are you partial to a jig, ma'am?"

The queen laughed outright.

"We'll dance a min-u-et, Mr. Driscoll, if you please. Didn't you ever thry one?" she asked.

"Oh, now I have it. No, thin, I didn't. I contracted with Tim Hinchy for three-ha'pence a-step, but he chated me out o' that dance, ma'am. Will ye be quiet, there, ye tazin' divils? Ma'am, spake a word or two to Paudheen, and intrate him to lave off ticklin' my nose. Curse o' Cromwell on ye, and lave the bottle alone—what's it doin' to ye? Can't ye thry and behave like Christhins—eh, can't ye?"

At a wave of the Queen's hand the elves desisted.

"There's the Queen of Hearts," she said; "mind, she'll be jealous o' me, Mike."

"Troth, thin, 'tis ill would become her. Is she spliced yet? I suppose ould Bullock Heart is her husband."

Diamonds was about to reply, when her royal sister seated herself at her side, and thus prevented Mike's curiosity from being gratified. At a signal from the Queen of Clubs, the whole company threw themselves in various positions on the grass; and as the Knave of Diamonds clapped his hands, the ground opened, and a round table, heaped with a sumptuous banquet, rose in their midst. To all solicitations to eat and make merry, Mick, who remembered the warning of the captive in the bottle, gave a firm but respectful refusal.

"Thry some of our blackberry jam," asked the Queen of Spades.

"Shall I send you a lark's leg, darlint?" said the Queen of Hearts. "Or a juicy alic from this sirloin of frog?" suggested the King of Clubs.

"I ax yer pardons all round," said Mike, "but I couldn't ate another morsel."

As Mike said this, he felt a tiny head laid lovingly on his shoulder, and heard the Queen of Hearts whisper:

"Ah, thin, Mr. Driscoll, were you ever coortin'?"

"Why, thin, not to say much, ma'am. There was a girl o' the Bradys that I had a likin' for, and was goin' to be married to her, till we fell out about a feather-bed and a goat. We wouldn't give, and they wouldn't take, and there was an ind of it."

The Queen sighed. "And did you never love any one, since, Mr. Driscoll?"

"Begor, thin, I'm afeard I did," replied Mike; "greatly afeard itself."

"Her name wasn't Brady, Mike—was it?"

"Begor, thin, yer right enough, ma'am, it wasn't Brady; 'twas the—the—"

"The what, darlint?"

"Why, 'twas the Queen o' Hearts, ma'am;" and as Mike made the terrible confession, he wound his arm round the Queen's neck, and imprinted a kiss on her cheek with so much vehemence that the report resounded like a clap of thunder over the locality. Kings, queens, knaves, and commoners sprang to their feet. "Treason!" "Revenge!" "Kill him!" "Sting him to death!" were the first cries which arose from the tumult.

"Tie his heels together," cried the Knave of Hearts, "and hang him out o' the moon."

"Give us a garter, Peggy," said the King of Hearts to his wife.

The lady parted with the ligature with evident unwillingness, and Mike's ankles were bound together in a trice. A cold sweat burst out through the pores of his body, and he grew powerless in the presence of the terrible doom which he had earned by his rashness. In vain he remonstrated, pleaded, and wept. A power he was unable to resist lifted him on the backs of four gigantic bats, and in three seconds he was being whirled towards the moon, attended by all the fairy company. The planet was reached in less than ten minutes, and Mick felt almost sick to death from the smell of stale cheese that pervaded the atmosphere.

"Hang him to this corner," cried the King of Hearts. "We'll let him see he don't kiss our wife for nothing."

"She can have it back, if 'twill please your majesty," said Mike. "I mint no harm."

"Here's a nice crumbledy corner to tie him to; 'twill break away in an hour, and then he'll be made porridge of," roared the Knave of Hearts.

A suitable spot was at length selected, and Mike, hanging head downwards between earth and heaven, was left swinging about in a storm which agitated the lonely lunar regions. Far below, he could see the world, and, when the wind lulled, could catch the roar of the Falls. His head grew dizzy, his heart sank within him, and, clasping his hands together, he exclaimed, "May the Lord have mercy on me." The words had not died on his lips when the corner of the moon he was hooked to snapped off, and he fell—down deeper, and deeper, and deeper! The stars shot past him, as he descended with the velocity of an aerolite; and, before he had time to bless himself, he alighted, with a great bound, on the world, narrowly escaping a plunge into the roaring Falls. He started up, he rubbed his eyes—what was this? where was the moon? and where were his tormentors? He was lying in the middle of the "Fairies' Wake," on the identical spot where he had taken the last draught of whiskey on returning homeward. Everything was quiet, not a leaf stirred; it was long past midnight, and the full, round moon of Christmas had begun to set. Looking up to the descending planet, he exclaimed, "'Twas a power of a fall intirely. I wonder was the bottle broke!" An examination of his pocket convinced him that it had not sustained a fracture; and, to his astonishment, the cards were all safe, and tightly packed together. "After all," he soliloquised, "I was only dhramin'; but ould brogues to me, if I play cards agin in a hurry—Sunday or Monday, or holiday, either. What the deuce has got into the bottle?" Holding the flask between his eyes and the light, he perceived something moving up and down the inside. For a moment, he was convinced that it was the spectral child, who had warned him to reject all offers of food and drink from the fairies, but, breaking the vessel, he discovered that it was only a field frog. Stiff and sore in every joint, he rose up and plodded homewards.

"You see, Mike," said his mother, when he had recounted in detail the experiences of the night, "that there's nayther luck nor grace in card-playin', for if you had gone where you ought, the Good People couldn't trouble you."

"True enough, mother," he replied; "but wait till I go card-playin' agin, and you'll be diggin' the praties on New-year's Day."

"There, go where ye ought to go," he exclaimed, throwing the new cards into the fire. "It's mighty plain that people who ride steeplechases on bats and dine on frog sirloins aren't fit company for honest Christians. And, mother, ye'll never agin have to fall out wid me about my duty; and here, may the Lord send us all A HUNDRED HAPPY CHRISTMASSES."

CHRISTMAS MEMORIES.

THE CHRISTMAS CHIME AND THE CHRISTMAS HYMN.

List! the Christmas Chime is pealing,
With its ever joyous swell;
And the midnight sky is sounding,
With the cheery ding, dong, bell!
From a thousand grey old turrets
Rings the dear familiar chime;
Ringing, ringing—bravely ringing—
For the merry Christmas time.
From a thousand blazing altars,
With soft clouds of incense dim,
Swelling, swelling, sweetly swelling,
Riseth up the Christmas hymn!

As it bursteth out with clanging speed,
Adown the frosty sky,
How many a ringing laugh grows still—
How dim grows many an eye!
And how the long-pent love breaks out,
The "Word made Flesh" to hail!
As ding, ding, dong, the Christmas peal
Comes dancing on the gale!

It telleth indeed of other days,
And it sings of a bygone time;
For ages have fled since first it shed
The notes of its merry chime.
But though ages have fled, and countless dead
Have bowed to the stroke of time,
Those stout old bells peal merrily on,
As they ring the Christmas Chime.

It rusheth forth from its turret grey,
With a sound right full and deep,
Like the wild wind's roar o'er the sea-girt shore,
When it wakes from its summer sleep.
And it hurrieth out with a surging swell,
And it seemeth in right hot speed,
For it knows that its song is a welcome one,
And that love is its own sure need.

Yet it lingereth first in the old churchyard,
And it whispereth round the graves,
With a mournful voice, like the babbling song
Of the gentle summer waves.
It seemeth to wail, with its own sad notes,
For the joys of the by-gone time;
It walleth for those who may listen no more
To the song of the Christmas Chime!

Then away it hies through the midnight skies,
And it floateth along the gale;
And it scattereth love, and it scattereth joy,
As it danceth through the vale,

And it greeteth the young, and it greeteth the old,
And it gladdens each list'ning ear,
For it singeth this song—oh! a right merry one,
But once in the passing year.

For those bells may sing, as they merrily ring
To greet each Sabbath time;
But they ring this peal but once in the year—
At the merry Christmas time.
Then ding, ding, dong, as it rusheth along,
It ringeth right merrily, ho!
And with ding, dong, bell, as it flits through the dell,
It chimeth right cheerily, ho!

I hear it now, that Christmas peal,
And now the Christmas strain,
As angel tongues, with heav'n-born notes
Thrill through me yet again;
And all my soul grows hot with love,
My eyes with tears grow dim,
As still I list from countless lips,
The holy Christmas Hymn.

And list it now!—how softly sweet
It floats along the sky;
And now again, with gathering force,
Like voices from on high,
As on to Heaven the grand old hymn
Is wafted up above,
To mingle there with angel tongues,
One song of hope and love.

And who shall say its tones grow old,
Or who shall break the spell,
The Christmas Hymn for ever wakes
In hearts that love it well?
The scent of flowers is ever sweet,
The force of love e'er strong,
But fresher, brighter, stronger far,
The holy Christmas Song.

It may be voices now are hush'd,
It may be eyes are dim,
That once flash'd quick and bright to ours,
To greet the Christmas Hymn,

And as the first "Adeste" falls
Upon the straining ear,
The sinking heart, the throbbing pulse,
Tell of some lost one dear—
And for a moment we are sad,
And scarce may sing our song,
As the Christmas Chime, and the Christmas Hymn, Float joyously along.

An instant more, and it has gone—
Our hearts grow full of love,
As a golden light comes gleaming down
In brightness from above.
As cherish'd tongues are heard once more,
The tongues of dear ones gone;
E'en little children, praying still.
"God bless us, every one."

In hope or fear, the Christmas Hymn
Is e'er a welcome guest;
It cometh, like some angel's song,
To speak of peace and rest.
For as it speedeth softly on,
It tells of nought but love,
And scattering fragrance o'er the past,
Still points us to above.

OLD KING CHRISTMAS.

OUR artist has "limned" him, in the centre of the beautiful engraving which embellishes the next page. That head is a glorious study—Pagan muscle and massiveness of development—Christian cheer and exultation. You fancy you hear the jolly old Viking roar from that huge mouth, and out of the hundred clefts of laughter which furrow his cheeks and forehead. He is a bit grizzled; but look at his beard, a frozen cascade, with all the water lines stiffened in the foggy sheet—you can almost see it wag. And those eyes—furnaces of fun, lighted up by the blaze of a million hearths and the better light of millions of happy faces. Bless him, though he is days distant whilst we write, we can hear the music of his sleigh-bells over the snow, and snatches of the carols he lifts up from his great heart, as the days grow shorter and the December stars rise earlier and earlier. Wait a little, and he shall rush into us from the wastes of midnight, whilst the cathedral steeples reel, and all the households of the land illuminate to welcome the time-honoured visitor. He is crowned with holly—gleaming holly, the noble evergreen which glitters with a verdurous brilliancy in our parks and shrubberies when the sycamores are leafless, and the oaks are as bare as maypoles on the second of June. Before he arrives the village boys shall have gone out to gather branches of the tree he loves, and hung them up to honour him. And when he sits by our hearths, little hands shall be stretched out for little presents, and little eyes peer roguishly into out-of-the-way corners where are hidden nuts and sweetmeats. Oh, dear uncles and aunts, when little Tom or Mary appeals to your pockets, pray do not refuse them churlishly, or put them off with a serio-comic equivocation. For, as French is to a Cockney, so is money to our dear children—a little of it goes a long way, and rich is the giver thereby. Hold! there are the sleigh-bells.

Our artist has caught the two sides of happy Christmas merriment; and has entered with all his cultivated enthusiasm into the spirit of each. See above, how daintily those nice people sit around the festive board, how gracefully the old gentleman rises to a toast; how fondly Maria indulges her indolent little brother, how demurely Kate listens to the precious whisperings of that young gentleman in the snowy shirt-front, whose eyes are turned in every but the right direction. That dog in Kate's lap is a spice suspicious; but, gracious goodness, don't we all know what subtle resources the women command when, like Lady Fitzpatrick in Planché's comedy, they wish they were coquettes? My good sir, that dog is a dummy, and as such enjoys a very enviable asylum. When Kate says, "Indeed!" in answer to some extraordinary observation of her friend to the right, she pats the animal's head; when annoyed from the same source, she pulls his ears; when made up for a "yes," she will whisper the affirmative, adding, "Oh! you poor little doggy;" but if bent on a "No," she will cast him from her lap, and cry "Get out!"

There is the rougher and heartier side of a Christmas revel sketched at the bottom of the picture. I have been looking at the faces of the two prominent figures for the last ten minutes, and have not yet grown tired of them. How sweetly bashful is the countenance of the young girl, as she averts it from the rather too confident gaze of her partner! How exquisitely she is posed, how gracefully draped—and, what is better, the whole figure is intensely and obviously natural. As for Pat, his enjoyment is evident—he is an incarnation of humour in frieze and shoe-leather. Were you to go over the ground in the morning, you would find it thickly tessellated with large nail prints, diversified, here and there, by the impression of an iron heel. For when Pat dances he does not depend exclusively upon his toes, but brings heel and sole into combined action. And to see him salute Peggy, as he leads her to her seat—but no, you can't. Look at that piper—don't you hear him blow?

Besides, we have hospitality personified in that woman who is leading the poor children from the deserted street into her house. God bless the kind hands whose gifts shall be multiplied at this season. It was a kind thought of the German poet when he represented the Infant Redeemer pacing the thoroughfares of a great town, at Christmas midnight, in the disguise of a destitute little child. The noble side of the Teutonic heart and brain broke out into that simple ballad; and the moral loses nothing by being translated. Be good to them. Then we have a picture in which the peasant children run to greet their father on his return home. What genial welcome beams from their happy faces! Heaven bless them with a happy Christmas!

Hark! hark! hark! the bells have ceased, the sledge is upturned in the snow—CHRISTMAS IS HERE!

CHRISTMAS EVE.

'Tis Christmas Eve, and, far and wide,
The shining snow spreads o'er the plain;
The fairy Frost has deftly dried
Her crystal mosses on the pane;
From grey church towers the Virgin Chimes
O'er hill and dale their sweetness pour,
And children sing their carol rhymes
Alike at Hall and Cottage door.

The eaves are hung with icy spars,
Snow-wreaths fantastic forms assume;
The moon-shines bright, and golden stars
In heaven's great garden burst to bloom.
The mansion wide its portals throws,
As in the merry days of yore;
And Welcome sits amid the snows
Alike at Hall and Cottage door.

The light that streams through lordly panes,
And makes the painted windows burn,
Is answer'd back from lowly lanes,
Where children hail their sire's return.
The wild bells ring with Christmas mirth,
And tell their tale of holy lore,—
Glory on High, goodwill on Earth,—
Alike at Hall and Cottage door.

Ay! this the key-note Christmas gives
To cheer us through the twelvemonth long,
And tune the burden of our lives
To echo back the angel's song.
Oh! may we join that glorious band
When, earthly joys and struggles o'er,
Dwellers in Hall and Cot shall stand
On equal terms at Heaven's door,

HOME AT LAST.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

HERE never was a more dreary day, in the dreariest winters, than that which set in the midst of a huge snow-drift, over the little town of Kilshane, on a Christmas Eve, forty years ago. As our readers may be looking out for the place in which we lay the scene of this "owre true tale," it may be as well to tell them, without further preface, that Kilshane is not the name by which the Post Office authorities know the locality of which we write, and from whose familiar archives of tradition we draw our story. But, nevertheless, Kilshane is name enough to our memory for the humble capital of an Irish mountain district, situate in the bosom of a pleasant valley, sheltered on the four quarters by great hills, which rise above like giant guardians who sentinel its repose. Once in the year it had its fair, when the streets were crowded with the big-boned, large-horned and fine-skinned cattle, known amongst the dealers as cows of the "real ould native breed," which have become superseded almost completely since by the more shapely, less serviceable, and unhealthy stock come of Devon pastures and Hereford sweeps. Once in the year there gathered within its precincts, to the imminent danger of every body, and the great profit of their owners, mountain raheries, and unbroke clibs, interspersed with worn-out garrags, whose great recommendation, at the instance of their strange-looking grooms—if grooms they can be called who never groomed the brutes—seemed to be the desperate agility with which they used their hind legs, and flung them out at anything and every body, of which a probability existed that they might reach. There never was an Irish fair without its pigs, and so once in the year, wherever the porcine crew crowded from, there were more pigs in the streets of Kilshane than, we believe, could be assembled in the streets of any other town in Ireland. None of the fair-goers seemed to be without an individual of the swinish multitude as an accompaniment, and some enjoyed the luxury of a dozen. This "once in the year" was always a great day in that little mountain mart, for of all the days in the year it fell upon Christmas Eve. Every body came down from the declivity of the hills around, for many a mile, to purchase or to sell, and prepare for the festival of the morrow, in honour of the Babe of Bethlehem. The poorest peasant, gaunt and worn with ill-requited toil, and lengthened days of hunger, had pinched himself for weeks before to buy that one candle which he enjoyed in all the year, and whose light should burn that night of nights in the midst of his children; he came thither to buy with the poor taper the provisions of an humble feast, to cheer his meagre board, and do fitting reverence to the day of the Heaven-descended. The more comfortable farmer journeyed there also, and chaffed, and joked, and bought and sold through the entire day, to go home in the dusk, not the most sober man in the world, as he sat upon his well-laden truck-car, bringing to the good woman at home store of meat and meal, spirits and spices, not forgetting the new-fangled but fascinating package of tea. Besides these regular drifts of humanity, there were irregular ones too, blown to Kilshane by all the erratic winds of impulse, profit, or promise, upon the yearly occasion. Beggars, particularly shrill in voice, and remarkably pious of sentiment; nondescript individuals, forming maimed portions of humanity, very lame, very blind, and very ragged; some who enjoyed a loss of legs, some who enjoyed a loss of arms, and throve in a remarkable manner on their deficiency; those crowded in what little room was unoccupied by cows and horses, pigs and dealers—and prayed or imprecated, slandered or sneered, with the greatest ease, as it pleased them.

So went the day of the fair always, and so it fared in Kilshane after its accustomed manner, on the day our story opens. But with the fall of the night the snow lay in dirty heaps in the straggling street, where the cattle had trampled it into mud. The thoroughfares were empty of all the crowds that occupied them during the day, except the occasional passers-by, who journeyed homeward with their marketing. The little shops were filled with customers for their wares, and the taverns were crowded with those who had sold or bought in the fair of the day—dealers, farmers, and the usual eccentrics attendant upon those occasions, on such folk. Here there was noise and bustle, loud generosity or garrulous quarrelsomeness, as around the rude bar the frieze-coated crowd clustered, in the mist which arose from the steaming punch before them, or the fog of tobacco smoke which filled the atmosphere with its dense clouds, in which those individuals breathed, somehow without being asphyxiated.

In one of those—the Kilshane Arms—as the name was inscribed on a creaky sign which swung from above the door, a larger crowd was assembled than in any of the rest. Behind the counter a buxom, good-humoured-looking woman, attended to the many calls made upon her by the uncouth waiters who came to the bar from time to time, and gave their orders, as they were bidden by the guests in various parts of the house. Filling measures, keeping count, and receiving money, was giving the lively hostess enough to do, when a group of five or six persons entered from the street, amongst whom was a girl of twenty-four or twenty-five years old, modest in aspect, large eyed, and well featured, but whose face was marked with a paleness as of much care. Her dress was neat, but worn, and she seemed to shun observation from the persons amongst whom she found herself, on entering the house, by clinging closer to an old man, whose coarse resemblance to her fair young face, indicated the relationship of a parent. She whispered in his ear, when he immediately went over to the woman in the bar.

"Mrs. Keogh," said he; "is there anywhere I could bring Mary until I make a settlement wid Tom Corkran here?"

The hostess stopped for a moment in the full flow of her occupation, and looked at the interrogator.

"Why then, Misther Donovan," said she, "you and yours must have any place in the house yez want."

"Jemmy," she called to a thick-set man, "mind the customers here, 'till I go wid Misther Donovan down to the kitchen; it's the quietest spot in the 'Arms' to-night."

"Ah, then, Mary Donovan," said she to the girl we have before noticed, "bud you're welkin. I wondher you wouldn't spake. In throth, achora, I'm glad an' I'm sorry to see you, for sake ov the poor mother that's gone. Cum down to the kitchen; I know you'd rather be there than among all the crowd wid their noise, and their talk; it's myself that's sick of them."

With those words she brought the party, leading Mary by the hand herself, down a passage which led backwards to the kitchen.

"Now, Misther Donovan," said she, as they entered that apartment, "yez will have no one to molest yez here, and can settle whatever yez have to settle in pace an' quietness."

"Beg your pardin, sir," she continued to a man who sat at the fire, with a hat drawn over his eyes, of a shape now known as a "Jerry," but then totally unusual in that remote district; "beg your pardin, sur, bud this young woman is cowlid, and th' evenin's sharp, an' if its plazin' to you to further over a little more, there'll be room, an' to spare, for all parties."

"I'm obleeged to ye; that'll do, now," she continued, as the stranger hastily drew himself more towards the side of the hearth, where a huge fire of turf blazed, sending out a welcome glow. "Now, Misther Donovan, what'll you an' your friends take? I'm goin' to get a cup of tay for myself and poor Mary, the crathur, an' you'll take sumthin' in the manetime."

"Oh, the hard stuff for us, Missis Keogh," said one of the men.

"In throth, Phil Corkran," she replied, "you're bould enough to answer for yourself, I'll go bail; but it's Misther Donovan I'm askin', and not you. The best in my house he'll have at his command, for he's a dacent man and was a comfortable man too."

"That's as much Missis Keogh," replied the man addressed as Phil Corkran, "as to say that I'm a comfortable man, bud not a dacent man. Well, it's all right, av coorse, but Misther Donovan is to thrate me now, whether you'll do it or not."

"Give us some sperits, Missis Keogh," said Donovan, glancing deprecatingly at the kindly hostess; "id's Christmas Eve, ma'am, an' we're all good enough according to our wakeness, if we only remember the bleasin' that fell upon the earth many a hunder years ago, to tache us humility. Phil is a bit sharp; but there's worse nor him."

"Id's good to hear you, Misther Donovan, sayin' that," she answered; "it's Christian like to the man who drove your little stock to this day's fair, for your Novimber rint, bud I'm not bound to think the better av him fur all that. Natty," said she to the little boy, "go up to your father an' bring down a bottle av spirits and some tay. Hurry, like a good child."

Natty soon returned with the required articles, and while the good woman of the Kilshane Arms busies herself in getting ready the tea for her guest, and whilst the men are making their settlement, we will take a retrospect of the events which gathered those individuals in the kitchen of the humble hostel of the valley village.

Seven years before the Christmas Eve to which we refer there was no more comfortable farmer than Ulick Donovan in all the district within ten miles of Kilshane. He held a couple of hundred acres of land, the best in the neighbourhood, and it lay within a short half-mile of the little town. His kith and kin had dwelt for many a hundred years before him in the pleasant farm-house, whose white-washed walls gleamed a short way up the slope of one of the hills which surrounded the valley, and which was built at the extremity of his holding next the mountain. By that alternation of events peculiar to the history of Ireland alone amidst European nations, he, the rightful heir of the soil, had found himself the tenant of it at the hands of the owner at law. However, those territorial lords had rendered the change of fortune of the Donovan family less bitter than it might have been. Through three or four generations they had permitted them to hold some hundreds of acres at a very moderate rent, and at last, when the relaxation of the laws against certain forms of religious profession had permitted such a step, they gave to the representative of that family a long lease of his land, at a low valuation. By reason of this encouragement Ulick Donovan, the grandson of the lessee, was a thriving man when he began the world. His neighbours looked up to him both from his good native blood and his independence, and the world went well with him up to that period. He had married a very amiable girl, the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood, with whom he got only the wealth of a cheerful temper, a good heart, and a thrifty hand. One child, a daughter, had blessed their union, and through her came the first sorrow on Ulick Donovan's home. Beside him, there resided on a farm bordering his own a well-to-do man, named Connell Carroll. He was a widower, and had an only son. Charley Carroll was a reckless, hearty boy, whose exuberance of life involved him in perpetual scrapes. His father died suddenly before he had reached the years of manhood, and Ulick Donovan, with a kindly feeling, aided the young man with his advice and assistance. The more he knew him the greater interest he felt in his welfare. Thus, Charley Carroll was a frequent guest at Donovan's house; and as Mary Donovan grew towards womanhood, the old story came to be repeated—Charley Carroll and Mary Donovan were lovers. Everybody in the parish knew it, and everybody in the parish talked of it. Wiseacres shook their heads at the notion of wild Charley Carroll and gentle Mary Donovan being ever husband and wife; and Charley was as wild with great, manly excitement of existence, as ever Irishman had been before. The joyous recklessness of the young man at last brought him into trouble. It was a time of great political excitement. Informers had their golden opportunity, and they did not neglect its use. They founded secret societies, and deluded young men into their meshes. They told them some specious tale about a union of Irishmen extending over the country in solemn league for her redemption. Every ardent spirit rushed into the wild hope there held out to tempt it. The first man initiated was Charley Carroll. There was danger in it, there was risk in it; and danger and risk were his delight. He neglected his farm, and he spent his money in aiding an organisation which was only the terrible shambling, where the informer was yet to make his blood-stained profits. When his money was gone, and the bloodhound had taken all from his victim, the villain who deceived him with false light of patriotism, made his way to the authorities, and at its nightly council the illegal society was surrounded by a police force. Every member was taken except Charley Carroll. A blow from his arm levelled the man who approached to seize him, and with a bound he was away through the darkness of the night.

Charley was never seen again; but Mary Donovan knew somehow that he was gone to America. The girl drooped and sickened; fever developed itself in her illness. Her mother paid her every care and attention that fondness could give, or zeal bestow; and saw it all repaid in the restoration to health of her darling. But the overstrained maternal love had left Mary Donovan's mother susceptible to the disease whose ordeal she had endured herself. With her uprise from the bed of illness her mother was prostrated. The disease came to kill—and did kill her—leaving Ulick Donovan a widower, and his child motherless. With this visitation came a succession of misfortune. Donovan's cattle died; he had bad crops; and worse than all, his lease terminated and a portion of his land, the best, was taken from him, and given to Corkran, the "rent warner," and the rent of the remainder doubled. The once comfortable farmer saw his substance gradually decrease, notwithstanding all his exertions and industry, so from day to day things went from bad to worse, until at length an unfavourable season left Ulick Donovan unable to pay his current gale of rent. The landlord was an absentee; matters were managed by his agent, who was very much guided in his dealings with the tenantry by Tom Corkran, the "rent warner." Tom was not a good adviser to the agent, but a grasping man, who took every opportunity of increasing his own store at the cost of the tenant's ruin; but so skilfully did he manage, that he took the blame from his own, to lay it on his superior's shoulders. He lent money to the insolvent tenant, if he saw means in his hands to repay his own claim, and then Tom took a favourable opportunity to make the agent press for rent due, and got the stock of the tenant for about half its value. In this profitable system he was ably assisted by his nephew, Philip Corkran, an insolent bullying fellow, who levied a kind of black mail, in his own fashion. Phil enjoyed the life "of a fighting cock," to use his own expression. He was feted by the trembling serfs on the estate, upon all occasions, and they were remarkably frequent, when he chose to honour them with his company. Philip enjoyed the prospect too, of the probable reversion of the goods of his cunning and thrifty uncle, as that personage lived in a state of single blessedness. This worthy had begun to look with a favourable eye on Mary Donovan. The farm still held by her father, and in probable reversion to her, might have something to do with his admiration for the fair girl. She was satisfied to endure the unwelcome attentions which she received from Corkran, whilst plainly enough intimating in her reception of them that she should prefer their discontinuance; but Philip knew very well that his influence exercised a despotic ascendancy over the Donovans, and hoped to improve his position in the maiden's favour with time and opportunity. On the occasion on which we introduce the party at the "Kilbane Arms," old Tom Corkran had pursued his usual game of purchasing the farm stock of Ulick Donovan at a valuation, which exceeded by some few pounds the rent due by the ruined old man, and the party had entered the inn to arrange the matter finally.

Whilst we have been entering into the history of these personages, Mary Donovan has been taking the tea prepared for her by the hostess. The stranger has been sitting in the shadow of the chimney, looking with an enquiring gaze on the passage of events before him. Phil Corkran has been indulging in his potations rather freely with the men who accompanied him; and Ulick Donovan is looking through his spectacles into the account furnished him by old Tom Corkran, and comparing it with the amount of money before him on the table.

"In troth, Misther Donovan" said Mrs. Keogh, "this is a poor Christmas-eve enough for you, to be shure, you that knew what comfort and manes was on sich occasions, an' its sorry I am to see ye on the bizness ye've cum about here to day. Whin the last of a man's stock goes, he may go himself soon after. Musha thin, Tom Corkran, ye might lave him a cow to give him a sup o' milk."

"Ye see, Missis Keogh," said Tom, "I wud if I cud; but the agent is mortal hard on me, an' I took the cattle only to sarve Misther Donovan here, and to save the costs of a seizure, an' I must sell thim again, for I want the money badly meself."

"B'lieve me, Tom," she replied, "things o' this sort don't end well. There isn't luck in them, except its bad luck. Misther Donovan, wan way or other, has been hunted into this strait, an' I tell you, whoivir is at the bottom av it won't thrive."

"I tell you what it is, Missis Keogh," interposed Phil Corkran, who had sat listening to the conversation, and emptying the glasses he had repeatedly filled, "this thing can all be settled comfortably. Here's Mary here," said he, "an she has it all in her own power to make her father as airy as ivir, if she only takes my advice."

Delivering himself of this peroration, Phil drew his chair over beside Mary Donovan, and sitting down, continued:

"An d'ye know what that advice is, Mary? Jist only to get married, an take meself to put the ring on yer finger."

Mary looked around her towards her father, as the drunken fellow addressed this speech to her, but she knew the difficulties which surrounded him commanded her civility to Phil, and she answered:

"I don't mean to lave my father, Misther Corkran, an I don't think he'd let me if I was willing itself—which I am not."

"Aisy, now, Mary, its only coaxin' you want," said Corkran, attempting to put his arm around her waist. "Mind you I'm a better man than Charley Carroll, who, they do say, softened your heart want; cum now, Mary!"

"Charley Carroll," said she, pushing her chair away, "is dead an' gone, God rest him, an' the dead oughtn't to be meddled for the sorta of the livin'."

"Divil a hair I care," said he, "where he is, bud you're here, an so am I, an' I make you a fair offer, an' bedad id's a good wan. Cum over here now."

He grasped her hand as he spoke, and tried to make her sit beside him. Mary struggled to free her fingers from his grasp in vain.

"Let me out, Phil Corkran!" she said, indignantly, "let me out; I want none of your freedoms."

"Ha! ha!" laughed the ruffian, "in throth it's on me knee you'll sit, an you'll be kinder presently."

He pulled her forcibly over to him, when the stranger in the corner arose, took off his hat, divested himself of his over coat and neck-tie, and turning to the struggling girl, caught her around the waist with one arm, and dealt Corkran a blow of such force with the other, that he fell sprawling backwards across the chair on which he had intended to seat himself.

"Mary Donovan," said the stranger, "its many a year since I saw your face, but I didn't forget you, nor have you forgotten me. I came jist in time to-night to serve you, but little I thought that sorrow had such a gripe upon you and yours as from all I heard here I know it has."

"Oh Charley," said Mary, clinging hysterically to his neck, "why didn't you let us know where you were, an' we'd know where to find a friend."

"All in good time, Mary, I'll tell you my story; but sit down until I settle an old score with this blackguard," he said, pointing to Phil Corkran, who had risen to his feet and was glaring at his rival with an expression of ferocious cowardice.

"Cum away, Phil," said one of the men who had accompanied him; "cum away, man."

"I wont," roared Phil, "I'll knock the life out of that returned informer."

Phil shook his stick menacingly at Charley Carroll, for he was the stranger.

"Call me that name again," said Carroll, "and not all the law in the world will save ye from my hands."

"Cum Phil," said the man who had before interposed, linking his arm within that of the ruffian, and bringing him to the door.

"Go now," said Carroll, "or I'll make ye."

"I wont," roared Phil, as he went out shaking his stick, and in a violent exertion not to get back. "I wont," he shouted until the door closed behind him.

"And now, Tom Corkran," said Carroll, "what is the amount of your claim against Ulick Donovan?"

"A half year's rent," promptly answered Tom.

"Give me the agent's receipt for it," said Carroll, "and here it is," unfolding, as he spoke, a roll of notes. "Bring home your cattle, I'll satisfy this man's claim."

Old Donovan looked up in the stranger's face with an air of bewilderment, whilst Carroll laughed.

"Don't be ashamed to take a little return from wild Charley Carroll for all the kindness you gave him" he said. "I went from Ireland a poor and hunted man. I stand upon her shores again, able to buy out the owner of Kilehane if he'll only sell it; and, to tell you truly, I am expecting a letter from my solicitor that every inch of the old sod is mine, for I have been already in treaty with its beggared possessor. But hush, there is twelve o'clock, it is the Christmas morning—shake hands old friend! I wish you a merry Christmas and many happy returns of the season."

There is hardly any need for us to continue this episode of life amongst our peasantry. Charles Carroll had made a fortune in the war of liberation of the Spanish States of America; and he had come home to claim the hand and heart of the girl he loved, and to whom he had been true amidst all vicissitudes. When the Christmas Eve came round again, he was master of all the broad acres of the estate of Kilehane. He had his home in the ancestral mansion which adorned it; and beside his hearth, its presiding genius, hovered his fair young wife. She had grown in beauty as she had grown in happiness. Endowed with native grace, she adorned the sphere to which she had been raised. Tried with poverty, she had not forgotten the poor; and never did the Christmas come on Kilehane, in which all its tenants rejoiced so heartily before, as on the first occasion when wild Charley Carroll and gentle Mary Donovan presided in "the House," as it was called par excellence. In a hundred homes their happiness was prayed for on that night. From a thousand hearts arose the most fervent orisons which ever besought heaven's blessing on human heads, for they were orisons that broke from hearts filled with gratitude, respect, and affection. All the intermediate details we leave to your imagination, dear reader; but if Charley Carroll and Mary his wife did not live happy, that you and I may.

I think she works more than our servant Susan, as I never see her unemployed. She says that idleness would make her sick, so manages amongst other things to attend outdoors' morning devotion. Mother says that I have the "turn" of father. Father is dead nearly thirty years. Mother has seen better days, even in my memory; thanks Providence for all things, and is satisfied. She says that I am the "prop" of her old age. I am a poor support, for so far, but I told her lately "stays" might help both of us. I think she understood me, for, said she, "I will look to it." I do not think she did look to it, however.

Mother and I live in a very old city, and in what had been a very retired street. We took our house on account of its "quiet neighbourhood," but the railway terminus, and the new paving blocks, have converted it into a rattling locality. I am obliged to study in a three-pair back, and with plugged ears. So much for improvements.

Down west mother has a sister—Aunt Margaret. She is old unmarried, and I think that she is a strong-minded woman. Mother thinks so too. Aunt Margaret is rich; she lives in a large old ivy-clad house, sits in a green plantation, and feeds calves, turkeys, and young lambs. I was at her house—"Derrybramble Manor" is the name of it—once upon a time. Aunt Margaret is no way like mother, unless that she, too, reads without glasses. Twice annually Aunt Margaret comes to town; not for the purpose of seeing mother and I, but to arrange with her banker and her broker. Last time she was in town, she told us that her shares in the railway companies were more than sufficient to qualify her as director for each, were ladies admissible. I proffered her my services, and said I would represent her if it would do, but she said I should "mount the hill of fame by means of my own ladder." I told Aunt Margaret that my difficulty lay in the procurement of the ladder, and that if I had the ladder and some one to hold it securely at bottom, I would mount the hill of fame or higher. Aunt Margaret replied that there was "something" in my observations worthy of consideration. Mother shook her head at me. So the subject dropped.

Aunt Margaret sends us three times annually, from Derrybramble Manor, a large hamper, heavy and full of her northern productions—rabbits, turkeys, eggs, and what not. Not so bad of Aunt Margaret; but it would be better for us if she would send even a smaller hamper more frequently. I told mother so, but she replied, "hush child!" I was right, however, in so far as our Christmas hamper was concerned, as shall be known presently, but I'll tell it in confidence and secrecy, for fear of Aunt Margaret coming to hear how the contents of the hampers used to be distributed.

For a number of years past, when Aunt Margaret used to forward a hamper, she wrote to mother, by that day's post, and enclosed a "catalogue of contents" of hamper. She sent the catalogue, she said, for fear of "pilferage." Last Christmas-time Aunt Margaret's letter and catalogue came to mother. The catalogue was long, very interesting, and elicited our fullest meed of praise to Aunt Margaret for her kind selections. The letter stated, that the hamper had been forwarded, and would be delivered by the railway company, likely ere the letter had arrived.

Now we would not, for the world, wish that Aunt Margaret should know, that out of all the hampers full, sent from Derrybramble Manor to us, mother kept for our own use so much only as would be sure to hold good and palatable, and made presents of the remaining portions to "struggling acquaintances." This mother had done for years upon years. So on this occasion, mother sent word to the struggling people, that the catalogue had come, and the hamper, when received, would be seen into. This proceeding was all very good, but our astonishment was indeed great at not receiving, on the following day, the hamper, nor did it come to hand on the Sunday which followed, although the vans were out on that sanctified day, as we took care to note. Mother said that the frost and the snow retarded quick delivery, an observation in which I fully concurred, so we expected that the hamper would surely come on Monday. We were disappointed, however; no hamper came to hand, up to long long after dusk, nor afterwards, to Christmas Eve!

It was after nine o'clock at night, and within a very few hours of the anniversary of that glorious day which gave joy to heaven, and hope to poor mortality; yet Aunt Margaret's hamper had not arrived! Mother was put about; she did not care for herself, she said, but her word was pledged. Servant Susan, did not like "tossication" on Christmas-day, she said, "railways were a pest, and she always thought so. They (the railways) should be tried for their lives." As for her, "she would sooner, by far, walk home to Derrybramble (her native locality), than give the railway company a shilling of her money,—in this determination she would live and die." I remembered that there would be a "late" train, and I determined to see if it were possible for us to have the hamper for the Christmas; so I put on my hat and cape, and went to the railway station. The train had just arrived,—the parcel-offices were open,—the goods stores were open, the clerks and porters were busy.

I was informed that the "vans" were then out—late as it was—and that they would be delivering on the following day, although it would be Christmas-day. Mother and I did expect the hamper would be to hand early next day. Christmas morning came, but no hamper. I asked mother what was to be done, as I knew she did not purchase at the Christmas market, depending on the hamper from Derrybramble Manor. Mother said it would be "all right." I thought this her way, so did not feel contented. I again went to the railway station, where I found very many persons looking after their Christmas hampers and Christmas parcels. There were there old gentlemen, who used very energetic language to the clerks, considering it was Christmas-day, and young gentlemen, who said they were too much annoyed to speak; and ladies tapped with their parasols the desks and counters; and others scolded, and took off their gloves, and put them on again; and poor people who spoke of the hardship, and the disappointment, and the loss, as they depended on the coming things, and had "managed" accordingly. And we all said, or did, something; and the clerks said but little but wrote much, and they were literally "hampered" with packages, and with us. So we were told the vans were out, and that we should get out too. And the superintendent got annoyed, and said again that we should retire; and we did retire, under protest, and we were all put about; and some threatened "damages," and some said they would see to it; and some said their hampers were long, long overdue; and a wag—I think he was a wag—cried "foul play." And I went to mother and told her how matters stood, and she did not appear disappointed then, but said "Heaven help the poor!" and I said "amen," for I was very sorrowful.

I have not ascertained in what manner our "struggling friends" managed under the disappointment we caused them; but mother, I do know, managed as if no disappointment had occurred. She always got over difficulties; she is used to them, she says, and tries to be prepared accordingly. Our Christmas fowl, which we had for dinner, was very good (but mother says now that it was not as good as if the production of Derrybramble); the plum-pudding was delicious, and rich in fruit. I am fond of good fruit. Tom Bredin, my old class-fellow, and old Mr. Benjamin, our private tutor, dined and spent the evening with mother and I. Tom sang some original songs; I accompanied him with my voice and piano. Mr. Benjamin discoursed mother and the decanters; I think that he discoursed the contents of the decanters very fully and freely, for long before he left, his face got claret-coloured quite; his mouth and voice "thick" and altered in tone, his eyes in expression, and his gait quite irregular, as he got up to propose a "Happy Christmas and many of them," and health and felicity to my pupils. Mr. Henry Vincent Turgram and Mrs. Turgram (mother and I) and Mr. Bredin the "stellations of the age," the "totality of genius"; the modern Sylvia and her "two" sons. He was not very particular as to who were his pupils, or mother's offspring. Mr. Benjamin then wished to sing his latinized "Shipwrecked Sailor." Tom and I objected, on account of Mr. Benjamin's articulation, which was nearly indistinct, and on account of the time of night. After a little time Tom and Mr. Benjamin saw each other home.

Thus were on, and nearly out, Christmas Day. Mother appeared happy, servant Susan was, I suppose, happy, for she had friends below stairs, and their laughter was very loud, and very frequent. I sat by the drawing-room fire, in our arm-chair, happy also—so happy as to fall fast asleep and to dream of railways, Aunt Margaret, Mr. Benjamin, and Derrybramble. I dreamed that mother, Aunt Margaret, and I, were preparing for servant Susan and our disappointed friends a magnificent dinner, and that some great guest was to be also at the dinner, and that Aunt Margaret only knew the name of this great guest, and that she would not divulge the name, (which name consequently remains a puzzle to posterity), and that my duty, specified to me by Aunt Margaret, was to "keep a clear and smokeless fire, and from a dent, which was placed in an angle of a large iron tray, that rested beneath revolving spits, to keep lubricated the fowl, and whole sides of oxen, which were placed on the spits, the ladle by which I was to lubricate consisting of a handle several feet in length, surmounted by a cup quite as large as half the sphere of a foot-ball. My duty was arduous and unremitting, particularly so on account of the "close eye" Aunt Margaret kept on me, and worst of all was, she would not listen to my protestations against the ungeniality of the occupation in which I was engaged, nor place me in a less humiliating, less tortuous, or less warm employment. Aunt Margaret herself was at a side table, making pastry, and rolling it out with a rolling pin—(work I considered very easy for Aunt Margaret after her years of experience), and as she rolled out the pastry, she rolled me out her "mind" on hard work, the "hill of fame," and her paid-up capital in the three companies, and I plied the ladle vigorously, and kept the fire bright. At length Aunt Margaret finished the pastry, so came to me with the rolling-pin in her hand, and said, "Take this rolling-pin, it will form the first rung for your ladder to mount the hill of fame." She then tapped me on the back, and left me. Astonished and perplexed at my position, with the rolling-pin in one hand and the ladle in the other, with the contents on the spits, which smoked and hissed for lubrication, and with the fire, which was running down fast, I awoke, and found mother in the act of tapping me on the back and shoulders, and servant Susan laughing so heartily as to be scarcely able to ejaculate, "The Christmas hamper has come at last but the eggs are broken!"

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER V.

AMAICA LODGE is within a sixpenny ride of London. Therefore, when no engagement kept John Ashby in town on Saturday, it was his custom to repair thither in the afternoon, and to remain till Monday morning. He seldom left the Temple, however, without having entreated one or two of his intimate friends to keep him company there on the Sunday afternoon. He promised them an excellent glass of wine, and the run of his father's cigar-box. These were temptations to many of his associates, but particularly to Namby.

We will ring up the curtain upon the Lodge on a certain Saturday afternoon, when John Ashby was comfortably seated at the parental hearth; his carpet bag having been deposited very carefully in his bedroom by his sister Victoria, who always insisted upon performing this duty for him.

"So Mr. Faversham is well, Jack?" said Mr. Ashby.

"All right, now—the jellies did it—or the tracts. Which do you think, Araminta?" and Jack turned maliciously to the saint. The saint looked neither so pale nor so frigid as usual.

"If Mr. Faversham has not been altogether spoiled by bad society, he has possibly derived more benefit from a certain divine's advice, than you, with your mockery, dream of, Jack."

"No lectures, Araminta; I can wait till to-morrow morning," said Jack. "Faversham—I'll do him that justice—certainly read them all, and seemed to be very properly dull afterwards. By George, all men are dull while they are ill."

"That is true, John," continued the saint; "while they are ill, they are serious; make all kinds of professions; will read good writings; but directly they leave their rooms, they leave their religion; alas!"

"Very true," interposed the elder Ashby, venturing rather timidly to open an argument with his immaculate daughter; "but is it quite clear, my dear child, that this falling off is not owing to the habit of basing religious instruction upon a system of the purest selfishness?"

The saint looked horrified. She even rose from her recumbent position upon the sofa—an effort which proved the intensity of her excitement.

"Yes, my dear child, an organised selfishness. The sick are taught to pray—why? Because death may be at their elbows, waiting for his prey. What is the object of their prayers?—their own salvation? Why, when they get better, do they cease to be devout?—because the danger is no longer present. Death has lifted his lean fingers from their pillow, and walked on his way to another."

"Pure selfishness, by George!" exclaimed Jack, as he filled his wine glass.

"Well!" said Miss Ashby, with a tone of wonder. She was waiting, staring with her cold eyes upon her father, evidently pausing to see how far he had proceeded on the road to perdition.

"Well, my dear, I have done. This has struck me very forcibly. I am convinced that there is a rotten selfishness which generally pervades the world. All that we do of good, we do, not for the love of the work, but because we hope to get cent for cent, of happiness out of the performance."

Jack generally made his appearance, on Sunday, when the family were at luncheon after their return from church. He would come down from his bedroom with a crumpled copy of yesterday's "Times" in his hand, followed by "Cheek"—his beloved terrier. Mr. Ashby invariably observed, on these occasions, that no young man had ever made his way in the world who had not risen early some time in his life. Jack invariably replied, that he intended to turn over a new leaf on the following morning. Then a walk occupied the family till dinner-time. Before sitting down to this important meal, how anxiously had Jack always stretched his neck over the garden gate, to look out for visitors "looming in the distance." When he had looked in vain for the outlines of some dear Temple friend, how sulkily did the young fellow sit down to dinner—in no way reconciled to the idea of an afternoon with his serious family. Alone, he was not a man there. He could not seize upon the decanter when he chose; his opinions went for nothing; his subjects of conversation were not those of his father. The jokes he had to tell were not jokes to the paternal ear:—the confidences he had to make could not, alas! be poured upon the paternal heart. No, he was a boy, and his father was a man! it seemed impossible to alter these relations. The exclamation of the old lady of ninety when she lost her promising daughter of seventy-two, ("I knew I should never rear that child!") appeared quite natural, and in no way ridiculous to him. He felt that, should his father live to complete his ninetieth year, he would remain liable to a box of the ear at sixty-five. Jack loved his father nevertheless—and felt that his weekly visits were matters of duty—of common gratitude; for his father had helped him out of many scrapes, and had always cleared the clouds from his prospects, when his own follies had darkened his way.

The Sunday which was the morrow of that evening on which the conversation on Faversham's recovery took place, was, however, one of Jack's bright Sundays. Both Namby and Faversham had promised to reach Jamaica Lodge before the dinner-hour. Faversham arrived very early; he opened the gate, as Amy was locking up the luncheon-sherry, before going out, in obedience to the maternal idea, that servants' virtue was not proof against a wine bottle.

"Here is Mr. Faversham!" shouted Victoria, opening the parlour door.

"That's all right," Jack replied emphatically. A load had evidently been taken off his mind.

Faversham was pleased to remark the evident pleasure with which he was received. Miss Ashby dropped her little lavender glove into his hand, then went up stairs to prepare for her walk; Ashby senior bade Victoria withdraw the sherry from the cupboard; and Mrs. Ashby proceeded to make elaborate inquiries into the extent and nature of his late illness. Of course Faversham made light of his sufferings (though he had borne them most impatiently), said many pretty things about the jellies, and offered his arm to Miss Ashby, as the party issued from Jamaica Lodge, for a walk.

It was a fine late autumn day. The damp odour of the fallen leaves gave a richness to the air; the hedges glowed with berries; the trees still bore their consumptive leaves, flushed with the hectic hues of death. The ground was crisp; and the wind was fresh. It was a day that gave elasticity to the step, and sent the blood racing through the veins. Miss Ashby was a good walker; Faversham hated walking. He spent untold sums in cabs; but he was too polite to be weary on this occasion. He tripped along with the young lady, a little nervously at first, but enlivening the way by pleasant gossip—the ice once broken. Miss Ashby even smiled occasionally, and became voluble, a positive chatterbox, when her companion made reference to passages in some of the good books she had sent him.

"You must not confound me with young men who laugh at these serious questions," Faversham said. "I am careless and foolish, but I respect the scruples of every person. I only wish I could see all the wrong other people seem to see in things which really and truly appear to me to be innocent."

"Self-examination every hour will do it," replied the little saint, looking up to Faversham, to see whether he was really in earnest. "You should be always thinking of good works."

"Possibly," replied the young gentleman, as he lopped the way-side nettles with his cane, "but the fact is, I want energy. I'm a creature of habit and impulse. I never hurt a fly in my life, that I can remember; on the other hand, I don't know that I ever did any positive good to anybody. I haven't the opportunity, I suppose; but pray, let us change the subject. I know you must have a very poor opinion of me, but I shall perhaps be worthier to talk to you some of these days, when I have pulled somebody out of the river, or dragged a child from a fire, or done something of that kind." This sentence was concluded petulantly.

Miss Ashby made no reply, but presently Faversham looked under the prettiest blue bonnet in the world, a bonnet worthy of Lucy Hooquet's shop window, and saw that his companion was very grave indeed. There was something that made him very nervous in the expression of Miss Ashby's eyes, when at this moment they met his; and at intervals he could not help snatching sly glances at the little saintly face, that never turned again full upon him during the remainder of that Autumn walk.

At dinner he sat near Victoria, who laughed and blushed when he took wine with her; who was sure he wanted all kinds of things that he did not want; who seemed to feel, in short, very uncomfortable that he treated her like a young lady. She was pleased to escape from the insignificance of childhood to the white chair of state of young ladyhood, but she was a little frightened at the dignity. She wondered whether that tiresome Jack was laughing in his sleeve, at her discomfiture. Faversham never noticed all this confusion; he never noticed anything. He took his wine, he ate his dinner, glancing, though he would not allow the fact, at the very serious young lady who sat opposite to him, and consumed a little pigeon specially prepared for her. She excused herself from the table before the dessert appeared, and presently Faversham saw her dragging Master Ashby along the garden path, on his way to prayers with her.

Mr. Namby made his appearance and his bow as the young lady with her refractory brother reached the garden gate. Was it possible to give a stiffer acknowledgment of a courtesy, than that Miss Ashby made to poor Namby? But the young fellow passed the stiffness without notice, and presently made his appearance in the dining-room, endeavouring in vain to suppress his laughter. Master Ashby had appealed to him, to decide whether it was not a shame to be dragged off to afternoon service without his pudding.

"The young rogue," said Mr. Ashby, "he will be a worldly fellow when he grows up." And having imbibed his first glass of port the father trust his hands deep into his pockets and looked very serious.

"Well, sir," piped Namby, tumbling at once against the prejudices of his host, "We have all grown up men of the world. You prefer your port to your paw on Sunday afternoon, and it is very natural I prefer my pipe to my free sitting, even in the morning, I own."

Namby filled his glass, and appeared satisfied entirely with his own way of settling the question.

To the horror of Jack, Namby had roused his father to an argument. The old gentleman having folded his habitual bandana across his knees, and filled his capacious hand with filberts (which roguish Victoria had cracked for him) proceeded to lay down the voluminous laws upon which he based his indulgence in port, and his absence from prayer.

"Mr. Namby," said the old gentleman, "there are no pews in my place of worship. We object to them; we have sittings."

"That will do, father," Jack interposed, kicking Namby vigorously at the same time under the table. And so the conversation on the subject terminated.

LIBERTY.—Liberty will not descend to a people; a people must raise themselves to liberty; it is a blessing that must be earned before it can be enjoyed.

CHRISTMAS AND ITS OBSERVANCES.

"At Christmas be mery, and thanke God of all;
And feast thy pore neighbours, the great with the small;
Yea al the yere longe have an eie to the pore,
And God shall send lucke to kepe open thy dore."

TASSER.

ALTHOUGH almost every subject of interest in connection with the historic and traditional associations of the festival of the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour have been from time to time elaborately treated, we must confess that each return of the season carries with it so many pleasurable emotions, that, even at the risk of being considered prolix and tedious, we cannot refrain from noting a few of those time-honoured observances which have for many and many a generation tended to remind erring humanity of their Saviour's natal morn, and to inculcate that grandest and noblest of lessons which, in the words of one of the old Christmas Carols, teaches—

"All glory be to God on high,
And to the earth be peace;
Good will henceforth from Heav'n to men,
Begin and never cease!"

The Saxons and other northern nations kept a festival at this time of the year in honour of Thor, in which they mingled feasting with sacrificial and religious rites. It was called Yule, or Jule, a term of which the derivation has caused much antiquarian discussion. Some consider it to mean "a festival," while others assert that Iol, or Iul, is a primitive word, conveying the idea of a wheel, and, therefore, applicable to the return of the sun. The name Yule still continues to be applied to the festival of Christmas in Scotland, and in parts of England, having been retained when Christianity put its broad-arrow on pagan goods and chattels. The "Saturnalia" of the Romans had apparently the same object as the Yule-tide, or feast of the northern nations. The Greeks, Persians, Chinese, Mexicans, etc., had all something similar. According to Brady's "Clavis Calendaria," the Christmas epoch was first introduced into chronology in the year 523, and was established in England by the Venerable Bede, but the observance of the feast in honour of the Nativity was of much earlier date. In the second century it was ordained, according to Telephorus, that "in the holy night of the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour, they do celebrate publique Church services, and in them solemnly sing the Angell's Hymne." In the course of the fourth century a perfect holocaust of human victims was sacrificed at the very altar, by Dioclesian, the Tyrant, while engaged in commemorating the festival of our Divine Redeemer. They had assembled for that purpose in the temple at Nicomedia, in Bythynia, when the sanguinary ruler in question caused it to be enclosed and given to the flames, about twenty thousand persons perishing on the occasion.

The first ceremony, after decking the house with evergreens, not forgetting the mistletoe, with its pearly berries and osculatory charms—and won't the writer test them this Christmas!—is, or rather should be, to light the Christmas block, or yule log, a very ancient custom. This consists of a massive piece of wood—frequently the rugged root of a tree—grotesquely marked, and which should burn throughout the holidays, reserving a small piece to light the fire for the Christmas of the ensuing year.

The "Wassail Bowl" was a composition of ale, nutmeg, sugar, toast, and roasted apples. The term Wassail, or Wassel, is generally derived from the salutation of Rowena, daughter of Hengist, King of the Saxons, to Vortigern, King of the Britons, in the early part of the fifth century, when she presented him with a cup of some favourite liquor, welcoming him with the words, "Louerd King, wass-heil," to which he replied, as he had been instructed, "Drinc heile." From a very early period the term "wassailing" has been used for revelry and carouse. There were regular Wassail Songs, of which some specimens may be found in the Harleian MSS. Perhaps one of the most amusing of these is the one commencing—

"Bryng vs home good ala, bryng vs home good ala;
And for our der lady-love, bryng vs home good ala."

Popular belief will have it that it is not man only that recognises the sanctity of Christmas morning; for the bees are heard to sing, and the draught oxen may be seen to kneel, in memory of the oxen at the holy manger. Howison, in his "Sketches of Upper Canada," relates the circumstance of his meeting an Indian at midnight on Christmas Eve—

"That happy night
That to the cottage, as the crown,
Brought tidings of salvation down!"—

during a beautiful moonlight, cautiously creeping along, who beckoned him to silence in vain, and in answer to his inquiries said:—"Me watch to see the deer kneel; this is Christmas night, and all the deer fall upon their knees to the Great Spirit, and look up!" When reading this touching incident we could not fail recalling a remark of poor Thomas Davis's, to the effect that the veriest Pagan who bends the knee to a stick or stone, has a notion—vague and indistinct as that notion may be—of a Deity far beyond it.

The boar's head was a celebrated dish at Christmas, and was ushered in with great pomp and ceremony. Holinshed relates that in the year 1170, Henry II., on the day when his son was crowned, served him at table himself, bringing up the boar's head, with trumpets before it, "according to the manner." Long after this the Boar's Head, with a lemon in its mouth, continued to be the first dish at Christmas in great houses, but brawn is now substituted for it in most cases. The latter is a dish of great antiquity, and may be found in most of the old bills of fare for coronation and other extensive feasts. Chaucer thus refers to it in his "Somnoure's Tale":—

"Yeve us a bushel whete, or malt, or reys,
A Goddes kichel, or a trippe of chese,
Or elles what you list, we may not chese;
A Goddes halfpeny, or a mame penny;
Or yeve us at your brawn, if ye have any."

From this it would appear to have been then an article of great rarity. Brawn, mustard, and malmsey, were directed for breakfast at Christmas during the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Mince, or mince-pies, are another dish of considerable antiquity, and are still in great request as an essential article in Christmas dinners. This savoury viand is said to have reference in the variety of its ingredients to the offering of the Wise Men. Amongst innumerable other items of Christmas folk-lore, it is said that in as many different houses as you eat mince-pies during Christmas, so many happy months will you have during the ensuing year.

Turkeys appear to form a portion of Christmas fare everywhere. In Spain it was customary for patients to send their medical attendants presents of these fowl, as well as capons. Gascoigne, writing in 1575, says:—

"And when the tenauntes come to pale their quarter's rent,
They bring some fowle at Midsummer, a dish of fish in Lent;
At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose;
And somewhat else at New Yere's tide, for feare their lease shal loose."

There is a custom in the south of Ireland, and, indeed, generally throughout the country, for the peasantry to carry about, on St. Stephen's Day, from house to house, a holly bush adorned with ribbons, having several wrens depending from it. The "Wren Boys," as they are termed, chaunt some verses, the burthen of which may be gleaned from the following lines of their song:—

"The wren, the wren, the king of all birds,
St. Stephen's day was caught in the furze.
Although he is little, his family's great.
I pray you, good landlady, give us a treat."

My box would speak if it had but a tongue,
And two or three shillings would do it no wrong,
Sing holly, sing ivy—sing ivy—sing holly,
A drop just to drink, it would drown melancholy."

And if you draw it of the best,
I hope in heaven your soul may rest;
But if you draw it of the small,
It won't agree with the wren boys at all."

In the early ages minstrels and mimics were in great request at the Christmas festival. The term "Wait," was employed to designate a species of musician, who kept watch at night during certain times of the year, having a hautboy, or some similar instrument, on which he was to pipe watch, as it was called, and to make bon gayte—that is bon guet—at the different chamber doors. In the household of Edward III., we find mention among the minstrels of "Waytes," who had 12d. a day in time of war, but in time of peace only 20s. a year. In old times minstrels used to travel the country in search of bride-ale, Christmas dinners, fairs, etc., and whenever they could do so, gained access to the mansions of the nobility and gentry.

The practice of decorating churches with evergreens at Christmas is of very ancient date. From the most remote times branches of trees and flowers were employed in religious ceremonies as emblems of gladness. One of the earliest of the old Christmas carols, is of the time of Henry VI., and is called "A Song on the Ivy and the Holly." In many parts of Germany, and in Sicily, a large bough is set up in the principal room at Christmas time, the smaller branches of which are hung with little presents suitable to the different members of the household. The mistletoe, which forms an essential and prominent object in these decorations, was looked upon by our Pagan ancestors with a species of veneration; it is supposed to have been the sacred branch referred to by Virgil, in his description of the descent of Æneas to the lower regions.

If so, it is probable it was in use in the religious ceremonies of the Greeks and Romans. The Gothic nations attached extraordinary qualities to it, and it is said in the "Edda" to have been the cause of the death of the famous hero Balder. Frigga—from whom our word Friday—when she adjured all the other plants, with the animals, birds, metals, earth, fire, water, reptiles, diseases, and poison, not to do him any hurt, neglected to take any oath from the mistletoe, from a blow of a branch of which he was ultimately slain. It is well known that this plant was held sacred by the Druids and the Celtic nations. The former were accustomed to collect the mistletoe on the approach of the new year, with many mysterious ceremonies, such as cutting it with a golden sickle, and receiving it in a white cloth, the officiating Druids being also clad in white. Coles, in his "Art of Simpling" (1656) observes, that "if one hang mistletoe about the neck, the witches can have no power of him." Witchcraft, however, is by no means defunct in the present generation, for beneath the bunch of mistletoe suspended from the ceilings of pleasant drawing-rooms at Christmas-tide, the glances of bright eyes, and the nectar of ruby lips have enthralled the hearts—aye, and senses too, of many a liege subject of the realm.

The original application of the term "carol" would appear to have been to festive songs, and as these become most prevalent during Christmas, it has for a long time past designated those songs during that feast. So popular did they become, that Wynkin de Worde, one of the earliest English printers, was induced to print a set of them in the year 1521, containing amongst others the celebrated "Boar's Head Carol," anciently sung upon the introduction of that dish on Christmas Day. In Shakespeare's time, carols were sung at night during Christmas about the streets, and made a pretext for collecting money. In Germany it was the custom for the young people of both sexes to go about from house to house on the three Thursday nights preceding the Nativity, knocking at the door, and singing Christmas carols, and wishing a happy new year. In the grand Christmases kept up at court, and other places, the singing of carols invariably constituted part of the necessary ceremonies. Carols at this period were probably divided into two sorts; one of a more serious nature, sung in churches and through the streets, ushering in the Christmas morning, the other, of a more convivial character, was adapted to the season of feasting and carousing. Some of them were called "Wassel Songs," and may be traced back to the Anglo-Normans, who were very prone to conviviality, and encouraged everything that was likely to aid it.

There is no doubt that carol singing was of very ancient origin in France, and that the Christmas customs there had a common source with, and were in many respects similar to, our own. Perhaps one of the most familiar of these carols is that entitled "A Child this day is born," which commences thus:—

"A Child this day is born,
A Child of high renown,
Most worthy of a sceptre,
A sceptre and a crown.
Novels, Novels, Novels,
Novels sing all we may,
Because the King of all Kings
Was born this blessed day."

Well, Old Father Christmas has brought his sports again, and it is a meet time for everyone to see what there lies in his or her path for them to do, in order to make it a happy season for others. The retrospect of the past year will, doubtless, be a mournful one for many. But the Past returns not, and if those to whom the recollection of the interval that has elapsed since last merry bells ushered in Christmas morning, is a pleasant one, will but endeavour to assuage any feelings that do not harmonize with the holy and cheerful associations of the hoary Christmas-tide, for how many to whom it is now a melancholy blank may not the Future be presented in a hopeful and glowing guise? For ourselves, a voice unheard for many a day echoes in our ears; a soft hand rests confidently in ours, and thankfully acknowledging that that fickle dame Fortune has deigned to smile on our progress, we sincerely and cordially wish our readers, each and everyone,

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER VI.

FAVERSHAM in the meantime was nearly asleep, but a considerate walnut shell from his faithful friend and sincere admirer, Jack, roused him before

Mr. Ashby noticed his somnolent guest, to take part in a discussion on the state of parties in the House of Commons, which ensued. Of course, the fate of the existing ministry was sealed on this occasion by Mr. Ashby; who foretold political disasters with the rest of a modern patriot. He was for destroying the prestige of the nobility altogether. Commerce was the great fact of the present time. The history of the nineteenth century was a history of the cotton crops. He was for having the people in the people's house.

"Yes, let the working man be represented fairly," said Namby, falling in with the tendency of the conversation, by way of making himself agreeable, and although he was in the habit of cutting cruel jokes at the working man's expense.

"Eh! did I understand you, the working man?" said the owner of Jamaica Lodge. "No, sir, I mean the commercial man. The working man is too ignorant, sir; he would legalise all kinds of matters obnoxious to the true interests of trade; he would try to dip his fingers in our pockets. No sir; the people who make this country great are the middle classes. They are the bone and sinew of the state. You young men have been caught up by a canting set of spongy-headed sentimentalists. I have had forty years' experience of the world, sir, and I tell you that the salvation of this empire is in the hands of the merchants of this empire."

As Mr. Ashby approached his peroration, Jack once more kicked his friend Namby to quiet him, and stop the conversation.

"Exactly so," said the young fellow; "my father is right."

Boquets of girls, in all kinds of dahlia colours, began to pass the gate about this time.

"Chapel is over!" said Mrs. Ashby in a quiet voice, as she rose from her seat, and was conducted to the drawing-room by the attentive Faversham.

Namby endeavoured to be agreeable to Miss Ashby, but his endeavours failed entirely. In the estimation of this young lady, he was a low young man. He had bad tastes, bad ideas, bad manners. She was astonished to hear that Mr. Faversham associated with him, but she supposed all young men were alike. Some could hide their defects, their real characters. When Namby, late in the evening, caught Faversham in earnest conversation with the saint; when, together, he saw them turning over the leaves of Gray's Elegy, illustrated by the Etching Club, and remarked the serious expression upon this young gentleman's face, he declared that Faversham was the greatest humbug he knew;

and wound up his opinion on the entire day by the expression that between the saint and Faversham "it was a decided case."

He opened this view of the matter as he walked home with "the greatest humbug." Faversham repudiated such a verdict with singular vehemence. He had been polite; the conversation amused him. He wanted to come at her real opinions; to see how far she was sincere in her religious professions; to discover whether or not under the ice there was not a hot spring in which some human tenderness could warm itself.

"Now I'm convinced of it, my boy," exclaimed Namby. "When you begin to search for a fire, it is pretty certain that you want to warm your own fingers." Namby chuckled at his happy way of putting Faversham's image to the test.

"I tell you what it is, Namby," Faversham answered rather angrily; "you are so unused to ladies' society, that you mistake ordinary politeness for something deeper and more significant. When I tell you that I have no intention of bidding for the five icicles of Jack's sister, it ought to be enough."

"Well, my boy, we'll leave the young lady in her native frigidity. Only let me warn you against any kind of analysis. Don't be curious about the warm springs; be content to slide upon the ice. The springs are marked dangerous!"

"All right!" was Faversham's answer; and the two smoked vigorously, as they strode past the long places, rows, terraces, and crescents, which lay between Jamaica Lodge and the Temple. This way lay past the splendid mansion in which Namby senior dwelt. Namby touched his companion's arm as they approached it.

"See," he said, "the governor has got a party to-night. By George, what would the old gentleman say if I were to make my bow suddenly to his friends? Well, I suppose he couldn't turn me out before strangers, but how savage he'd be! His clerk, Highlow, would have a long speech to make to me when my next remittance was due, and I should have to depend upon those imaginary properties known as 'my own resources.'"

Faversham was not so light-hearted as his friend. He ventured to suggest that perhaps, after all, Namby senior had good cause for his want of friendship.

"Your know, my boy," added Faversham, pressing the point very tenderly, "you have bored the old gentleman confoundedly; £20 for cigars was rather stiff; and he did pay it."

"Well, never mind, it will all turn up right some day, I suppose. Come along, or the Rainbow will be shut up. Twenty-five years hence I suppose you and I will be respectable, middle-aged gentlemen, dining together in a suburban mansion, and cursing the folly of our sons, who will be then in the act, according to us, of throwing away the best position two young men ever had. All young men throw away two or three positions, before they do anything. You might as well beat a kitten because it preferred playing about the carpet with a ball of cotton, to taking a quiet seat in the sun upon the garden wall near its grave parent, as to quarrel with youth because it wanders hither and thither, attracted by every new enjoyment; while middle-age takes its sixpenny ride, at nine o'clock every morning, to the Bank."

"There's something in that, my dear Namby," said Faversham, "and I am as fertile in excuses for folly as any fellow; but, I am persuaded, that it is harder business for the governors than we are inclined to think. A man is in a dangerous way who exerts his ingenuity to excuse his errors. Clifton was quite right when he said that he could understand that derangement of reason which should lead an intellectual man to support murder with a conclusive argument in its favour. Why, we find discontented fellows twist their reason to serve their passion—often. Hence the republicans who would rob on system, saying all men are equal, all have a right to an equal share of the world's advantages and enjoyments. Be persuaded of this, old fellow, we are in the wrong as well as our governors; and we can't try to twist ourselves into the right, when we play away our rent at whist, or spend it at Vauxhall, without damaging our moral constitutions. I could contrive a plausible argument in favour of debt, but I know, deuced well, that reality would confound the practice of it irrevocably by the touch of a sheriff's officer. But here's the Rainbow still open."

"And here's the appetite for a Welsh rabbit," said Namby, glad to dive down the long avenue to the tavern, and perhaps to escape the moralising tendencies of his companion.

Namby declared to some friends he found in one of the boxes, seriously engaged upon baked potatoes, that "he had been to chapel, and that the Reverend Mr. Faversham had preached a most edifying discourse."

I am not convinced that, as Faversham very silently discussed his rabbit, his thoughts did not wander, of course mechanically, all the way to Jamaica Lodge.

"Faversham, my boy, lend me five shillings," quoth Mr. Namby, as, early on the morrow after the evening spent at Jamaica Lodge, he discovered himself at his friend's bedside.

"Hanged if I think I've got as much," replied Mr. Faversham, turning in his bed, "but feel in my pocket, old fellow, and take what you find."

"All right—thanks. I want it for the Wretch. She has been talking to me about five children, and want of breakfast, and has just now pointedly connected this absence of refreshment with the length of my bill. Any bitter beer in 'the crib?'"

"Not a drop; but Jack will send for some," responded Mr. Faversham.

Mr. Namby hereupon directed his steps to the chamber of young Mr. Ashby, and having fairly roused this gentleman, repeated the question.

"Oh! these London hours!" was Mr. Ashby's first exclamation. "What's the use of going to the sea-side! This isn't the high-road to the woolsock, Namby. Hand us that bottle of soda water. Then, just have a pipe in the next room, while I wash, and I'll be with you in five minutes. There's a copy of your own burlesque on the sofa: read that."

"What have I done to deserve the punishment?" squeaked Namby. "But I confess I'm somewhat puts on my comic Hamlet. You should have heard how the audience took every point in the scene where Ophelia brings her action for breach of promise against Hamlet, 'commonly known as the Prince of Denmark!' Ha! ha! they didn't miss a joke. I knew the thing was safe then. I went with the manager, Bobbles, to have a tumbler. But he wouldn't advance a shilling. I've just time for one pipe, and the Wretch must have her five shillings. She's in a deuce of a temper this morning—boiled my eggs hard, hang her!"

Mr. Namby did sit down, did take a pipe, did read his own burlesque, to his own great enjoyment. Now he squeaked a repartee from it into Mr. Faversham's room; and now, that his friend might be equally favoured, he jerked a pun into the apartment of Mr. Ashby, who politely laughed.

Presently Mr. Ashby exhibited his round head, the damp hair flattened over it, through his door, saying—"By Jove! my head hissed in the water! How many 'goes' did we have?"

"Nothing to hurt a school girl," replied Mr. Namby, still thumbing the burlesque.

"Make the tea, dear child," Mr. Ashby affectionately said, as he withdrew his head to his room to arrange its hair, and go through that trying moment in the toilette of even the stoutest heart—the moment of parting.

Mr. Faversham was quite silent in his room. To him the toilette was a ceremony to be conducted in solemn silence. His roguish friends might describe the process as that of adding perfume to the violet, or of painting the lily, if they pleased; but he knew the value of a complete exterior. He confessed to a preference for clean shirts to those occasionally exhibited by friend Namby. He did like patent leathers and fancy studs. Yes, he used cire to his moustache, perhaps to darken its natural auburn. Namby might call it a blue and yellow moustache, if it amused him. Was he to be blamed if he conscientiously believes that a man who wore his cravat awry, saw morally awry? If he believed this, as he devoutly did believe it, was he not justified in adjusting his own kerchief with mathematical precision, aye, even by the aid of pins? Faversham, in short, was fond of personal adornment. He cared no more for the loose shooting-jacket and the easy wide-awake, than he cared for leafy lanes and gurgling brooks. His place was Regent-street, his tailor, Poole at the very least.

Namby lifted his little eyes from his burlesque, when his friend Faversham walked in embroidered slippers into the sitting-room, and smiled.

"I don't see anything irresistibly comic in a clean shirt," said Mr. Faversham a little petulantly.

Namby still smiled, but his attention was concentrated upon Faversham's slippers. "A girl?" asked Mr. Namby, meaning to inquire whether the posies had been worked by the object of Mr. Faversham's affections.

"My aunt," was the brief response.

"Where were you last night, old fellow?" Mr. Namby inquired, as he fashioned a spill from the back cover of his burlesque.

"At Mrs. Mellon's."

"Not at Jamaica Lodge?" was the suggestive interruption of Namby.

"At Mrs. Mellon's, I said," Faversham severely repeated, "and a very pleasant evening we had."

"Let you smoke?"

"No; but there was a girl there who sang splendidly."

"Ah!" murmured Mr. Namby, as he rolled his first cloud over his friend's breakfast-table. "An evening is no evening to me without my pipe."

Enter Mr. John Ashby. Hair matted in two curls against crimson cheeks, crisp collar, blue handkerchief with large white spots, snuff-coloured suit, snuff gaiters over patent leather boots, crimson silk pocket-handkerchief in hand. The style of man is unmistakable.

"Mouth as dry as a parrot's," is the gentleman's morning salutation.

"I give you up as a bad job, Jack," from Mr. Faversham, who was arranging his slices of buttered roll, and adjusting his plates and cup, and knife and fork, with that precision which marked everything he did.

"By the way, Faversham, I had a note for you from the Lodge. I don't know where I put it, but it will keep; it's only about some confounded blanket club; some nonsense from Saint Minnie."

And Mr. Ashby began to moisten his parrot mouth, and to look eagerly over two hissing kidneys, which he had just removed from within the fender.

Namby nudged Mr. Ashby gently, and winked towards Mr. Faversham; who was clearly attempting to conceal his face with the morning paper. But the paper was damp, and it fell back, and there was a crimson glow upon the handsome features behind it.

"Well, Jack Faversham," said Namby, coming to the relief of his friend, "it's infernally ill-mannered of you to keep a letter in your pocket."

Jack started to his feet, and went to his bedroom to search his coat pockets, although Faversham protested awkwardly enough, that "presently would do."

Mrs. Larrance appeared at the door. Some ladies were below, as wanted Mr. Faversham directly. Was breakfast done with? What hours young men did keep now-a-days, to be sure!

"The girls, by Jove!" exclaimed Mr. Faversham. "Tell them I'll be with them directly."

"I'll be off," shaking the tobacco ashes from his pipe. Somehow Namby felt awkward—he, the bold and cool one—in the presence of young ladies.

"I'm going with my sisters to the Grove," said Faversham, "It's a deuced bore; but I promised the governor."

"Wish you well through it. Good bye, my boy."

And Namby disappeared, as a rustling of silk, and musical titters were heard on the staircase.

"Well, Harry, we were determined to come up! Are you ready? Was that uncouth person we met on the staircase a friend of yours?" Here were Miss Faversham's three rapid introductory sentences. Ada simply crept to his side and kissed him.

"I've told you, Clara, that I don't approve of your presence in bachelor's chambers," was Faversham's stern reproach.

"Nonsense!" said Clara Faversham. "But you always had all kinds of stupid notions about you. Was that your servant who opened the door, or rather answered our ring, for these horrid places have no street-doors? What a dirty drab!"

"Come, Henry dear," Ada interposed, "be quick. We've hardly time to catch the train, and papa will be so vexed if he sends the ponies, and we're not there."

Here's the letter, my boy!" shouted Mr. Ashby, returning from his bed-room.

"My sisters, Ashby!" said Faversham. Miss Clara looked at poor Ashby's feet as she curtsied with a most dignified air. Ashby was awkward for a moment, but he speedily recovered his self-possession; and offered chairs to the ladies. There was a wicked malice in Faversham's mind when he asked his chum to entertain the lively girls, while he (Mr. F.) buckled his portmanteau.

It was not an easy matter to entertain Clara Faversham. No ordinary topics of conversation would suffice. A mocking spirit given to say tart things; rapid retorts to her sly hits; a thorough knowledge of the world, and of the humbugs of society, were necessary. Throw out the threadbare weather, and she would tear it to tatters, and tell you to try a newer ground. Why not the last singer at the opera? she would suggest. Expert, indeed, was the tongue that could fence with hers. It was her delight to confuse; and poor John Ashby, with his limited intellectual resources, would have passed a very mauvais quart d'heure, while his chum was completing his travelling preparations, had not Mr. Clifton opportunely presented himself.

"I have had the pleasure of seeing Miss Faversham before," gravely and calmly suggested the new comer.

"Yes, at Mrs. Mellon's, I think," Ada interposed kindly, anticipating some confusing sally from her sister.

Clifton was a clever man. Miss Faversham would not easily confound him. Clifton based himself firmly upon his adopted principles of life. His scorn for its frivolities; his hatred of the shallow folk who tossed solemn questions about lightly, as a picnic party dabbles with hay, kept him calm under the fire of the most sarcastic beauty. Miss Faversham might flash those dark eyes of hers from those deeply fringed, oval embrasures under her marble forehead, at the fierce young democrat; but her artillery practice could not leave a trace upon the quiet, thoughtful face of Mr. Clifton. That quiet slow voice of his annoyed her, as it replied to the rapid rattle of her small shot.

"These chambers, of ours in this great cobweb we call the Temple, must seem dreary places to you." Clifton had opened the conversation.

"You men never seem to be so happy as when here."

"Except when they are in the presence of ladies," interposed poor young Ashby.

Miss Faversham looked with profound pity upon the Ashby platitude.

"Men have serious duties to perform; anxious studies to get through; and, here, in the midst of London they find profound quiet," Mr. Clifton very solemnly observed.

"Serious duties!" was the laughing retort, that bubbled from the ruby chalice made by the arching of Miss Faversham's lips. "You students of the present time mix a lobster salad with your mid night oil."

"Not all of us" protested Clifton, remaining earnest. "Opposite my rooms is a student whose walls are hidden by his books, who is up before the water-cress man, who lights his own fire when you can't see through his little window-panes for the frost, when many men about him are getting up—Ashby for instance—"

"For shame, Mr. Ashby!" interposed Ada, colouring as she feels the boldness of her remark.

—he has done a fair day's work. Why, he is editor of two papers, and a brilliant contributor to two or three more. A calm, sociable man, with a pleasant thing upon his lips always; not the least jovial guest at any board; self-possessed in the midst of his merriment; never drowning to-morrow's duties in to-night's cups. I reckon him a shining pebble in this whirling life-stream of ours.

"And who is this wonder, Mr. Clifton?" asked Clara, the sweet mocking-bird.

"Oh! a quiet-looking man enough. A handsome country gentleman you would take him to be, with no more care about him than has a squire who trots over his rich acres."

"An awkward bumpkin, who doesn't know what to do with his hands!"

"I assure you—Miss Faversham,"—Clifton was very grave, "my friend has the manners of a true gentleman."

"Of the old school, I should think—"

"Now Clara—sneering again!" said Mr. Faversham, as he joined the party from his bed-room, carrying the neatest conceivable portmanteau. "Glad to see you, Clifton, my boy. You'll come down?"

"I shall be delighted."

"Girls, I've asked Clifton to the Grove; and, by the way Clara, I've promised him that you will be a little less clever than usual."

"And that you will be, if possible, at once civil and intelligent, I suppose," retorted our mocking-bird. "We shall hardly know one another."

Weeks elapsed since chance dropped the plump white hand of Clara Faversham upon the palm of Robert Clifton. And the hand was withdrawn, and the two parted as two antagonistic natures might be supposed to part.

Clara went on her way, throwing sharp things at defenceless young men, and, it must be added, never shrinking from an encounter with even the most skilful word-fencer. She kept every man at a vast distance from her, by laughing her loudest at love, and love's doings. Many were tempted by those large and lustrous eyes, by those rose-bud lips, and those sunny sides of peaches that melted sweetly to a marble neck—to cast themselves upon the ground, and worship the "white mice" that peeped from under her skirt as she tripped about a room. Many drew back, cured of love very rapidly. The light you see in those eyes is sharp also if it be dazzling; find me tenderness in it if you can. Calm are these lights always; laughing wickedly now and then, if you will; but calm as the foreland lanterns in the fiercest storm. The most precious jewel a woman ever wears, that which makes her adorable; the brilliant that degrades the Koh-i-noor in comparison, to bottle-glass—have you seen it gather under her dark lashes? Of the first water are human tears; but Clara Faversham has no taste for this jewellery. She is a passionate reader of novels; but then I am afraid this is because she generally places herself in the advantageous position of heroine. She has a general sense, indeed, of being the heroine wherever she moves. You may conclude this from her manners. She holds that men were meant to be the slaves of women; and she will accept any attention you may pay her, as a slight instalment only of the attention due to her in her capacity of queen of the rooms, for she crowns herself at once queen of any room she enters. She disagrees with the world, petulantly and cleverly, on all social question. The lion of the day is her target; the fashion of the day is a contrast to her own taste, which she boldly carries out; and she has walked into her brother's chambers because other ladies would have waited below in the fly. Dost thou like the picture, Clifton?

Clifton could not possibly like it. His sympathy now was with the simplest natures. For him, the "home-spun kirtle" was the guise in which woman should be loved. Suburban gentilities, gig drives from the time of Thurtell to the present moment; social veneering of all descriptions, were matters which his soul abhorred. In the midst of these influences of activities; breathing artificial air—a monument of art where nature had done enough—was Miss Faversham, of the Grove. Clifton loved violets, Clara, violet powder.

He could not possibly admire the unabashed manner with which Clara Faversham lifted the letter from Jamaica Lodge, as the party were about to leave for the railway station; and, having examined it, held it up before her brother, defying him to tell her who was the writer? He could not fall in love with the boldness that met Faversham's rebuke; when this haughty gentleman icily told his sister that the note was from Miss Ashby, John Ashby's sister!

Yet he followed the girls and Faversham to the fly below; was persuaded to accompany his friend to the station; and felt—well, something like loneliness when the train had glided from the station.

"The girl was the most forward person he had ever seen," he exclaimed to Namby, when he met this gentleman, over his chop. It was strange that the ladylike Faversham—that amiable slave to the rules of society—should have such a sister. Had she been in a cavalry regiment? Had she been a leader of the Bloomer movement? Ashby opined that she was decidedly vulgar, and a bore to boot. Deuced clever perhaps, but utterly incomprehensible.

Clifton could not allow that the girl was stupid; because when she consented to speak at something less than express pace, she seemed to develope shrewd ideas—and ill-natured ideas enough they were. He was afraid that she had been tutored in the idea that she was a satirist. "And a satirist in petticoats," adds Mr. Clifton—"Ugh!"

Ada Faversham being introduced to the party lingering over chops, kidneys, and potatoes, (a party that has decidedly expressed its determination to follow up these dainties with just one "go" of arrack,) is just aside at once by Mr. John Ashby, (who is very bold now) as "a little fool."

Namby leans towards Mr. Clifton, while Ashby is loudly expostulating with the waiter, (as with knife and fork he holds a chop apart, in which he has cut an experimental gash, discovering its underdone condition)—leans towards Mr. Clifton, and asks:—

"Is it really a case between Faversham and Jack's sister?"

Mr. Clifton does not know. That letter looked queer; and the jellies were ominous signs. But he never interfered in these matters.

"She was born to be a pew-opener; to marry a sexton in her prime; and to spend her old age laying out bodies." This was Mr. Namby's opinion of Miss Ashby.

"How did you get on with the Wretch this morning," asked Mr. John Ashby, unconscious of the verdict lately passed upon his sister,—a verdict, be it observed, that this gentleman might have been persuaded to sign, with something like alacrity.

The Wretch had taken the two half-crowns only sulkily, according to Mr. Namby; and this gentleman had deduced from this sulkiness a new proof of the proverbial ingratitude of the lower orders. Had not he (Mr. Namby) positively risen two hours before his usual time; had he not put aside the second act of his burlesque on the sorrows of Werter (entitled the "Grievances of Simpson"); had he not lost an entire day (for a fellow once out never does anything); and all for the Wretch's convenience?

"Never mind the Wretch, though I don't agree with you, you know, Namby," said Mr. Clifton. "Waiter, three arracks; hot water, sugar."

"If my governor could see me now," was the placid observation of Mr. Ashby, as he dropped a bit of lemon-peel into his tumbler, and turned his emptied pewter arrack measure upon its side, that it might drain, and yield him yet a few drops more of the precious spirit, "shouldn't I have a lecture, that's all?"

Mr. Clifton, having requested Ashby to pass the water, seriously hinted that the sort of thing was very wrong; Mr. Namby looked dolefully forward to a morrow of head-ache and joke-making, as he lit his cigar.

The young fellows sat long in that low greasy room; where the pipes were fantastically arranged fan-shape: where the chimney ornament was the portrait of an old waiter with a solid curl upon either cheek, "who had served twenty-five years in this establishment;" where spittoons, or expectoratoons, as Mr. Namby slyly called them, filled with saw-dust, decorated the sanded floor; and where coarse, blue-nosed men noisily caroused, and betted "bobs" on the ages of actresses, or the riders of race-horses. Were the grease-spots upon the table attractive? Could they comfortably dwell upon the proportions of the spittoons? Was the square face of the waiter; were the tints thrown into the napkins upon that ever-active arm; were the matted curls upon the obsequious cheeks; was the ponderous watch-guard in purest chrome—something rich and rare to dwell upon? Jamaica Lodge has a velvet pile upon its drawing-room; a Turkey carpet in its parlour, for the grateful feet of its inmates. Unadulterated spirits (cost price, direct from the friendly distiller) and unexceptionable wines of choice vintages, lie cool and pleasant in its ample cellars. Supper appears upon faultless damask; fresh butter may be picked from silver, with an argent nautilus-shell; warm slippers are the constant care of gentle Victoria. Here are cigars which peers might covet; and meerschaums which have held rare tobaccos for the refreshment of the late Duke of Sussex. Here is a mother's kiss for a sweet good-night; above, a couch fragrant with country washing as a lavender bed washed with dew.

Yet John Ashby still turns his battered pewter arrack-measure side-ways upon the greasy table; rolls his kidney over with a bent steel fork; wrangles with a waiter; and sleeps amid cobwebs!

"Ah! me!" cries Mrs. Ashby. Mrs. Namby echoes the cry; and Mrs. Clifton re-echoes it.

Must it be so?

THE GOOD AND BEAUTIFUL.—There is nothing, no, nothing innocent or good, that dies, and is forgotten; let us hold to that faith, or none. An infant, a prattling child, dying in its cradle, will live again in the better thoughts of those who loved it; and play its part, though its body be burned to ashes, or drowned in the deep sea. Forgotten! Oh, if the good deeds of human creatures could be traced to their source, how beautiful would even death appear; for how much charity, mercy, and purified affection, would be seen to have their growth in dusty graves.

THE VAGARIES OF COMPOSITION.

REPEAT, I am modest enough to admit my mind is imperfectly, not to say unfortunately, constituted. This confession has no reference whatever to a mental malady or disorganization of brain; it points exclusively to what I am obliged, for a better name, to call "displacement of force." Now, to render this absolutely intelligible, it is necessary for me to turn to an illustration. Imprimis: I am not, normally speaking, destitute of ideas; to speak the bare truth, I am oftener a sufferer from an excess of thought and an overflow of phraseology. My unhappiness consists chiefly in an inability to follow out the subject in hand until it is thoroughly and methodically exhausted. If you can imagine a discursively-inclined rifle bullet, instead of running along the line over which the impulse of the weapon projected it, shying off at right angles, and dancing around eccentric curves, in its flight to the object it was intended to hit, you will have realised a fair conception of the difficulties with which the progress of my mind is beset. Occasionally I am engaged to write an article on a new ploughing machine, and I sit down to the task with the most conscientious intentions of getting straight at the plan, the utility, and the economy of the machine in question. A few minutes pass by, and I suddenly find myself in the middle of a picturesque green lane, in love with white-thorn and elder blossoms; or up to my chin in white linen at the opera, applauding Titiens, or delivering an exciting appeal, from a rural hustings, in behalf of my friend the Honourable Gustavus Nookes; or dining in a bar parlour, on tea and shrimps, at Greenwich—in point of fact, doing every thing besides getting at the work in hand. To correct myself with a long sigh, and a fresh dip in the ink, is the work of a moment, and I fall vigorously on the new ploughing-machine once more. Looking at the prospectus before me, I find that the writer has set down butterburs in the category of troublesome weeds! He cannot, surely, mean that. Let me see; I remember seeing a group of butterburs down at Olney Hall last March. The butterbur, now that I recall it, is a noble plant, growing to the height of five or six feet, with a cluster of blossoms, looking for all the world like a violet silk umbrella, at the top. Large fan-shaped, shiny green leaves project from the stem, around which they hang like Chinese penthouses. To catalogue such a plant as a weed is simply intolerable. By the way, speaking of weeds, I am afraid that our parterre and mathematical plot-loving civilisation, is neither grateful nor generous enough to those lonely denizens of our woods, and fields, and highways. What can be finer in January, when the snow is on the earth, and the Dutch tulips have gone to pot, than to find a spray of geranium robertianum flowering in the shade of a neglected hedgerow; or a bunch of deadnettle, from whose dome-covered seed-vessels the hungry chaffinch gathers daily provender in the inclement days of early spring, opening its exquisitely-moulded bells to the watery sunshine? Of cowslips I will not say much, as their worth and beauty, embalmed in the precious traditions of childhood, meet with kindly recognition from mature age; but I have a word to say on behalf of the two-flowered linnaea, which brightens dark spots in woody places with its white and pink stars; and for the ruthlessly-uprooted-wherever-it-is-found corn cockle, which loves to associate itself with blowing wheat and cuckoo flowers. For all weeds, wretched and despised as they are by the agricultural canons, I have a hearty sympathy, almost approaching reverence; and when I object to my butterbur being placed in the list of farm nuisances,

I may be understood to speak in the interest of the whole community. Weeds, on the whole—but what about the improved ploughing-machine? Here I have wandered down a whole page of weedy sentiment to the utter abandonment of the work in hand. Pahaw! what are corn-cockle, and cuckoo flowers, and butterbur to me, who have to do the scientific department of the Weekly Delver? I blush for my want of continuity, and proceed.

The farming public will readily appreciate the advantages of a machine, which for economy, facility of action, and area of execution, must distance every competitor. It has received the unqualified eulogies of Mr. Thompson Allan of Allan. Now, where have I heard that name? why is it that the mere mention of Allan arrests my pen, and drifts me off into etymological speculations? Ah, the mystery clears up; the word Allan suggested Edgar Allan Poe, who, as I happen to remember, has written an interesting but overstrained article on the philosophy of composition. I have read that essay, and though it may not help me to the reader's praise, I believe scarcely half of it. Consistent in its commencement, which reads frankly enough, it ends with an elaborate, artificial, and inconsistent conclusion. It is the first part of the essay which I credit; it is the last part which I reject. When Poe tells us that the unity of composition is obtained through the agglomeration of thousands of little mite ideas into one noble, neatly-rounded cheesecake, we feel that he tells truth, for then he chimes in with the experience of every man and woman who has thought, laboured, and written. But when he treats us to a description of the suspiciously exact processes by which he constructed that unique and wonderful poem, "The Raven," it is patent that the man has ceased to tell the truth, and that he is intent on making us believe that his genius was totally exempt from the eccentricities which usually accompany that gift; that the spicula that sparkled in it did not lie in efflorescent cross grains and knotty nebulae, but in a clear geometric distribution of parts, like a wall-paper pattern, or the figures on Indian tapestry. If Edgar Allan—gracious goodness, it cannot be that I have turned from the Improved Ploughing Machine to croak over Poe's Raven! Eh! Well, there's no help for it but to stick to the subject until the last finishing punch is administered. I shall never get along if I persist in flying off in congenial tangents in this manner. Go to!

Where did I leave off? Yes. Mr. Allan of Shrop House, who has used it for several months past, and who has kindly consented to allow persons to inspect it whilst in operation on his farm. We cannot close our eyes to the important strides which science, particularly agricultural science, is making daily towards the amelioration of humanity. It is only twenty-five years since—twenty five years? yes, about twenty five, that I travelled on a red-sided, black-roofed, time-battered stage-coach between Hastings and London. It was December weather, and nothing could be more cheerless and desponding than the appearance of the country through which we passed. On every side the fields were laid in plagues of furry snow; and the hedge-rows, by the road-sides, were feathered with ice and rime. Here and there, where an oak bole or stout holly-tree sheltered it, the virgin's bower shot up from the hedge level, to the height of eight or nine feet, tossing its downy tufts and cinnamon-coloured fronds about in the keen wind, that blew dead from the north-east. Occasionally we came across a dismal yew, rock-rooted and snow-drifted, in masses of white basalt, amongst whose crevices the red lichen cup shook its scarlet trumpets; and the blood-pleached helbena lurked liked blotches of crimson-toned wine. Merry it was to look in at the open doors of farm-houses, where apple-cheeked children moulded snowy balls in their tiny little palms, and catch a hurried glimpse of huge fires blazing upon brick hearths, and hurling volumes of blue smoke, delicate with the scent of green wood, up the oven-throated chimneys. Pleasanter it was to me, wrapped and muffled in shawls and wrappers, to be taken in the lap of an old lady, whom I never saw before, who sat inside in the coach with her back to the horses, who absorbed snuff from a black box, without the mediation of her fingers; who cried "rat it," when the wheels floundered over a road-boulder; who called me "deary;" and who, when we finally got to London, just twenty-five years ago.—The years again! Once more I have been riding my discursive hobby, this time as far as Hastings. Seriously this will never do. If my erratic fancies master me to this extent, I must give up the Improved Grubber for good. But I must not do that. To proceed.

Twenty-five years ago, the idea that such a beneficial agent could ever be devised, would have been received as a hopeless absurdity. Our cousins the Americans—just for a minute, or so, have you ever been at an American Gas Convention? In the year '43, happening to be at St. Louis, I attended a gas convention. The books having been opened, and the minutes of the last meeting read, a Mr. Wass "ordered" that "ours is emphatically, comparatively, undeniably, incontrovertibly, positively, superlatively, a great and glorious country. Greece wasn't a circumstance; Rome was nowhere (vide speaker's MS.) Venice couldn't hold a candle to us; while modern nations sink into the slough of public and private insignificance, under the red heels and glorious moccasins of this beloved Republic."

The next resolution was moved by Dr. Wright. The learned gentleman suggested "that ours is a great country. It is the corner stone of nations, the top of the hill, the head boy of the class, the head man of the heap, the last button on the coat; the crowning jewel of the diadem, the capital of the column, and the observed of all observers."

At this stage, the band played "Hail Columbia," and a Mr. Acres rose, amid loud plaudits from the gallery, to propose his resolution. It was a modest little effusion, and ran in this wise—"Resolved that ours is the best government on the carcase of the universe, and our country the most consummately stupendous. We have longer rivers, and more of them, and muddier and deeper, and they run faster, and go farther, and make more noise, and rise higher, and fall lower, and do more damage than any body else's rivers. Our country is bounded on the north and south by the poles, on the west by the setting sun, and on the east by eternity." Mr. Edward Acres—ah, the acres—ah, the Machine! Where am I? How shall I square accounts with the Weekly Deliver, if I am to get along in this fashion! Well, here's for a long pull, a brilliant pull, and a pull in a straight direction.

"It may be necessary to state that whilst other machines, to the faults of which the public at large appear to be blind—right, right she was, and now I remember it. You must know that I fell in love at a very early period in my life. I was twenty-two, to a day, before I fell really and hopelessly in love; and the affliction was scarcely mollified by the circumstance that my passion was reciprocated. My tears wet the paper as I write; for she is dead, and there is joy in deliverance. Her father—that is to say Margaret's paternal—was a nice man who shaved twice a-week, and sold lollipops in St. Patrick's Close. Beautiful Margaret! (she always wrote it Margaretite, but never dotted her i's lest the close work should injure her pupils) I told her I was short-sighted, and she swore she loved me better for the weakness. When I visited her at home, I always found a chair placed for me at her right. She was indeed lovely, although I saw but her profile; and, though lovers seldom do things by halves, I was content with my portion. On one or two occasions I attempted to sit at her left side, but was rebuked so gently, and informed, withal, so mildly that my doing so would make her nervous, that I desisted. We loved, we vowed, we were married. Papa grew nasty towards the close of our courtship; and we were obliged to steal to church in a 'bus. 'Twas only a two-penny ride. There were no orange blossoms, no white lilac for us; no white favours, no faintings, no fits, no flatterings—all common-sense from the 'bus to the busing. I observed during the ceremony that she managed to keep the right side of her face still towards me; and I attributed the peculiarity to the tender bashfulness evinced by every well-conducted young woman during such a trial. We came home; we stopped at the Dog and Dolphin; we tasted wine and broke biscuit together. Behind the landlady was a looking-glass; and chancing to lift my eyes to it, I saw for the first time the left side of my wife's face. Drums and explosions! what a discovery—she had a strawberry cheek, and was blind of the left eye! Dashing the cup of intoxication from my lips, I turned round and reproved her bitterly—I told her I had been insulted, deceived, outraged, humiliated; and what was her answer: "Pahaw"—(with a sneer which might have curled a metal plate) "Pahaw, you six days' poodle, why didn't you look before you leaped?" Woman, I exclaimed, "this—Tantarara-ra-ra."

Oh, the grubbier, the grubbier; and here comes Houlihan, to talk me out of my remaining patience—to put an end to this day's work—to finish finality's self with his spongy gossip. I give up, I give up!

THE BATTLE OF CLONTARF.

[BRIAN BORUMHA.]

NLY twenty-seven years have elapsed since the "Dublin Penny Journal" was in existence, and yet it is with the greatest difficulty a perfect set of it can now be obtained. This fact is due to the circumstance that it would be impossible to find a more complete repertory of important facts relating to the history of Ireland, for its pages were enriched by contributions from the pens of a new school of Irish writers; men whose erudition and indefatigable industry afforded opportunity for throwing a ray of light upon the night-side of our history, and in disproving the erroneous theories of the school of antiquarians who preceded them. In the belief that a selection from their writings cannot fail to be acceptable to the readers of this serial, the proprietor has purchased the copyright of the "Dublin Penny Journal"—literary matter as well as illustrations—and our pages will, therefore, for the future be enriched from time to time with papers invaluable for their historic and general interest. A month has scarcely elapsed since a vault in Glasnevin Cemetery received the mortal remains of one of the most gifted of Irish antiquaries and philologists—John O'Donovan—and as a trifling tribute to his memory, we make our first selection from the "Dublin Penny Journal" with a valuable contribution from his pen; an account of the Battle of Clontarf, translated chiefly from an ancient Irish MS. entitled Cath Chluana Tarbh, corrected, however, in many parts from the "Annals of Innisfallen and Ulster," especially in the list of the chieftains who fell in that remarkable contest. The account of the deaths of Brian and Morogh is translated literally from the original Irish, as given by Mr. Hardman in his "Irish Minstrelcy." As the popular and generally-received accounts of an event of so great importance in Irish history, this translation will, doubtless, prove interesting to the Irish reader; but it must be confessed that in some of the details there appears even an excessive allowance of exaggeration.

"It is said that towards the end of Brian Borumha's reign Ireland flourished in all earthly blessings; and that, so strictly were the laws obeyed, that, as we are informed by Mac Liag, chief antiquary of Ireland in Brian's time, a lady might travel unattended from Tonn Chliodhna to Tonn Tuaithe (from one extremity of Ireland to the other) with a gold ring on the top of a wand, without being robbed or molested. No Danes were left in the kingdom, but such a number of artisans and merchants in Dublin, Waterford, Wexford, Cork, and Limerick, as he knew could be easily mastered at any time, should they dare to rebel, and these he very wisely (as he thought) permitted to remain in those seaport towns for the purpose of encouraging trade and traffic, as they possessed many ships and were experienced sailors.

But such prosperity was of short continuance: Maelmordha, who usurped the crown of Leinster in 999, by the assistance of the Danes, being at an entertainment at Kincora, saw Morogh, Brian's eldest son at a game of chess, and advised his antagonist to a movement which lost Morogh the game; whereupon Morogh observed to him, with a sneer, that if he had given as good advice at the battle of Glen-mama, the Danes would not have received so great an overthrow.

To which Maelmordha replied: "My instructions the next timeshall guide them to victory," and Morogh, with contempt, bade defiance. Maelmordha became enraged, retired to his bed-chamber, and did not appear at the banquet, but passed the night in restless anger, and ruminating his country's ruin. Early next morning, he set out for Leinster, without taking his leave of the monarch, or any of his household, to show that he was bent upon desperate revenge. The good monarch, on hearing of his departure, sent one of his servants after him to request his reconciliation with Morogh; the servant overtook him east of the Shannon, not far from Killaloe, and delivered his message from the monarch. Maelmordha, who all the while listened with indignation, as soon as the servant was done speaking, raised the rod of yew which he had in his hand, and with three furious blows thereof fractured the servant's skull, to make known to Brian how he rejected such reconciliation. He pursued his way on horseback to Leinster, where, the next day, he assembled his nobles, represented to them the insult he received at Kincora, and inflamed them to so great a degree that they renounced their allegiance to Brian, confederated with the Danes, and sent the monarch defiance.

Emissaries were sent to Denmark and Norway. The Danes of Normandy, Britain, and the Isles, joyfully entered into the confederacy, pleased at the prospect of once more gaining possessions in this land flowing with milk and honey.

The King of Denmark sent his two sons, Carolus Kanutas and Andreas, at the head of twelve thousand men, who landed safely in Dublin, and were kindly received and refreshed by Maelmordha. Troops now daily poured into the different parts of Leinster, from Sweden, Norway, Normandy, Britain, the Orkneys, and every other northern settlement. The king of Leinster was also indefatigable, not only in raising new levies, but in labouring to detach different princes from the interests of their country. Never were such efforts made by the Danes as upon this occasion; the best men were every where pitched upon for this service. Among others, Broder and Anrud, two Norwegian princes, landed at the head of one thousand choice troops, covered with coats of mail.

The King of Leinster, being now animated by the number of his auxiliaries, without longer delay bid defiance, by a herald, to the monarch Brian, and challenged him to fight at Moynealta, a spacious plain near Dublin, now called Clontarf.

Brian Borumha, with all possible speed, mustered the forces of Munster and Connaught, and marched directly to Clontarf, the place appointed, and there saw the enemy prepared to oppose him, viz.: sixteen thousand Danes, together with all the power of Leinster, under the command of their King, Maelmordha, the sole author of this battle. Then the power of Meath came in to aid their monarch Brian, under the conduct of Maelseachlain, their King, who, however, intended to betray Brian. For this purpose he sent to the King of Leinster to inform him, that Brian had dispatched his son, Donogh, at the head of a third part of the Eugenic forces to ravage Leinster, and that he himself, with his 1,000 Meathmen, would desert Brian on the day of battle. Accordingly, it was determined to attack Brian before Donogh could come up. He was then encamped on the plain near Dublin, with a smaller army than he otherwise should have had. His opponents formed themselves into three divisions; the first, consisting of 1,000 Northmen, covered with coats of mail from head to foot, and commanded by Carolus and Anrud, two Norwegian princes, and of the Danes of Dublin, under Dolat and Conmael. The second division consisted of Lagenians, about 9,000 strong, commanded by their King, Maelmordha Mac Morogh, and under him by several minor princes, such as Mac Tuathal or Toole, of the Liffey territory, the prince of Hy-Falgy, (Ophaly,) together with a large body of the Danes. The third division was formed of the Northmen, collected from the islands, from Scotland, etc. It was commanded by Loder, Earl of the Orkneys, and Broder, admiral of the fleet, which had brought the auxiliary Northmen to Ireland. Brian was not dismayed by this mighty force, and, depending on Providence and the bravery of his troops, prepared for battle, dividing his army likewise into three divisions; one to oppose the enemy's first division, under his son Morogh, who had along with him his son Torlogh, and a select body of the brave Dalcassians, besides four other sons of Brian—Teige, Donald, Connor, and Flan, and various chieftains, Donchuan, Lonargan, Celiocar, Fiongallach, and Jonrachtach, and the three chiefs of Teffia, etc., together with a body of men from Conmaicne-mara, a western part of Connaught, under Carnan, their chief. To this division Maelseachlain was ordered to join his followers. Over the division which was to fight the second of the enemy, Brian placed Kian and Donald, two princes of the Eugenic line, under whom were the forces of Desmond, and other parts of the south of Ireland, viz.: Mothla, son of Faelan, King of the Desies; Murtogh, son of Anmchadha, Lord of Hy Liathian; Scanlan, son of Cathal, Chief of Eoganacht of Lough Lein; Cathal, the son of Donovan, Lord of Hy-Cairbre Eabha and Loingseach O'Dowling, Chief of Hy-Connall Gaura; the son of Meothach, King of Kerry-Luacra; Geibbionach, the son of Dubhagan, Chief of Fermoy. To this division also belonged O'Carroll, and his troops of Ely O'Carroll, and it was joined by another O'Carroll, prince of Oriel, in Ulster, and Maguire, Prince of Fermanagh. The division opposed to the third of their antagonists, consisted chiefly of Connacians, commanded by Teige O'Connor, as Chief, under whom were Mulroney O'Heyne, Chief of Aidhne; Teige O'Kelly, King of Hy-maine; O'Flaherty, King of Muinter Murchadha; Connor O'Mulroney, Chief of Moylurg; Hugh Guineagh O'Doyle, and Fogartagh, the son of Donall, two Chiefs of Ely; Murtogh, the son of Corc, Chief of Muscraige-Cuire; and Hugh, the son of Loughlin, Chief of Hy-Cuanach; Donall, the son of Dermot, Chief of Corca-Baisgin; Donogh, the son of Cathal, Chief of Muscraige Aedha; Ectigerna, the son of Donegan, King of Ara.

The Northmen who had arrived under Broder at Dublin on Palm Sunday, A.D. 1014, insisted on the battle being fought on Good Friday, which fell on the 23d of April, a day on which, by reason of its sanctity, Brian would have wished to avoid fighting. Yet he was determined to defend himself even on that day, and holding the crucifix in his left hand, and his sword in the right, rode with his son Morogh through the ranks, and addressed them as follows, as we read in the "Annals of Innisfallen," under the year 1014:

"Be not dismayed because that my son Donogh, with the third part of the Monmanian forces is absent from you, for they are plundering Leinster and the Danish territories. Long have the men of Ireland groaned under the tyranny of these sea-faring pirates! the murderers of your kings and chieftains—plunderers of your fortresses!—profane destroyers of the churches and monasteries of God! who have trampled upon and committed to the flames the relics of His saints! (and, raising his voice,) may the Almighty God, through His great mercy, give you strength and courage this day, to put an end for ever to the Lochlunian tyranny in Ireland, and to revenge upon them their many perfidies, and their profanations of the sacred edifices dedicated to His worship, this day, on which JESUS CHRIST himself suffered death for your redemption." So saying (continue the "Annals"), "He showed them the symbol of the bloody sacrifice in his left hand, and his golden-hilted sword in his right, declaring that he was willing to lose his life in so just and honourable a cause." And he proceeded towards the centre to lead on his troops to action; but the chiefs of the army, with one voice, requested he would retire from the field of battle on account of his great age, and leave to his eldest son, Morogh, the chief command.

At sunrise in the morning the signal for battle was given, but at this very critical moment, Maelseachlain, finding an opportunity of being in some measure revenged of Brian, retired suddenly from the scene of action with his 1,000 Meathmen, and remained an inactive spectator during the whole time of the battle, without joining either side.

This defection certainly rendered the division of the monarch's army very unequal in numbers to that of the enemy's which they were appointed to engage with. But Morogh, with great presence of mind, cried out to his brave Dalcassians, "that this was the time to distinguish themselves, as they alone would have the unrivalled glory of cutting off that formidable body of the enemy."

And now, whilst the Dalcassians were closely engaged with battle-axe, sword, and dagger, the second division, under the command of the King of Connaught, hastened to engage the Danes of Leinster and their insular levies, whilst the troops of South Munster attacked Maelmordha and his degenerate Lagenians. Never was greater intrepidity, perseverance, or animosity displayed in any other battle than in this; as every thing depended on open force and courage. The situation of the ground admitted of no ambuscades, and none were used; they fought man to man, and breast to breast, and the victors in one rank fell victims in the next. The commanders on both sides performed prodigies of valour; Morogh, his son Torlogh, his brethren and kindred, flew from place to place, and every where left the sanguinary traces of their courage. The slaughter committed by Morogh excited the fury of Carolus and Conmael, two Danes of distinction; they attacked him in conjunction, and both fell by his sword. Sitric, the son of Loder, observed that Morogh and other chiefs retired from the battle more than twice, and after each return seemed to be possessed of double vigour. It was to quench their thirst, and cool their hands, swelled from the violent use of the sword and battle-axe, in an adjoining well, over which a guard of twelve men were placed; this the Danes soon destroyed.

On rejoining his troops the last time, Sitric, the son of Loder, with a body of Danes, was making a fresh attack on the Dalcassians, and him Morogh singled out, and with a blow of his battle-axe divided his body in two, through his armour. The other Irish commanders in like manner distinguished themselves, though their exploits are not so particularly narrated; and it would seem, from the number of prime quality that fell on both sides, that the chiefs every where attacked each other in single combat.

The issue of the day remained doubtful, until near four o'clock in the afternoon, and then it was that the Irish made so general an attack on the enemy, that its force was not to be resisted. Destitute of leaders, and consequently in disorder, the Danes gave way on every side. Morogh, at this time, through the violent exertion of his right arm, had both hand and arm so swelled and pained as to be unable to lift them up. In this condition he was attacked by Anruth, the son of Ebric, but Morogh, closing in upon him, seized him with the left hand, shook him out of his coat of mail, and prostrating him, pierced him with his sword by leaning with his breast upon it, and pressing upon it with the weight of his body. In this dying situation of Anruth, he nevertheless seized the skeine (scimitar) which hung by Morogh's side, and with it gives him at the same instant, a mortal wound! The Dane expired on the spot; but Morogh lived until next morning, when he made his confession and received the sacrament.

The confusion became general through the Danish army, and they fled on every side. Laidin, the servant of Brian, observing the confusion, feared that the imperial army was defeated. He hastily entered the tent of Brian, who was on his knees before a crucifix, and requested that he would immediately take a horse and fly. "No," says Brian; "it was to conquer or die I came here; but do you and my other attendants take my horse to Armagh, and communicate my will to the successor of St. Patrick—that I bequeath my soul to God, my body to Armagh, and my blessing to my son Donogh; give 200 cows to Armagh, along with my body; and go directly to Swords of Columbkille, and order them to come for my body to-morrow, and conduct it to Duleek of St. Kieran, and let them convey it to Louth, whither let Maelmurry, the son of Eochy, Comharb of St Patrick, come with the family of Armagh, and convey it to their Cathedral."

"People are coming towards us," says the servant, "What sort of people are they?" says Brian, "Green, naked people," says the servant. "They are the Danes in armour," says Brian, and he rose from his pillow, seized his sword, and stood to await the approach of Broder and some of his followers; and he saw no part of him without armour except his eyes and his feet. Brian raised his hand and gave him a blow with which he cut off his left leg from the knee, and the right from the ankle, but Broder's axe met the head of Brian, and fractured it; Brian, however, with all the fury of a dying warrior, beheaded Broder, and killed the second Dane by whom he was attacked, and then gave up the ghost.

From the vast number of chiefs who fell we may form some idea of the carnage on both sides. On the monarch's side, besides himself, were slain Morogh with two of his brothers, and his grandson, Turlogh; his nephew Conang; the chiefs of Corca Baigain, of Fermoy, of Coonagh, of Kerry-Luschna, of Eoganacht Locha Lein, of Hy-Conaill-Gabhra, of Hy-Neachach Mumhan, of the Desies, &c. fell in this battle; as did the Connaught princes O'Kelly of Hy-maine, O'Heyne and many others.

The Great Stewards of Leamhna (Lennox) and Mar, with other brave Albanian Scots, the descendants of Corc, King of Munster, died in the

On the side of the enemy there fell Maelmordha, the cause of all this blood, with the princes of Hy-Failge (Ophaly) of Magh-Liffe, and almost all the chiefs of Leinster, with 3000 of their bravest troops. Of the Danes, besides their principal officers, there fell 14,000 men. The 1000 men that wore coats of mail are said to have been all cut to pieces.

The Danes were routed and pursued to their ships, and as far as the gates of Dublin. The surviving foreigners took an eternal farewell of the country; and the Irish Danes returned to Dublin.

The body of Brian, according to his will, was conveyed to Armagh. First the clergy of Swords, in solemn procession, brought it to their Abbey, from thence the next morning, the clergy of Damhlin; (Duleek) conducted it to the church of St. Kieran. Here the clergy of Louth (Loughmash) attended the corpse to their own monastery. The archbishop of Armagh with his suffragans and clergy, received the body at Louth, whence it was conveyed to their cathedral. For twelve days and nights it was watched by the clergy, during which time there was a continued scene of prayers and devotions; and then it was interred with great funeral pomp, at the north side of the altar of the great church. The body of Morogh, with the heads of Conang and Faelian, prince of the Desies, were deposited in the south aisle of that church; but his grandson Turlough, and most of the other chiefs, were interred at the monastery of Kilmainham."

other ruins of the edifice, presents a gloomy yet fanciful picture. The above engraving represents the bridge of Adare, over the river Maigue, and the castle of the Earls of Desmond, the ruins of which show it to have been a place of great strength. It was completely dismantled during the civil war of 1641.

HERE is not, perhaps, in the entire province of Munster a village so beautifully situated as the ancient town of Adare, about nine miles from Limerick. Its lonely and unfrequented shades, and the remarkable and magnificent ruins of its castle, and once splendid religious edifices, raise in the mind of the occasional visiter many sublime and delightful emotions. From ancient records we find its name written "Ath-daar," which signifies the "Ford of Oaks." The remains of the Franciscan Abbey are elegantly picturesque; its mouldering walls being covered with a mantle of ivy. It was an extensive building in the old Gothic style of architecture, and is said to have been founded in the reign of Edward I., by John, Earl of Kildare. On the south side an Augustinian Abbey was founded, known by the name of the "Black Abbey," of which there still exist some very beautiful and romantic remains. The establishment called the "White Abbey" was founded by the Earl of Kildare, about the year 1271, to which was attached very large possessions. The entrance to this Abbey was by a low gate, on the west side, which is yet partially standing, and, with the

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER XII.

OME in, Tony," said Quill, in reply to a knock at the office door of Barman, and as the boy entered, Quill, who affected to be busy, observed, "I saw you passing the window. Why, my young vagabond, you are nearly in as bad a position as myself," continued Quill; "you have got new clothes. Now, will you be good enough, my juvenile and respected friend, to inform me who developed the Saxony, and what became of your venerable garments, including your accommodating and ever-to-be-remembered white hat, of pious memory? You are 'slap up,' Tony; in fact, a casual observer would mistake you for a gentleman's son, preparing to go back to school after the Christmas holidays. Do you feel queer, Tony, and imagine that the people are looking at you; for if you don't, you must be an individual of more nerve than I happen to be?" added the voluble Quill, who turned himself round, and said, after eyeing his new cloth from head to foot, "What do you think of my new garments? I think they are of the right sort—there is no pretension about them. They cost me money, no doubt, but there is nothing like getting value and a good article—is there, Tony?"

The boy appeared to listen, but he, young as he was, felt a kind of contempt for Quill, as the vain and garrulous fool strutted about the office in his new finery, which he had purchased that morning ready made.

"The Black Doctor, Mr. Foster, and your master will be here soon," said Tony. "and I believe they have a great deal for you to do."

"I expected," said Quill (in whom transitory good fortune seemed to have developed a great deal of the patron) "to have heard that you would be one of the miserable victims of the fearful conflagration, at that famous and well-beloved hostelry going by the name, and rejoicing in the appellation of the 'Three Jolly Travellers.'" As a matter of course you have imitated your betters, by putting on black for your deceased friend—none more worthy of respect and gratitude from you, Tony, than the ever-to-be lamented John Brunt."

Tony, who felt the satire of the lawyer's clerk, never answered him, but, sitting down on an old tin box, he waited patiently for the arrival of the Black Doctor.

A lengthened silence was broken by Quill, exclaiming, "Every body is coming out in new clothes to-day. Here is Mr. Barman, solicitor at law, and Mr. Foster (gentleman) in span new black."

"This is a strange life of our lawyers; what ups and downs of life we do see," remarked Quill, as he mounted himself on his stool, and pretended to be making a pen with a knife that he kept for the special purpose of cutting tobacco.

"Was Dr. Bramble here?" asked Barman as he entered, accompanied by Foster.

"No sir," replied Quill, whose manner was most obsequious to his employer, "Tony Johnson has been here some time waiting for him."

"Come this way, Tony," said Foster, as Barman and he entered the inner office, and turning to Quill, he observed, "If Dr. Bramble comes, show him in at once."

Quill was by no means pleased at having been excluded from the conference, and he became most anxious to hear what was going on inside. For the effecting of this object he placed his ear against the keyhole, and was just in a position which he believed most favourable for his purpose, when the quick sense of hearing of Tony was attracted by the shuffling of Quill's feet at the door. The boy took an old file that had been allowed to rust from want of use, and cautiously approaching the place where the eaves-dropper was trying to catch every word that fell from Barman and Foster, he thrust the rusty point of the file through the keyhole, into the ear of Quill, who screamed with pain.

"What is that?" asked Barman, as he sprang from his chair, "what can have happened Quill?"

"Nothing," replied Tony, "I was only persuading him with the top of this old file, not to be listening to what you were saying."

"That was a good move of yours, Tony," said Bramble, "and I think it will teach Mr. Jonas Quill a lesson on the folly of hearing too much."

Bramble entered the inner office just as Barman had made up his mind to go and inflict immediate corporal punishment on his worthy clerk.

"We have a great deal to do, and a short time to do it in," said Bramble. "Gentlemen, excuse me, I have delayed you; but I had much to do. I feel that I am getting, day after day, into deeper difficulties and dangers, through which I cannot see my way. What want of rest, unheard of fatigue, all kinds of wildness and extravagance if you will, could not accomplish for years, a few days of mental torture and excitement have effected. Many have gained by my follies, but I have lost. Come gentlemen," continued he, "I have promised you to perjure myself; it may be a strange contradiction, but I would sooner do so than break faith with you. I will read the certificate which I have written, and which, I suppose, I must swear to; I will never permit it be said that I broke my word. This is the certificate of Mrs. Foster's death.

"I have attended Mrs. Laura Foster, throughout a long and painful illness, and, to my knowledge, she died from natural causes. (Signed) "BRUTUS BRAMBLE."

"Put in any date you like, Barman, to this document, it is in my handwriting."

Barman rose and opened the door. "Here Quill," said he, "embody that certificate in the draft of the affidavit."

The attorney closed the door, and the conference was resumed. Around the old mouldy table, in the back office of Jacob Barman, sat three desperate gamblers. Their hands were full of trumps, but it required great courage and address to play them; one mistake would be fatal, and each knew that he stood on the verge of a precipice.

"You are not in good spirits to-day doctor," remarked Barman, "but I suppose what Quill was telling me about the burning of the 'Three Jolly Travellers' and old Brunt in the bargain, shocked you not a little, I must confess when I heard it first it alarmed me."

"And is it possible that the house where we were in the habit of meeting, has been destroyed by fire, and the fat old man that I used to see behind the counter is dead?" asked Foster.

"It is so," replied Bramble. "The 'Three Jolly Travellers' was more than it looked; much crime and dark deeds were done within it, and he who alone could tell all, met his fate in the flames which consumed it. No record now remains of the fearful scenes which were enacted within its unhallowed precincts, and before long, it will be a question to be determined by tradition, where the 'Three Jolly Travellers' stood. But I have other and more important business with you than to be moralizing over burned houses. I have sworn, and all but staked my life's welfare, to have vengeance on Abraham Isaacs, and that vengeance I will have at anything short of the sacrifice of my soul. He is in my power now, as never man was in the power of another. I will want your help to carry out my plans, and he who thwarts me in my purpose, I shall regard as my enemy. The Jew is as legitimately my prey, as the sparrow is that of the hawk, or the rat is of the terrier. You gave the Jew an assignment of your estate, Mr. Foster, some years since, and passed him a number of bills?"

"I did," replied Foster, "and the Jew has been receiving the rent for a very long time."

"You would know that assignment, and the several bills if you saw them?" observed Bramble. "I merely ask you that question out of pure curiosity."

"Most assuredly I would," replied Foster, "as I have a good right to remember those things which enabled the exacting and terrible man we call 'the Jew' to deprive me of all I possessed in the world."

The Black Doctor took from his side pocket a large bundle, and opening it, he laid a parchment document on the table, and after unrolling it, said to Foster—

"Is that the assignment of which we were speaking just now? You look as if you had seen it before."

"In Heaven's name," asked Foster, "where did you come by this?" and as his anxious eye spread over it, he said; "why, it is the original, and has not been registered. This is a marvel. Who gave it you?"

"I have been given it in trust for vengeance," observed Bramble. "Do you know these?" enquired he, as, to the amazement of Foster, he laid before him bundles of promissory notes, which he had passed to Isaacs. "I will use them soon as I will also use this charming forgery of the amiable Abraham."

Bramble handed the Jew's forgery to Barman, and asked, "Don't you think that very clever. I would not part that out of its proper season not for a kingdom." Bramble, as he folded up the documents, and carefully replaced them in his pocket, remarked, "We understand one another. Not a word is to be breathed of what has occurred here to-day. This will affair once out of the way, and the Jew and I become better acquainted. Foster, I seek nothing at your hands; these documents shall be yours when they have done my work, aye, not my work, but a work, though perhaps to be accomplished not by the honestest means, still good and praise-worthy, no matter how accomplished."

Bramble, Foster, and Barman were employed up to a late period of the day perfecting the several affidavits necessary to obtain probate of the fictitious will of Mrs. Foster.

"I will have that will proved to-morrow," said Barman, "and the Jew must come with me to lodge it."

"Be a little liberal with him," observed Bramble. "He will require to make much profit to compensate him for what he will soon lose. It would be well, Barman, if you saw him this evening."

"I intend to do so," said the attorney, "as Isaacs is a man that must be closely watched. I know something, doctor, that the Jew was saying to me about you, and I believe if he had his way, he would not be anxious to prolong your life."

"I suppose not," replied Bramble, laughing, as he took Foster's arm and bid Barman good evening.

A FIRE-SIDE REVERIE.

LD King Christmas is here again, but we care not. For the next six months we are certain of enjoying the solacing companionship of our old friend—the fire. What a bright, lively, glad, happy-looking creation it is! and how it flames, and flares, and frolics about the bars of our grate, as if from some very excess of glee at finding itself there again. Let us draw near, and enjoy its sociability—welcome it with uplifted hands and outstretched palms, affectionately and reverentially, in token of the fervent blessings that our hearts bestow upon it. No sooner do we begin to experience the depressing effects of the season, than the fire, like an old and honest friend, comes to dispel our despondency, and make such a bright and genial summer in-doors, that we are most amply compensated for the loss of our out-door sunshine. We boldly bid defiance to all external influences; even though it be that—

"The wind moans dull and drear;
Misty vapours cloud the plain;
Whilst December's leaflets sear,
Throb against the pane."

The same graphic pen that depicted this infliction, has taught us to counteract it, thus:—

"What, though now we can no more
On the skies of summer gaze;
Let the poker's aid restore
June's bright substitute—a 'blaze.'
Ply the poker; touch it lightly;
See! the fire is blazing brightly."

Aye, say we, so gloriously, that it warms us to the very heart's core, and enables us to create a world of felicity around us, by the extraordinary expansion of our sympathies. How delightfully it is associated with our retrospections of childhood, when with wondering eyes, we used to sit and gaze upon its mysterious brightness, and at last fell asleep, nestled, like a bird, in Aunt Jeannie's lap. We were very happy then, reader, and so were you. Never mind what has happened since; here's the fire to cheer us still; the same veritable essence of life and light, as beautiful to look at and as genial—more genial than ever. We can sit and think about it, and about ourselves, and all the happiness we have enjoyed with it. We say enjoyed with it, for we never could divest ourselves of the feeling of positive vitality and individuality belonging to it. You may smile; but the idea is a pleasant one, and quite as good as anything of too palpable a reality to be mistaken for the emanation of pure fancy.

You remember the old Christmas parties—the group of happy faces round the blazing hearth—the hissing, crackling, and flaming of the Yule log, and the noble, hearty, generous, and beneficent substantiality of the fire! Doubtless, you remember, also, how good-naturedly and how cleverly roasted your chesnuts were, and how, as soon as they were done, you had them thrown out at your feet, with a "phiz" and a "pop" that created a little suppressed screaming, and a great deal of loud laughter. How eagerly you snatched up the glowing treasure, regardless of burning your fingers, and intent only on the pleasure of dividing it with a certain little bright-eyed maiden, whom you used to imagine yourself very fond of. How delicately it was cooked, and how nicely the shell was split and cracked in various places, to afford you every facility in the feeling; how entirely your happiness depended on the fire then! next to your host it was worthy of all honour. There was no friend to be compared to it, either when you were at home or went out visiting.

Eh! what's that? a coal flown out of the fire, as if to remind us that we are flying from our subject; and so we are, for we find such a number of pleasant vistas tempting us at every turn, as we trace back our road of life from boyhood, that we cannot refrain from taking a step or two aside to get all the enjoyment we can out of our fire-side recollections. Books—ha! books—books and the fire—exactly what we used to be very fond of, and so we are still, but the relish has diminished, the books have lost their freshness. Do you remember sitting by the fire reading "Robinson Crusoe," the "Arabian Nights," "Gulliver's Travels," or—we will go lower—the "Butterfly's Ball," and "Jack the Giant Killer?" How you went on revelling in a dream, toasting your knees, and sometimes burning the toes of your boots, so completely were you absorbed by the fire-side visions! And then when you had no books, how the fire supplied you with visions almost as good! Yes, there you sat, muttering to yourself, as we may fancy, and as we have no doubt you did, mentally, something after this fashion: "Well, that coal's uncommonly like a castle, and there's a little ugly old man looking out of the window—what can he possibly be looking at? Perhaps he is watching that flock of sheep, but why is he not with them? No, he's not watching the sheep; he looks too wicked to be employed to watch sheep. Ah! here's a couple of travellers (did not see them before, though) and they are going up to the castle; just come through that gap in the mountains—the old man is looking out for them—some captain of banditti! Now, as the travellers come near, he'll whistle to his men, and they'll be ready to rob and murder the travellers the moment they have passed through that archway, and then their bodies will be thrown into that great pit there, and then—why, the castle has fallen down, and the travellers are gone, and Pincher has stolen that last slice of bread and butter!" So much for juvenile day-dreams by the fire; but there were better dreams than that—dreams of love, a few years afterwards, when you and somebody used to sit for hours by the fire-side, and revel in the anticipation of possessing some pretty cottage, with its white walls gleaming in the sunshine, and a garden in front full of beautiful flowers, and a porch at the door clustered with honeysuckle or jessamine, looking down upon a magnificent valley dotted with villages, streaked with shining rivers, and shaded by towering hills, and woods that bounded your imaginary prospect. How happy you were to be! You would have plenty of money to live upon, to be sure you would! and you would go rambling about all day long, or sit by the fire if the weather was wet, and spend the day in reading or talking! And then what happy evenings you would have! with a host of kind friends around you, and a blaze of lights, songs, music, cards, and chess, besides some glorious revivals of blindman's buff, and good old country dances! All very delightful, truly, but, alas! we must change the picture, and conjure up the reminiscence of a fire-side reality that destroyed all this dreaming—a long morning scene, a mixture of reasoning, remonstrance, entreaty, and parental appeal against the step that, as you had fondly dreamed, was to produce the consummation of all this happiness—you were very young and had been acting very rashly. You saw your folly, but the discovery was opposed to your affections. It was a bitter and a painful truth; so much so that you refused at first to acknowledge it, and required time for consideration before you would give the promise required of you. You were left alone; you locked the door of the room, flung yourself into a chair; and there, by the very hearth where you had cherished dreams of love, you took upon yourself the meekness of a martyr, and resolved to bow obediently to the advice and wishes of those whose experience and affection demanded such a sacrifice. It was a trial and a triumph—and the end? What is the scene that the blaze of your fire illumines now?—a vivid picture of comfort and happiness!

But this is the genial Christmas-tide, and we have no right to let our fire-side reveries take a sombre hue. Let us stir the cheerful fire, and regard the reflex, so full of life and reality, which Sir Walter Scott has given us of Christmas, as kept in a baron's hall in the olden time.

"And well our Christian sires of old
Loved when the year its course had roll'd,
And brought blithe Christmas back again,
With all his hospitable train.
Domestic and religious rite
Gave honour to the holy night;
On Christmas Eve the bells were rung;
On Christmas Eve the mass was sung;
The damsel donn'd her kirtle sheen;
The hall was dress'd with holly green;
Forth to the wood did merry men go,
To gather in the mistletoe."

Then open'd wide the baron's hall
 To vassal, tenant, serf, and all;
 Power laid his rod of rule aside,
 And ceremony doff'd his pride.
 The heir, with roses in his shoes,
 That night might village partner choose;
 The lord, underogating, share
 The vulgar game of "post and pair."
 All hail'd, with uncontroll'd delight,
 And general voice, the happy night,
 That to the cottage, as the crown,
 Brought tidings of salvation down!
 The fire with well-dried logs supplied,
 Went roaring up the chimney wide;
 The huge hall-table's oaken face,
 Scrubbed till it shone, the day to grace,
 Bore then upon its massive board
 No mark to part the squire and lord.
 Then was brought in the lusty brawn,
 By old blue-coated serving man;
 Then the grim boar's-head frowned on high,
 Crested with bays and rosemary.
 Well can the green-garbed ranger tell,
 How, when, and where, the monster fell;
 What dogs before his death he tore,
 And all the baitings of the boar.
 The wassail round, in good brown bowls,
 Garnished with ribbons, blithely trowls.
 There the huge sirloin reeked: hard by Plum-porridge stood, and Christmas pie."

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

THE LIME-LIGHT.

VER since the introduction of gas, men have been attempting to find some still more powerful light, as far surpassing that as it does any generally used means previously adopted. Many years ago an intense light was exhibited by lecturers to popular audiences, by turning on jets of hydrogen and oxygen upon a ball of lime, which was thus raised to a point of brilliant ignition.

This was the "Drummond Light," so called after Lieutenant Drummond, who invented it, and applied it practically in the triangulations of the Ordnance Survey of Ireland and Scotland, on some of the lofty stations, where it was of great importance in those operations to have certain determinate signals. From Holyhead to Ireland the light was visible sixty-four miles; and the same was the case from Ben Lomond to Knock Layd, a still greater distance—ninety-five miles; thus demonstrating the practical unlimitability of the lime-light for the most extended terrestrial purposes. But there must have been some difficulties in the management of such a pure and brilliant light to have prevented its coming into general use, for it is five-and-thirty years ago since Drummond gave us the knowledge of it. And there was a difficulty.

We do not mean in its costliness, for the procuring of oxygen was then a dear process; but there was a difficulty in keeping it, so to speak, a-light. Not that the lime burnt away, because it is not combustion which takes place at all. It is ignition or incandescence which gives the light, and this will take place as well in a vacuum as in the air; but the lime crumbled under the intense heat, and fell away in powder. Hence the Drummond light was laid aside by the public, but not by some individuals, who, from fancy or other motives, continued to try to remedy this one defect, and to render the light perfect and useful.

Mr. Renton and others who thus devoted their time and their intellect to this point have produced a steady and continuous lime-light by the use of clock-work, which constantly moves up to the point of the impingement of the jet of gases a fresh portion of the lime-wick; and for the more extended purposes of lighthouses and other such objects, where very strong, permanent, and distance-carrying light, is required, a combination of several lime-wicks and their attendant gas-jets is made use of, so that the volume of light is powerfully increased, and all danger of extinction removed, for, if by any possibility one or two should become useless, which is not now likely, the others would continue to give off their powerful cones of rays with undiminished brilliancy.

Although the lime-light is something less intense than the electric, it has advantages over it. Nothing can make the electric light of uniform intensity. Every change of weather, every change of atmospheric conditions, influences the generation of electricity in the battery which supplies its force, and as the source itself is affected, so must be the river of light which flows with such intensity but in such a narrow thread from an almost mathematical point between the charcoal ends of the conducting wires. The electric light, too, is enormously costly, and requires constant attention. An attendant watches it all night long, and if it go out, oil lamps have to be supplied. It is, therefore, of importance to test a light which is now, by novel methods of producing the gases it requires at cheap rates, useable with greater economy than oil, and we believe even than coal-gas.

Another property of the lime-light which we have not yet seen noticed is its power of burning as well under water as in the air; all that is necessary is to cover the lime wicks with a bell glass, closed at the top, so as to prevent the actual contact of the water with the lime, and the apparatus can be lowered into water without in the least interfering with the brilliancy of the light. Air is not necessary for the burning of this light as it is for that of most others, the mixed gases containing within themselves the necessary elements both for burning and for the support of combustion; whilst the sole products of combustion being the vapour of water, this would condense and run down the sides of the glass. There would be no permanent gas to escape, and consequently the light might be lowered to the bottom of the clearest lake without the transparency of the superjacent water being in the least degree disturbed by the rising and breaking of air bubbles at the surface.

Not only are colours perfectly distinguishable by this light, but it has this advantage for domestic use, that it generates no bad odours, it produces nothing, or at most a few drops of moisture by the union of oxygen and hydrogen, for, as we have said, it is ignition, not combustion which takes place.

For large factories, workshops, and public assembly-rooms, where the gas-lights now add heat and annoying smells to the other inconveniences of such crowded places, the lime-light would be a vast improvement, and as it requires no air for its support, it has been properly suggested that it might well be adapted to coal-mines and other works where explosions now cause such calamitous losses to human life.

THE LILIES.

I WALKED amid the lilies, at the morn,
 And they were fair,
 With trembling chalice that banquetted
 On sun and air.
 In the cool depths of the green inland lake
 I saw them rise,
 Chilly and white as stars that break and break
 Thro' autumn skies.

At even tide, slow pacing, I returned,
 Ah! woe is me!
 Where were the bright inhabitants of morn,
 That welcomed me?
 What keel of summer skiff, red-beaked and slow,
 Had ridden o'er
 My white lake-garden, blotting out its lights,
 'Twixt shore and shore?

No answer and no answer. Lucid sprites,
 Where'er you be,
 The spring is flying backward o'er the hills,
 Be patient ye.
 I hear the wind-swirled trumpeters of March,
 On wave and plain,
 Be patient, spring is coming quick and ye
 Shall rise again.

A WOMAN OF MARK.

HE genius of American literature has its own peculiarities, wedded to the soil from which it has sprang, and bound up with the aspirations of the age and people. Drawing its elements from European schools, but with original stimulants to thought in new scenery, new society, and new duties, it has called forth a circle of thinkers to vindicate its aims, and these strangely stand up apart from the entire literature of the world. Emerson, with his old-world thoughts, spoken through the new materials of the west; Longfellow, with his spirit-music, drawn from the Elfin songs of Germany and the lyrical melody of Greece, charming with his Miltonic philosophy; and Nathaniel Hawthorn's, brimming over with the tone of European tradition; while working out the phases of a new land and people, all exhibit peculiar originalities, which separate them from the general body of European writers, and yet so strangely assimilate their productions with the tendencies of European minds, that their books are read almost in preference to our own, and have the most extensive influence of any, except native literature, on the character of national thought.

But America has produced several remarkable women, whose names stand equally apart with those of the opposite sex, just mentioned. For example, Mrs. Stowe, whose name has echoed at every fire-side; Mrs. Sigourney, whose poems are as well known here as those of our own Mrs. Hemans; and, to pass by many others, the subject of our present sketch, Margaret Fuller.

This notable woman was born on the 23d of May, 1810, at Cambridge Port, Massachusetts. Her father was a respectable lawyer of some scholastic acquirements, and her mother was "one of those fair and flower-like natures which sometimes spring up beside the most dusty highways of life," a true woman, full of affection, moral rectitude, and "bound by one law with the blue sky, the dew, and the frolic birds." Her infancy was remarkable for the quickness of her mind and her extraordinary love of books. Her father, ignorant of the laws of mental development, was filled with an ambition to see her mind prematurely perfect, and forced on her tasks far beyond the capacity and endurance of a child. She had none of the resources which usually form the life of childhood; neither dog, nor bird, nor flower; no companions, and nothing to love; and, under the harsh compulsion of her father, her mind soon became diseased, through too early and too laborious a course of study. She had headache, she wandered about the house in her sleep, and was a complete victim, in body and mind, of a mental cultivation begun too early, and pursued in a manner too severe.

The result of this was that her growth was stunted and her frame weakened, while her mind was rendered wonderfully acute, and her wit sharpened to a sarcastic perception. She was a wonderful child, or rather wonderful woman, at the age of thirteen; for she was so precocious both in her mental and physical development, that she passed for eighteen or twenty. Her conversational powers were at this time most extraordinary. She conversed with the students and professors of Harvard College, and baffled them by her keen criticisms and brilliant raillery. She had no natural childhood, and her womanhood was tainted with morbid tastes and tendencies.

Her school life was chequered with hysterical peculiarities, and she became famous as a quizz and a wit—a reputation by no means consonant with the studied propriety of boarding-school misses. But her studies at school were extraordinary. She soon mastered the common-place elements of polite learning; dashed into the remote corners of classical literature, became familiar with Aristotle, Helvetius, Milton, Racines, and the older British poets, and entered into the genius of the French, Italian, and Spanish languages, in a manner worthy of a master of philosophy. Her correspondence at this time was esteemed; her letters were replete with learning, broad and clear-sighted criticism, and a high-toned speculation in religion and morals. During the ten years spent at Cambridge, from 1826, she exhibited great intensity of mental life. She was universally beloved, and had always around her a bevy of fair girls, in whom she awakened an intense interest, and whose confidence she won by the nobleness of her womanly nature. In their evening meetings Margaret always drew around her a knot of listeners, whom she enchanted by her fine conversation, or excited to ecstasy by her brilliant wit. Her conversational talent was wonderful, and past the belief of any who had not heard her. Her personal appearance was far from prepossessing. She was short, somewhat corpulent, with features full of intellectual expression, but by no means beautiful, and rendered universally peculiar by a constant habit of shutting and opening her eyelids, while speaking in a somewhat nasal tone.

In the year 1833 she commenced the study of German, and at this time her mind acquired its full expansion, and she was in the prime of her intellectual endowments. Her letters and journals of this date are full of fine feeling and character—they brim with soul; and throughout all her observations on men and books, or her friendly exchanges of courtesy, a spirit of earnest piety runs underneath, and a benevolence of most womanly warmth and tenderness. In German she made rapid progress; she read Goethe, Tieck, Körner, Novalis, Richter, and Schiller, and soon commenced a series of criticisms in her journals and letters, which evinced a thorough mastery of the spirit of German literature.

While she evinced these noble traits, the fruits of early ill treatment showed themselves in certain diseased manifestations of mental powers. She believed in omens, talismans, and dreams; was particular as to birth-days, coincidences, and mottoes, and never wrote a letter to a friend without putting on a lucky ring or bracelet, in which a carbuncle was set, as a charm against evil influences; to flowers, too, she was partial, and selected the heliotrope as her own flower, because of some fancied similarity between its nature and her own.

Every year her friendships increased in number, and her great soul, like a magnetic centre, gathered to itself all others and similar sympathy. In the autumn of 1835 her father died; in 1836 she went to Boston, to teach Latin and French, in Dr. Alcott's school; in 1837 she accepted an engagement to conduct a school in Providence, at a salary of one thousand dollars a year. Her industry was amazing, and she grew more literary in her habits. She translated Eckerman's conversations with Goethe. In 1844 she commenced to write for the "New York Tribune," while she was at the same time engaged on her great work, "Woman in the Nineteenth Century." It was the publication of this work which stamped her fame in the presence of the world. Hitherto her high talents had only evinced themselves in anonymous journalism, and in conversation with private friends; now she appeared before the world with a new idea, and asserted for once, and for the first time fairly, the false position of women in the scheme of modern civilization. She held the right of women to take part in the administration of public affairs, and to enjoy in every sense an equal share with man in the political and social affairs of the age and nations. Those who think such an idea wild and ridiculous must bear in mind that Margaret's mental powers were strongly cast, and she felt her right and capability for these things, and forcibly applied that consciousness to the tender sex universally.

At last she achieved what had been the chief wish of her lifetime—a voyage to England. She sailed from Boston on the 1st of August, 1846, and landed at Liverpool, on the 12th of the same month. After visiting Wordsworth, De Quincy, and other northern notorieties, she went up to London, and saw Thomas Carlyle, W. J. Fox, Joanna Baillie, the Howitts, and other literary celebrities. From London she went to Paris, where she made the acquaintance of Beranger, George Sand, and others, afterwards proceeding to Rome. There she was introduced to several English poets and artists staying there, and to a young Italian soldier of the Guard. This was the crowning hour of Margaret's life time. She had felt lonely in the world too long, and had said, in a letter to Beethoven, "Sometimes the moon seems mockingly to say that I shall not shine without I can find a sun;" and now the congenial nature appeared in the person of the young Italian. His name was Eugene Ossoli, Marquis of Ossoli, and descended of a long and noble ancestry of Italians. Ossoli and Margaret were married, but the marriage was kept secret for a considerable period. Into the events which in the year 1848 deluged the streets of the seven-hilled city with blood, it is not our province here to enter. Suffice it to say that Ossoli threw himself into the heart of the revolution, and that when tranquillity was restored Margaret and her husband turned their faces to the west.

There were three to make the voyage: Ossoli, Margaret, and their little boy, Angelo. When spring touched with gentle fingers the blossomy banks of the Arno, they bid farewell to the orange groves of Florence, and on the 17th of May, 1849, sailed for America. Nothing of great import occurred upon the voyage, until July 16th, when, in a head gale, the vessel struck on the beach of Long Island, off the American coast, and the first scene of a frightful tragedy opened. All was confusion and fear, and the ship evidenced early symptoms of becoming a complete wreck. In the most hopeless plight they consoled each other, and waited for help from the land. The boats were swamped, the fore-castle crushed in, the vessel going by the board, and though a life-boat was brought to the beach, no attempt was made to man her, or to push her off. At last, after twelve hours' communion face to face with death, several of the passengers and seamen were got off by the aid of rafts and ropes, and it came to Margaret's turn. She refused to be separated from her husband and child.

There were now only four seamen left on board, besides Margaret and her husband, child, and servant; she was sitting in her night-dress, as she had rushed out of the cabin on the first alarm, and the seamen were persuading her to try the planks. At that moment a huge sea swept them all into the boiling waters; three of the seamen escaped by swimming, and the fated three, besides the other sailor were all drowned. Margaret sank without a groan, and was seen no more; Ossoli and the maid Celeste caught for a moment at the rigging, but were immediately engulfed in the waters; while the infant, who had sunk with his mother, was washed ashore some time afterwards, and buried by a sailor among the sand-heaps. Such is sometimes the reward for a life of toil and travail. The cares and anxieties, the earnest labours and high aspirations of a life of forty years came to this end—a pitiless sea, a wreck on a sand-bar, an idle life-boat, and not one friend. Margaret's last prayer was fulfilled; they all went together, and the anguish was brief. Apart from the few books she has written, in moral worth, character, and heroism, it must be admitted that one of the most remarkable women of the present century, was Margaret Fuller, Marchioness of Ossoli.

GOD BLESS US, EVERY ONE.

"And so, as Tiny Tim observed, God bless us every one."

He was a little feeble child,
And full of care and pain,
But yet with blithesome heart he sang
His simple Christmas strain.
God bless us all, cried Tiny Tim,
God bless us, every one;
So, too, we pray, this holy day,
God bless us, every one.

They sat around their humble board
In Christmas mirth and glee;
In very truth, though low their lot,
A pleasant group to see.
And Tiny Tim's poor pallid face
With light and beauty shone,
As looking on them all, he cried,
God bless us, every one.

Another Christmas Day came round,
And Tiny Tim lay dead;
Yet as they deck'd his simple bier,
They scarce could think him fled.
Upon them still the little face
With kindly presence shone,
For still they seem'd to hear him pray,
God bless us, every one.

Though many a place be vacant now,
Though dim be many an eye,
Which erst the Christmas chimes might greet,
In gladness fitting by;
A golden light comes gleaming down
From dear ones who are gone,
As pray we now, with Tiny Tim,
God bless us, every one.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER XI.

BRINGS THE CONSIDERATION OF THAT VERY SERIOUS SUBJECT, THE "DINNER GRIEVANCE," TO A CONCLUSION.

FIND myself, courteous reader, constrained to return still again to the subject of the "Dinner Grievance." I am quite conscious that I have dilated upon it at considerable length, but as I have already said, it is one of those subjects which so grow upon you, when once you have entered upon its consideration, that it becomes very difficult to know where to leave off—moreover, I must be allowed to say that, although I have treated of several matters which appeared to me to bring dinner parties in general fairly under the head of "Grievances," I have to add that there are also several other little circumstances which I could not, in justice either to my subject or my readers, pass over in silence. To the consideration of these, then, will I, with your kind permission, dear reader, devote this paper; and, in order not to tax your patience too severely, I promise you that this paper shall conclude the "Dinner Grievance," so far as I am concerned.

I flatter myself that I have, in the preceding paper, touched upon some of the most salient points connected with this grievance; and I have, without respect of persons, adverted to some of the principal circumstances which, equally on the part of the entertainer and the entertained, tend to convert the meetings which should of their nature be all cheerfulness and conviviality, either into egregious mistakes, or into regular bear-gardens. I now proceed without further preface to touch upon another of these points.

I have remarked more than once in the course of these pages that I am of a highly nervous temperament. This is my misfortune rather than my fault. I am quite sure that if I only looked to my own interests, and my prospects in life, I should very reasonably prefer to be endowed with a face of brass, for there is no doubt that parties of that complexion—"bragien," as the venerable Mrs. Gamp would name it—make their way much more easily, and with much greater profit to themselves through the world, than modest, retiring people like myself, who in our struggles to make head, go to the wall a great deal oftener than is either pleasant or profitable. For example: when I am out at an evening party, and am engaged in telling my story, in my own low voice, and timid, retiring manner, to a small circle of admiring friends, up comes Smith with his great red face, and his loud voice, which, without any disrespect to Smith, would, I must say, be quite appropriate to a bull of Bashan, and breaking into our circle, with his own peculiar roar, which drowns my poor voice in an instant, he carries all before him—"shuts me up," and extinguishes me as completely as if he placed a large diving-bell over my head; and all this, because Smith is "bragien" and I am not. I venture to say that my intellect is quite as acute and quite as highly cultivated, as that possessed by Smith. I remember very well, that when we were at school together at Dr. Searchall's Seminary for Young Gentlemen, he was not fit to hold a candle to me—at least, so the Doctor used to say, for, of course, I should never think of making any such assertion; although, I think I may venture to add, without being accused of vanity, that I remember very well that Smith was always the last fellow in the class, whilst my own place was at the other end of it. I have no reason for believing that the intellect of Smith has received any great development since the time he left school. And hence, I conclude, without presumption, I think, that I could tell as good a story as Smith, or hold my own with him any day in argument; and yet, as a matter of fact, I have no chance at all against him, and all because the article of "brass" seems to have entered very largely into his composition (of course I speak allegorically and metaphorically) whilst I have been made not of "sterner" but of "softer" stuff (if I may be allowed thus to paraphrase the expression without any disrespect to the great author of it). There is no use in life in my engaging with Smith; what chance has my intellect, or my argumentative powers, or my soft, quiet way of telling a pleasant story, against his noise and his "brass"—not the least. He drowns me in an instant. He "shuts me up" in the fullest sense of the word, and leads away my prey—if I may be allowed to apply such a term to the inoffensive young men in tail coats and white ties, and the still more inoffensive young ladies who are listening to my story—from under my very nose. I feel that I am wandering again, but I have made these remarks to prove that if I am of a highly nervous temperament, it is not because I have selected that peculiar quality of mind for myself. It has been given to me without any reference to my own wishes or inclinations on the matter, and hence I say that if I am of a nervous temperament, and if it is a misfortune to be endowed with a temperament of this nature, I may labour under a misfortune, but I am free from any fault in the matter. Such being the state of the case, or to speak more correctly, such being the state of my mind, you will now, dear reader, I think, appreciate how I have suffered at various times from that absurd practice of "taking wine," which still prevails at some tables. I can safely say that the agonies I have endured on this point have been so great as completely to spoil my enjoyment, and interfere very materially with my digestion. There I am, a nervous young man, always bear that in mind, trying to eat my dinner in peace and quietness, and with as little observation as possible, when somebody, Smith for example, roars out from the other end of the table, "Mr. Incog, pleasure of a glass of wine." Immediately all eyes are turned in my direction, and I, as a necessary consequence, blush awfully, and begin to tremble all over. The probability is that there is no decanter of wine before me, and I have to trouble somebody else to get it for me, my own glass, mark you, most likely being full all the time, but this is a part of the absurdity of the whole proceeding. At length both my own glass and that of Jones being properly charged, we raise them in our hands, screw up our faces into the most solemn, but absurdly ridiculous expression which we can put upon them, bob our heads at one another like a couple of insane old mandarins, put the glass to our lips, and then, when all this time has been lost, and this ridiculous pantomime gone through, replace them on the table, our mutual friends looking on admiringly all the while. Now, I put it to any man of sense to tell me, whether he can conceive any proceeding to which a couple of rational human beings can be subjected, more absurd than this, or better calculated to fill modest young men of a highly nervous temperament like mine, with utter confusion and dismay. If any one can conceive a more absurd proceeding than this, his imagination is a good deal more lively than mine, for I confess that I cannot. I know that this (I don't like to say absurd, because so many decent people still retain it) custom is now exploded at many tables, and is fortunately becoming unfashionable, but I also know from my own sad experience, that it still holds strong sway in many other families, and now that I am on the subject of "dinner grievances," I shouldn't feel easy in my mind, I shouldn't have the proud consciousness of having done my duty, which is always such a pleasant reflection to a well-constituted mind, did I let the opportunity pass without having a parting shot at a custom which has given me so much annoyance as that of "taking wine."

I object to the practice of "taking wine" on three grounds. I object to it, firstly, on the ground of its absurdity; secondly, because I consider it a "sham," and thirdly, because it has subjected me, and I believe all persons of the same temperament as my own, to unheard of confusion, and indescribable annoyance.

I hold that this "taking wine" is absurd. Now suppose instead of Smith's accosting me with "pleasure of wine, Mr. Incog," I were to accost Smith with, "pleasure of a potato, Mr. Smith," and then instead of the process of taking wine, which I have just described, Smith and I were individually to stick our forks into a potato, then elevate said vegetable, and wave it gracefully in the air in the direction of one another, and finally, after applying the potato to our mouth, and just licking it with our tongue, were to restore it to our plate, would not every man of common sense protest against the whole proceeding as an utter absurdity? And yet I must confess, that such a proceeding does not appear to me one whit more absurd than the "taking of wine," with its grimaces and contortions, its bobbings and manipulations, its putting to shame of inoffensive and nervous young men.

And then the thing is such a "sham." That is what annoys me more than all the rest, and I am sure that it must have this same effect upon every other conscientious and right-minded member of society. We must hate shams. It is a principle of our nature, and I, for one, have always striven to further its full development in myself, and to nourish within my soul a fervent hatred of all impositions and shams whatever, whether they come before me in the shape of my Lady Standoff, the Honourable Lucretia, or Mrs. Squeezer and her evening devotions; and I must say, and say emphatically, that I consider this taking of wine a sham. If it isn't a sham, what does it mean? will somebody please to tell me this? I am open to conviction. I only ask for information. I am not like Smith with his roaring voice and his bullying manner. I don't think that I could put any man down by noise and declamation, even if I tried, which I have no intention of doing; and hence I say I am open to conviction, and shall be proud to give in my adhesion to any one who can rationally and fairly show me that there is any meaning in this practice of taking wine. If it is to be taken as a compliment which you wish to pay your friend, the compliment should be taken to consist, if in anything, in drinking with him. Now, fortunately, the days are gone by when you were held to honour a man by drinking with him, and when the bonds of your friendship were supposed not to be fully cemented, until you had fallen under the table together. In those days, the good old times, as some—save the mark!—call them, the "taking of wine" was a reality, and there was some meaning in it. You challenged your friend, and your friend challenged you, and you both drank until you could drink no more from very repletion; and although this proceeding was about as near an approach to the perfection of beastliness as you can imagine rational creatures attaining, still, it was a real proceeding, and it meant something; viz. that you honoured your friend by making a beast of yourself for his sake. But the rules of politeness which fortunately hold sway now-a-days, don't allow you to degrade and animalize yourself in order to honour your friend. If you were to tumble under your friend's table now-a-days, the probability is, that your friend would, very properly, ring for his servants to transfer you from his dining-room to the pavement outside his door; or, if he were of a very forgiving character, with a more than usually tender feeling for the failings of a friend, he might send you home in a wheel-barrow with some clean straw. I confess that I should adopt the former mode of proceeding. Consequently, if you are dining with a large party, and you either challenge, or are challenged by some twenty or thirty people to "take wine," of course you can't do it. You would make a beast of yourself if you drank twenty or thirty glasses of wine, and the very people who invite you to "take wine" would be the first to have you trundled out into the street. Now, if you can't drink the wine, if you are not permitted to make an animal of yourself, even to honour your friend, it follows by order of good consequence, that you only pretend to take your wine, and you set down your glass without having tasted its contents; and, if a pretence of this kind be not "a sham," a sham of the very shallowest and most transparent nature, I hold that there is no such thing in creation; and I hold, moreover, that all shams are to be scouted, and driven out of society (although candour compels me to admit that I have no hope of attaining a "consummation so devoutly to be wished," for I am afraid that the shams are rather too large a family to admit of it) I say that this custom of "taking wine" ought to be sent to the right about in double quick time, along with the toping, duelling, and roystering habits of the period when it had its origin, and to which it properly belonged.

But the absurdity of the thing, and the patent fact of its being an arrant sham, are nothing in comparison with the confusion with which it overwhelms a young man, who like myself, has the misfortune, if indeed it be a misfortune, to be bashful. Instead of eating my dinner in peace and quietness, there I sit, trembling all over, lest any one should single me out and draw the attention of the whole company upon me, by what I regard as his unwelcome civility. It comes at last, in every variety of tone, from the bel-low of Smith to the soft whisper of Jenkins, who sends down his servant to beg "that he may have the pleasure" etc. etc., and I am kept at it the whole time that I ought naturally to be taking my victuals, and I may say that my dinner is interrupted by one continued succession of blushes, spasmodic smiles, and awkward inclinations of my body, to persons in different parts of the table. This, however, is a mere trifle compared to the ordeal of inviting others to take wine with me. It may cost me a few blushes, etc.; but I can manage to fill my glass, bob my head, and put the wine to my lips, in answer to the challenge of my friend; but it is the asking others which upsets me completely. I can't do it. My natural infirmity won't allow me. If I could conquer it, I would, but I cannot; and yet, because I cannot, I am reputed an ill-bred young man, ignorant of the usages of society. Now, I will give a case in point. I have already informed you, dear reader, that I seldom dine out for reasons with which I have furnished you, but I do dine out, sometimes. Well, some little time ago, I was invited to take my place at the board of a certain gent, whom I happened to meet at the house of another friend. I accepted the invitation. The family was one whose acquaintance I was really anxious to cultivate, but my designs were completely frustrated by this custom of which I now treat. Upon sitting down to dinner, I found to my horror that this family still retained the custom of taking wine. The host, of course, begged to have the pleasure, etc., and this I managed to get over. According to the rules laid down in this case, I ought then to have begged the lady of the house to "allow me to have the pleasure," and I was really most anxious to do so, but I could not for my life screw my courage up to sticking point. I was fifty times just on the point of doing it, when at the critical moment, my heart failed me, and with a ghastly smile, I allowed the opportunity to pass by. I saw the dishes being gradually removed, and still my duty was undischarged. There I sat in an agony of nervousness, but it was all of no avail, and the dinner passed away, and I had not asked the lady of the house to take wine with me. And mark the consequences. I have never been invited to dine at that house since, and all because I did not discharge a duty which, I give my word of honour as a gentleman, I was morally unable to discharge. Now, isn't this too bad? sympathizing reader, isn't it too bad, and hasn't the time come for sweeping away this custom at one fell swoop? If there are any old people, relics of the last century, who are so attached to this custom that the peace of their latter days would be seriously endangered if they were not allowed to continue it, I would make an exception in their favour, and allow them to continue a habit, which I daresay comes natural enough to them; but it must be allowed to die out with them, and not be forced upon us who are averse to the imposition.

Such, dear reader, are my views on this whole question of the "Dinner Grievance." I trust that I have put them forward with all due diffidence and modesty, and without assuming any authority which I have no right to assume. I have not based my assertions upon mere speculations, but I have, in every instance, based them upon facts, and facts, I need not tell you, the intelligent readers of this journal, are stubborn things. Where my deductions from these facts (you must take my word for the facts), are not legitimate, reject them by all means. Where they are legitimate, and you cannot logically deny them, admit them and their necessary consequences; and, although I say it, who should not say it, our dinner parties and other convivial meetings will be all the better for it. But, at all events, and whatever else we do, let us keep alive the sacred fire of hospitality.

"Blest be that spot where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire;

Blest be that shade, where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair;
Blest be those feasts with simple plenty crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jests and pranks, that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale,
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good."

Poor Goldsmith, who in his time wrote many beautiful lines, never, in my estimation at least, wrote a more beautiful one than this—

"And learn the luxury of doing good."

I regret very much that the precarious and unsatisfactory state of my domestic relations with Mrs. Squeezer does not allow me to practise this virtue as much as I could wish, but I don't admire it the less, nor entertain a lower appreciation of it on this account. No. Let us be hospitable, and enjoy as much of one another as we can during our few short years of passage.

"But well may we hope, when this short life is gone,
To meet in some world of more permanent bliss,
For a smile, or a grasp of the hand, hastening on,
Is all we enjoy of each other in this."

The world is slipping through our fingers and gliding from under our feet; every day carries us nearer to that bourne whence no traveller returneth. Whilst we have the opportunity, then, let us live like true brothers; and let us never be more happy than when, in due time and season, and with all subordination to higher interests and holier duties, we gather our friends around our festive board, and look upon the pleasant sight, aye, the pleasantest this world can afford, which is presented by a circle of smiling and contented faces; when eye greets eye with sympathetic flash, and heart speaks to heart with an eloquence which all the rules of rhetoric could never teach it. It is to further the attainment of this happy end that I have ventured to point out in these papers some of the mistakes into which the best intentioned of us fall in these matters, in order, that by comparing our mutual experiences, and correcting our mistakes, we may render these festive meetings all that they ought to be; and, with many thanks to you, kind and courteous reader, for the patience with which you have followed me in my wanderings, and with a fervent hope that some, at least, of the hints thrown out in these papers may bring forth their fruit in due season, and tend to unite us still more and more, and make us a band of single-hearted, loving, hospitable men, walking hand in hand on our passage through the world, and ever ready with our aid for the brother who may be weak, and stand in need of our assistance, with a hearty grasp and a pleasant smile for all, and above all things, with as much of reality and as little of the artificial in all that we do and say, as is possible in this nineteenth century in which our lot is cast, I take my leave of, and write "Finis" to, the "Dinner Grievance."

CHAPTER VII.

IT is very late autumn; so late, that every morning chilly people declare over the breakfast table that winter has "set in" at last. The faded, rotting, summer dresses of elm, and lime, and poplar, lie at their base, filling the air with a rich, vegetable charnel dampness. Swiftly the plough, almost hidden in the steam from the dappled team, turns the rich umber of the under earth to the sun. Grateful to the eye is the land ploughed yesterday; its shady side of the furrows, silvered with a light frost. Winter is treading on our heels undoubtedly. Sharp and impudent are the birds. Why, the starlings, in eager quest of worms, almost strike the heels of the ploughman, as they follow in his wake! Wonderfully sagacious is this. That they should know that the worms will show upon the fresh up-turned earth; and that he is up-turning it! The berries glow in heavy crimson masses upon the denuded hawthorns. "Aye, sir," says the farmer, "we shall have a sharp winter of it." There is a metallic ring in the reports of guns in the sharp, clear air. The black, deserted birds' nests, swinging in the bare arms of elm and chestnut, are pelted by the village boys, in very wantonness. Labourers are cursing the parish steam thrashing machine, (for parishes have now their thrashing machines for the use of neighbouring farmers, as they have their fire-engines.) Yeomen are trotting from the plough to the harrow, and from the harrow to the "mixing" cart, upon solid, frisky nags. Woodcock were seen in the orchard of "The Grove" yesterday; and, if Farmer Jeastman speaks the truth, (and why should we say "if?") a couple of wild geese flew over Mr. Faversham's chimney-pots, within easy shot, only an hour or two since.

"By Jove!" says Mr. Arthur Faversham, the younger brother of our friend, "they may be along the shore."

Mr. Arthur takes his gun. Henry Faversham and Mr. Clifton, who has kindly accepted his friend's invitation, and has been received with strict politeness by Papa Faversham, are smoking in a bed-chamber snugery, which Mr. Arthur has fitted up for himself and for brother Henry, whom he adores as a shining light on all occasions.

Mr. Arty is not a clever youth, but you shall travel swiftly for a week before you find a more companionable fellow. If you suggested to him that he was handsome, he would request you to have none of your hanged nonsense. Nor was he handsome, save that he had an open—a roguish face. It twisted, and lit up, and darkened, and was convulsed with laughter, or moved to tears, so rapidly and fitfully, that it never made the same impression upon you twice. You never examined it—(I cannot for the life of me tell at this moment whether Arty's eyes were blue or sea-green; I only know that I was always pleased to meet their genial light, and warm my sluggish spirits in their warmth.)

"We are going to have a crack at some wild geese—we are," quoth Mr. Arty Faversham, as he burst into his snugery, and took down his gun. Still addressing himself, as he examined his fowling-piece, he continued, whimsically, not choosing to notice his brother or his brother's guest: "Just half a dozen geese, and a widgeon or so, will be about the thing. Not the slightest objection to a wildcock, or we'll say, a snipe—not the slightest. Could do with a snipe, with just a golden plover or two for lunch."

"What's up now, Arty?" asked Mr. Henry Faversham, without taking his eye from his book, or his pipe from his mouth.

"Reading and writing again!" answered Arty, glancing with humorous contempt at his brother and Mr. Clifton, who was "knocking off" something. "I never saw such fellows!"

Clifton pitched his pen aside, and, jumping up, vowed that he would have a turn with the young dog.

"Young dog!" repeated Master Arty, measuring his brother's friend with those queer, laughing eyes of his. "Now, then, Methusalem! Have you brought your crutch with you?"

"None of your nonsense, Arty, or I shall have to thrash you," observed the lordly Mr. Henry.

"Dear me!" responded Mr. Arty, throwing himself into a convenient posture for the threatened operation.

An east wind swept, keen as a razor, over the fields. Mr. Arty stalked valiantly against it, getting over the furrows at a rapid rate, only to enjoy the pleasure of turning round to see his brother in thin boots, and generally attired as he would have been in Regent Street, scudding uneasily over the clods, and vowing that it was not the sort of thing to which he had been accustomed.

Clifton, his hands rammed into the pockets of his reefing-jacket, and his wide-awake drawn tightly over his eyes, pushed solidly and deliberately over the ground, and found freshness, and health, and spirits in the brisk air. Mr. Arty, his hair standing stiffly out from the sides of his head, under his cap, as he looked eagerly about him, then paused to listen, then motioned his companions to halt, then levelled his gun, then dropped it again—strongly resembled a terrier. His sense of sight and sound were sharp as lightning. He knew the whistle and the song of every bird about him; he was great on the daw-backed rocks; he was not to be misled from that sharp ringing with which golden plovers rise; he was almost even with the cunning of the crows, as he hid his gun behind his back, and crept stealthily forward. Now a storm-cock flew swiftly overhead, but it was too high for Arty's gun.

The party was nearing the sea. There was a saltiness in the wind, the trees were low, and bent inland, as though they would hug the soil for protection against the relentless ocean. Faversham passed the young fellows wheeling barrow-loads of glistening fish (rock-cod and whiting, chiefly) to the neighbouring villages. Farm-carts loaded with sea-weed, were on their way to various dung-hills. Down a steep, deep cutting through the chalk cliffs, went the young men to the sea, Clifton shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Arthur; Henry Faversham daintily picking his way in the rear.

The two foremost men had hardly turned out of the cutting upon the beach, when the sharp echoes of a gunshot startled the people round about. A minute afterwards, Mr. Arthur might be seen jumping from stone to stone, dashing through wet masses of deep-green and ragged sea-weed, to where the waves were gaily and noisily tumbling along the shore, edging it with a creamy foam. He returned presently with a gull; its ruffled feathers dashed with blood.

"Nasty work," said Mr. Henry Faversham.

"Is it?" responded Mr. Arthur, "I should like to see you bring a bird down at that height! You see—sick into his head," he added, exhibiting the marks of the shot. "By George, I wish I could come across a wild-geese or two!"

Mr. Arthur pushed forward, expressing his hope that beyond a headland that stood boldly out towards the sea, about half a mile distant, they might come up with a duck or two at any rate. Clifton followed briskly; Henry Faversham sauntered after them, and then, when they turned a corner of a rock, took the opportunity of retracing his steps homeward. He had letters to write—one letter that he wished to write alone.

Let the reader learn at once, that Mr. Henry Faversham was in a state of high nervous excitement, which he controlled before friends; but to which he must give vent occasionally—alone. Did the face of the pretty blight, whitened by the moon, on that memorable night when Miss Ashby did him the honour to take his arm, and walk along Hastings parade with him, still shine before him—refusing to be chased away? If, when he called to mind the evenings he had spent at Jamaica Lodge, ruling neat little account-books for the pious little female secretary, and when he felt the sweet breath of the holy little creature upon his cheek, as she stood, necessarily, close to him, to give him directions; if when his memory had completed this picture, a peculiar thrill passed over him—a thrill as indescribable as it is pleasant—was he in love? Why was that little note which Mr. John Ashby had given him, if he were not in love, always in his pocket? A less sentimental note could not flow from an inkstand. In it, he was simply, "Dear Mr. Faversham;" and he was asked if he knew anybody who could give employment to a discharged policeman, in whose wife and children (regular in their attendance at chapel,) Miss Ashby took a lively interest. He was not even asked why he had not been, of late, to Jamaica Lodge. Where could he find employment for a discharged policeman? Could a more ridiculous question be put by a young lady to a man in Faversham's position?

Still Faversham's business, which hastened his steps back to Mr. Arthur's snuggery, was, to write in every direction. Would the man do as a waiter? Could he act as a city porter? Had he any objection to livery? A hundred questions must be addressed to Miss Ashby. Prosy work this, to an indolent man; yet, Mr. Faversham is arranging his papers with a vigour, and a swiftness, that we have not been accustomed to remark in his movements. To be sure, the correspondent is a lady, and the severest editor of the most rigid book of etiquette,—could not charge Mr. Faversham with a single forgetfulness of the laws written down, for the guidance of modern knights, in the chivalrous service of the fair sex. Still this manner, which we notice to day, is not native to the deliberate and easy gentleman of the Temple. That effort to hum a popular air, blithely, cannot deceive us who are behind the screen, peering, indecently it must be confessed, into the secrets of one who has always treated us with the most finished courtesy. The letters to friends, who may hear of a situation adapted to the capacities of an ex-policeman, are easily tossed off, and so should that to Miss Ashby be. Mr. Faversham is a most elegant letter-writer. He has always a pretty conceit at the point of his pen; and has been called "a dead hand at a compliment," by his chum. But those sweet antitheses of his are not flowing to-day. He is wasting time terribly, drawing caricatures upon his blotting paper.

Briefly,—the reader impatiently interposes—the man is in love.

Gently, fair reader, whose flashing eyes light my page; whose breath, sweet as thyme, perfumes my paper, Mr. Faversham is not in love. What! with Miss Ashby! This young lady has never given him the slightest encouragement. Her eye has never melted tenderly under his, her hand never lingered for one second in his, her lips have never betrayed a passing preference.

Miss Ashby may have won his regard, but she has never suggested to him that she is a woman; the lady is cold: has, we are inclined to think, a one-chambered heart. That waist, tender as it is, was not intended to be compressed by the rough arms of man. It is rigid, unyielding. That little head was never meant to fall out of the perpendicular, upon a lover's shoulder, and turn passionate lips to his.

Still Faversham bites the feather of his pen, and dwells upon every word of his letter to saint Minnie. There is a glow in his heart, as he directs his note to the Saint,—a glow, at once peculiar and embarrassing. Tut! tut! that impatient reader with the flashing eyes interposes, this time "really angry" to see all this beating about the bush: the man is in love, or will be.

Will be,—granted, but at this present writing there is hope for Mr. Henry. Mr. Henry is not the man to fall in love, like a school-girl. He is too sentimental to trip at once into the snare. His eye has always been upon it; he has watched every man-trap with his glasses; he has weighed every sigh; he has examined, critically, every roguish eye. Your bouncing, red-faced country bumpkins are the prizes caught easily in the man-traps. The first flash of the first eye makes them quiver in every limb. The first sigh brings their heart into their throat; the first pressure of a hand provokes an awkward, but sincere, declaration. Bumpkin, if his acreage be good, is accepted, and is afterwards "whipped into shape." His elegant young bride tells him that his taste is "horrid;" quizzes his provincialisms; turns him over to her brother's tailor, and in a few months, changes him from a bluff, hearty, country squire, into a stiff imitation of a May Fair gentleman. Is he happy? Surely he must be. His bride traces her ancestors into a far-off Norman fog, and reminds him that she refused an earl's eldest son.

But Henry Faversham was no country bumpkin, with fat acreage, to be snared by the ungloving of a hand. He admired chiefly, in Miss Ashby, that rigid conscientiousness to which she was a slave. She had never been within the walls of a theatre; she had never been upon a race-course, she had never held a hand at whist, she had never rattled dominoes, or even (one would have thought this was harmless enough) moved a bishop upon a chess-board. In a wicked moment (for all flesh is weak) she had certainly enjoyed a few passes with battle-dore and shuttle-cock, but after five minutes she had reflected that life was too short, to give any of it to the idle amusement of sending a shuttle-cock into the air. And so she had returned, a penitent sinner, to the intricacies of her blanket club accounts. From hot artificial ball-rooms, from clouds of blue and pink tarletans, from the sight of artificial flowers upon heads as artificial; the elegant mockery, the hollow refinement, the feigned modesty and underhand rivalries of my lady's rout; from the crowded staircases of Kensington gentility, where Mrs. Kensington gives an annual party (to pay off, in one reckoning, the score of her obligations to people who have invited her), from these regulated shows, in which there is neither hospitality, nor friendship, nor intellectual rubbing of mind against mind, to the extreme quiet and the honest welcome of Jamacia Lodge, is a refreshing step. Henry Faversham was amused enough at Kensington; delighted when the judge's lady sent him one of her broad cards, bidding him be of her next party. He was not insensible to the applause which greeted his waltzing; nor to the flattery which rewarded his elegant exertions at forfeits. But every man has a nature of his own, that he hides from the world. The noble impulses of the painted clown who knocks his knees and lolls his tongue for the pleasure of school-children (pomatumed and provided with sweetmeats in the boxes), shall never reach the youngest nor the eldest of these children. Behind that red and white paint is a sorrowful face, that has lately hung over a dying wife. Cruel clown, who cuts a man's head off, and sits and grins upon the trunk; has an orphan in the spare home, whom may be he has vowed to protect in memory of his dead friend—(the pantaloons of last year.)

It is hard to believe it, but Mo, the bum-bailiff, the touch of whose finger ices the debtor's heart, actually jumped into the river one day, and clutched a boy from his yawning grave; possibly giving life, hereby, to a future prisoner, Sir Cynic may add. But no, no, no; let us hold that there is a touch of redeeming good—some secret kindness, in the worst of us, as there are accidental lights in the gloomiest, the deepest caverns. Sad, that the world perversely stares at the darkness, and passes the diamond points of light. Sad, but not strange. For how deep is the mystery that, to the wife who has lived her half century with her John Anderson, remains, the seal untouched, in honest Anderson. Anderson is an open-hearted man; but he has his inner sanctuary, as we all have, the threshold of which neither parent nor mistress shall pass. We would fain hope that our best, our most solemn, self is there; and it is a comfort to us to believe so. And we laugh at the world that judges us, and the pompous big-wigs who elaborate our characters.

Our elegant waltzer, successful as a light and happy sneerer, was especially careful to conceal his inner self. This self would not do for society. He cased himself in a habited armour of indifference, which secured for him the reputation of a well-bred man. His saunter into a room was a study. He walked leisurely, supporting the stare of everybody, to his hostess; was just as cordial with M'Cummins as with Lord Falchion; asked ladies to dance, and received their intimation that their list was full, with equal grace; and he threw in a happy hit here and there, as though good things were hardly worth dropping. This was Henry Faversham, Esq., as he wished the world to see him; nor could he understand how any man could live in the world without feeling himself perfect in the bienséances.

But call me Henry Faversham to mind, far away from the scented saloons of West End, London. The scene shall be a rich slope of grass, decked with yew and willow, with rose and myrtle, with white recording stones near every footstep. Henry Faversham has lost a friend, and is now in the wake of his remains, borne on hired shoulders, to the grave. The solemn voice of the clergyman rises upon the summer air, the sun shines upon uncovered pates, and near the head of the cold, shadowy grave, stands our young friend, his face buried in his hat—of little avail the hat. The boy's heart is bursting. Never handsomer than when, red with honest weeping, you looked kindly, passionately into your dead friend's last home, before the sunlight was shut out from it, have we seen you, calm and gentlemanly friend of ours, and of our set.

And it doth appear to us, that hence we have looked to the very threshold at any rate, if not beyond it, of your inner self—that inner self of which you are ashamed, and that we are able to estimate justly your perplexity in re Miss Ashby. How you have sat at the window of your brother's snuggery this long time, short pipe in mouth, puffing smoke at the flies, and mumbling to yourself. You cannot help it, you do admire the little saint in her russet. You are horrified when you picture to yourself that quaint little straw bonnet, bound by one band of brown ribbon, bobbing at your side along Piccadilly. But—but—relieved by the appearance of the party returning from Mr. Arthur's wild expedition (which has been joined by the Misses Faversham), you would most decidedly prefer the straw bonnet and brown ribbon, to the flaunting colours (caricatures you know of the last Follet) carried by Clara.

Clara has accepted the arm of Mr. Clifton. He is very serious; she is laughing, making herself very clever, I have no doubt. Mr. Henry mutters; angry to see a sister of his "going in for a display" in the company of his own particular friend. Clifton hates display, is not fond of the Pivert, Jane Clarke, Hoby-and-Stults world. There is a high, if mocking spirit in Clifton, to which Faversham looks up, and by the side of which he appears to himself a driveller and a coxcomb. That is, when Faversham is with Clifton, and under his influence. But let Faversham have one of Lady Trumpet's broad carls before him, let him be shaving in those dingy chambers of his, preparing himself to obey Lady Trumpet's summons, and he is sad to think how his stern and careless friend puts the fashionable world aside, and hugs himself in his rough and almost brutal independence.

Clifton, coming along the gravel walk with chattering Clara, is an unpleasant picture to the lady's brother. She is so light and daring. She is so fond of asserting the most untenable doctrines. She delights so hugely in putting a serious man at a disadvantage. She will appear, in short, to Clifton, a volatile, surface-skimming girl of the world, without heart or veneration.

Why is Clifton not talking rather to sweet Ada? To Ada, who is sportive as a kitten—but tender, modest, and womanly. Who might blush, and stammer, and say she "didn't know" to a thousand not profound questions; but in whose low, murmuring, rippling voice there is a vibration that trembles from the ear to the heart. Why, again, let Mr. Faversham be asked, are his thoughts for the Peckham saint, and not for the laughing little sinner, her sister?

"Two of 'em—golden plovers both!" shouts Mr. Arty, who cares not whether Clifton talks to Ada, or to Clara, or to both, as he throws the birds on Mr. Henry's desk, and proceeds, as he whistles a favourite air, to examine his gun.

"Some people can't tell a plover from a hedge-sparrow," says Master Arty to himself, as he tries the triggers. The sneer is intended, of course, for Clifton, who is at the door of the room.

"Take those birds off my desk, young chaw-bacon," from Henry Faversham.

"Dear me!" And Master Arty removes them with humorous care, and blows all over the desk, and wipes it with his pocket-handkerchief.

"Were you afraid of your boots, Henry?" asks Clara.

"Henry had letters to write, hadn't you, dear?" volunteers gentle Ada, creeping quietly to his side.

"I've had a delightful walk, Faversham," declares Mr. Clifton. We thought he glanced at Clara as he spoke. She was examining the link of her new bracelet.

SCIENCE.—Science is too lofty for measurement by the yard of utility; too inestimable for expression by a money standard. Those groveling ideas of the objects of science, which constantly jar it in its intercourse with the world, ought to find no response in the breast of any devotee who would draw inspiration from its shrine.

HAPPINESS.—False happiness renders men stern and proud, and that happiness is never communicated. True happiness renders them kind and sensible, and that happiness is always shared.

TO SPRING.

From the grey wicket of the morn,
Under the shadow-braided skies,
With violet twilights in thine eyes,
Thou walkest across the fresh, green corn.

I see thy pathway in the dark,
Thy sweet feet print the fields with light,
With primroses and snow-drops white,
And silver on the larch tree's bark.

I know thy coming. Underneath
The black and leafless lattices,
There comes the moan of blowing trees,
The wallflower's faint ascetic breath.

I know thy coming—for the air
Blows soft upon the sleeted pane,
And drips the eaves with amber rain,
And scatters odours everywhere.

Far down, amid the shallows dank
Of the cold freshets, mallow-blossoms
Are broadening in the willow glooms,
And cowslips flame on byre and bank.

O peace, O rest! Thou wintry jar
Of piping nights and mornings cold,
With fogs upon the sunless wold,
And thunders in the west afar;

Leave us a while, that we may rise,
With bright hands on the happy latch,
That we may go abroad and catch
The season's passion from the eyes

Of fringed daisies that espy
The sun's return, before the furze
Turns golden; or the swallow stirs
His dusk wing in our faithless sky.

On many a sandy river shore,
And emerald lawn, the chestnut stands,
And shines along the pasture lands,
The gleam of blossomed sycamore.

And in the hours of sunshine brief,
But barred with shadows every one,
On gables looking to the sun,
The honeysuckle gathers leaf.

Blessed be thou, sweet time of spring,
And not alone that thou dost come,
Thy white arms piled with freshened bloom,
And songs that make the woodland ring.

No more amid the myrrhs and palms,
Of highest heaven, dost thou repose,
And feel upon thy crownless brows
The light of ever-crimson calms.

Thine aim is higher. Thou art the type
Of resurrection—of the Spring
That yet shall wake the sleeping thing,
When God is pleased, and time is ripe.

VALUE OF KNOWLEDGE.—One of the most agreeable consequences of knowledge is the respect and importance which it communicates to old age. Men rise in character often as they increase in years; they are venerable from what they have acquired, and pleasing from what they can impart.

MY AUNT AND I.

I.

I DESCRIBE HER PERSONALLY

N introducing my venerable and respected aunt to the notice of the public of these kingdoms, it may be expected that I shall inform my readers who she is, and what are her special claims to my attentions. This duty which I have adopted as a labour of love, I hasten to discharge. My aunt is a middle-aged lady, and by some misfortune, for which she at least cannot be held accountable, was christened Maryanne. This circumstance, light as it may seem to persons incapable of appreciating the aesthetics of euphony, has proved to her a constant source of irritation. She protests (my aunt never asserts anything) that the name is decidedly vulgar, and that one of the chief reasons which prevented her marrying was the dread of having the frightful surname engraved on the laps of the wedding envelopes. The sister of my father, long deceased, the middle-aged lady has invariably manifested the heartiest liking for the writer of these pages. She has dug him out of debt more than once, and although she has repeatedly protested against a repetition of the operation, the said writer believes that, if Tom got into debt to-morrow Tom would be disinterred. I am very attentive to my aunt—I am her only relative. Although she is far from being a strong minded female, she has her own idiosyncracies, her own canons of taste and judgment—above all, she is remarkable for an adherence to truth, very rare in this shuffling, equivocating world. When she fell sick down at Whitegate, the family residence, three months ago, a paragraph deploring that calamity appeared in the "Whitegate Chronicle." It expressed the heartiest sympathy with the amiable and accomplished invalid, and ended by hoping she might be speedily convalescent. "Madam," I said to her, "the Chronicle has inserted a very pleasing notice of your illness." "It did—I wrote it myself," was her brief answer. "Madam," I often venture to say, "time, which plays havoc with the fairest complexions, only improves yours." "I can't say it does," replies the lady, "as I haven't seen it this long time. Slab and rouge, sir, slab and rouge." Occasionally she volunteers a remark which may stand unsurpassed for candour and ingenueness. "Sir," she will say, "at my time of life ladies generally give over all notions of matrimony, but I flatter myself I haven't yet come to that. Did you ever see a neater figure with a girl of eighteen, Sir?" "Beautiful teeth, ma'am—perfection of symmetry—the result of extreme care," observed Dr. Leech, one day, as he was examining her tongue. "Doctor," quoth my aunt, "they take care of themselves—£10 the set, sir—suction satisfactory." One morning we were chatting over the events of a ball which we had attended the previous evening. A lady who was present said timidly, "I wonder, madam, who had the best feet in the room?" "I protest I had," replied my aunt, and she raised her dress about three inches to confirm the statement.

In matters of dress she is rather peculiar. There are but three breadths in her swellest dresses, brocades and satins as they be. she is broader at the waist than at the ankles, so that the drapery torso bears a suspicious resemblance to a baggy umbrella. Her collars are broad and deeply mitred, and might with propriety be consigned to the museum of a Flanders lace factory. In the matter of bonnets she still adheres to the railway tunnel pattern, which occasioned an irreverent fellow to remark that it required the assistance of a telescope to make out her face. For gloves she has a strong and lingering attachment, invariably wearing the one pair until the thumb seam rips and her finger tips work through. But it is in the scarf article that she shines as the cynosure of our locality. On going out, she throws a mauve-coloured slip of silk across her shoulders, and having adjusted it there, with considerable trouble, crosses the ends, and secures them with pins. This is the finishing touch of an elaborate toilet, and when it is accomplished we sally forth. On reaching the hall she stands on the mat until I have unlatched the door, and on those occasions I have frequently caught her studying her face in a bit of looking-glass neatly and secretly framed in the bottom of her reticule. She insists on taking my right arm, and frequently congratulates me on the delightful fact that she wears "no abominations," like "other young persons" whom she knows. I take the allusion to refer to a little friend of mine in Sandymount, who, with the greater part of her dear, inconsistent sex—God bless them!—will have their own way in what most concerns them.

My aunt, I should have said, is a great sight-seer. When the international fight between the immortal Heenan and the immortal Sayers was about to come off, she inquired seriously if ladies would be permitted to be present? and threw in a suggestion to the effect, that woman was the most natural as well as the best qualified of nurses. When I cautiously remonstrated with her on the impropriety of a lady attending such a proceeding, she quietly asked, "Don't women ever fight, sir?" We have been over Dublin a dozen times—are acquainted with half the barrel organs, and could furnish the addresses of two dozen noted confectioners. Our connection with the latter is the source of much humiliation to myself personally. "Sir," my aunt will say, "I require some light refreshment—come in." Walking up to the counter, she will ask, "Have you got any nice jam tarts to-day?"

"We have, ma'am."

"Ah, let me see. I do detest acids—I love something hot. Pray, oblige us with half a dozen gingerbread and two glasses of water." The viands are furnished, we pay our penny, and depart. Sight-seeing, I repeat, is a passion with my aunt. She will hear Grisi, she will hear Mario, she will see the pantomimes and the educated pig; she will see the Fishamble Dancing National Assembly Rooms, the reviews in the Park, the latest eminent carte de visite, the newest description of gas-burner, the last swallow, and the first brocoli. She has been to more than one execution in the provinces, her comment on one of those melancholy exhibitions being, "That Mr.—a—a—Catch is a very ungentlemanly-looking person." When Turner told her of the Cork hangman who used to whisper the unhappy culprit, when tying him up, "Howld up your head, and long life to yez!" the old lady rose, went to her portfolio, and wrote out the story under the head of "Entertaining Anecdotes." Only one thing puzzles her beyond measure, and that is the telegraph. If it carries messages, she doesn't see why it shouldn't "take" parcels as well; and when I strive to convince her that the communication between the ends of the lines is conducted by a spark, she shakes her head gravely, and observes, "That young spark lives very fast, sir." It was her luck to see the first Napoleon, in Paris, during the last days of his career, and she gloried in it. With all the statues, plaster-of-Paris and marble, of the First Consul, she is thoroughly dissatisfied. "Sir," she will say, pointing to the well-known picture in which the Emperor is represented standing with folded arms and gazing into the sea distance, "the man that daubed that was a booby. When I saw Napoleon, he hadn't his arms folded and his left leg stuck out in that preposterous fashion. On the contrary, sir, he was taking snuff out of his waistcoat pocket, and a great slobberer he was, with all his grandeur." That my aunt is too strictly guided by the canons of what Fichte terms positive common sense, is a misfortune for me as well as for her. For instance, we are eternally at issue on astronomical topics. She refuses to believe that when one half the world is dark the other is bright, for, as she asks, somewhat peevishly, "Who ever saw both at the same time?" To tell her that the sun is ninety millions of miles from the earth is but to provoke the inquiry, "Was there ever a tape made that could measure it?" And when the comet paid us that unexpected visit, the other day, she gave me a second glass of punch after dinner, that I might drink "More confusion to the humbug astronomers." On reading for her John Keats' apostrophic to the moon, in "Endymion," she demanded to know what all that trash was about, for she had looked at the moon through a telescope (one peep-a-penny), and protested she was pock-marked. "Poets, indeed," she continued, "why, I bought a ballad for a ha'penny, the other night, in Great George's-street, and I protest it was the best thing that ever was printed."

At dinner, my aunt tucks her napkin under her chin and turns down her glass, placing her bread below it, until I invite her to take wine with me. To carve a leg of mutton other than haunch-wise would be to rile her awfully. She eats mock-turtle with a teaspoon and chops down her ices on the point of a butter-knife. Besides she insists on everyone present sitting to table at tea, and has a notion that toast should be buttered before it is placed on the server. She likes fowls curried and spatchcocked, and makes a famous sauce of chillies and chutney that might scarify the palate of an elephant. At ten o'clock she will rise from the table, and exclaim—"I protest I had no idea of the hour, gentlemen—where are your hats?—ladies, fetch your shawls and bonnets, this dissipation is ruinous to young persons." And when the company have left, my aunt will sit down, and then—oh, then. Some other time.

Such is an outline of my aunt, a lady with whom I have had several adventures, descriptions of which may add their weak merit to the stronger features of this journal. I shall next proceed to tell you how I and my venerable relative fared in a search for "nice furnished lodgings."

II.

WE LOOK FOR "GENTEEL APARTMENTS."

I HAVE said that my aunt kept her own house; I may add that she also kept her own plate and linen, with the addition of a daddy-long-legged work-table, and a stuffed poodle with one glass eye. She was proud of all, but her invincible spirit was no match for her vanity. Once you got her "monkey" properly up, she was capable of any spite, any sacrifice; ready for any humiliation. The happy reader who shall properly appreciate those facts, will have no difficulty in understanding how it was that on Mr. Crib, her landlord, complaining one morning of the unswept state of the street-flags, the old lady flared up, and gave him what she styled "warning of quittance" on the spot. Mr. Crib, I must say, made the amplest apologies, but my aunt was not to be mollified, and he departed a bit less buoyant than he came. I was a moody and not indifferent witness of the little tableau; and for once in my life had sufficient wisdom to hold my tongue. From the rapid manner in which my aunt drove her needles through her sampler, and various nervous twitchings which enlivened the region of her mouth, I guessed that she was working up her feelings to some terrible pitch of resolution. I was right. Looking at me over the gold rims of her spectacles for a moment, she said—"Sir! we shall go into furnished lodgings. I can no longer tolerate a position which exposes me to the insults of those low landlords. Sir, get your hat, and fetch my scarf and bonnet."

When I returned with the apparel I found the old lady examining her teeth in the cheval glass, and carefully smoothing back, with her wetted fingers, a few hairs which had dropped in a distracted manner over her forehead. Without turning round she shook out the folds of her drab dress at both sides, and asked:

"Did you ever tell a lie, sir?"

I pleaded guilty to that weakness.

"I don't tell lies myself," said my aunt, shuffling her scarf across her shoulders, "for, generally speaking, one finds them inconvenient. But," (and here she put three or four pins in her mouth), "I do so love a neat falsehood. A lie, to be a lie, should be a lie. If you're sixty, for instance, there's no harm in saying you're but thirty-nine; that may pass, unless one could get a hold of your old clothes or your love-letters; but to assert at twenty-seven (critical age that for unmarried females), that you're just turned your twenty-first year, is highly immoral, sir, mean, sir, spiteful, sir, and I hate it. To tell a good lie, as it ought to be told, you require a character for truth, though, perhaps, you never earned it; lots of brass and a cheerful conscience. Your uncle William was a most superb liar, and, I own, I liked him the better for it, and he got on the better for it, and now that he's dead, I don't think he's much the worse for it. Whenever you hear people, sir, declare they abhor falsehood, keep your hand on your watch-pocket, and if your handkerchief is not over cheap, 'tis well to have an eye to it. For a lie, little or much, sir, and I protest 'tis a toss up between the best of us. To day we shall look up lodgings, and I have every reason to think we shall meet with the clumsiest crew of liars in existence. As I said before, I don't tell lies, so you must spare nothing with those people. Spare, sir, nothing!"

It is needless to say that I listened to this profoundly suggestive lesson with becoming attention and docility, and I may further add that when my aunt had imparted the last touch to her toilet, which consisted of a smart slap administered to the crown of her bonnet, that that article ought repose more easily on her head, I announced myself charmed with her morality, and ready for the excursion.

To appreciate the deplorable, decaying state of that once aristocratic portion of Dublin, which lies north and west of the Customs House, one needs traverse it in search of furnished lodgings. What with splendidly-built houses, "cottiered," as the technical phrase goes, until the hall is the property of a half-dozen distinct families, where the doors and windows rot from positive want of painting and washing; where the knocker is an abolished institution, and the bells don't ring; where the inhabitants turn the areas into laundries, and set the coal-hole to single lodgers; where the windows are never cleaned and the flags are never swept, and the policeman never examines the door fastenings, and the milkman never cries milk, and the gas cocks are turned off till the light burns blue,—a more disheartening spectacle was never offered to the contemplation of a sensitive dreamer. I do not pretend to explain my aunt's peculiarities of taste and temper; I do not profess to have fathomed her reasons for selecting the above locality for her future residence. Confining myself to the simple fact, thither we went. It was a clear day, roofed in with a bit of piebald sky, and freshened with an easterly wind, when we sallied forth. Crossing Carlisle Bridge we turned to the left, and with our eyes on the Hope of our customerless Custom House, turned off at a right angle, into the intricate net work of streets which may be described as lying in an angle formed by the river and Sackville-street. With some difficulty we got into Horticultural-street, a noble thoroughfare; and here the ruinous symptoms I have alluded to were unfortunately too visible. Every fourth house or so, displayed in its windows the little card, bearing the words "Furnished Apartments." We passed several places, before meeting with anything which came up to my aunt's notions of respectability. The "real downright" lodging-house, is an institution, whose functions are obvious at a glance. In the fanlight you are sure to find a bust of somebody, detached from its nose, with a piece of cobweb extending from the said somebody's eye to the nearest projection of plaster or woodwork. The door, in the majority of cases, presents all the symptoms of smallpox in a chronic state of eruption. It is mottled and scratched, and cross-barred, and thick with vermicular punchings, which extend all over the panels, from the lintel to the footboard. The parlour curtain is a spy of itself. The prevailing colour of that piece of drapery is a dusty brown: and the texture is a sort of book-muslin, intersected with a variety of raised stripe. Through it I have seen people at dinner, I have seen people court-ing, I have seen boys stealing lump sugar, and girls trying on turned bonnets, and old men brushing venerable hats with the assistance of their coat-sleeve. Looking up a bit higher, you will find the drawing-room windows, almost obscured by dingy draperies that were once red or yellow, but so covered with fluff and dust, that the original tint has subsided into a genteel neutral. The fringes, (and this is no small puzzle to my aunt and me,) seem to preserve their brilliancy, long after the curtain themselves had faded. The cotton twist may roll off the spools, and the hanging tassels look a bit seedy, but the fringe remains. Where there are balconies, you may find a dissipated flower-box, one end bulged out, or a row of flower pots with chapped lips, and washy complexions; all in a row, like Lady Mary's oyster shells, and of all heights and thicknesses. Mignonette is thickly distributed through those botanic collections; sweet-william, when the season favours its growth; or it is possible that a tulip bulb may be earthed there, and having sent up a few sprouts to report on the state of the locality, die rather than be identified with such villanous associates. The kitchen window, by the way, is well worthy of observation. The panes are generally foul from rime and accumulated water-drip, which clings like sea-ooze to the sashes, and sticks like flat stalactites to the glass. As for the water-butts, in which the leaden bobs hang dejectedly like muddlers in empty tumblers, it is ten to one that three of the four hoops have given way, and trundled themselves into the most inconvenient corner, where they stand like the penitential ghosts of a certain defunct folly. At those windows my aunt and I have seen, between whiles, white, old-fashioned faces peeping over the fluffy blinds, as if to ascertain the state of the weather through the railings; or a sketch of an attenuated dog sitting on a scorched iron holder, and apparently speculating on the arrival of a new lodger. Through those windows also, we have heard more than once sounds suspiciously like the creaking of an ill-greased mangle, which, in combination with certain bowls of starch and blue-bags, scattered inside, leave no doubt as to the pursuits of the occupants.

It would be unfair to infer from this description that all the lodging-houses in Horticultural-street are en suite. They are not. Amongst them may be found situated a score of cheerful, chirruping residences, with bright-windows and bright-blinds, and shiny knockers and responsive bell-handles—residences that almost ask you to step up and see them. It may be necessary to state that it was amongst those my aunt and I prosecuted our "researches;" but I, by way of a little variety, insisted on visiting their neighbours, and seeing what was to be seen, as the exhibition was gratis. After some hesitation, my aunt, who is open to any experiment that promises to increase her "knowledge of the world," consented, and we gave seven taps at a grandly-mildewed door, framed in with elaborate Ionic pillars and mouldings. At least five minutes elapsed before anyone answered, and we were ready to give up in despair, when a shuffling sound in the hall arrested our departure. An old woman, who had been evidently up the kitchen flue in quest of tooth-powder for the previous half-hour, opened the door; and as my aunt stepped in, she hooked her toes in a dilapidated mat, and nearly fell to the ground. The venerable custodian was all apologies.

"Dickens take ye, for an ould mat," she said, "and, sure 'tisn't out of pride the misses ud buy a new one. I axes yer pardon, my lady, and I hopes yer not hurted."

"Ma'am," cried my aunt, "can the lady of the house be seen?" and saying this she turned round with a hauteur which was saved from being superb only by the limpness of her skirts.

The custodian replied by rushing to the top of the kitchen-stairs, and shouting, "Are you there, ma'am?—are you there?—Quality lookin' for rooms, ma'am. Hurry on wid yez."

A pair of slippers clacked up the stairs to the tune of Lillibulero, a head emerged over the landing, and the lady of the house confronted us with her sweetest smile. A middle-aged person was the lady of the house: her hair, scrupulously brushed back from her forehead, shaved to heighten it, was of a deep, rich black, but, when she stood between us and the light, it emitted a purple hue that spoke volumes in favour of Fred Lewis's "Marvellous Hair-Dye." She had a pale, mustard complexion, that terminated at a pair of small, red ears, and the upper edge of a check apron hurriedly thrown over her neck. I observed that her chin, apprehensive, perhaps, of being lost, had presented its owner with a duplicate of itself in high relief, and my aunt observed that her finger-nails were enriched with a deposit of gritty dough. Of her dress, it must be said, it was neat and simple; and she wore three pocket-handkerchiefs (white lozenges on a red background) knotted at the corners, and tied around her waist as an apology for an apron.

"Want to see the apartments, ma'am? This way, ma'am," and she led the way to the drawing-room.

I saw at a single glance that the place would not answer, and I determined to observe my aunt's morality in order to get out of it. The front drawing-room was a three-sided apartment, an arrangement necessarily resulting from the gable of the house being built skew-wise. The curtains were so heavy and mouldy that scarcely any light penetrated into the room, what did scarcely enable us to make out a couple of ugly silhouettes hung above the mantel-shelf; when the fire-irons had been used was a matter of speculation, for they were clogged with rust, and seriously ignorant of chamois and bath-brick. To the right of the apartment stood an ancient piano, which endeavoured to maintain its equilibrium on three legs and a music stool. The silk shade was badly fretted in more places than one; and some former literary lodger had contrived to cut his initials, "P. F." on the key-board. As for the keys themselves, most were down-hearted, and forgot to rise when touched. The entire furniture of the apartment was chastely clothed in blue chintz, which did not stand washing, and various fractures in which revealed substratic glimpses of faded crimson, bits of curled hair, and morsels of rotten mahogany. On the walls I observed a species of paper on which a covey of plump pheasants were enjoying themselves in what appeared to be the suburbs of a drunken vineyard. Vines were mingled with peaches, peaches with vases, and vases with architraves, that appeared to spring out of nothing, and find rest on the same. There was a cabinet, too, loaded with geological specimens, obviously abstracted from the nearest road depot, as the collection comprised only two varieties of minerals, viz.—quartz and sandstone. About the pictures, it would not be fair to say much, as they were all family portraits; but it struck my aunt that they might have had their faces washed something cleaner ; and that the oldest of the lot must have been very vulgar to enter a drawing-room with his hands in his breeches pockets.

"And here's the bedroom, ma'am. Very lofty, ma'am, and such air ! I had a gentleman with me for three years in this room, and he was at last obliged to leave me on account of it."

"Beg your pardon, madam," quoth my aunt, "what did you say he left for?"

"The air, ma'am, the air. He was an author—one that writes for the newspapers and them things ; and the air, ma'am, gave him too much appetite."

"And you believed him?" asked my aunt, abstractedly.

"Oh, dear, yes, ma'am. Always believe decent, respectable persons."

"Humbug," said the old lady. "If you do, I protest you're a fool. Is this the bedroom?"

The apartment into which we were ushered was a square, high enclosure, in the centre of which stood a bed, gorgeously draped in the conventional figured calico. The clothes, which were turned down within a few inches of the foot, displayed a nice bit of snowy dunnity, and the pillows and bolsters were unexceptionably white and wholesome. It was a pretty room on the whole, but I knew it would never suit, so I said :

"These are really nice cheerful rooms. What are your terms?"

"Fifteen shillings a week, sir, finding your own coal and candles."

"Well," I replied, "we shant object to that. You can let us have a portion of the kitchen and another bed-room?"

"Dear, yes, sir."

"Then," I said, "this lady and I may consider things settled, and we shall fetch the children this evening."

The lady of the house glared, the lady of the house opened her eyes, and merely said, "Children, sir!"

"Children!" I replied, "yes. Is that anything extraordinary?"

"No, sir, nothing wonderful ; but I'm sorry you didn't mention them sooner, as we are quiet people which hates noise. Kids wouldn't answer me, sir."

"Indeed," said my aunt, puckering her eyebrows, "so children wouldn't answer you, ma'am. I protest I love them. Come Augustus," she continued, taking my arm, "I saw a label in the next window, we shall enquire there."

"Beware of them, ma'am, beware of them," exclaimed the lady of the house. "There was a Mr. Tottle lodged there for a week, and they robbed him. They brings him up his bill one day, and he says, opening his eyes as big as two saucers,

"What's this?" says he; "cheese, fd. My goodness, Mrs. Cruschet," says he, "had I cheese for breakfast?"

"No, sir," says she.

"Had I cheese for dinner, Mrs. Cruschet?" he says.

"No, sir," says she again.

"Then, ma'am," says he, "had I cheese for tea?"

"No sir," says she, "you hadn't cheese any time, but barring that, are you forgetful," she says, "that there's mice in the house, traps to be set, and wittles to be pertected?"

"Beware of Mrs. Cruschet, ma'am, and don't believe her if she took her book oath on it. I never borrowed a copper saucepan from her, and" (we had reached the lowest of the street steps), "her first husband isn't dead yet."

TO MY SISTER.

DEAREST, thou'rt very fair ; most delicate
Hus of the Heavens do sleep within thine eyes,
And in thine hair a golden arrow lies,
And on thy happy steps two suitors wait.
Beware, beware ! Dear, favour show not him
Whose mind perceiveth but thy loveliness,
And leaves thy better part to doubtful guess.
Beware, beware ! The richest star grows dim
And wanes in season. Bleared eyes and lips
Are common heritage ; thy steps shall fail,
The strawberries forsake thy finger tips,
And the warm cheek, I kiss, be sick and pale.
If he love not thy soul, his suit disdain,
Too soon no other beauty shall remain.

CARRICKFERGUS.

LACED on a rock, and in a convenient position for commanding the best harbour on the north-east coast of Ireland, it is a very natural supposition that this place should have been early selected as the site of a fortress, which is said to have been a stronghold of the Dalriadians, and distinguished by the name of Carrag-fergusa, or the rock of Fergus, after a king of that name, who was drowned near the place.

John de Courcy, having received from Henry II. a grant of all the land he might conquer in Ulster, set out from Dublin with a small band of seven hundred followers to secure his prize. Observing the convenient position of the strong fort, he erected here, according to the Norman practice, a castle, which, with subsequent additions, now remains, and may justly be considered as one of the noblest fortresses of the time now existing in Ireland.

De Courcy having fallen into disgrace with the succeeding English monarchs, his castles and possessions fell into the hands of the De Lacy family, who becoming oppressive and tyrannous, were in their turn ejected by King John—fled to France—were restored—again became obnoxious to the English monarch, and the Lord Justice Mortimer being sent against them, they fled a second time, and passing over into Scotland, invited Edward Bruce, the brother of the famous Robert Bruce, to invade their country, and become their king.

In May, 1315, Lord Edward Bruce, having obtained the consent of the Scotch parliament, embarked six thousand men at Ayr, and accompanied by the De Lacys and many nobles of the Scotch nation, landed at Oldfleet. Numbers of the Irish chiefs flocked to his standard ; and having in a battle totally routed the Earl of Ulster, and slain and taken prisoners various of the Anglo-Norman nobles, he laid siege to Carrickfergus. During the progress of the siege, he had well nigh been discomfited by the courage and desperation of the garrison. Thomas, Lord Mandeville, who commanded, made a sally upon the Scotch army, who were apprehending no danger, their only guard being sixty men, under Neill Fleming, a man of great courage and address. He perceiving that the Scotch army would be surprised and probably routed, despatched a messenger to inform Bruce of his danger, and then, with his sixty men, threw himself in the way of the advancing English, crying out, "Now, of a truth, they will see how we can die for our lord!" His first onset checked the progress of the enemy, but receiving a mortal wound, he and his little party were cut to pieces. Mandeville, dividing his troops, endeavoured to surround the Scotch army ; but was met in person by Bruce, who, with his guards, was hurrying forward. In front of Bruce's party was one Gilbert Harper, a man famed in the Scotch army for valour and strength, and he knowing Mandeville by the richness of his armour, rushed on him, and felled him to the ground with his battle-axe, and then Bruce despatched him with a knife. The loss of the English commander so disheartened the soldiers that they fled back towards the castle ; but those who remained in the garrison, seeing the Scots close behind, drew up the draw-bridge, leaving their comrades to the mercy of enemies.

In the year 1503, Con O'Neill, chief of south or upper Clancaboy, whose castle was that of Castlereagh, was confined here, on account of the following affair. Having about Christmas, 1602, a "grand debauch" at Castlereagh, with his "brothers, friends, and followers," he sent his servants to Belfast for more wine. They, in returning, quarrelled with some English soldiers, near the Knock Church, and they lost the wine. Con was, doubtless, not a little vexed ; and having learned from them that their number exceeded the English soldiers, he swore by "his father, and souls of his ancestors," that they should never be servants of his until they had beaten the "bulldaghs Nassenagh soldiers." This threat roused their courage—they returned, attacked the soldiers, several of whom were killed in the affray. Con was soon after seized as an abettor, and confined for some time. But, though he was permitted, after a time, to walk out through the town, attended by a soldier, Con did not relish his limited liberty. But one Thomas Montgomery, the master of a barque which traded to Carrickfergus, with meal for the garrison, being employed by his relative, Hugh Montgomery, to effect Con's escape, and letters having been conveyed to the prisoner advising him that measures were planning, he made love to Annas Dolbin, the daughter of the provost-marshal, and marrying her, she (and small blame to her) got O'Neill conveyed on board her husband's vessel, and set sail for Ayrshire. Con was afterwards pardoned by James the First, but in the meantime he had been simple enough to make over the greater part of his estate of Clandeboy to the cunning Hugh Montgomery, who procured a new patent, and entered on the possession.

During the wars of 1641, and following years, Carrickfergus became an object of interest to the contending parties, being alternately in the keeping of the Scotch, English, and Irish.

The year 1760 is memorable as being the year in which the French, under the command of Commodore Thourot, landed in Carrickfergus, and attacked the town. Though the castle was in a most dilapidated state, a breach being in the wall next the sea fifty feet wide, no cannon mounted, and the garrison few in number, yet Colonel Jennings, encouraged by the mayor and other inhabitants, bravely met the invaders, and when driven back by the superior strength of their assailants, they retreated into the castle, and repulsed the French, even though they forced the upper gate. But all the ammunition being expended, a parley was beaten, and the garrison capitulated on honourable terms. During the attack a very singular circumstance occurred. When the French were advancing up High-street, and engaged with the English, a little child ran out playfully into the street between the contending parties. The French officer, to his honour be it recorded, observing the danger in which the little boy was, took him up in his arms, ran with him to a house, which proved to be his father's, the sheriff, and having left him safe, returned to the engagement. This really brave and humane man was killed at Carrickfergus Castle gate.

The French kept possession of Carrickfergus for some time; but the alarm having been carried all over the country, and troops gathering fast to attack them, they were constrained to embark on board their vessels and set sail; and two days afterwards were attacked off the Isle of Man by an English squadron, when Commodore Thourot was killed, and the French ships captured.

CARRIGADROHID CASTLE.

THE Castle of Carrigadrohid is situated within three miles of Macroom, to the east, in the county of Cork, and province of Munster. It is built on a steep rock which rises in the middle of the river Lee, and its erection is attributed to one of the M'Carthy family; but this is disputed, and some affirm that it was built by the O'Learys, who held possession of it for a long time: others say it was built to please Lady O'Carroll, who was married to one of the M'Carthy's, and who selected this beautiful and romantic spot for her residence. However, judging from the ruins, the castle seems to be of comparatively modern structure, by its square and gabled turrets; yet we cannot but admire the taste of the lady who pitched upon the wild rock of Carrigadrohid for the site of a castle. It commands the passage of the bridge over the Lee; and this castle and bridge were taken and retaken by the contending parties during the wars of 1641. It was then a noted pass.

The Lee, or Ley, river extends from Macroom to Cork, a distance of twenty miles, and runs through a great part of the county of Cork, by Macroom, Crookstown, Carrigadrohid, and Cork.

The Lee is supposed to be the Luvius of Ptolemy, and rises in that highly wild and romantic spot called the Lough Gougane Barra, which is deemed one of the greatest curiosities in the country. Gougane Barra, or the hermitage of St. Barra, or Finbar, is traditionally allowed to have been the hermitage of that Saint, before he founded the Cathedral of Cork.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER XIII.

FOLLOWED by Tony, the Black Doctor and Foster proceeded to the house where Mrs. Foster was staying, and as they went their way they arranged the plan for Foster and his wife going out of town that night.

"I know a place in a remote part of the county of Wicklow," said Bramble, "where you and Mrs. Foster can reside, and never fear detection. You must be there before daybreak to-morrow, and a letter which I will give you, will insure for Mrs. Foster care and every attention."

Fully an hour before midnight Mr. and Mrs. Foster were seated in a comfortable room in a charming cottage, far removed from the reach of their enemies.

The interview between Barman and the Jew was of short duration; the latter promised to be ready at any time to go to the court, to lodge the will, and to give every facility to the money being drawn, that lay to the credit of him to whom Mrs. Foster had bequeathed it.

The Black Doctor and Tony put up at their usual lodgings, and retired early to rest.

It was evident that some great change had come over Bramble. He forsook all his old haunts, and his old associates, and there was an abstraction in his manner not easy to account for. He was fond of being left alone. What was the cause? He was up to his ears in love with Charlotte Stammers. He knew that his race and colour rendered a union with her he loved all but an impossibility, and he often tried but tried, in vain, to turn his thoughts from ever dwelling on her; but her image haunted him by day and night, and often he wished he had never seen one who was the cause of so much anguish to him. His vanity, or perhaps his philosophy, would come to his aid, and he would say within himself, the antipathy against my race arises from prejudice, and if she loves me, love rises above all prejudice, and if she does not love me, what is she to me but a stranger. But love, thou art a mighty power, whether you are seen governing by a mild and gentle sway, or subduing the strongest or most potent to yourself. Ambition, fame, philosophy, are all mere straws when opposed to your triumphal progress, and, whether you lead to joy or to sorrow, all admit the might of your influence, and the indestructibility of your dominion. Bramble, the daring, the resolute, and thoughtless of consequences, became a child under your control. He loved with the intensity of his warm and impulsive nature, and everything in life assumed a very secondary place in his consideration when contrasted with the object he loved.

Bramble at one moment made up his mind to go to the house of Colonel Stammers, and openly avow his attachment to Charlotte. At another moment his courage would fail him, and at last he determined to make Tony his confidant, and entrust him with a letter to her who was valued by him more than everything else in the world.

He called Tony, and said to him—

"I have something of the greatest importance for you to transact for me; I will depend on your fidelity and long-tryed friendship. You must give this letter to Miss Stammers, and to no one else—mind, into her own hand, and she must get it without any person but herself seeing it. Take it," continued Bramble; "on this brief letter depends my fate."

"I will deliver it safe," said the boy; "but what excuse am I to give for calling?"

"You are right," observed Bramble. "Say that I am not well, and that I sent you to ask how Mr. Stammers is going on."

In a short time Tony was off on his mission, and Bramble remained within doors in a state of the greatest suspense.

"In the letter which I have sent," soliloquised the Black Doctor, as he walked up and down, "I have candidly stated to her the love which I bear her. I have not concealed from her that I know there is a prejudice, and a strong one, against my race and colour, but I have expressed the hope that the ardent love which I feel for her would make me find favour in her heart. Am I not a man better than thousands who are courted and flattered—but they are white, and I am black."

Tony was received with the greatest kindness at Elm-place by the old Colonel, Mrs. and Miss Stammers.

"Where is Doctor Bramble?" asked Charlotte—"why did he not come to see my brother?" and before Tony could reply, Mrs. Stammers said that she hoped the Doctor was well.

Tony replied that Doctor Bramble was not well, and that he had sent him to inquire if Mr. Stammers was getting better.

"Come and see him, Tony," said Mrs. Stammers, and the two ladies conducted the boy to the room in which Bob Stammers was lying.

"You are welcome, Tony," observed the patient; "but where is my friend the Doctor? I expected to see him before this."

"He has not been very well to-day," replied Tony, "and he sent me to see you. He is not very sick, and I think he will be well to-morrow."

Tony was most anxious for an opportunity to deliver his message, but he perceived that he had no chance in the presence of Stammers of giving the letter to Charlotte without being perceived.

"I have had no breakfast to-day," said the knowing Tony, looking sharply at Miss Stammers; "perhaps you would be good enough to take me to where I can get some."

Stammers laughed heartily at the free and easy manner assumed by the boy, and said—"Go with Tony, Charlotte, and get him his breakfast."

Tony, when he got outside the door, slipped the Black Doctor's letter into the hand of Miss Stammers, saying,

"I will wait for an answer."

While Tony was discussing his breakfast, Charlotte Stammers retired to her room to read the letter which she had just received. She opened it, and when she ascertained its meaning, it fell from her hands on the floor.

"This is strange, most strange, that he should write thus to me, asking me to be his wife," said Charlotte. "Can he have lost his reason, or does he mean to insult me? I will reply to him as a woman should reply," said the beautiful girl, now looking more beautiful because of her excitement. "But stay," continued she, "I must not be unreasonable with the man who saved my brother's life. I will reply to this," said she (stooping, and lifting the letter from the floor) "and put an end to the Doctor's matrimonial ideas, as far as I am concerned. Charlotte Stammers to become the wife of a black man! what a notion? I owe him much, as do all belonging to me, but it would appear that I am expected to pay dearly for my part of the obligation."

She seated herself at a desk, and wrote the following letter—

"DEAR DOCTOR BRAMBLE—Tony handed me a letter addressed from you to me privately. In reply to that communication, I have only one word to say, and that is 'impossible.' Your own good sense will tell you, on reflection, that such a letter as that which you have sent me should not have been written."

"I acknowledge the many and deep obligations my family are under to you, and if you deem them of any value, you may always reckon on the deep gratitude and sincere friendship of,

"Yours most truly

CHARLOTTE STAMMERS.

"Elm Place, Tuesday."

She folded and sealed this letter, and gave it to Tony, who was anxiously waiting for it.

"I hope we will soon see you again," said Miss Stammers.

"I suppose you will see me every day from this out," said Tony, winking knowingly, and never dreaming that he was the bearer of the saddest news to the Black Doctor that he could hear.

Bramble met Tony at the door of his lodgings, and asked him in an excited manner if he had brought an answer to the letter.

"I have," said Tony, "and here it is," handing Bramble Miss Stammers' note.

"You are a brave fellow, Tony," said Bramble, as he ran to the window of his room to read that which he had said would decide his fate.

When he had read it he calmly folded it up and put it in his pocket.

"It must be a stupid thing for you, Tony," said the Black Doctor, "to be deprived of all kinds of amusement on my account. Go out for a few hours and enjoy yourself. I will remain within to-night."

Tony availed himself of the permission which he had received, and scampered off in search of fun or mischief.

Bramble became quite overpowered on reading Miss Stammers' note; he did not wish any person to perceive his emotion, and for that reason he desired to be alone.

When Tony left, the Black Doctor writhed in mental torture. In one moment all his dreams of happiness vanished, as did also his good resolves. Pride and grief sought for mastery, but at length the former prevailed.

"She did not know of my follies or my vices," said he; "she and hers only knew me by acts of kindness and self-sacrifice. She spurns me because of my race, but if I had let her brother meet a felon's fate, the haughty Charlotte Stammers would not be above forming an alliance with one even more despised than him they call the Black Doctor. But this kind of thing is unworthy of me; I will strive and forget her; she must be to me as if I had never seen her, and from this hour I will discard her from my thoughts."

This was a brave resolve, Bramble, but during your sojourn in life Charlotte Stammers will haunt you like the memory of a melody, or the remembrance of a happy dream.

The Jew was punctual in keeping his appointment with Barman, and both proceeded to the dingy old court whence the will was lodged, and after the usual formalities were gone through, probate was granted.

"We will make immediate application to draw the money out of the English courts," said Barman, addressing Isaacs, "I will not delay in handing you the thousand pounds which you advanced."

"It would be well if you considered this matter," observed the Jew, "or you will lose a great opportunity of putting money into your pocket. Foster owes me more than ever he can pay me, and why should we now give up that which fortune has placed in our power?"

"You had one escape from my vengeance before," said Barman, looking thunder,—"don't try my patience again, or you may not get off so well."

"It was for your own interest I was speaking," observed Isaacs, "can't we be friends and serve one another?"

"One word more on this subject, and I will let you know the kind of man Jacob Barman is. I would strongly recommend you to be most prudent in your dealings, with me and, indeed, in your conversations also."

The Jew remained silent until he arrived opposite his own door, when he hid the astute attorney "Good evening."

That night Barman forwarded to London the authority to draw the two thousand five hundred pounds lying to the credit of Foster, as legatee to his wife, out of the English equity courts.

When Tony returned to the lodging-house, he was surprised to hear that Bramble had retired to rest. The Black Doctor was stricken by that keenest of weapons, "love unreturned, unrequited."

Tony, in his ramblings, had met Joey Dix, the dog fancier, who made most anxious inquiries for Bramble and the gentleman who had broken his leg. Tony had seen several of his old acquaintances, and was not a little disappointed at having to go to bed without being able to tell Bramble all the news he had collected.

The morning was far advanced when Bramble left his room. He looked as if he had not slept, and there was an air of carelessness or weariness about him that clearly showed something of a serious nature had affected him. He sent for Tony, who soon made his appearance, and at once perceived the change which had come over the Black Doctor.

"Is there anything the matter with you?" asked the boy. "You are not looking like yourself to-day."

"I want you to call at Barman's office," said Bramble, evasively.

"Tell him that I want to see him here at once, on particular business. Don't leave him till he comes with you."

"All right," said Tony; "but you have not told me how you are. I know that something is the matter with you, as you have not the same look you used to have when you were so full of fun and tricks at ———, the old house," continued the boy, seriously.

Bramble, who perceived the kindly solicitude of Tony, went towards him, with assumed frankness, and said, "You know, Tony, that for the past week I went through a great deal of hardship and excitement. I am not well, and want rest," continued the Black Doctor, musing.

The close-observing power of Tony was brought to bear on his patron, who appeared to be struggling with emotion, which he tried to conceal. But no acting or dissimulation could hide the heart-burnings that he felt.

How many truths in life are made known by persons imagining that their actions are not observed and truly translated even by those for whom nothing but contempt and bitter servitude had been reserved? Children, reputed fools, and all who take special note of trifles, are great observers, and for this reason:—they never think on anything else; and still, in trifles alone can the true features of character be observed, as the generality of men deal with them without the assistance of that great barrier—caution, ever in requisition when important questions are to be determined.

Bramble knew too much of the world not to know that he had been observed by Tony, and finding that further disguising the truth was useless, he said—

"I hope, Tony, that you will never have to feel the serpent bite of the detested monster, Ingratitude, as it is sure to wound you in the most vital place. I believe it is the most hideous form the Devil assumes; it is an accursed thing, so bad, so fiendish, that even the most abandoned ruffian, who is willing to plead guilty to every other charge that could be brought against him, stoutly maintains that he is innocent of the hellish crime of ingratitude. Still, the world is full of ingrates, and none are brought to justice, because there is no punishment known on earth commensurate with the transgressions. You know what I did for him that is called Bob Stammers, and for those of his kindred. I risked my life to save him and his from utter ruin; and, will you believe it, Tony, they who fawned upon me when they were in danger, who never lost an opportunity of telling me how deep they were in my debt, tittered and pointed at me when they thought that danger was removed, and even whispered abroad that it did not look well to have the "black man" so intimate at Elm-place?"

Tony looked with intense amazement at the Black Doctor, and was proceeding to speak, when Bramble interrupted him, and said:

"Yes, Tony, but they never knew that my colour was black when you and I were working and striving to save him from the gallows. But there was one in Elm-place whose heart I believed was true and good, and its sunshine beamed from her eyes upon my heart. She I thought could love him, no matter what his colour, that could accomplish manly and noble deeds, sacrifice self for others, and seek no reward but in his own esteem. Such I thought her, but such I did not find her. One more proud, more nobly born, and as beautiful, was wooed and won by one of my race. But surely, if all I have read be true, Othello did not serve the daughter of the Venetian patrician as I served Charlotte Stammers."

Tony, who did not understand one-half of the allusions of Bramble, still could glean sufficient to make him understand what was sought to be conveyed to him.

"She sent me a letter by you, Tony, and in that letter she offers me gratitude and friendship—the one another name for 'thankfulness for favours to come,' and the other 'a cloak for hypocrisy.' I have her brother still in my power, but out of the respect I once bore her and the love I had for her, he is safe—aye, as if he had never forged a bill or signed a post obit. But now, Tony, as I have spoken so much about ingratitude, I must tell you there is another crime which I hold to be nearly as bad—I mean not taking vengeance on your enemies when you have the power to do so. I have a long score to settle with Abraham Isaacs. I have sworn to settle it, and it must be done. Do you go to Barman at once, Tony, and do not breathe a word of what I was telling you to anyone. This life of inaction would never suit me, and perhaps my efforts to improve the worldly prospects of Mr. Isaacs will bring me back to my old health and spirits."

Tony, who relaxed into a kind of reverie during the time that Bramble was speaking, observed:

"Surely you don't mean to say that Mr. Stammers or his wife gave you any offence when you went to see them?"

"By no means," replied Bramble; "and Tony, like a good fellow, don't be long in bringing Barman here."

Tony reluctantly left the room, evidently displeased at not having got more information concerning the folk at Elm-place.

NELLIE PITTIS.

BLOW warm wind from the spicy South,
Low airs of fragrant cinnamon,
Touch half the ripples of her mouth
Before that happy smile has gone;
Wild bird, on yonder lilac branch,
Ravish her ear with crystal ditties,
She sits and laughs below the sun,
My own dear girl—my Nellie Pittis!

One little curl, gold-tinct and rare,
Trails down the whiteness of her neck,
Across her forehead, smooth and fair,
The dim leaves scatter many a fleck;
Above her drifts the azure cloud,
Rolled seaward from the dusky cities,
Dear light, dear life, dear hope, dear love,
Smile on me, smile, sweet Nellie Pittis!

Ah! dare I touch that happy hand,
—White fingers, rosy-tipped and warm,
Or whisper in that little ear
One brief sweet word—hush, no alarm!
I deem it bliss to sit and sing
Whilst thou, rich love, inspirest the ditties,
Be mine to hope, be thine to yield,
In thy good time, sweet Nellie Pittis!

ANCIENT IRISH NECK ORNAMENTS.

OR artistic design and highly finished manipulation, the most remarkable personal decoration characteristic of the age known as the BRONZE PERIOD, is undoubtedly the torque, an ornament common to all the Celtic nations, the name being derived from the Celtic torc, a twisted collar, or more correctly, a twisted circular decoration of any kind. In design it was of the penannular, or open ring form, and as the term implies, was composed of twisted fillets or convoluted bars of gold, and rarely of sometimes from thick plates of metal, elaborately chased. It was in general rebated, and outward, by which device it held, or if the extremities were in some examples, they were secured with skeins of some silk or woollen fabric. Such ornaments are of the most remote antiquity, and like the Celtic, to whom the construction of most of these which modern railway and agricultural enterprise restores to the light of day is traceable, and in whose manners and customs the pervading universality of the oriental element was effectively illustrated, are unmistakably of Eastern origin. The collar of gold with which Pharaoh invested Joseph, is rendered in the Septuagint by the word strepson (strepton,) turned or twisted, and was evidently a similar kind of decoration, as the monumental remains of Egypt prove that our present description of chains were then unknown, but that torques, or spirals of gold, were common. Exact counterparts of these are also of frequent occurrence on the bas-reliefs discovered in such profusion among the ruins of Persepolis, the ancient capital of Persia. Moreover, in the narrative related by Herodotus, of the ambassadors sent by Cambyses to the Ethiopians, there is a distinct notice of the gold collars which they wore, and which it would seem the African monarch considered insignificant compared with those of his own subjects. The Persian torques were probably made of Scythian gold; the Ethiopian of African. Sir Robert Ker Porter also alludes to these spiral collars as being represented on Persepolitan monuments amongst the most prominent gifts offered to Darius, whose exuberant wealth at last excited the cupidity of a Roman conqueror, and numbered his empire with the territorial appendages of the mistress of the civilized world. The Assyrian warriors wore collars and ear-rings of a similar pattern, the most common being composed of gold wire, from which circumstance this kind of ornament was called "Pathil" or "Phatil," derived from a word signifying to twist. They were likewise worn by the Mesopotamians, and, as we learn from the Ninevite sculptures and the book of Genesis, by the people of other countries. Another species of Eastern neck ornament were the thin tires, or gorgets, of gold, now distinguished as "lunettes," from their form, and which have been erroneously regarded as head ornaments—an hypothesis which their tenuity of material renders altogether untenable. They are most probably the "round tires like the moon," mentioned by the prophet Isaiah as having been worn by the daughters of Zion—those damsels of the wanton eyes, and mincing gait, and tinkling feet—and this supposition is the more certain, since although he alludes to all other decorations that would be worn by females, he particularizes none specially designed for the neck.

Torques were distinctive badges of Gallic chivalry. The treasure wrested upon one occasion by the Romans, under Publius Cornelius, from the Boii, a nation of Celtic Gaul, famous for their opposition to the domination of their conquerors, included nearly fifteen hundred decorations of this kind. A fanciful story originated by the annalist Quadrigarius to account for the title, and adopted by Livy as an historical truth, relates that in a single encounter between Titus Manlius and a Gaul, A.U. 393, the golden neck spiral of the latter became the spolium opimum of the victorious Roman, upon whom the Senate conferred the surname of Torquatus, which remained hereditary with his descendants until annulled by a decree of the Emperor Caligula. From its general recognition as essentially an honorary distinction of the Gauls, the torque has been introduced as encircling the neck of that masterpiece of Ctesilaus—the theme of some of the most noble and masterly stanzas in "Childe Harold"—the immortal statue of the Dying Gladiator—

"Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday."

This incomparable example of antique sculpture, "all nature, all feeling," was found in the year 1770 at Porto d'Anzo, the same locality where, in the sixteenth century, the Belvedere Apollo was discovered, and is preserved in the Museo Capitolino at Rome. Modern criticism, however, has shown it to have received an erroneous appellation. It is unquestionably a memento of the palmy days of Greek art, and therefore of a period long antecedent to the introduction of gladiatorial contests, and evidently formed one of a series of figures illustrating the irruption of the Gauls into Greece. When this statue was disinterred after the lapse of many centuries, the right arm and portions of both feet were mutilated, but were restored by Michael Angelo in a manner almost worthy of the original. The fresco decorations of a villa at Pompeii, depicting some incident in Grecian warfare, represents the forces opposed to them—most likely Gauls—as wearing similar ornaments. The Medes and Persians were remarkable, even amongst Asiatics, for their love of decorations of this class.

The torque was not generally worn by the Romans, and is seldom found in the ruins of their cities, being most familiar to them only as one of the spoils which adorned the procession of a triumphant general. They had, however, an order of knighthood, the members of which were called "Equites Torquati," in allusion to the golden badge of their rank, and it is a decoration of this kind, perhaps, to which Virgil refers in the fourth book of the "Æneid":—

"It pectore summo Mexillis obtortit per collum circulus auri."

It is a matter of history, as may be gleaned from the pages of Caesar, Diodorus Siculus, and many others, that such was the abundance of gold among the Celts in their times, as well as in preceding ages—

"A date remounting far beyond the day When Roman legions met the scythian cars"—

they wore the richest and most massive decorations of that metal, as torques, armillæ, bracelets, &c. and even had their armour and weapons inlaid, and the frontlets of their helmets lavishly encrusted with it. It is no marvel that the Romans should have deemed the conquest of those same Celts a task worthy of their most splendid aggressive efforts, when the pens of classic writers enable us to realize the character of the treasures which, in common with their independence, they defended so nobly.

Gold is mentioned by Strabo as having been one of the chief products of ancient Britain, where torques of that metal were generally worn. Dio Cassius notices one as adorning the person of Boadicea, the heroic Queen of the Iceni. Probably the most unique and interesting example hitherto found in England is that accidentally turned up in Sherwood Forest by a fox some years since, and at present in the possession of her Majesty the Queen. It is of simple, but tasteful form, composed of seven strands of gold, twisted together and looped at the extremities. In Wales, formerly so celebrated for its mines of the precious metals, this ornament was a common embellishment, and is everywhere alluded to in the bardic poems, as in the following translation from Aneurin, who wrote in the sixth century;—

"To Cathaeth's vale, in glittering row,
Twice two hundred warriors go;
Ev'ry warrior's manly neck
Chains of regal honour deck," &c.

From a magnificent decoration of this kind Llewellyn, one of the native princes, not many centuries since derived the agnomen, aur Dorchag—"Llewellyn of the Golden Torque." Llywarch Hên, a bardic prince who flourished in the sixth century, asserts that he had four and twenty sons, each of whom, in virtue of his rank, wore a massive golden torque. In Ireland the aggregate amount of the articles of manufactured gold found even within the present century is altogether unexampled in the records of treasure trove, most of them, moreover, being of exquisite and elaborate workmanship, particularly the torques, fibulæ, armillæ, &c. After the lapse of immeasurable years, accident or the cupidity of this matter-of-fact age, whetted by traditions of long-buried wealth, disinters them from their dark recesses, but little impaired by the ravages of time, while the very dust of their former possessors has become undistinguishable. The geographical source of all this treasure has been a fertile theme of antiquarian discussion. A portion of it may have been procured by foreign commerce, but it is probable that native gold was anciently found in the "Island of the Saints" in greater abundance than it has been in modern times. At any rate, the national annals furnish incontestible evidence of a people far advanced in metallurgic craft for the age to which these articles are referred, and from the sixth to the eleventh century, as Mr. Digby Wyatt—no partial critic—has admitted, the Irish were, in the practice of art, undoubtedly "in advance, both in mechanical execution and originality of design, of all Europe, and the Anglo-Saxon in particular." We find notices of artificers "very curious in the working of metals" at the most remote pre-historic period. In the year of the world 3070, a Milesian monarch instituted the "Order of the Golden Chain," a dignity second only to that of the sovereign, and the knights of which, like the Roman "Equites Torquati" of a later age, wore a glas, or chain of gold around their necks. In the course of the ensuing reign, the custom of wearing rings of the same metal, as the insignia of those who excelled in the arts and sciences, was first introduced. These decorations were known as muntorcs, when designed to encircle the neck, and failghe, when worn as armlets, or leg-bangles. A very celebrated collar was the one mentioned in the Irish annals, as the "Iodhain Morain," which was so termed from the Prime Minister or Chief Justice of King Feredach, (A.D. 96,) and was fabled to warn the wearer by its increased pressure, when about to pronounce an erroneous judgment. In the second century, (A.D. 122,) an Irish prince, the eldest son of the famous monarch Cathair More, "of the wine-red hand," was distinguished by the surname of "Failghe," or the hero of the Rings, and it was their successful "loot" of these ornaments that originated the epithet "exactors of rings," applied in the Norse metrical romances to the Vikingr who harried Ireland from the ninth to the twelfth century, and were to her what the Huns and Vandals were to Italy. In one of the numerous engagements which took place towards the close of the tenth century, (A.D. 994,) between Malachi II. and the Danes of Dublin, the former successively defeated two of their most noted chiefs, Tomar and Carlus, in a hand-to-hand encounter, acquiring as trophies, the golden torque from the neck of one, and the sword of the other. This event is gracefully alluded to by Moore in one of the Irish Melodies.

"Let Erin remember the days of old,
Ere her faithless sons betray'd her,
When Malachi wore the collar of gold,
Which he won from the proud invader."

A ring weighing twenty ounces was presented to the Cathedral of Armagh by Brian Borumha, circa 1009. Tradition asserts that it was identical with one discovered in the course of the last century near the site of the Palace of Emania, and which was apparently a portion of a spherical ingot of gold twisted into an annular form, while part of the original bar, from which it was afterwards separated. The Museum of the Royal Irish Academy contains, inter alia, two torques which merit more than a cursory notice, as being not only the most unique and magnificent examples of this decoration in Europe, but as having been the nucleus of the entire Museum, to inaugurate which they were purchased in 1839, at the rate of £5 an ounce. They were discovered about the year 1810, in a mound in the immediate vicinity of certain obeliscal pillar stones that formerly stood upon the summit of the Hill of Tara, and are of the spiral or screw pattern, the design being simple, but the manipulation remarkably symmetrical and delicate. In both instances the limb is formed of four equidistant radiations from a common centre, the spiral contour being subsequently given. The larger is five feet seven inches from one extremity to the other, a size which suggests the influence that it might have been worn across the breast, and weighs twenty-seven ounces and nine pennyweights. The other is of much less dimensions, and weighs but twelve ounces and six pennyweights. Alike the generality of Irish torques, or Moinches, they have two knobs or balls of gold at the extremities. So highly did many of the Irish princes and chiefs prize their torques, and so tenacious were they of them, that they frequently refused to resign them even with death, and they were accordingly placed with them in their sepulchre. From a chemical examination of the gold ornaments in this museum, it would appear that there is a greater amount of alloy in them than one would expect from seeing them invariably described as of "fine" or "virgin" gold, merely fused and fashioned into the required shapes. This error has its source in the colour of the metal as well as its extreme ductility, which permits some of these articles to be bent with the greatest ease and impunity. The gold in most of the Irish antiquities varies from nineteen to twenty-one carats fine, but many have been assayed of twenty-three, the alloy being produced, perhaps, from determinate quantities of the constituent metals.

It has been ascertained from travellers familiar with the interior of Africa, that twisted gold collars are commonly worn there by the native chiefs, similar in pattern to the torques found in Ireland, but of much less intricate and elaborate workmanship. There is nothing strange in this when we recollect that the Celts are radically identical with the Phœnician or Canaanite traders of antiquity, and that it was unquestionably the maritime successes of the Phœnicians of Tyre, who, according to Herodotus, circumnavigated the Cape of Good Hope, which suggested to the Senate of Carthage, more than five centuries before the Christian era, the despatch of an expedition under Hanno for the purpose of exploring the western coast of Lybia (Africa) beyond the pillars of Hercules (anciently called Calpe and Abyla, and now known as Gibraltar and Ceuta), founding colonies and extending the national commerce and power. Some of the incidents of this memorable voyage have been preserved in the narrative entitled the "Periplus of Hanno," "a fine piece of antiquity," as Montesquieu has designated it, and many of the customs prevailing among African nations at the present day, carry us wonderfully back to those times in the far past, they reveal so clearly and unmistakably types adopted by their Lybi-Phœnician ancestors.

The Royal Irish Academy, to which we have already adverted, is unrivalled throughout Europe for the extreme rarity, intrinsic value, and number of the examples of Celtic art preserved in its noble museum, a visit to which will afford to the earnest student of the annals of the past—not to the antiquary or the artist merely—a clearer insight into the civilization of Ireland at an epoch when there alone of all the world the Arts had a home, then he could obtain by years of laborious toil in his study. One would think that such an institution, and the only one, too, chartered for the preservation of the souvenirs of bygone national pomp, and power, and renown, with their manifold associations, should be untrammelled as regards financial action. Yet this is not the case, and we believe we are not in error when we state that nearly the entire contents of this treasure-house of the remains of all the beautiful in Celtic art have been garnered up by the individual exertions of a few members, and that the funds at the annual disposal of the Academy for the purchase of antiquities seldom exceed £100. This is not as it should be. There is, moreover, another circumstance which impairs the value of the Academy as an illustrated national history-book, if we may be permitted the expression. We allude to the unpatriotic apathy manifested throughout the country by the finders of manufactured gold as to its preservation, there being apparently a universal desire to consign it to the nearest crucible, instead of submitting it to the judgment of the Academy, which, if warranted by the ornamentation or rarity, would give more than the standard value of gold for it. They manage these matters better in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, in which countries laws have been specially enacted with respect to treasure trove, and rigidly enforced. There, whatever antique is discovered is regarded as the property of the crown, and invariably paid for by it above the intrinsic value, in other words, the finder receives a douceur for any inconvenience he may be at. In August, 1860, the Lord Commissioners of the Treasury issued instructions authorising rewards equivalent to the intrinsic worth of coins, gold or silver ornaments, and other relics of antiquity in England and Wales, to the finder of these articles, and making their detention or destruction a penal offence. It is certainly high time that a similar statute should be in force in Ireland, when we read of a magnificent gold fibula, unique on account of its dimensions, and the amount and character of its ornamentation, having been first attempted to be divided with a hand-saw, the ends then battered off and one of them made into a fernle for a "blackthorn," and the entire finally melted down; and of the finder of some fragments of gold ornaments, of a semi-lunar pattern, in ignorance of their true character, disposing of a portion of them with a lot of rubbish to an itinerant "gather-em-up," for tobacco, and proceeding to convert the remainder into "pig-rings," with a pair of scissors! Incredible as this relation may appear, its authenticity has, nevertheless, been vouched in a letter on treasure trove, published towards the close of 1859, from the pen of Surgeon William Robert Wilde—a gentleman without a peer for the enthusiastic devotion with which he has long pursued his task of elucidating the buried art and literary wealth of Ireland. As the Palladium of such treasures, around the most insignificant of which cling inseparably memories of the palmy days that are fled—

"Like the vase in which roses have once been distill'd;
You may break, you may shatter the vase as you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still!"— the Royal Irish Academy is deserving not merely of a State patronage and support commensurate with its historic utilitarianism, but likewise of a more cordial popular appreciation of, and co-operation with its labours and their results, than it has hitherto received from those for whose instruction it was mainly called into existence.*

IF YOU LOVE ME, SAY SO.

You praise the colour of my eyes,
You say my face is fair,
And that the raven's wing alone
Can match my waving hair.
And oft you linger by my side,
Pray, what can make you stay so?
Why can't you speak your mind at once?
Do, if you love me, say so!

You say no music sounds to you
So sweet, so silvery clear,
As when my joyous laugh rings out
Upon your eager ear;
My voice is sweetest in the song,
And charmeth care away so;
There's magic in it, you declare,—
Yet if you love me, say so!

You often hold my hand in yours,
Your voice is soft and low;
And when you come, you stay and stay,
And still seem loth to go.
I wonder if you love me, Tom,
I wonder why you stay so;
Why can't you tell me what you mean?
Do, if you love me, say so!

I love you—love you dearly, Tom,
I often think with pride,
That soon the happy day will come
When I shall be your bride.
I know 'tis love that makes you come,
'Tis love that makes you stay so;
Love speaks in every act and look,—
Yet, O dear Tom! do say so! E. B. O.

* Since this paper was written the Treasury have sanctioned the expenditure of £100 a year by the Academy towards the recovery of antiquities. It is proposed to carry out this scheme through the instrumentality of the Constabulary; and although it has been facetiously observed that their proper function is rather to detect the occurrence of vice than of virtue, they will, without doubt, be the medium of securing for the Academy a great number of articles which would otherwise be lost to it.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

I.—BURT CASTLE, COUNTY DONEGAL.

THE ruins of Burt Castle are situated on an eminence distinguished as the Castlehill, on the southern shore of Lough Swilly. It was a quadrangular structure, with circular towers at its alternate angles, and was evidently a place of some strength, as there are many embrasures for cannon, and the walls are from four to five feet in thickness, while the merlons of blue purbeck stone are perforated for musketry. You enter, by a ruined archway, what was once the great hall—once, perhaps, the scene of feudal splendour, garnished with the trophies of warfare or the chase, and resounding with the revelry of wine and wassail. The vaulted ceilings of this, and all other apartments immediately above it, have fallen in, rendering the chambers of the northern tower inaccessible, except by means of ladders. Turning to the left, you ascend by a spiral stone stair, at each window of which there is a circular room, lighted by a few embrasures, and vaulted with stone, for no wood has ever been used in any part of the building. From the top the prospect is uncommonly grand and expansive, extending over a space of not less than fifty miles by thirty-seven. Within the circuit of five miles from its base, stood the ruins of several religious edifices, besides another castle at Rathmeltan, one at Drumbuoy, and one at Castleforward; but the castles at Inch and Ailagh, with Burt Castle, were border fortresses of "The O'Doherty," the strength of which availed more than the justice of the tenure, in preserving their patrimonial territories to the chieftains of that noble house. Of these, Ailagh, situated within three miles of Derry, was by far the most ancient and important. Burt Castle was most probably erected during the commotions that ensued during the vice-royalty of Kildare, in the reign of Henry VIII. A medallion of that date, with the armorial bearings of "The O'Doherty," and a coin dated from the accession of Edward VI., have been found in its vicinity. In the year 1818 we find the chieftain of Ennishowen affianced to the daughter of the grand northern dynasty, O'Neill, as a reward for his services during the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce. Again we find the name of O'Doherty in the list of those chieftains who perished in the battle of Knockore, in 1492. Thenceforward there is little mention of that family, till Sir John began, in the reign of Edward VI., to offer a resistance to the measures of the English government, as determined as it was unavailing; and dying, he bequeathed his estates and his misfortunes to his son and successor, Sir Cahir, who saw the impending ruin of his house, and vainly laboured to avert its fall. His estates were confiscated in 1608, and he went down, after a fearful and unequal contest, like a stately bark, foundering amid whirlpools and quicksands; and many a tear bewailed his doom, but not one hand recorded his expiring struggle. Of the particulars of his death there are many conflicting narratives.

A SWEETHEART'S GUESS.

He came close behind her, plaiting his fingers
Over her eyes, over her eyes.

"Guess who has caught thee, O dear little maiden, Guess, guess, and be wise."

"Now, then, Allick, be quiet—oh! dear, oh! my eyelids."

"Have I hurt you, poor darling?" he tenderly said,

"But you know tian't Allick; come, guess till you're weary,
And guess in the shade."

"Let me go; O, 'tis William, his hands are so clumsy; Clumsy and coarse, clumsy and coarse."

"Wrong, wrong, little queen of the yellowing harvest; Guess, guess, till you're hoarse."

Come, I'll help you to ravel the sweet little secret,
I know twixt my fingers the light comes in slips;
There, there, what flavour, Nell, dear, are such kisses?
And he twice kissed her lips.

"Ah, cruel one! take your long hands from my temples;
How should I know, how should I know?"

"Ah! sweet one," he cried, "by the darkest of magic,
Come, come, you are slow."

Who gathers in somebody's cows in the evening?
Who fetches her blossoms when Summer is dead?"

"Ah, I see it all now," exclaimed Nell, blushing deeply,
"Tis Ned, it is Ned!"

LITTLE LISETTE.

DARKNESS reigned in the city of Paris, covering for a time, with the most dense of veils, these rues and ruelles which, a few hours previous, were the scenes of riot and of blood, and, even now, giving a promise of again being polluted by a repetition of like outrages on humanity. The dim light of the oil lamps threw a flickle glare on the broken flags beneath them, revealing to the eye of him who had courage to wander there, at that silent hour, the sleeping forms of men, both young and old, all of bold and martial bearing. Some in rough, others in gaudy dresses, one as a soldier, another in citizen's attire; still he would behold men whose appearance was clownish, while close by them lay sailors who appeared to have only lately given up their nautical life, and chosen in its place to act a part in the most sanguinary drama that the world was ever a witness of: there they lay in the open air; they were, however rude the instruments, all supplied with weapons of destruction.

In one of the most populous rues of the city, two people, the one a man in the prime of life, the other a young girl not more than ten years of age, were hurrying on, the elder evidently seeking some friend, for invariably, in answering the challenges, he would scan the features of the sentinels with an intensity which at once showed he sought some one. He seemed dispirited, and drew closer to him the little girl whose soft hand he held within his own, when—

"Qui va là?" demanded a sentinel.

"Un ami," was the reply.

"Advance, friend," said the soldier, "and give the countersign."

The other advanced, still holding in his the soft hand of his little companion, till he came quite close to the soldier, whose face, revealed to him by the light of the guard-flambeau, he looked at for an instant, and then exclaimed:

"Henri! Henri! Do you not know me?"

"Oh! it is you, Jacques," replied Henri, the soldier. "I am so glad to see you, my dear brother. Come in, come in; there is no one here but myself for this night. Who owns the child you have with you?"

"I have brought her here," replied Jacques, "to intrust her into your care, as I am going abroad."

Henri stirred up the fire, placed a chair, and then taking the little girl from the hand of Jacques, he lifted her up and placed her on the high seat. She threw aside her little cloak, and as she did so Henri looked at her sorrowfully for a moment, and then bending over, he kissed her kindly on the forehead. She was, indeed, a very beautiful child; her features were fine, her face, though slightly flushed after the walk she had taken, was transparently white; her eyes were large and full of expression, her hair was fair and clustering, and the hand which the soldier had just held in his was small and soft, with fingers thin and elegant in form.

Henri covered his eyes to hide the tears which suffused them, and little Lisette, perceiving he was affected, asked him, in a sweet, feeling voice:

"Ah, why do you weep? Did I displease you?"

"No, no," he hastily replied, "you could not do so; but both of you must be very hungry. I will see about supper, or I might say breakfast, for morning is coming fast."

Henri rushed out, and rousing one of the men who slept in the street under the roughly-constructed sheds of the shops, dispatched him in search of eatables to the cook-shop where he thought the proprietor was least lazy, and therefore not difficult to wake up. They very soon had an abundant repast, to which they did every justice; afterwards Henri went into the little pantry, where he prepared a little bed, as best he could, on a large old trunk, and rough military cloaks spread over it. When he had done this, he came back again, and all three sat round the fire, talking pleasantly, for some time.

"Henri," said Jacques, "I must tell you how I came across little Lisette, here. About two months ago I was going through the city, and seeing a house (out of which some soldiers were after dragging a man whom Lisette has since told me was her uncle, his name you will know by and by)—I entered it, and there found Lisette. I brought her to my house, and Madam Dubois, my landlady, took care of her. Early to-night I found that I was accused of treason, and to-morrow they have resolved to bring me before the tribunal. I have resolved to set out for America in a few hours, in order to frustrate their schemes; so I have brought little Lisette to confide her to your care, fearing to bring her with me, as if I were arrested some harm might happen to her. Here is a letter, in which I have written something I would like you to know."

Saying this, Jacques handed Henri a letter, and then continued:

"Good bye—good bye, dear brother; adieu, Lisette—you are as dear to me as my poor sister Claire!"

Then he raised little Lisette in his arms, and kissed her, their tears mingling together; embraced his brother in silence, and went away on his lonely journey. Henri sat down by the fire again, and for some time he was unconscious of the presence of any one; soon the little girl began to talk to him so affectionately and so like a child, that he could not but be pleased and happy again.

"Do tell me," asked little Lisette, "why did you weep when you looked at me first? I am so very inquisitive; but I should like to know."

"I will tell you," said Henri, and he spoke in a more mournful tone. "When you took off your little cloak, sitting here by the fire, I saw in you a likeness to my sister Claire."

"Then you have a sister?" said little Lisette, joyfully. "I am so glad of that. Oh! you really must bring me to see her."

"She is a long way off," said the soldier.

"Where?" asked little Lisette.

"In Heaven," said Henri. "In Heaven—and I am glad she is there, for they cannot annoy her more."

"And who could annoy her?" asked little Lisette.

"I will tell you," said Henri, speaking these words less firmly than former ones, and ever faltering in his voice when he spoke of his sister. "It is a sad tale, and one which may raise in your youthful heart a throb of sympathy for my poor sister Claire."

"My father and mother died about the same time, leaving three children to mourn their loss; Jacques and I were then fast growing into manhood, and well able, by diligent labour, to support ourselves and our dear sister Claire. Two years passed, and still we worked on gladly, sometimes without a franc in our purse or a loaf in the cupboard, but we worked for her who was dear to us, and that made us happy. Ever since the death of our parents a dreadful change was coming over our sister—it made her not less fair or not less good—still it was coming on, and slowly dragging her away from this life. She had ever, even in our poorer days, been a kind friend to the poor and the sick, all of whom saw in her a sweet messenger of hope, ever visiting their humble abodes, bringing food and medicine to heal and refresh their enervated bodies, and Heavenly balms to cheer their sinking souls; now she was unable to perform these worthy actions, and the hovel of poverty ceased to be a witness of her commiseration and of her compassion. She had been this way for a long time, when a year of scarcity came, such as had not been felt for centuries before; Jacques and I found that, though we had harboured every soul coming into our possession, we were unable to pay the rent of our little cottage.

"Our landlord was the Duc de S——, who always resided in Paris, had made his brother agent over the property, who was a man very unlike the Duc, being of a penurious and mercenary disposition, easily bribed over to any one's interest, with a heart always obdurate to suffering or affliction. The day at last came, a cold winter's day it was; we could not pay the rent; we were ordered to leave our home, as the agent was going to make it the site for a residence for himself. We asked a few days, or even a day, in order to get Claire safely away, and also anything belonging to us which was in the house; both requests were refused, and the agent said:—'I will send down my men presently, and if you are not out of the house, I will not leave a stone of it standing.' Jacques and I rushed home, told Claire as gently as we could that the house was no longer ours; it shocked her so much to hear it, that we began to despair of getting her away at all. While we were thinking of what it was best to do, the agent and his men came; they burst open the doors, they hurled our furniture out; but I cannot describe the scene, it makes my blood boil to think of it, and it will ever remain indelibly painted on my mind. Claire was greatly frightened; she cried to us to bring her out of the house, we were rejoiced to do this, as we feared the men might harm her.

"Leaning on Jacques and me, she came slowly down the stairs and into the air, then we placed her sitting on a rustic stool before the door of the house, which we could no longer call home. Scarcely had we done so, when a vivid light flashed from every window; it was all in flames; the agent and his men were the incendiaries.

"Claire looked for a moment—only for a moment—at the awful spectacle, for although we still held her up, she was sightless and dead."

When Henri finished his sorrowful story, he told little Lisette to go into the adjoining room, where she might rest herself till morning came. Henri then sat by the fire, and taking out the letter, which his brother had given him, read as follows:

"My dear Henri—To-morrow I set out for America, as here my life is no longer safe, being (a kind friend informed me so) among the suspected enemies of the republic. I wish to consign to your care a young girl, little Lisette, whose father, though she is ignorant of the fact, was guillotined the day after I found her in the city; and no one could deserve it better, for he had a hand in our sister's death; he was the cruel agent, the brother of the Duc de S——. Little Lisette knows not of her relationship with the Duc, but I discovered it all among some papers which I found in a house where I first saw her. Treat her well, and bring her to some school where she may be educated properly; be kind to her for poor Claire's sake. This is all I have time to write, so accept it, as we may not meet again, as a farewell from your living brother,

"JACQUES ———."

"I fear to give my name in full or where I write from, lest by accident it might be intercepted by anyone unfriendly to us.

"J. ———."

Henri, after reading this, remained for some time thinking of his brother and little Lisette, till he fell fast asleep. The morning was far advanced when little Lisette awoke; she was astonished to hear loud voices laughing and talking, and Henri's name mentioned, but could not recognise his speaking among them. Having settled on her cloak, she unlocked the door and walked into the outer room, which was now, to her great astonishment, crowded with soldiers and officers.

A young lieutenant seeing little Lisette appeared frightened, took her kindly by the hand and said: "My fair little citizen, what treason have you been plotting against our good republic?"

"I!" replied the girl with astonishment, "I have plotted nothing. I was brought here last night by one who was very good to me, and intrusted by him to his brother's care, whose name was Henri. Where is Henri now?"

"Why," replied a sergeant to whom the lieutenant put Lisette's question, "he was the person who was on guard here last night; poor fool, there is very little use asking for him. When we came in this morning he was fast asleep, so the piquet took him off to be tried, and with him, too, by the by, some treasonable production, which none of us could understand; it was from his brother, and talked of nobles and such like, all ruffians, vile scum"—here the speaker spat into the fire, and then, seemingly relieved, continued—"He is now gone to be tried, and if you wish to be present, the lieutenant can send an orderly with you, who will conduct you to the place."

This the lieutenant did order, and in a few moments Lisette, accompanied by a young soldier, set out for where the court-martial was being held. After a short walk they arrived, and there they saw a detachment of soldiers in a line, and Henri standing at some distance before them, calmly awaiting his fate.

All was ready, the preliminary orders were given, the colonel was crying out the last fatal word, when a beautiful little child rushed from amidst the spectators, and spreading out her arms Henri received her in his, and pressed her for a moment affectionately to his heart; then came a roll of musketry, and the smoke which accompanied it quickly clearing away, disclosed to all the lifeless form of little Lisette in the embracing arms of the dead soldier.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER VIII.

OLEMN was the dinner hour at the Grove; for Thomas Hammersley Faversham, Esq., county magistrate, was at the head of the table. His conversation was stiff as his white neck-cloth—and with the folds of this voluminous cloth not even Beau Brummell could have found fault. Just as the Beau was wont, the cloth in proper folds, to draw it with delicate finger and thumb in a straight line round his chin, and then to dimple it symmetrically by gently dropping his under jaw—so did Mr. Magistrate Faversham, every afternoon of his stately life. He wore black trousers buttoned to the ankles, and a coat wondrously deep in the collar. He sported, if a person so solemn could “sport” anything, a flaxen wig, exquisitely oiled and scented. He was younger than the historical tops of the Regency, and his youth had yielded him the freshness to delight in the whims and millinery of this lively and heartless time. He had put on his Toryism with his first Hessians; and to this Toryism he would cling till he put that perfumed flaxen wig aside for the last time. He was, possibly, a very good old gentleman—at heart. He subscribed to buy garden allotments for labourers’ children; he allowed strolling haymakers to lie in his barn occasionally; a man had once robbed him of three bushels of barley, and he had not prosecuted the miscreant. But these heroisms were crusted over with a hard and polished shell, that few could penetrate. The old gentleman was exquisitely polite to every body. In his glistening pumps, of evenings, his eyes sparkling through his wrinkles, lighted by the five glasses of port he systematically allowed himself after his dinner, how majestically he bowed little Ada (serious as a parson now) into her accustomed seat opposite him, to be his opponent at chess. He made a false move occasionally, by the way, but Ada would sooner have cut her sweet tongue out than have hinted at the error. She lost nearly always; often when she might have won. The easy, self-sufficient Henry Faversham (whom a Kensington Gay Spanker of our acquaintance called the most charmingly vain man of her circle) was reserved—well it was so—shy, in the paternal presence. He was a boy still, and he was never certain that he would not be suddenly sent into the nursery, by the awful being in the flaxen wig, to whom he owed his existence and his allowance. Clara, before her father, bit her unquiet lips, and was silent.

When Clifton was introduced to Faversham père, the young gentleman spoke to the owner of The Grove (to the astonishment of Mr Henry) without embarrassment. Faversham père was severe at the dinner table, about young men of the present time.

Clifton answered airily, agreeing in the main, with his host. The girls, who had been accustomed to hear the oracle speak, without daring to give more than an occasional sign of approbation, were absolutely astonished when Mr. Clifton, in a firm tone, presently drew the Pater sharply up with a flat objection,

"The Radicals are not gentlemen—not gentlemen," said Mr. Faversham père, as he removed a crumb of bread from the fold of his neckcloth.

"I must beg leave, sir," said Clifton, turning boldly upon his host, "to differ with you most emphatically."

The old gentleman paused, some fish nicely adjusted upon his fork, and stared at his young guest. He had never been so startled in his life. His children also paused over their plates. But Clifton was roused, and he continued:

"It is the old story—old as feudalism. You will remember, sir, St. Simon says of Racine: 'There was nothing of the poet in his manners; he had the air of a well-bred and modest man, and at last, that of a good man.' It was astonishing to narrow-minded St. Simon to find a scribe who could comport himself like a gentleman; being like a gentleman to St. Simon, he was unlike a poet. In the same way—I mean nothing personal, sir, I can assure you—the old school of Tories, and indeed of Whigs, are astonished when they find, as they daily find, that there are eloquent advocates of the people's rights who never eat peas with their knife."

"Tut! tut! tut!" responds the oracular magistrate, now looking solemnly at Mr. Clifton. "You are, I should say, Mr. Clifton, about five-and-twenty; a young man, a very young man. Wait till you have lived in the world as long as I have. Tut! tut! tut! Rights of the people. Stuff, stuff!"

Here Clara nodded significantly to Mr. Clifton, while her venerable father was engaged upon the contents of his plate, satisfied in his own mind that he had thoroughly disposed of Mr. Clifton.

Before taking his after-dinner nap, under a honey-tinted bandanna, the magistrate condescended to recur to the subject, saying—"Rights of the people! Well, bless me! Educated men, too, talking this nonsense. Be very careful, my dear young friend—be very careful. Don't suffer a corduroy taint to get into your opinions: yes, corduroy taint—that's it." And, thoroughly satisfied that that was it, and most happily expressed into the bargain, the magistrate slept the sleep of an upright judge, and a judicious diner.

"The boys" (we are all boys, whiskers, wrinkles, and all, when we return to the parental nest, and fold ourselves answ in the warmth of its sweet feathers)—the boys crept out of the dining-room, leaving the flies alone to fret over the bandanna that protected the magisterial nose from their tantalizing probosces.

"Now for that delightful moment of the day—now for the first pipe after dinner," said Henry Faversham, throwing himself in an American rocking-chair in Master Arty's snugery.

"You don't like the best place, Harry, I see," observed Master Arty, as he proceeded to strip a pipe-stand over the mantel-piece, of a dozen black, brown, and red pipes. Clifton, like a business man, took up the first, blew through it, and dipped his fingers at once into the tobacco-jar.

"How soft of you," suggested Master Arty, drolly, to Clifton, "to tackle the governor. Let me see," and Master Arty walked round Clifton, examining his face very closely—"yes, yes, your nose is all right. But I wouldn't have given two-pence for it an hour ago."

"Shut up, Arty," said Mr. Henry Faversham, to which Master Arty responded by a low, derisive whistle.

"But, I confess, Clifton, I go a long way with the governor," added Mr. Henry, as he blew his cloud. "I don't like your people—your masses, your general diffusion of everything everywhere; your cant about equal rights, and all that kind of Codger's Hall stuff, seasoned with tobacco, and strengthened by the juniper."

"Of course"—Mr. Clifton had a sneering tone—"your Jouvin gloves get into your head. You would have the whole world swept clean, for one reason—and that, to spare your patent leathers. You are not a strong thinker; you are not a man whose head keeps his sympathies right, my boy. Your convenience makes you a conservative; your fine taste has something heartless in it. You are perfectly at your ease in a drawing-room, because there your senses are gratified; but you would be even stupid in the company of an ingenious mechanic, because your pride would lift you far above him, and you would be endeavouring to let him see that you were upon a throne above him."

"Well, well," replied Henry Faversham, starting up, "you are ill at ease in a drawing-room, my boy. Same thing reversed—same thing reversed. Give me a light, Arty."

"Two," from Master Arty.

Clifton stuck to his point, because he was in earnest. Mr. Henry Faversham was only passing the time away, and showing his embroidered slippers, upon the sofa.

"It is not my point reversed. I am uneasy in your kind of world, because it supplies no enjoyment to me. I'm no dancer; I hate talk that has no soul in it. I detest your stock young ladies, with their regulated number of answers; who blush according to the Book of Etiquette, and are virtuous because in society it is—de rigueur. My boy, I've seen farmers' buxom lasses, with twice the sense and sound reading of your card-leaving—P.P.C.—thanks for kind enquiries—style of girls. And with all their grace, mind; and with homely, quiet virtues, that would make many houses in your Belgravia purer places than they are."

"Hang this discussion," here interposed Master Arty, who had just completed the transformation of a nut into a whistle, and was anxious to try it.

"I'll throw a pillow at your head, young two-pence," said Mr. Henry, "if you're not quiet."

Clifton was worked up, and was not to be put aside.

"Read, my boy, Godwin's Political Justice; dip into Mandeville's Fables of the Bees, try Hallam's Constitutional History, mark step by step, in Miss Martineau's clear and liberal page, the progress of the Reform Bill; don't be more afraid of Tom Paine than of Burke on the Revolution. Get something like a strong ground of opinion, and then look about you. Hang it, face the world like a man; look to your brother man opposite, and take him by the hand and say to him, naked we both came into the world. By what savage freak of fortune does it happen that you are all but naked now? that to your blue flesh the wind is not tempered; while I wear merino and fine cloth, and the softest leather; while the hearth is piled up for me, and the crackling embers sweeten and soften the wind to my grateful nostrils? It does a man good to ask himself these questions."

Clifton's pipe had been forgotten, while he was delivering these vehement words. Faversham still looked, but uneasily, at the worked-up pansies upon his slippers; but he felt that he must say something. Arty was looking at him, and he was not prepared to be beaten in argument before this young gentleman.

"But look here, Clifton, there must always be inequalities in society."

"By Jove, then, turn nigger-driver. There will always be inequalities, I believe; but if you've two penn'orth of heart in you, see how far they who have the worst of society's bad bargain can be helped along. Don't put your infernal Tory heel upon them."

There was a gentle rap at the door.

"Hang it, here are the girls," muttered Master Arty; then he growled—"Come in, at least I s'pose so."

"You're polite, Master Arty," said Clara, tripping into the room. Clifton dropped his pipe, and offered his seat to the young lady, but neither Master Arty nor Mr. Henry ceased to smoke nor to lounge.

Miss Faversham swept into the chair, which she covered with her ample skirts; then begged Mr. Clifton to observe, that ladies never looked to their brothers for politeness.

"And a very good thing too," Master Arty observed. Master Arty hereupon blew the smoke from his mouth in rings.

"They were having such a jaw, Clara, when you came in; it only wanted you to complete it."

Clara turned to Mr. Clifton.

"Don't let me interrupt the conversation; and I pray, Mr. Clifton, go on with your pipe." Miss Clara was very gracious.

"Never mind it," said Mr. Henry, still surveying the pansies upon his slippers. "We were talking politics. Clifton is a radical, and I'm a conservative; we shall never agree."

"I don't know one from the other; except, as you know, that papa says, the radicals don't know who their grandfathers were. Is that the case, Mr. Clifton?"

Clara flirted a fan as she looked, not archly, but boldly and quizzically, into Clifton's face. When Clifton was in earnest, he was not complimentary, even to ladies.

"It is not the case, Miss Faversham, as a rule."

"Oh! drop it, drop it," interposed Mr. Henry Faversham.

"Well if nobody will talk, who will stroll about the garden? I'm sure the fresh air is better than this nasty place."

Mr. Clifton would have been a brute and a dolt had he resisted this invitation.

There were pretty walks about the Grove, although they were damp and ragged now, and the birds sang seldom in them, and there was no odour of flowers to greet the lounge. Humid mounds of dead leaves lay against the box borders; dead branches had fallen here and there in the lounge's way. But the cheery Michaelmas daisy still turned its hundred bright eyes to the sky; and the laurel and the holly were crisp and green. A pale rose or two nodded in a sheltered spot; but these laggard flowers wanted freshness, and might as well not have been. The air was soft, but the wind was icy. It was that precise evening in autumn, when, for the first time, a healthy person feels that just a spoonful of fire would be grateful to the flesh, before bed time. Just the time, moreover, when a female arm must feel comfortable in that of a cavalier. Precisely the time when the walk may be brisk enough to wear away the embarrassment of tender avowals.

There are no tender avowals, we trust, hovering upon the lips of Clara Faversham and Mr. Clifton. There cannot be tender avowals to make between the serious young Radical, and the fashionable, the giddy, self-possessed flirt. Miss Faversham, naturally, has taken her companion's arm; and her well-gloved hand rests upon Mr. Clifton's coat-sleeve, quietly as Lucretia Borgia's marble hand reposes upon the blue velvet, in the oracular magistrate's study. There is a broad space between Miss Faversham and Mr. Clifton. His arm is bent out, her arm is stretched out, just to rest her hand within his elbow. It is not that agreeable contiguity, when the lady's hand falls through your arm, and hangs gracefully as a fuchsia bell; when the bosom just faintly touches your arm too; when if the face of the young lady were turned to you, you might look into it as into a fresh fruit-basket, and take the fruit that pleased you most, to your lips. There was fruit under Miss Faversham's broad hat, but it wanted the heat of the sun.

Clifton naturally turned the conversation towards the country—to trees, and flowers, and wreathes; but his companion declared that she hated the country.

"I hate the country!" Clifton exclaimed seriously, looking into Miss Faversham's face. There was a careless, whimsical sneer upon it.

"Yes; I hate the country. Wearing shoes fit for ploughboys; getting over stiles; breakfasting at eight in the morning; having to admire pigs, and scramble through straw yards; getting brown and catching freckles; being eaten up by midges; and altogether becoming red as a dairy maid."

Clifton drew his lips together, as Miss Faversham, seeing his displeasure, rattled on:

"Now, I cannot bear poor people."

Slyly Miss Faversham looked up into Clifton's face; but there was a malice in the slyness. Let there be malice, and slyness, and all uncharitableness expressed upon that young face,—it loseth not all its spell. Cold as it is; bold as those full dark eyes are, there is youth here, and there are the gently swelling lines so grateful to the eye. That those lips may say, "I cannot bear poor people;" and still, to the sight of a thoughtful man, be beautiful!

"You are joking, of course," Mr. Clifton suggests. He is anxious that she should withdraw her words.

"Oh, dear no! I'm tired of your philanthropists; the poor man's rights and the poor man's wrongs; whether he shall vote or not. I suppose I'm too dull to understand it all; but I don't believe in it. Lord Lubberton told me that it was only, I think he said, 'a gag,' and that the poor are much better treated here than in any other country. But let us change the subject; it makes my head ache." Miss Faversham plucked a leaf, and carelessly rubbed it. She had done with that subject; and was thoroughly enjoying the grave agitation into which she had thrown Mr. Clifton. A turn of the walk discovered Ada with a ruddy, a most oleaginous baby, whose lips lay in a deep valley between its mountainous cheeks, and whose nose was vainly struggling to show itself in profile.

Ada was crimson in the face; her hair was in disorder; and the oleaginous baby was tugging hard at her brooch.

"There!" said Miss Faversham. Then to Ada. "Ada, Ada, dear, you are such a figure. Why, where did you find that child?"

Clifton had approached the baby, and lifted one of its pulpy hands to his bearded chin; and the child had withdrawn it, laughing. Ada turned to him at once.

"Isn't it a fine boy, Mr. Clifton? Feel the weight of him—only ten months old." A minute more and the fat youngster would have been in Mr. Clifton's arms; but Miss Clara burst into such a fit of laughter that the gentleman drew back, and vowed that he was afraid to touch babies, lest they should tumble to pieces.

"But where did you find the child?" Clara repeated.

"Dear me, you know it's Mrs. Larrance's baby."

Mrs. Larrance was a spare, solemn woman, who by her own exertions kept a house full of children. The little two-roomed cottage where she dwelt, was so stocked with little Larrances, indeed, that a facetious passer-by had wondered how the street-door could be shut. At the Grove she found occasional employment in the humble capacity of charwoman. Ada was her great friend. The little Larrances wore dresses made from Ada's, the little Larrances jumped and chirruped when Ada lifted the latch of their cottage, for they knew that her pockets were not quite empty. Ada would stand in the middle of the dark little room, swarming with human and animal life; where the rabbits hopped among the children, and birds of all English kinds whistled and twittered from sorry green cages, unmindful of the dead unfledged birds that lay in heaps (to be sold to Farmer Ballaby, at one penny per dozen, to feed his ferrets). Dense fumes of boiling potatoes filled the air. Ada, holding her little hand aloft, would shout—

"Who's for Bonaparte's ribs, and who's for brandyballs?"

Whereupon the air would be rent with shrill cries of "Bonaparte's ribs" and "brandyballs;" and a forest of hands would encompass Miss Ada Faversham. Then she would proceed to poke ribs and balls into the wide mouths around her; then she would say good-bye to the baby (which she is holding all this time in her arms, before Mr. Clifton and his sister), and then she would skip, like a fawn, from the cottage.

Mr. Larrance, from his chimney-corner, would knock his wooden leg (for which leg he enjoyed a pension of one shilling per diem) upon the hearth, and grunt that Miss Ada was a sweet lady, and that the brats ought to be thankful to her.

Grant that we have wandered from the meeting in the garden, which first suggested Mrs. Larrance and hers to us, there is little or no harm done. No thread is broken; no silver chord has been sundered. For the tea-table, and subsequent whist with the awful magistrate, speedily claimed Mr. Clifton; and Miss Clara had not read the third volume of Edith Clutterbuck, or the Maid, the Wife, and the Mother; that novel which "an evening paper" confidently recommended to its readers.

It is difficult to decide whether Mr. Clifton enjoyed his evening, as the partner of his solemn host. About nine o'clock we heard mine host say in sepulchral tones to Mr. Clifton, leaning as far as his white neckcloth would allow him to lean across the table: "Do you call that whist, Mr. Clifton?"

The gentleman addressed turned red, and Master Arty, screened by a handkerchief, tittered.

OLD SONGS.

OLD songs of earth, tinted with the hues of heaven,
And stained with mellow gloom;
Gray household melodies that ever breathe
Of morning-life and home;

Of smoking homesteads and of uplands dim,
Of orchard, croft, and wold;
Of lime woods budding in the green spring haze,
Or flushed with harvest gold,—

Come hither from that undiscovered land
That lieth—no man knows—
Within the inmost quiet of our souls,
The heaven of still repose.

THE TEACHING OF CHARACTER.—We pass for what we are Character teaches us our wills. Men imagine that they communicate their virtue or vice only by overt actions, and do not see that virtue or vice emits breath every moment.—Emerson, CHIPS AND SCRAPS FROM THE STUDIOS.

THE antiquity of painting, or, as a quaint writer of the sixteenth century describes it, "the art of showing events to the sight in some shape or another," must be considerable when we remember that Homer's account of the embroideries of Helen and Penelope, points out a very early epoch for coloured tapestry. If we take Virgil to be an authority on a subject which has given rise to so much grave dispute and profitless controversy, painting must have reached no mean degree of perfection in the age of his Dido, since the pious Æneas was able to discover his own portrait amongst the pictures—probably a primitive form of fresco—which enriched the magnificent temple of Juno at Carthage. According to Diodorus Siculus, the walls of Babylon were in many places encrusted with tiles painted with the forms of animals, and embellished round the edges with a highly conventional ornamentation. It is to be regretted that all modern research in this direction has failed to profit us much; and we know little more of Babylonian art than did our forefathers a century ago. The absence of all evidence respecting it is to be chiefly attributed to the perishable nature of the material—friable terra-cotta, probably—employed by those forgotten artists. Semiramis, we are told, possessed a collection of pictures, mostly hunting pieces, but we are left in complete ignorance of their merit, and of the "vehicle" in which they were painted. The bare mention of them is, however, worth something, as it shows that along with the sterner and coarser qualities of her nature, the great woman had a gleam, faint as it may have been, of taste and refinement. As for the Egyptian theory of the origin of pictorial art, it is, like everything else which we have received from that strange land, "marvellous, mystical." It asserts that painting was known in the cities of the Nile six thousand years before it had penetrated into Greece, and in support of this statement are invoked the testimonies of the most ancient monuments of the country. Recent discoveries have shown that Egypt at a very early day must have been acquainted with the crude elements of painting; and the frescoes recently transferred from that country to the walls of the British Museum, prove that the people had an indigenous school of their own—a school which existed within itself, and received no inspiration second hand.

It is not generally known that the exquisite colour called Minium (said to be the finest possible red) was discovered long before the Christian era, by an Athenian youth, who believed, in the fervour of his alchemic speculations, that it formed the original and real base of gold. When goddesses were to be represented, the ancient painters always selected for their model either their own wives or some celebrated women. The glorious Magdalen of Le Brun, a picture whose sublime pathos and unequalled tenderness have made beholders weep, is a portrait of the celebrated La Vallière. A thousand instances in which the great masters have availed themselves of such questionable resources could be adduced, did space permit us.

Pliny, who appears to have been gifted with a superhuman facility for digesting marvels however monstrous, tells a story in testimony of the power of painting, which throws the Greek grape and veil legend into the shade. The Triumvir Lepidus, having been annoyed and disturbed during the night-time, in his camp, by the "whistling, hooping, and screaming of the nocturnal birds which infested it," was angry with the magistrate of a neighbouring town for recommending him so unfavourable an encampment. To appease the enraged soldier they presented him with a banner on which was painted a fiery dragon with such consummate skill that the noisy carrion "drew off in great fear and trepidation." Pliny recommends this expedient, "which," he says, "may prove of fair service on moonlight nights." A blunt German being asked by an old Roman how he liked a famous picture of an old shepherd leaning on his hook, replied—"Why, I would not take the original even as a slave." A coarser proof of the absence of artistic appreciation could with difficulty be pointed out. It is stated that Nero, corrupted as he was in heart and soul, cultivated a taste for painting, had a turn for drawing, and frequently amused himself with modelling in clay. Perhaps no one ever carried the caprices and whimsical peculiarities of the artistic profession so far as Regnier, King of Naples. When his wife died, he had her portrait taken at two advanced stages of decomposition, the last so ghastly and loathsome as to fill the spectators with horror. He was finishing a portrait of a partridge when news reached him that his kingdom was lost and his nearest relatives fugitives; but before paying any attention to the calamity, he gave the last touches to the bird, and then broke out into lamentations.

In spite of the Iconoclastic tendencies of Islamism, Mahomet II., one of the most sanguinary and contemptible of despots, exhibited some taste for the fine arts. Gentil Bellini, a painter of great reputation, whose works still hold no mean position in the school to which he belonged, was invited by him to establish his residence near the palace. The painter acquiesced, and continued to enjoy the favours of his powerful patron until an occurrence took place which forced him to abandon the distinction. Having painted a decollation of John the Baptist, he showed it to Mahomet, who professed to find fault with the tissues of the neck; and to convince the artist of his error, sent for a Greek slave, whose head he struck off with one sweep of his scymetar. The artist bowed in acquiescence, and set sail next morning for the Adriatic. In strange contrast with the art-enthusiasm displayed by this royal critic, we turn to Christina of Sweden, who cared little for painting, and less for sculpture. Her father, Gustavus, bequeathed her from the spoils of unhappy Prague, several chests of paintings of inestimable value. These she offered to Sebastian Bourdon, a Huguenot artist, who had the generosity to tell her that she knew not the worth of the treasures she wished to bestow upon him. The queen took the hint, reserved the pictures to herself, and cut off the hands, feet, and faces to ornament prominent parts of her bed-chamber. Many of those precious fragments finally found their way to the cabinet of the Palais Royal. A great Duke of Russia, Vladimir, was converted to Christianity on beholding a picture representing the last day, with all its horrors. Terror-struck by the overwhelming misery of the damned souls, he fell back, averting his eyes from the painting.

"Where would you wish to be on that day," asked a Christian who was witness of his emotion.

"By the side of that venerable and amiable figure," replied the barbarian, pointing to the Almighty Judge.

"Embrace the laws of Christ, and you may be placed there."

The Duke consented, and his subjects followed his example. Many years after this notable occurrence, Lestoc, a French adventurer in Russia, by placing before the eyes of Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the Great, two paintings, the one representing her in a convent, and Lestoc broken on the wheel; the other, Elizabeth, seated in magnificent robes on the imperial throne, inspired that princess with sufficient spirit to make a revolution and seize the crown. The latter, it may be observed, was her undoubted right. The use which Rienzi made of allegorical pictures, "to stimulate the sluggish Romans of his day in the struggle for their rights," is too well known to be dwelt on here. In the early ages of Christianity, it appears that a custom prevailed of inlaying the church floors with representations of saints and angels. Amongst the oddities of the school of Sienna, was that invented by Simon Memmi (who flourished in the beginning of the fourteenth century) of putting scrolls, explanatory of the subject, into the mouth of his figures. An instance of this ludicrous custom is still shown in the sacristy of St. Jude at Florence. It represents the devil almost expiring from the effects of a thrashing administered to him by some pious individual; in the mouth of the infernal personage is a scroll searing the words "O non, posso piu." Oh! oh! It is all over with me! We may remark that Boccaccio imputes the rise of this ridiculous fashion to the advice given by Bufalmasco, a noted buffoon, to Le Bruno, a simple artist, who besought him to suggest some plan for rendering the expression of his figures intelligible to the spectators. Speaking of portraits of Satan, Aretino, a painter of Arezzo, lost his life through their agency. He had painted a picture of the Demon, exquisitely hideous and so realistic in its terrible lineaments, that he could not remove its impression from his mind. The impressions haunted his dreams: the lost spirit appeared before him, one night, and reproached the painter with having drawn him with such terrible fidelity. Aretino awoke in an agony of terror, and soon after fell into a fit which ended his life in less than three hours. Paulo Mazzochi, in a work descriptive of the natural elements, represented the sea by fishes, the earth by a mole, and fire by a salamander. He wished to paint a chameleon to represent air, but as he had no model of that animal, he contented himself from a similitude of sounds by introducing a camel which, extending his long neck, snuffs up the breezes. Ridiculous as this usage must seem, one finds it imitated to no small extent by the modern caricaturists. Punch, it was thought, employed it for the first time; but in an old number of the 'European Magazine,' a periodical which enjoyed at one time a high literary reputation, the same expedient is employed to explain the vagaries of a camp of undertaker's men, who are refreshing themselves in front of an ale house at Battersea, London. The few chips we have picked up in the ancient studios form but a small portion of the heap which remains to be selected. In another number we shall return to it.

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

THE SPECTRUM DISCOVERIES.

R. Miller's lecture during the sitting of the British Association at Manchester could hardly have failed to have been an excellent and entertaining one, from the importance which attaches to its subject—that remarkable line of investigation, the spectrum analysis—and the capability for brilliant displays of optical effects in its illustrations.

Dr. Miller said justly, that this subject had attracted as large a share of popular attention as any that could be mentioned. Like the telescope, it revealed to us intelligence of distant worlds; for not only did it tell us of changes in the glorious sun, but it revealed to us something of those distant solar orbs that stud, as twinkling stars, our firmament. Not only, like the telescope, did it reveal to us wonders from afar, but, like the microscope, too, it dealt with quantities so minute as to defy every other method of detection. He thought he should best discharge the duty which had devolved on him by endeavouring to give, in a brief manner, the successive steps by which this branch of investigation had been raised to such prominence. Like other great discoveries, it had not been the work of a single individual. It was a work, he was proud to say, in which our own countrymen had taken prominent parts; and there were many members of the British Association then present who had laid the foundations of our present knowledge on this subject. Nothing was known of the constitution of the solar spectrum before Newton, who in 1701 produced, in his memorable work on Optics, the results of investigations of many previous years.

Newton, however, had not the same certain means of showing his experiments as we now possessed in the electric light, the brilliant coloured spectrum of which Dr. Miller showed on a white screen. This spectrum, it was seen, was composed of bands of red, orange, yellow, green, blue, and violet colours, merging insensibly one into the other; but the solar spectrum, which, as far as colours were concerned, exactly resembled it, exhibited numbers of vertical dark bands, first discovered by Wollaston in 1801, but called after the German philosopher who subsequently carefully mapped them, and published his drawings of them,—Fraunhofer's lines. Wollaston, passing the sun's light through a narrow slit, found that it was not a continuous spectrum which was given, but that it was interrupted by a series of black bands at right angles to the length of the spectrum; but he did not pursue the investigation further, and it was twelve years after that Fraunhofer examined with a telescope the spectrum of a ray of light so passed, and carefully noted their position, which was found to be independent of the nature of the material used in constructing the prism. Fraunhofer not only interested himself about the spectrum of the sun, but he observed also the spectra of the fixed stars, and detected in them lines not always in the same or coincident positions with those of the solar bands.

There exist four distinct sets of phenomena, namely lines which might be called,—1st, cosmical, such as those of the solar light and of the fixed stars; 2nd, lines produced by absorption, for the discovery of which we are indebted to Sir David Brewster; 3rd, the bright lines produced by coloured flames; and 4th, there were the lines produced by the electric spark taken between various conductors, the knowledge of which was given us by Professor Wheatstone. Wollaston and Fraunhofer had not gone further than to notice that the electric spark produced an interrupted spectrum; but Wheatstone was the first to detect in it the existence of bright lines, and to show their dependence upon the nature of the conductors employed.

Of the absorption lines, Brewster was the first to suggest a cause. He observed that when the sun passed through the highest part of the heavens, certain lines of the spectrum were not to be seen, but when setting or rising, its light traversed, nearly horizontally, a thickness of 200 miles of the earth's atmosphere at its greatest density, certain bands were developed in the spectrum, and this was due to the absorption of particular rays of light by the atmosphere. Then came Becquerel's discovery in 1842, when he ascertained that corresponding with Fraunhofer's dark lines, were a series of inactive spaces, both in the chemical and in the phosphorogenic spectrum, extending in the chemical spectrum, far beyond the more refrangible of the violet rays.

Stokes, in 1852, succeeding in rendering these lines apparent to the eye in the invisible portion of the spectrum, by his discovery that the fluorescent power of the spectrum was also interrupted by inactive spaces, the position of which corresponded exactly with the lines observed by Fraunhofer and by Becquerel. Another step was made by Brewster in 1833, whose experiments on the red vapours of nitrous acid showed that they had the remarkable property of absorbing certain parts of the sun's rays. This gas is of a brownish red colour, and if viewed by transparency, no interruption is perceptible, but, examined after the ray of light had been passed through a prism, a series of dark bands were rendered visible.

Peroxide of chlorine, the vapours of iodine of bromine, and as the lecturer had himself ascertained and published in 1845, those of perchloride of manganese, and several other coloured gases, produced characteristic absorptive bands in the spectrum.

Foucault's observation, in 1849, that the sun's rays when passed through the electric light gave black bands where the electric light showed bright ones in Kirchhoff's hands, led to that grand discovery—the special subject of Dr. Miller's lecture.

Then came spectra of the coloured flames. Sir David Brewster, in 1822, found that light of one colour might be produced by burning dilute spirits of wine. The same year Sir John Herschel made a series of observations on lights coloured by certain salts in combustion in their flames; but to Fox Talbot is due the credit of having turned these suggestions to account as a means of chemical analysis. The flames coloured by lithium and strontium, for example, were both equally of a red colour, so nearly alike in shade, that to the naked eye there was nothing to distinguish them; but through the prism a striking difference was apparent.

The spectra of the electric light had the first impulse given to their investigation by Wheatstone. In 1835 he showed at Dublin a map of various spectra from sparks taken between points of different metals. Each metal exhibited a spectrum crossed by characteristic bands, whether magnetic, voltaic, or common machine electricity was used. He further showed these phenomena were not due to the burning of the metals, by passing the sparks through a vessel exhausted of air, and through one filled with carbonic acid.

The investigations of Wheatstone, who was at that time engaged personally with the electric telegraph, excited so much interest as to induce the Academy of Sciences at Haarlem to offer a prize for further investigations; the treatise of Masson, who, between 1851 and 1855, had contributed some valuable papers on the subject, being the one approved. The spectra figured by Masson were much more complex than those originally mapped by Wheatstone for the same metals; and it was subsequently shown by Dr. Alter, an American observer, and still more clearly proved by Angstrom and Van Willigen, that the result of Masson were obtained by the superposition of two spectra, one due to the metal, the other due to the ignition of the gaseous medium itself, owing to the very intense sources of electricity which he employed.

In illustration of this, Dr. Miller exhibited the spectrum of silver, obtained by igniting the metal by the voltaic current, and proceeded then to introduce the subject of spectra from gases, by passing the spark through a tube exhausted of all but an imponderable quantity in a highly rarified state.

THE VALUE OF AN ATOM.

WE all remember our lamented friend Hood's jest when he heard of the projected coinage of half-farthings. "I can't conceive their possible use," he said, "except as a payment for kicks—I'd kick you for half a farthing." In a similar irreverent fashion, although with far less reason, do the unlearned speak of atoms, and therefore it is that in our present paper we propose to endeavour to raise them in the scale of respectability, by showing, in a popular way, the very extraordinary and important part they play in the composition, decomposition, and transmutation of a vast variety of matters, with which, in common parlance, they are not supposed to be associated at all. "A mere scrap—an atom" to the general apprehension means something so utterly ridiculous, as to be unworthy of appreciation; but to the man of science it wears a different aspect, and bears a different value. This, in an indirect way, it has done long before chemistry became an exact science, and, in truth, the exactness of the science may fairly be said to date from the time when its important value became first well understood.

It is worth while, however, for the better understanding of the value of an ATOM, to take a backward glance at the rise and progress of the science with which it is so intimately connected, in order that we may perceive how many obstacles lay in its way, and after how long a period of incubation it arrived at its present triumphant fame.

People who are only conversant with the wonders which modern chemistry has achieved, look upon the science as one of comparatively a latter-day growth. But it is not so; it can look back on its thousands of years, as well as astronomy or mathematics, although it originated in far more selfish instincts than either of them. Mammon and Moloch were deities just as much worshipped amongst the ancients as they are at the present day, when to become rich is to become virtuous, respectable, and celebrated, at a blow; we have our gigantic adepts who manage to transmute had paper into hard cash, whilst the adepts of former days moved heaven and earth in order to discover the philosopher's stone, virgin earth, or magisterium, a single grain of which was to transmute billions of pounds of the baser metals into gold. This extraordinary mania must have been early implanted in the human heart, since we trace it back to Arabia, from whence the Egyptians were infected, and thence into the most celebrated European schools. Neither were they mere charlatans or empirics who pursued for centuries this seductive myth. Men renowned for wisdom and profoundly versed in the learning of the time, were the most anxious in its pursuit, and not a few amongst them fancied that they had arrived at the double consummation of turning baser metals into gold, and of conferring immortal youth on its possessor. "Send me these six lepers," says the confident Geber, "that I may cure them." The six lepers were silver, mercury, copper, iron, lead, and tin. Again he says, "there are means of producing and transmuting metals. These means consist of three sorts of medicines. Those of the first order are the raw materials or ores, as furnished by nature. Those of the second order are the substances of the first, after being refined and purified by chemical processes. By the further ennobling and fixing of those is produced the medicine of the third order. This is the great magisterium, the red tincture, the great elixir, the philosopher's stone."

Isaacus Hollandus begins by procuring his adamite or virgin earth. "When we have obtained this," he says, in a careless, off-hand sort of way, befitting a perfect adept, "the preparation of the stone is only fit for women or child's play. From the materies prima, cruda, or remota, the philosopher obtains first the mercury of the adepts, which differs from ordinary quicksilver, and is the quintessence, the first condition of the creation or procreation of all metals. To this is added philosophical gold, and the mixture is left for a long time in an incubatory or brooding furnace, which must have the form of an egg. There is thus obtained a black substance, the raven's head, or caput corvi, which, after long exposure to heat, is converted into a white body. This is the white swan, cygnus albus. After this has been long and more fiercely heated, it becomes yellow, and finally bright red—and now the great work is consummated. "First catch your fish," says the immortal Mrs. Glass. The "virgin earth" was to be the worker of the miracle; catch that and you might dress it as you pleased. But no trustworthy adept ever pretended to have discovered it, although hundreds of "gold-makers" did, and beguiled kings, princes, and other great ones of the earth, into believing them.

In the meanwhile, although this "splendid phantom" eluded philosophers, their labours in chase of it were by no means unproductive. The philosopher's stone remained a mystery; but during the many centuries in which its discovery was the alpha and omega of every philosopher's dream, the new science which we now call chemistry was slowly making its way. The story is a familiar one, of the farmer who bequeathed to his sons a treasure, which he had buried in a certain field on his farm, without saying which; after his death, they turned over and over again every foot of the soil, without finding what they sought; but the additional fertility recompensed them for the loss, as no doubt their wise father intended it should. So was it with the labours of the alchemist; they were the instruments destined by Providence to subserve a great end. They laid the foundation of the magnificent temple which science has since raised, and they deserve far more credit than they have gained, since whether we look to the meagre tools with which they wrought, or the wonderful effects produced by them, we cannot but be struck with the commanding genius of the men who did not so little but so much. Geber, for instance, grouped the metals as we group them; those which lost their lustre by exposure to fire were called the baser metals; those which were unchangeable were called noble. So we call them still. But once they began to theorize, they got out of their depths immediately. Swayed by the ever-prevalent notion of transmutation, the alchemist found that, during his researches, sulphur was expelled from certain ores, which, by expulsion, became brighter and purer. From thence he drew the deduction that a further subtraction of sulphur was the one thing needful to lead to the coveted end. By the further process of cupellation, he found that a certain quantity of silver was procurable from lead, and from the silver again a trace of gold. "A ha!" quoth he, "I have you at last!" But he failed, of course; leaving to us, however, his discovery of the art of purifying metals, and of separating one from another. So it is in many other things now familiar to us, but for the first knowledge of which we are indebted to him. Sulphuric, nitric, and muriatic acids, ammonia, the fixed alkalis, numberless compounds of metals, alcohol, ether, phosphorus, etc., for all these are we indebted to enthusiasts like Geber, Avicenna, Isaacus, Hollandus, Roger Bacon, Albertus Magnus, and others, who sought a "stone," and found immortality instead.

The second step in advance made by chemistry may be dated from what is called the Phlogistic period. And here, again, the practice was sound, and the theory at fault. Phlogiston was a vast idea wrongly carried out. The Phlogisticians calcined metals, and found that they actually grew heavier by the process. This increase of weight was to them inscrutable, as they debited the metal with the positive loss of a principle, Phlogiston (so called from phlego, I burn), which they looked upon as the cause of its levity, and never thought of crediting it with a positive gain from the air in which it was burned.

To Stahl and his disciples belong the credit of dissipating, in some measure, these erroneous views, but it was the masterly genius of our own Black which gave the death-blow to the Phlogiston theory, and substituted a better in its place. This was done in apparently a simple way; but every thing seems simple, when accurate deductions are drawn from principles radically right and clearly observed. He it was who showed that quick-lime exposed to the air increased in weight by the absorption of carbonic acid from the atmosphere, and that the increase of weight in the lime was exactly equal to the weight of the absorbed gas, thus proving that the Phlogistic theory, which would have attributed the weight of the lime to its loss of one principle and not to the gain of another, must be clearly in the wrong. Lavoisier's experiments tended to the same result as those of Black; but with Black, Priestly, and Cavendish, began the true era—the third era—the era of the theory of COMBUSTION, the benefits of which we are reaping at this day. OXYGEN, discovered in 1774 by Priestly in England and Schule in Sweden, was, after all, the real transmuter which turned all it touched into gold, by showing us the extensive aid a true knowledge of it gave to us in multifarious operations and in hundreds of ways. At first, it was called empyreal air, dephlogisticated air; afterwards it was named oxygen, from the Greek words oxus, acid, and gennao, I give rise to—a title given it by Lavoisier, in his new nomenclature, although we now know that the title is a deceptive one, as there are many acids which do not contain oxygen at all. It is, however, the great supporter of combustion. In all ordinary cases of combustion, the action lies between the burning body and the air, and in the most general sense, a body in a state of combustion is one in the act of undergoing intense chemical action, during which oxygen plays the principal part. It is supported and nourished by it increasing in intensity by every fresh volume of oxygen it receives. Oxygen indeed plays a busy part in forwarding the prosperity of nations, and as the theory of combustion is intimately connected with it, we may fairly look upon the era of its discovery, as by far the greatest that had yet been made, in giving exactitude to a science which was rich in facts, the gatherings of centuries, and now only waited for the master mind to appear capable of linking them firmly together. Such a mind had Lavoisier. As Liebig observes of him:—"In the time of Lavoisier, all the substances and all the phenomena which he studied, were already known. He discovered no new body—no new property—no natural phenomenon previously unknown; but all the facts established by him were the necessary consequences of the labours of those who had preceded him. His merit—his immortal glory consisted in this—that he infused into the science a new spirit; but all the members of that body were already in existence, and rightly joined together."

Having now cleared the way for our atom, we are enabled to introduce it on the scene.

The atomic theory of Dalton assuredly may be ranked as the fourth great advance made by chemists to give certainty and perfectibility to the science, and has gone a long way in attaining its object, as we hope to show.

Dalton, like Lavoisier, discovered nothing absolutely new, but his theory infused a new spirit and gave a new direction to the discoveries of others, which enabled his successors to work with greater precision, and to form juster notions than it was possible for them to do before his labours commenced. The doctrine of the divisibility of matter was one of the problems of antiquity, in the discussion of which Epicurus and Lucretius took part, and although, even now, it is a vexed question as to how far it may extend, still the Daltonian theory has succeeded in giving to the chemical combination of atoms—as cognizable by our senses—a precision and importance which are of the greatest consequence to the chemist in his operations, and which forms a very curious study in itself. That matter is wonderfully divisible has been clearly proved. A grain of the iodide of potassium, dissolved in 480,000 grains of water, and mixed with a little starch, will, on adding some chlorine water, render the entire fluid blue. A single grain of ammoniacal hyposulphate of silver will render 32,000 grains of water intensely sweet. Gold or silver wire may be visible to the naked eye, although only the 864,000th part of an inch, and platinum wire was drawn by Wollaston, for astronomical purposes, so fine, that it may easily be proved not to have exceeded the 18,000th part of an inch in diameter; 890,000 of the red globules of the human blood are required to cover a superficial inch; and Professor Ehrenberg has shown, that in fluids, there are such vast numbers of living animals, that a single drop may contain 500,000,000, and yet that each of these creatures is furnished with organs of motion, &c. If this be so, what then must the size of their blood globules be?

The Atomic Theory supposes that the ultimate elements of bodies have a definite, size and weight, and this proposition is capable of proof. Under a powerful microscope, the most minute particles of chalk, for instance, are found to be an aggregation of crystals, each as perfect as the finest specimen of calcareous spar. Pulverisation may reduce the size of the mass, without in the slightest degree interfering with the crystalline structure of the chalk itself. And yet the atom so observed is not a simple atom at all, but a tolerably complex one, of which the component parts are three. Chalk is a carbonate of lime, which requires for its composition three ingredients: first calcine, second carbon, and third oxygen; the proportions of these, again, are one atom of lime and one atom of carbonic acid—carbonic acid being itself a compound composed of one atom of carbon and two of oxygen, and lime being likewise composed of one atom of calcine and one of oxygen. Each particle of chalk must contain these three ingredients, in the proportions we have given, or it will not be chalk at all. Here, then, we have an example of the wonderful divisibility of matter, and of the nature of what chemists call "a compound atom," at the same time. As we have mentioned carbonic acid in the above, we may give an instance in connexion with it, of the vast difference of properties produced by the addition or subtraction of even a single atom, unimportant as it seems. A single atom of carbon and a single atom of oxygen, forms carbonic oxide, which burns with a lambent blue flame, such as is occasionally visible on the tops of tall chimneys; whilst if to our single atom of carbon we add two of oxygen, we obtain carbonic acid, which extinguishes flame altogether, and is incombustible itself.

We have spoken of a compound atom, and showed by a familiar instance what it means. A simple atom is, of course, a different thing. At present, there are known to chemists, sixty-three elements, or simple substances, incapable of resolution into any thing simpler than themselves. Of these some are gaseous, such as oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, &c.; some are metallic, as iron, gold, silver, mercury, tin, copper, platinum, &c.; some are metalloids, such as sulphur, phosphorus, iodine, &c.; and one is liquid, called bromine. But these simple substances are capable of the most wonderful combinations, and in their atomic proportions play the most extraordinary freaks. In fact it is here that our perception of the value of our atom really begins. Let us commence with atmospheric air. Its chief constituents are oxygen, nitrogen, and a small quantity of carbonic acid and of ammonia, and, besides these, were traces of combustible gases. In round numbers, it may be said to consist of four parts of nitrogen and one of oxygen (leaving out the rest as fractional); it is not a chemical compound, although its proportions are constant, but is a mere mechanical mixture of the elements, in order thereby to insure their more ready separation, and permit the oxygen to become available for its multifarious uses—those of combustion and respiration especially. But there are other mixtures of oxygen and nitrogen which are chemical compounds, and which show us vividly how decided a change in quality may result from a change in composition. One atom of nitrogen combined with one of oxygen, forms laughing gas; with two atoms it combines to form binoxide of nitrogen, a poisonous gas which cannot be breathed without loss of life; with three atoms it forms nitrous acid; with four hyponitric acid; and with five nitric acid, one of the most potent of our inorganic acids, capable of dissolving any of the metals but platinum or gold. We might, if we liked, rest the claims of our atom to distinct appreciation on these singular transformations alone. Here have we two elements, which, by an apparently simple change of proportions, becomes an air, stimulant gas, or the most dangerous of corrosive poisons, all by the addition of an atom or two. Can anything be more wonderful? Can any thing be more convincing of the power and wisdom of the Great Being, who out of such simple materials works such unlooked-for ends? And, we may add, can any thing be more convincing of the wonderful sagacity of genius and the perseverance of the human mind than such discoveries include?

There is another quality in our atom, which is a very extraordinary one. It appears to have its likes and dislikes—its loves and hates, just as we have. This is called its elective affinity, and is very curious in its results. There are, as every one knows, various kinds of attraction in matter. There is the attraction of gravitation, by which every particle attracts every other particle, and, as far as we know, acts at all distances; then there is cohesive attraction, which prevents bodies from falling to pieces; and, finally, there is purely chemical attraction, which is exerted only at minute distances, and entirely changes the nature of the bodies on which it acts. In plainer language, chemical affinity or attraction, means chemical force—that force which compels two bodies, having a natural attraction for each other, to unite, whether they will or no, even though the identity of each be lost, and the resulting compound be altogether different from either of the original ingredients. A correct and minute knowledge of these forces and affinities is indispensable to the chemist, as without it he would, like the alchymist of old, be working in the dark; and equally necessary is it to the physician, since otherwise he might order compounds which would decompose each other, and by doing so produce an effect altogether different from what he expected.

Let us take carbonate of soda—the common “washing soda,” as it is called—as an illustration of what we mean, and of the singular power which our atom wields. One atom of the metal sodium and one atom of oxygen—the omnipotent oxygen—form caustic soda. This is our base. One atom of carbon and two of oxygen forms carbonic acid. This is our acid. We present them to each, and they combine at once on the most intimate terms, and in doing so form the new compound called carbonate of soda. Here then we have a caustic alkalic and a poisonous gas inviting in friendly communion to form a thing different from either. If I wish to turn this carbonate of soda into the milder bicarbonate, of which effervescent draughts are made, I add another atom of carbonic acid, and the thing is done.

Now, suppose I wish to change the carbonate of soda, so made, into chloride of sodium—our common table salt—I add to my atom of carbonate of soda an atom of muriatic or hydro-chloric acid (spirits of salts of the alchymists), and then I find that the metallic base, sodium, has a much greater liking (affinity) for it than it has for the carbonic acid, which it jilts incontinently, driving it off without ruth or pity, and joining fellowship with the muriatic instead, thereby forming the new compound of which we make such excellent use. On the other hand, carbonate of soda is manufactured on a large scale from common salt, but as the process is a complicated one, in which many chemical changes occur, it hardly admits of explanation in this paper, which is written for the unscientific alone.

THE ABBEY OF SLANE.

At what period the abbey of Slane was first founded is unknown. We are informed by Archdall, that an abbey of Canons Regular was founded at a very early age, on a hill adjoining the town of Slane, and was remarkable for being many years the residence of Dagobert, King of Austrasia, who, in 653, at the age of seven years, was taken by Grimoald, mayor of the palace, and, by his direction, shorn a monk, rendered unfit to hold the reins of government, and banished into Ireland. He was received into this abbey, where he obtained an education proper for the enjoyment of a throne, and continued here during the space of twenty years, when he was recalled into France, and replaced in his government. The ruins of the abbey at present consist of a large chapel and a lofty tower at the west end; in the latter there is a handsome ramified window. It was frequently pillaged during the prevalence of the Ostman power in Ireland; but in the year 946 the Ostman received a signal defeat in this town, in which their chieftain, Blacar, and sixteen hundred of his best troops fell. The English, with Mac Morrogh, King of Leinster, burnt and sacked the town, A.D. 1170. In the time of Hugo de Lacy, first Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, Slane was a considerable town, being one of the boroughs in his palatinate of Meath.

Under the protection of the baronial family of Fleming this ancient abbey experienced a renovation of prosperity. By Sir Christopher Fleming, Lord of Slane, and Elizabeth Stuckle, his wife, it was refounded, in 1512, for friars of the third order of St. Francis. The buildings were then restored, on an extensive scale, and some fresh endowments made. After the dissolution, this friary was granted to James, Lord Slane, at the annual rent of one penny, Irish money. The remains of the buildings add an interesting feature to the picturesque charms of this neighbourhood.

INCH ABBEY.

THE Abbey of Inch, of the original church of which the above illustration affords a good idea, was erected towards the latter part of the twelfth century on the island or peninsula of Inniscoursey, on the lough of Strangford, county Down, by Sir John de Courcey. Though at present a very dilapidated ruin, enough remains to show that it was originally an abbey of great importance and architectural beauty. It was in the usual form of a cross, and had a lofty belfry on the south side. Of the latter there are at present no remains, except of an arch on which it stood, which appears to have been of very elegant construction; and of the church itself there is little to be seen except the east end, or chancel, which has three noble latticed windows, upwards of twenty feet in height, in its east wall; and two windows of similar form, and nearly equal grandeur, in each of the side walls. The circumstances connected with the foundation of this monastery are characteristic of the spirit of the age. Sir John de Courcey, having, in his struggles for conquest with the native princes in this district, found it necessary to demolish a Benedictine abbey, called Erynagh, or Carrig, which, from the strength of its position, had been converted into a garrison, and did him much mischief, he founded this Abbey of Inch in atonement for his sacrilege, and endowed it with all the lands of the extinguished house. The late Dr. O'Donovan, the most able and judicious Irish scholar and topographer which Ireland has produced for the last century, in his notes to the foundation charter of Newry, shows that the original name of this island now corruptly called Inniscoursey, was Innisconmishraigh, pronounced Innisconogery.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER XIV.

OBERT STAMMERS, although fast recovering from the effects of the injuries which he had sustained, was heartily sick of having to remain in bed so long. For the purpose of making the time pass over, or in other words, "to shorten the day," Mrs. Stammers was reading aloud a portion of a new novel, published four days before in London for "three half-guineas." It had arrived that morning in Dublin, and was regarded as a great treat by Mrs. Stammers, as the hero was "a lord." Charlotte was seated at a tambour frame, apparently most industrious. Mrs. Stammers had arrived at the point where Lord Pumkin rescues Lady Evelena Fitzclarence from drowning, when Stammers observed:

"If you love me, tell me who was the enterprising merchant that imported that rubbish. Unless you want to make me more miserable than I am, you will put by that book. Why, the leaves of it are scarcely dry yet. It is one of those things which are got up for watering-places, to make hypochondriacs more mad than they are already. You may not believe it, but I wrote two fashionable novels in my time; that is, I mean to say before you absorbed all my attentions," continued Stammers, laughing. "There is nothing easier than to write a fashionable novel; begin thus:—'He walked up and down the room in great agitation;' or 'Belgrave was poring over the Morning Post as he sat at breakfast, when his eye fell on a paragraph—he sprang from his chair, and said, 'Zounds! Fred Cavendish is caught at last!—ha, ha—he, he—and he laughed immoderately.' There is nothing easier than to get a publisher. Take the manuscript to Oldby, and 'faith he'll prent it,' giving you some copies of the work for your trouble, and a promise of paying you if the publication should go a second edition. But somehow or another the publisher is very seldom indeed called on to make any pecuniary advances to the authors."

Mrs. Stammers, though a little piqued, had to laugh at her husband's satire on fashionable authorship.

"As you won't listen to the new novel, perhaps you will hear me play some of the new melodies," said Charlotte; "I will get a piano rolled in from the next room."

"Not at present," said Stammers. "I was just thinking what could we have done to Bramble that he does not come here. He must have taken offence at something. Tony said yesterday that he was ill; have you sent to inquire after him?"

When Charlotte heard the name of Bramble mentioned, her face became crimson, and her manner quite excited, as she threw a hurried glance at her sister-in-law, to whom she had shown Bramble's letter.

In reply to her husband Mrs. Stammers said that she had not sent to inquire how Doctor Bramble was, and added: "You know, Robert, that it is perhaps as well that we should not excite observation by bringing so singular a man too much about this house. The Berkeleys called to see me yesterday, and they laughingly inquired who was my sable chaperon. We can be very kind and civil to him, but we need not be too familiar."

Stammers looked the very picture of amazement while his wife was delivering herself of what she thought was a very able statement.

"Can I believe my ears, that you who only a few days since was ready to lay down your life for the man who saved me from worse than a hundred deaths, now speak of him as a person of whom the Berkeleys were asking, and one who should not be seen too much about this house? Tell me, both of you, on your peril, have you said or done anything to my true and noble-hearted friend that could give him offence, or in any way make him believe that anyone claiming kindred to me was ungrateful to him? Am I not to be consoled with, lying here a maimed prisoner, not having the power to go and see him, and ask him if I have wronged him?"

"Your sister and I have given Dr. Bramble no offence; on the contrary, we have received him with the greatest kindness."

"Feigning kindness, I suppose," observed Stammers, bitterly. "May I ask you, ma'am, was it the Berkeleys made the speech for you that I have just heard you deliver for the benefit of him who risked all for me—who spurned wealth and power rather than betray me. I swear solemnly," continued Stammers, as he raised himself in his bed, "I would sooner go back again into all the perils through which he has brought me, than be the man who, for one moment, would permit him to believe that I am unmindful of the deep, deep obligations I am under to him;—the mere thought of the possibility of his having been offended here by those he saved from ruin and disgrace, is too much for me to bear."

"Robert," said Mrs. Stammers, "did it ever strike you that it would be well for us to remove as far as possible those things which will be for ever reminding us of the cause of the obligation. Dr. Bramble will find associates in his own circle. You will soon be in a position to reward him amply for any service which he has rendered you."

"I understand you, ma'am," replied Stammers. "Poor Bramble, what a worthless wretch you have served in rue; but if I am to die in the attempt, I will see you this day."

"Surely you do not mean to leave your bed in your present state?" inquired Mrs. Stammers.

"I do," said he; "although I was not so profuse in the expressions of my gratitude as you have been. If he is not ill I know there is some cause which I cannot fathom that has kept him from coming here."

"Perhaps when you hear that he has proposed for your sister, you may be inclined to postpone your journey," observed Mrs. Stammers.

"Come here, Charlotte," said Stammers. "Did Dr. Bramble propose for you? and if so, was it verbally or by letter?"

The girl burst into tears as she simply said—"By letter."

"And, as a matter of course, you not only refused him, but insulted him. I see how it is. Ladies, leave the room, and send me my servant," continued Stammers, as he waved his hand towards the door. His wife and sister sought to remonstrate, but they, perceiving his passion was becoming aroused, withdrew.

"Assist me to dress," said Stammers to his servant, "and send off for a hand-chair, and let it be at the door in half an hour."

Bramble was turning over the file of bills which were in the Jew's pocket-book when Barman and Tony entered.

"Welcome, Barman," said Bramble. "You perceive I was prepared for your coming. May I ask you, has Isaacs done his part in connection with the will? for if he has, it is high time for me, with your assistance, to renew hostilities against him. I will make a fair bargain with you. If you are not prepared to go on vigorously against this fiend, or if you are not steeled against having the remotest feeling of mercy or pity on him, you can withdraw from my plan, and I will get some one to do the work."

"I am ready and too glad to have the chance," replied Barman. "I will hunt Isaacs with you, if necessary, to the death, and here is my hand on it."

"That will do," said Bramble. "Here are all Foster's securities given to the Jew, and the assignment of his estate. These documents lay bare a system of wholesale plunder, perpetrated by the old wolf on that confiding fool, Foster. We must go at once to the Jew, and tell him that we want to release Foster's securities. As a matter of course he cannot produce them. I will want Wisp to come with us. Where is he to be found?"

"At my office; and if he is not there, Quill will be sure to make him out," replied Barman, when leaving the house in company with the Black Doctor and Tony.

On their way Barman called at his office, and, as he conjectured, he found Wisp involved in a warm discussion with Quill. Barman beckoned to the former to follow him. The bailiff buttoned his coat, and seizing the stout oak stick which he was in the habit of carrying, walked after the attorney, Bramble, and Tony.

"Do you wait here with this young gentleman while Mr. Barman and I go inside; we will call you when we want you," said Bramble.

The Black Doctor and the attorney entered Isaacs's shop together. The Jew was behind the counter, and when he saw Bramble he became deadly pale.

"Won't you walk into the parlour, gentlemen," said he, as he led the way. "I hope the arrangement about the will was in every way satisfactory, Mr. Barman. I suppose you will not get the money over before a week," continued he, as he stole occasional glances at Bramble, who appeared to be quite indifferent in his manner.

"We have come to relieve you of a very unprofitable client," observed the Black Doctor. "You know the person to whom I allude—I mean Mr. Frederick Foster. He has now fifteen hundred pounds to his credit, and a friend of his is willing to advance him any more money he may require to release any bond, mortgage, or assignment that you may have on his property. We have also called on you to furnish an account of the rents which you have received since Foster's property got into your hands."

"Very good, very good, gentlemen," said the Jew, with affected composure. "I am glad poor Mr. Foster is getting out of his difficulties."

"We want to see the securities which you hold," said Barman, "as they are not registered. We would not have troubled you had they been."

"I can't let you see them before to-morrow," said the Jew, "as I have not them by me; but if you come about this hour I will be sure to have them."

"We must see them now, or be directed to the person in whose custody they are," said Barman.

"It is entirely out of my power now to show them, or even tell you where they are," said the Jew, as he grasped a chair and seated himself upon it. "Mr. Foster and his wife have squandered all my hard earnings, and I have nothing for all I advanced them but a mortgage on one property and an assignment on another; and, gentlemen, you can't blame me for not keeping such valuable documents in a place like this, where robbers may come at any hour of the night."

"You trifled with me before now, Mr. Isaacs, in the case of Mr. Stammers's bill," said Bramble; "don't try it again. Any bills I have I keep more ready than you do. I suppose you saw this before," continued the speaker, as he held up the bill which the Jew forged in Barman's office. "We will make one proposition to you, and you may or you may not agree to it. If the securities to which we have referred be not produced by this hour to-morrow, this forged bill shall be lodged in the proper quarter. I will now give you into custody of the sheriff's bailiff on a charge of forgery; but that arrest shall not be in force if you produce, to-morrow, what we require."

"You don't mean to ruin me?" asked Isaacs. "Have I not done everything for you that you required of me? For mercy's sake, don't be so cruel on me."

"Call Wisp, Barman," said Bramble, firmly and coldly.

A whistle from the attorney brought Wisp and Tony into the shop.

"Come here, bailiff," observed the Black Doctor; "that man is your prisoner on a charge of forgery. Don't let him out of your sight, but don't tell anybody that he is in custody till I see you to-morrow. This bailiff," continued Bramble, turning to the Jew, "will give you no annoyance. He will remain with you until we discharge him. You can, Mr. Isaacs, make this a mere formal arrest if you please—or a terrible reality. Come, Tony," said Bramble, as he retired from the shop with Barman, leaving the Jew, overcome with terror and amazement, in the keeping of Wisp.

"The Jew will give us a clear discharge of that mortgage and assignment to-morrow," said Barman. "I don't see how he can get out of it."

"Nor do I," replied Bramble, pondering as he went on his way to give some instructions to his friend's famous clerk, Jonas Quill.

The hand-chair or hand-chaise of the olden time was a primitive though a most convenient mode of locomotion, but it is now a thing of the past, that was superseded by the hack-car or cab, as the old stage-coach has been superseded by the railway train. The hand-chair is now a piece of antiquity, rarely, if ever, met with. At the period to which our story has reference it was a most favoured vehicle, when long lines of them were to be seen ranged in the streets in readiness to be brought into immediate requisition. They were shaped like sentry-boxes, covered with leather and studded with brass nails, and the windows in front and at either side of the door were generally furnished with muslin blinds, frilled like a medal boy's shirt on examination day. The hand-chair was borne along by means of two poles fastened by staples at each side of the conveyance. The hand-chair was borne along by what were called chairmen, a class now extinct, who had to give place to the modern Jarvey. They lived in the period when barbers were in such requisition, that ladies had often to sit up for two nights prior to a ball for fear of disturbing their hair. This course was found in many instances to be most necessary, as Figaro had generally so much work on hands on the approach of a great festive assemblage, that he and his assistants could never dress the hair of their many customers unless their patrons accommodated themselves to considerable inconvenience, such as sitting up in an easy chair for nights in succession, to prevent the powdered and crimped pyramids on their heads being tossed about and ruffled. But it must be remembered that the making of the toilet of a lady, sixty years ago, was a most formidable proceeding, involving much care and labour. The link or torch boy at night was generally in close attendance on the hand-chair, and in front of the old-fashioned houses at the present day are to be seen the places affixed to the railings leading to the door-ways for extinguishing the link, or holding it when lighted.

Stammers with much trouble succeeded in dressing, and was ready to proceed to the hand-chair which was waiting in the street when Mrs. Stammers and Charlotte entered.

The former observed addressing her husband. "Surely you do not mean to imperil your life by going out in your present feeble state. If you require it, I will go and see Dr. Bramble, and make any explanation you may think necessary—anything to prevent you leaving your room, I will do."

"Don't go out Bob," said Charlotte; "I will go myself, if you like, to Doctor Bramble, and convey to him any messages you have to send him."

"It is likely ladies, that Doctor Bramble would not be pleased at such kind and generous women, who had done so much to serve him, putting themselves to further inconvenience on his account," replied Stammers bitterly.

"I know Charlotte," continued he, "that you have received some sound admonition from Mrs. Stammers, as to the course you should adopt towards Doctor Bramble. I do not blame you for not encouraging the overtures he made to you, but it was quite competent for you to have rejected him as a suitor, and retained him as a friend, particularly when you remembered the overwhelming obligations we are under to him. You need not fear for my safety, as I will take care that I shall be moved with great caution."

With the assistance of two servants, Stammers was placed in the hand-chair, and in a few minutes after, the chairmen trotted off with their burden, to the office of Jacob Barman.

The warm friendship which Charlotte Stammers had expressed for Bramble was mistaken by him for affection and love, but in this he was mistaken, as Miss Stammers never dreamed of Bramble in any other light than a friend, until she received his letter. It required all the forbearance which she could command to suppress her sense of injured vanity when replying to it, particularly as the counsels of her sister-in-law had a tendency to make her feel that she had been all but insulted. But prior to writing her reply, she remembered the deep debt of thankfulness she owed to Bramble, and the kindlier nature of the woman prevailed. She did not love the Black Doctor, but still she felt a greater interest in him after he had written to her than she ever felt before, for this reason: no woman can be indifferent, however she may affect to be so, to the man she believes that sincerely loves her. Charlotte Stammers was unhappy; she did not know why, but the reason lay in the belief that she had to be unkind to the benefactor of her brother—to one who had acted nobly and generously, and who had given the best proof of true friendship—self-sacrifice. However, her vanity came to her assistance, when she thought of the presumption of a Negro offering her his hand, and of the ridicule which would attach to her if it was for a moment known by the Berkeleys and others of her acquaintance, that such a proposal had been made.

The hand-chair occupied by Stammers arrived at Barman's office as Quill and a friend were discussing some law points, and two quart measures of porter.

MY SISTERS.

An urnful of ashes lying Somewhere in daisied plains,
A rosemary plot on their bosoms,
And that is all that remains.
The winds come swirling and piping
O'er hill, over meadow, and wold,
But never, never they hear it,
Under the rosemary gold.

Happy were they in life's garden,
In the beautiful spring of youth,
One was like tender Rachel,
And one was like blue-eyed Ruth.
They caught the lights of the season,
The sun, and the rain, and the cold,
But never, never they reach them,
Under the rosemary gold.

When I pass by them at evening,
With the blinding road between,
The low grave mists out its odours,
Twixt the leaves of the green larch screen.
And there comes a panting and heaving,
I hear it far down in the mould,
As if their twin hearts were beating,
Under the rosemary gold.

The peace of our God be with them,
For though they were dear to me,
I know they are better and sweeter,
In the land that we may not see.
And whenever I faint on the highway,
And clouds all the heavens enfold,
Bright spirit voices breath comfort
Under the rosemary gold.

FELICIA HEMANS.

FEW of the great women of the world have woven for themselves a brighter wreath of immortal fame than Felicia Hemans. There are few names more universally known—there are none more universally admired. Christian piety, kindness of heart, undoubted genius, are the elements which compose the popularity of one who wrote much and wrote well, and never employed her pen but in an ennobling service. Mrs. Hemans's name will always be surrounded with a lustre, the brightest rays of which are as much of Heaven as of earth.

Felicia Dorothea Browne (afterwards Mrs. Hemans) was born on the 23rd of September, 1794, at Liverpool, where her father was engaged in mercantile pursuits. Her father was Irish; her mother was English. Felicia was the fourth child of a family of three sons and three daughters. Her father died before she was seven years old, and she was thus deprived of a portion of parental solicitude. To the nobleness of her mother, it seems, she was indebted for the instruction and example by which she acquired that refinement of intellect, and high tone, religious and moral, which distinguished her after-life and works. It is this influence of the mother which peeps out as the most prominent fact in the history of nine-tenths of our great men and women.

Mrs. Hemans owed the form of her character and the direction of her aims to a mother's influence. Under that influence her mind quickly arrived at a tone of maturity and power; and, before she had reached her ninth year, she had written poetry worthy of preservation. The quickness of her mind was one of its striking features. She read much, and observed more; and it was astonishing how rapid her judgments were of men and things, respecting which, even as a child, she always manifested a lively interest. She could repeat pages of poetry from her favourite authors, after having read them but once over; and, such was her rapidity of conception, that she read and grasped the entire meaning of any author, when a bystander thought she was only carelessly turning over the pages of a book. The earliest of her definite traits was a love of Shakespeare, whose varied page, crowded with wit, pageantry, idealism, philosophy, and observation, became her choicest mental food at the age of six years. At this early period she began the study of the immortal Bard of Avon; and, for many years—until, indeed, the season of ripened womanhood—the works of the great poet were her chief delight. At the residence of her mother, at Grwyth, North Wales, she had a favourite haunt, where she retreated into a region of romance, and fed her young soul on the rich food which the universal teacher offered her. This secret retreat was a seat amongst the branches of an old apple-tree, where, revelling in the treasures which she had discovered in Shakespeare, the world of the ideal opened before her, and afforded a new current of heart-blood to her warm and sympathising nature. Much of her early poetry is founded on this passion for the great dramatist, and the following lines, written by her at eleven years of age, exhibit the tone which this admiration assumed in her mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

"I love to rove o'er history's page;
Recall the hero and the sage;
Revive the actions of the dead,
And memory of ages fled:
Yet, it yields me greater pleasure;
To read the poet's pleasing measure.
Led by Shakespeare—bard inspired!—
The bosom's energies are fired.
We learn to shed the generous tear
O'er poor Ophelia's sacred bier:
To love the merry moon-lit scene,
With fairy elves, in valleys green!

Doth some old nook,
Haunted by visions of thy first-loved book,
Kiss on thy soul, with faint-streaked blossom white,
Shewer o'er the turf; and the lone primrose knut,
And robin's nest, still faithful to the spot,

And the bee's dreamy chime? O! gentle friend!
The world's cold breath—not Time's—this life
Of vernal gifts. Time hallows what he leaves,
And will for us endear spring memories to the end."

In 1808, Miss Browne published her first volume of poems, her age being then but fourteen years. This volume contains some pieces written as early as her ninth year, which, not worthy of popularity as poems, are, nevertheless, marvellous productions, if we consider the age at which they were produced. The book was reviewed harshly, and perhaps deservedly so, for however much we may admire its contents when we consider the youth of its writer, we cannot expect reviewers to make allowances of this kind; it being their duty to purge literature of all such premature writings, regarding only the dignity of letters, not the individual feelings of authors. Be that as it may, Miss Browne was so affected by one review of her volume, that she fell into ill health, and was confined to her bed for several days, in consequence of what she regarded as the cruelty of the act. There is little doubt, however, but that this severe censure, as in the case of Byron and others, who have profited by the strictures of the press, was of great advantage to Miss Browne, for, in her second volume, "The Domestic Affections," published in 1812, a higher tone of thought is manifest, and a wonderful march, as regards composition, on the quality of her first verses.

Other duties than those of authorship now began to surround her. She was wooed by Captain Hemans, and gave her hand to him in marriage, in the same year as her poems of the "Domestic Affections" were published, that is, at the age of eighteen. The union was not a happy one, and a separation followed soon after the birth of their fifth son. Captain Hemans then went to Italy, and never saw his wife again.

After the separation, Mrs. Hemans took up her residence with her mother, at Brounwylda, near St. Asaph, North Wales. Here she lived in seclusion, and cultivated her poetic powers amidst the lovely scenery of Wales. She studied Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, French, and German; and in the latter language soon discovered an exhaustless fund of thought and inspiration in the wonderful books with which it was enriched. At this time the power of her memory was extraordinary, and on one occasion she learned (as a mere amusing experiment to test her powers) the entire of Bishop Heber's poem of "Europe," consisting of four hundred and twenty-four lines, in one hour and twenty minutes. In other respects her accomplishments were extraordinary. She was talented in drawing; had a remarkable taste in the appreciation of scenery and pictures; played the harp and piano with wonderful brilliancy, and sang with extraordinary sweetness. In fact, the refinement of feeling, and the intensity of thought which she expressed in her poetry, also found expression in the mere amusements with which she beguiled her time when not engaged in study. Music had a spell for her which transcended every other, and became a sort of fantasy on which her spirit fed, and found solace in the hours when domestic affliction surrounded her with a terrible darkness.

At twenty-five years of age she became acquainted with the Rev. Reginald Heber, afterwards Bishop of Calcutta, whose poems shadow forth many of the traits which, in the course of his intimacy, he imbibed from Mrs. Hemans. It was at his suggestion that her first dramatic work, the "Vespers of Palermo," was written. This tragedy was represented at Covent Garden Theatre in 1823. After this she wrote and published "The Siege of Valencia," the "Last Constantine," and other poems; and again, the "Lays of Many Lands," and the "Forest Sanctuary," making another volume, which met with great success. On the eleventh of January, 1827, her mother died, and long after this event, a melancholy tinged her verses, which showed how truly this loss had coloured her thoughts and life.

In the course of the year 1828, she left Wales, and went to reside at Wavertree, near Liverpool. She then visited Scotland, and formed a friendship with Sir Walter Scott. In 1830 she published her "Songs of the Affections," and immediately after this event visited William Wordsworth, at Rydal Mount, and then took up her residence at Dublin. She now began to feel the pinch of poverty, and with five sons dependent on her for support, experienced the anguish of a struggling mother. She soon began to feel the harsh lot of having to breast the world alone, when solitude and a still, calm, meditative life were what her heart desired. In one of her letters she says: "The constant necessity of providing sums of money to meet the exigencies of the boys' education, has obliged me to waste my mind in what I consider mere desultory effusions—

"Pouring myself away,
As a wild bird amid the foliage turns
That which within him thrills, and beats, and burns,
Into a fleeting lay."

In the month of August, 1834, Mrs. Hemans took scarlet fever, and when imperfectly recovered, caught cold. Ague followed, and then dropsy, and she lingered on till May the 12th, 1835, when, after a long and quiet sleep, without sign or token of pain, her willing soul went upwards to its God.

She dictated her last poem in April, 1834; the last strain of the heart-weary singer, who was soon afterwards to hang her harp for ever on the willows, was entitled "A Sabbath Sonnet":

"How many blessed groups this hour are bending,
Through England's primrose meadow paths, their way
Towards spire and tower, 'midst shadowy elms ascending,
Whence the sweet chimies proclaimed the hallowed day.
The hails from old heroic ages grey,
Pour their fair children forth; and hamlets low,
With whose thick orchard blooms the soft winds play,
Send out their inmates in a happy flow,
Like a freed, vernal stream; / I m y not tread
With them those pathways—to the feverish bed
Of sickness bound; yet, O my God! I bless
Thy mercy, that with Sabbath peace hath filled
My chastened heart, and all its throbbings still'd
To one deep calm of lowest thankfulness."

Her end was as holy as her last song, and a fit closing to a life of piety, high virtue, and patient suffering. She had shown her nobility in her songs; she had evinced her womanly strength of character in her devotion to her children; and, as she owed much of her genius and womanly refinement to her mother, so she herself played nobly the mother's part, and so discharged in full integrity the highest mission of a woman. To poetry she through life devoted herself with an enthusiasm as pure as it was beautiful. Poetry was her passion—her life; she made it the object of her studies, she sought its materials in history and the arts, and she completed the culture which these afforded her by direct appeals to the teachings of nature. The serene beauty of the simple solitudes; the bird, the bee, the flower, were to her as so many syllables which the Great Creator had sprinkled on the earth, which, with the varied shades of human passion and emotion, it was her calling to weave into wonderful song—and her mission was accomplished well; her lyric poetry affords the finest variety of rich and warbling melodies, unsurpassed in the sweetness of its music, and scarcely ever equalled for the sincerity and holiness of its thoughts; while her dramatic works evince a deep acquaintance with the ways of the human heart, in a poetry as dignified in purpose as it is classical in tone, and powerful in execution.

About a year since a very chaste and handsome memorial window was erected, by subscription, to Mrs. Hemans in St. Anne's Church, Dublin, where her remains are interred.

Although that lovely lyric of Mrs. Hemans, the "Better Land," has been frequently quoted, we do not think we could better close this brief notice of the greatest of our female poets, than by quoting it in its integrity; its exquisite perfection as a lyric justifying us in preference to many others of her pieces which are less known:

"I hear thee speak of the better land;
Thou call'st its children a happy band;
Mother! oh, where is that radiant shore—
Shall we not seek it and weep no more?
Is it where the flower of the orange blows,
And the fire-flies dance through the myrtle boughs?
'Not there, not there, my child!'

'Is it where the feathery palm trees rise,
And the date grows ripe under sunny skies,
Or 'midst the green islands of glittering seas,
Where grantforests perfume the breeze,

And strange bright birds on their starry wings,
Bear the rich tones of glorious things?
'Not there, not there, my child.'

'Is it far away, in some region old,
Where the river wanders o'er sands of gold—
Where the burning rays of the ruby shine,
And the diamond lights up the acet mine,
And the pearls gleam forth from the coral strand—
Is it there, sweet mother, that better land?
'Not there, not there, my child.'

'Eyes hath not seen it, my gentle boy!
Ears hath not heard its deep songs of joy;
Dreams cannot picture a world so fair,
Sorrow and death may not enter there;
Time doth not breathe on its fadeless bloom,
Far beyond the clouds and beyond the tomb,
It is there, it is there, my child!'

OVER A CUP OF TEA.

As a modern writer has observed, whether we regard the rapid strides that the tea plant is making towards establishing a substitute for the fermented and spirituous liquors in general use; whether we consider the social relations that are connected with it, the influence it has had, and still exercises, over the eastern possessions of Great Britain; the stimulus it has given to navigation, commercial intercourse, and even warfare, we must always be filled with wonder, admiration, and gratitude to Him that has bestowed so valuable and simple an herb upon us.

The tea plant is indigenous to China or Japan, and, though asserted by some botanists that the many varieties known to us are obtained from one plant—the "Thea viridis"—yet it is pretty certain now, that such is not always the case, although the Chinese themselves say that either black or green tea may be prepared from any tea plant, but that it is not always done. The tea districts of Assam, which are of great importance to India, are situated in the kingdom of Ava, which became a British possession in the year 1825.

The tea country or district of the Chinese empire, is divided into four parts. The green tea country is in the province of Keang-nan, at the north-west extremity of a range of hills dividing that province from Ché-keang, between thirty and thirty-one degrees of north latitude, near where the tea plant was first seen by the British embassy, on its return from Peking, on the southern bank of the Yang-tee-Keang. The black-tea district is in Fokien, between twenty-seven and twenty-eight degrees north latitude, and is situated on the south-eastern declivities of a ridge of mountains, dividing the province of Fokien from Keang-sy. The word tea is probably derived from the botanical term thea, which is of Chinese origin, the name for tea in China being tcha, cha, or tha.

According to the Linnean system the general botanical characteristics of the plant are as follow, but each variety has its distinctive character. Mondelphia Polyandria; calyx of five sepals, the petals disposed in two or three rows cohering at the very base, down to which the stamens are almost unconnected; anthers roundish; capsules three-berried or three-seeded; the dissepiments are formed from the edges of the valves, being bent inwards. Beautiful evergreen shrubs, with shining laurel-like leaves, and largish, white, axillary stalked flowers somewhat like those of the wild rose of our hedges. "T. Viridis," or green tea; leaves elliptical, oblong, serrated, three times longer than broad, pale green, flowers of five sepals. This shrub has been cultivated in England since 1768, flowers in September and December, and is a native of both China and Japan. "T. Bohea," or Bohea tea, leaves elliptical, oblong, obtuse, crenated, twice as long as broad; dark green and coriaceous, with flowers of five sepals and five petals. It has been cultivated in green-houses since the year 1780. "T. Cochinchinensis," leaves lanceolate, flowers of three, five sepals and five petals, solitary, terminal, and white; fruit three-lobed, usually one-seeded, opening at the apex. It is cultivated in green-houses, and is from seven to eight feet high. "T. Oleosa," or Oily Tea; leaves lanceolate; flowers white, of six sepals and six petals; is a shrub about eight feet high, and is cultivated in green-houses. We may remark, with regard to tea brands and their explication, that "Hyson" means, "before the rains," or "flourishing spring," that is early in the spring. Hence it is often called "Young Hyson." "Hyson skin" is composed of the refuse of other kinds, the native term for which is "tea-skins." Refuse of still coarser description, containing many stems, is called "tea bones." "Bohea," is the name of the hills in the region where it is collected. "Pehoe," or "pecco," means "white hairs"—the down of tender leaves. "Powchong," "folded plant." "Souchong," "small plant." "Twankay" is the name of a small river in the region where it is bought. "Cougou" is from a term signifying "labour," from the care required in its preparation. Even ridiculous as these terms appear to us, how equally absurd must the appellations which have originated with us; such as "imperial tea," "flower of tea," "flower of pekoe," "orange scented," etc., seem, when we reflect that the Chinese are not aware of such distinctions, though they distinguish two other kinds, besides the common tea, namely, the "Vovi" and "Soufflo," which are reserved for people of the first quality, and the sick.

The green tea plants are more hardy than the black; snow does not kill them. The shrub succeeds best when cultivated on the sides of mountains, where there is a small accumulation of vegetable soil. It delights to grow in valleys, at the foot of mountains, and upon the banks of rivers, where it enjoys a southern exposure to the sun, but it is capable of undergoing considerable changes of temperature, as it flourishes in the north of Pekin, as well as about Canton, but a mild, temperate climate, such as Nankin, is more suited to it.

The tea plant is raised from seeds, sown in November and December. The Chinese plant whole fields with it; the Japanese only plant the borders of fields, without regard to soil or situation. When the ground has been prepared, three or four, and frequently as many as seven or eight, seeds are dropped into each hole, which is about five inches deep and four feet apart from the others; the uncertainty of the vegetation of the seed, even in their own climate, rendering it necessary for the Chinese to sow so many seeds at once. After once sown no further trouble is necessary, beyond that of keeping the ground between each row free from weeds, and not allowing the shrubs to attain a greater height than will admit of the leaves being gathered conveniently. The soil best adapted for the plant is a micaceous sand, or a light stony ground.

The first crop of leaves is gathered about the third year after sowing, and when the plants are six or seven years old, they are removed, to make room for a fresh crop, as they are unfit for use. The gatherings take place from one to four times during the year, but much depends upon the age of the shrub. The usual periods are about the middle of April, the rest about midsummer, and the third during August or September.

The leaves obtained from the first gathering are the most delicate, as regards flavour, aroma, and colour, and are more fleshy; that is to say, they do not contain so much fibre, and moreover are less bitter. The second gathering affords a less valuable quality, the leaves having a dull green colour, and less aroma and flavour than the first crop. The third and last gathering are inferior in every respect, and the leaves have a dark green hue.

It will thus be seen that the quality of our tea is influenced considerably by age, climate, time of gathering, and soil; the plants that are most exposed and youngest producing the best and most valuable crops.

The Chinese exercise some little cunning even in gathering tea; for it so happens that some of the finest trees grow on the steep declivities of hills or mountains, which are exceedingly dangerous to ascend, and in some instances it is utterly impracticable to collect them. The natives irritate the monkeys which inhabit these cliffs, by throwing stones and other missiles at them, and the animals in return break off the branches, and pelt their assailants with them, and by this means the difficulty is overcome.

As soon as the leaves are gathered, they are thrown into wide, shallow baskets, and placed in the sunshine, current of air, or wind, for some time to dry them, which process should be effected as soon as possible after gathering.

The drying houses contain from five to ten or twenty small furnaces, three feet high, each having at the top a large, flat cast-iron pan. The furnaces are heated with charcoal, and each pan is calculated to hold only from a half to three-quarters of a pound of leaves during the process of drying. When the drying-pan has attained the required degree of heat, the leaves are placed in it, and commence crackling as soon as they touch the pan; they are then kept in a constant state of motion the whole time, by the operator shifting them with his bare hands, till the heat becomes too great to be endured easily, when they are quickly and dexterously swept off into baskets, and carried to the rolling table. This is a low bench covered with mats, on which the leaves are laid and rolled by the rollers, who, sitting round it, take a small quantity at a time in the palms of their hands, and roll in one direction, while others are fanning them, so that they may cool as speedily as possible, and retain their curl and aroma the longer. When thus rolled they are again put into the pan, but in larger quantities than the first time, and heated anew, though at a lower temperature, only just sufficient to dry without scorching the leaves. Sometimes, though not always, this process is repeated three or more times, previous to the leaves being stored, so that all the moisture may be got rid of, and a good curl established, for much depends upon these two, as regards the preservation and appearance of the tea.

When sufficiently and properly dried, the whole batch is placed upon another table and submitted to the pickers, who abstract all imperfectly dried or unsightly leaves, over-dried leaves, stems, etc., and then separating it into different kinds, it is packed or stored for use or exportation. After being stored for some months, it is taken out and dried again over a very gentle fire, and re-packed. All tea brought down to Canton, is re-dried and packed, previous to exportation.

Notwithstanding its extensive use in Europe, tea is of comparatively modern introduction. Soliman, an Arabian merchant, who visited China in the ninth century, mentions it as the usual drink of the people of that country, but we discover no mention of it from that time to the end of the sixteenth century. In 1660, tea is alluded to in an English act of Parliament, which lays a duty of eight-pence a gallon on all tea and chocolate. Old Samuel Pepys in his Diary mentions having sent for "a cup of tea (a Chinese drink), of which I never drank before." Europe is indebted for its introduction to the Dutch East India Company, and from Amsterdam it was imported to London. The amount of tea imported to England in 1856—the last year for which we are able to find statistics—was 86,159,517 pounds. Well has Tate remarked of a gossip over a cup of tea:—

"When in discourse of Nature's mystic powers—
And noblest themes we pass the well-spent hours;
Whilst all around the Virtues—sacred band,
And listening Graces, pleased attendants stand.
Thus our tea conversations we employ.
Where, with delight, instructions we enjoy,
Quaffing, without the waste of time or wealth,
The sovereign drink of pleasure and of health."

THE GREEN COLOUR OF PLANTS.—The production of green colouring matter in the leaves of plants, under the influence of the electric light, is very curious. Plants grown in the dark are known to be colourless, and the greenness of the leaves is always attributed to the action of the sun's rays. It was interesting, therefore, to know if the green matter which young leaves develop so freely in the sunshine, would be produced equally under the influence of the strong light of electric lamps. Through the assistance of M. Allard, the head of the French Lighthouse Establishment, the desired means for the experiment was obtained. The electricity was produced by an electro-magnetic machine worked by a steam-engine, and the light obtained from coke-points. In a space perfectly dark, about a metre from the lamp, small flower-pots were placed, each containing four seeds. In a few days the shoots of the young plants were seen tipped with green at their summits. As the plants grew, their greenness became more and more evident, and they all turned towards the light. Like plants grown at the same time in the dark, for comparison, appeared completely yellow; and it was thus seen that the light emanating from electro-magnetic machines has the same influence as the solar light on the green colour of plants.

A TALE OF THE BORDER.

IN the delightful, "good old times," when the citizens of the world enjoyed the generous privilege of cracking each other's crowns and cutting each other's throats with perfect impunity—so far as the law of the land was concerned—freebooting was among the most money-making professions of the day. At a certain period of those Arcadian times, a band of freebooters ranged that debateable ground which lies between the rivers Tyne and Tweed, and levied black mail, chiefly upon the fortunate inhabitants of Northumberland. This troop was commanded by a man whose wonderful and daring exploits in arms, and fertility of resources, had raised him to his present dignity of captain, and who was commonly known by the name of the Border King. Who the Border King was, or whence he came, was entirely unknown, even to the members of his own troop, for he never appeared in public without having his face covered with a mask of dark cloth. This imparted a mystery to his character which caused him to be regarded with awe and terror by all who beheld him, and in no small degree tended to bestow upon him that absolute command which he exercised over his lawless associates. For days, and sometimes for weeks, the Border King would absent himself from his band, yet none dared to question his actions, nor to pry into his secrets. Suddenly and secretly he would disappear from amongst his companions in arms; and with equal suddenness and secrecy would he appear amongst them again. His re-appearance was invariably the signal for action, as he always returned with correct information as to where a fortress might be attacked with success, and booty obtained.

It was after one of these periods of absence, that, on a fine morning in June, the Border King presented himself in the camp of his followers, and gave orders for immediate preparation for a march of some twenty miles. In less than an hour the bandit troop was in "battle's magnificently stern array," with the Border King at its head. Some were mounted on horses and carried lances and sabres; others ran on foot with matchlocks slung over their backs, and short swords hanging at their sides. The Border King himself was mounted on a steed of great power and beauty, and caparisoned in the richest style of the time. The rider was dressed also with great splendour. On his head he wore a high conical hat, over his face the inseparable veil of black cloth, and around his neck the ruff which was worn in the days of James I. His body was protected by a cuirass which glittered in the light of the morning sun. A cloak of fine cloth was thrown over his shoulder, the folds of which fell gracefully on the flanks of his horse. His legs were encased in leather boots, and a sword was suspended from his side. Leaving the troop of lawless borderers on their march, we must precede them to the castle which was the object of their meditated attack.

Castle Hamilton was one of those princely piles which are at once a pride and a characteristic of England. Its battlements and turrets rose above the surrounding woods, and looked like grim sentinels keeping guard over the adjoining country. The possessor of this princely residence, at the time of which we speak, was Sir Reginald Hamilton, a knight-banneret, who had won much fame and wealth in camp and council, and who had, but a few months before the time our story opens, taken to wife one of the most beautiful and wealthy heiresses that England could boast. The only member of the family, besides Sir Reginald and his lady, who resided in the castle, was Archibald Hamilton, brother of Sir Reginald, and two years his junior.

Whilst the elder brother had been fighting the battle for love and glory in camp and field, Archibald had been pursuing studies of a very different kind, and was, at the time of which we write, accounted one of the most accomplished scholars in the kingdom. His brother said that his clerical acquirements had carried off his wits, for not only was Archibald a great linguist, mathematician, anatomist, geologist, etc., but he also appeared to believe in alchemy, and, upon more than one occasion, expressed an enthusiastic hope of being able, ultimately, to discover the philosopher's stone.

Archibald, like his brother, was of a gentle disposition and amiable manners. He was brave, too; his bravery, however, never exhibiting itself in angry bursts, but in a calm and dignified manner which won him general respect. He was master of every weapon, and was especially adroit with the sword.

About eleven o'clock in the morning, when our story opens, Sir Reginald and his beautiful bride might be seen walking in the grounds of Castle Hamilton, some distance from the building. They were conversing playfully on those subjects which always make their way into the minds of lovers.

"But," the Lady Edith said, turning suddenly to her husband, "you recollect my sister Eleanor will be here to-day, and I am anxious that she and Archibald should meet. It is awkward his going away at this moment."

"Nobody could dissuade him, my love. Truly his botanical propensities are almost as preposterous as they are ridiculous. But they are so innocent that one cannot object to his indulging them. He promised me, however, to return to-morrow, and will therefore have full opportunity of enjoying Eleanor's society."

At this moment the sounds of horses' hoofs ringing on the pavement struck their ears, and Sir Reginald exclaimed:—

"By my troth! this must be she. She is much earlier than I expected, and, if my ears deceive me not, attended by a numerous court. Let us proceed to meet them."

Drawing the Lady Edith's arm within his own, he proceeded in the direction of the sounds of the approaching horses, which each moment became more and more distinct. As Sir Reginald and Edith emerged from a shrubbery into the main avenue leading to the castle, they came upon a body of visitors less welcome than those they expected to behold. The new-comers were about thirty in number, and all armed for strife. About ten yards in advance of this body rode our acquaintance, the Border King, who, on beholding Sir Reginald and his bride, reined up his steed so suddenly that the animal was forced back almost upon his haunches. At a wave of the captain's hand, too, the entire body of cavalry reined up in like manner.

Sir Reginald, advancing a few steps towards the leader of the party, and placing his hand upon his sword said—

"Who art thou, sir, and by what right dost thou intrude on my privacy?"

The person addressed made no reply, but raising to his lips a silver whistle, which hung suspended from his neck, he uttered a shrill note, and, as if by magic, twenty men, on foot, issued from the wood. Sir Reginald had merely time to draw his sword when he was pinioned and disarmed. The Lady Edith, on witnessing the attack made upon her lord, uttered a loud shriek and fell senseless on the sword.

"No violence," exclaimed the Border-King, in a deep, distinct voice. "Bind Sir Reginald, and bear him towards the Castle. I will take care of the lady."

"Villain!" cried Sir Reginald. "Monstrous, cowardly villain! By Heaven! you shall pay dear for this."

The Border King did not appear to take any notice of this; but springing lightly from his horse, he approached the fainting lady, whose head he raised with the utmost gentleness, and applied to her temples the water which had been brought by his directions from a neighbouring brook.

Meantime Sir Reginald was lifted in the arms of four sturdy fellows and borne rapidly away, notwithstanding all his struggles to break loose. When he was hidden from view, the Border King again raised his voice; addressing the troop that stood silently by, he said—

"We have not now time to attack the castle. The alarm is already given, and Sir Reginald's brother is no doubt by this time collecting the retainers, and organising a stubborn defence. As there is a body of royal troops in the vicinity, they would be down upon us before we could effect a capture. Here," he added throwing a weighty purse on the ground, "take that, to make up for your disappointment."

A cheer arose from the troop at the sight of the gold, which was instantly checked by the Border King.

"Silence!" he exclaimed; "Begone, at once; and meet me six days hence, at our home in the Cheviots."

Without a murmur, the order was obeyed. After picking up the money, this troop of desperate marauders turned, and quickly disappeared through the woods.

Directing his attention once again to the lady, the Border King raised her gently in his arms, and bore her away as though she were a child. Entering an avenue in the wood, he proceeded at a rapid pace until he reached a small turretted building, which had been raised by Sir Reginald's father, to gratify a caprice of his lady, who spent much of her time in fitting it up with great splendour. Since the good lady's death, the little building had fallen into disuse, and now only served as a memorial of a generation that had just passed away. Leaving the Border King with his precious burden at the door of this building, we must beg our readers to return with us to Sir Reginald, who was determined to recover his bride, and awaited with impatience the slowly approaching night. At length the shadows began to lengthen into giants, and the western heavens were beaten into "flakes of fire." Near the castle a little brook ran, and as Sir Reginald crossed the bridge that spanned it, its waters played with the moonbeams which tipped with silver its thousand little waves. Perceiving a light flicker through the trees some distance from him, Sir Reginald concealed himself in a neighbouring plantation. He had scarcely taken this post when a man issued from the opposite wood, bearing in one hand a dark lantern, and in the other a basket. In a moment Sir Reginald recognized him; it was the Border King. His first impulse was to rush upon the wretch who had carried away his wife, but his better sense coming to his counsel, he checked himself, and determined to watch the motions of his enemy.

"I thought so," he muttered. "I thought the mysterious villain would remain here, thinking to throw me off my guard. Now, our Lady of Grace assist me to recover my Edith!"

Keeping in the shadow of the trees Sir Reginald followed, with cautious steps, the Border King, who proceeded at a rapid pace along the margin of the stream, in the direction of the turret where we left him this morning. On reaching the building the maulauder set his lamp upon the ground, and placing his finger on one of the nails with which the door was studded, he pressed it for an instant, and the door flew open. Passing in at once he closed the entrance after him. Sir Reginald did not delay long to follow the example thus set him; and passing into the building in like manner, he found himself in a long vaulted passage, at the end of which he distinguished a light. Walking stealthily along in the direction of the light, he, in a few moments was in a position to observe a large room furnished in a style of luxury almost oriental.

There were two figures in the chamber, one that of a female seated at a table with her head buried in her hands over which the auburn tresses fell in rich profusion. On beholding her Sir Reginald started, and for a moment trembled violently; but recovering himself immediately, he set his teeth firmly, and remained an anxious spectator of the scene. The second figure was that of the Border King, who stood in a respectful attitude regarding the lady Edith, for the female was no other than she. The Border King had removed his mask, which he held in his hand, but his back being turned towards the door, Sir Reginald was unable to see his face. After some time the freebooter took from the basket which he carried some viands and wine, which he spread upon the table before Lady Edith. Then addressing her he said,—

"Lady, let me implore you to partake of some nourishment."

"Leave me," she replied, in a tone of deep anguish, "for Heaven's sake leave me."

"I will obey you, Edith," he answered, "and remember that I have never forced my society upon you when you desired my absence. I will leave you now for the night; but let me beseech of you to re-consider your reply to my prayer. My love is as pure as, and ten thousand times more lasting than that which Sir Reginald bears you. I will ever cherish you like my own life. Consent to fly with me, dear—dear Edith, and my whole life shall be devoted to the gratification of your every wish. The countless riches that I have spent years in collecting, by every means, shall win us a proud and honourable position in a foreign land, where you shall reign as an empress, and be worshipped as a goddess."

A deep groan from the person he addressed was his only reply.

"Edith," he proceeded, "have no fear from me, for I love you too sacredly ever to wrong you, even in thought; but it is well at the same time, you should learn that you can never quit this place save on the terms I propose. I leave you now, Edith, hoping you will have altered your resolution by the morrow. Good night, good night!"

Turning to depart the Border King faced Sir Reginald, who, on beholding him, gasped in an almost audible tone—

"Heaven and earth, my brother!"

And, indeed, the Border King was no other than Archibald Hamilton.

Quitting the chamber with a slow and stately step, the Border King almost brushed against Sir Reginald in passing. The latter remained quiet until he heard the steps of his brother die into an echo. Then advancing cautiously into the chamber, he laid his hand gently on the shoulder of his wife, who started at the touch; and, on raising her eyes to his, uttered a low shriek and sprang to his supporting arms.

Whispering words of comfort and encouragement Sir Reginald led her towards the door by which he had entered, and passing into the open air, he almost carried his beautiful bride towards his mansion. In about half an hour they reached Castle Hamilton, where they were welcomed with rapturous joy by their retainers.

The Border King was never seen or heard of again; and his name was never mentioned before strangers by either Sir Reginald or his lady. The band which he had with such ability commanded, being deprived of direction, was in a short time broken and utterly destroyed. Archibald Hamilton, had, it was hinted, entered the service of the King of France, in which he won, by his daring courage and politic wisdom, great honours. He never returned to England; and ended his life like a true soldier, upon the field of battle. Sir Reginald and Lady Edith Hamilton lived to rear a numerous and amiable family, to whom the father bequeathed his great wealth, and the mother her spotless virtue.

MIS-DIRECTED FRIENDSHIP.—All our friends, perhaps, desire our happiness; but then it must be in their own way. What a pity that they do not employ the same zeal in making us happy in ours!

SULL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER I.

IT is a very usual remark among those who pretend to be acquainted with the condition of Irish society, that it is a land more favourable to the stranger than to the native—that the foreign adventurer finds the various avenues to good fortune which it presents less encumbered and blocked up with difficulties and disappointments, than the indigenous children of the soil; and this observation appears to be equally confirmed by experience, whether it is applied to the humble artisan who confines his hopes and prospects to the acquisition of the ordinary comforts of domestic life, or to the armed aggressor who comes to conquer and lay waste for conquest's sake alone. To endeavour, even by conjecture, to account satisfactorily for this—one of the very slightest among the anomalies of the country's polity—would lead to a disquisition on national dispositions and habits, and an inquiry into historical influences, into which we are not at present disposed to enter. The most obvious and usual cause assigned, however, is the superior industry and perseverance of the naturalized inhabitant.

One class of persons in particular have verified the observation to its utmost extent. We allude to the descendants of those emigrants from the Palatinate of Germany, who were invited over into these countries by the liberal policy of the Whig ministry of 1708, a measure which afterwards gave such displeasure in England, and drew down so weighty a censure from the succeeding cabinet of 1710. History informs us, that at this period the indigence and misery which prevailed among the disappointed aliens was such, as to occasion a not ill-founded apprehension of a contagious distemper—no less than ninety of them being accustomed to take up their abode beneath a single roof, in some of the lowest neighbourhoods of the British metropolis.

In the sister isle, nevertheless, the exertions of the same race have been attended with incomparably better success. Unmingled and uninterested as the adventurers necessarily were with the politics and the factious prejudices of the people, and having no internal or external cause to divert them from the even course of steady and persevering industry, which their habits and inclinations suggested to them as the most likely to attain success, they were in every way prepared to take advantage of the encouragements held out to them by the landed proprietor. These were, as they still continue to be, very considerable—and this circumstance, together with the difference of religion, of disposition, and of civil habits, laid the foundation of a deep and rooted hatred and jealousy, which the moral and political changes that have, since the first introduction of the aliens, taken place in the relations of the country, have contributed rather to increase and confirm than to alleviate. The Palatines, or Palentins, as they are more usually termed among their rustic neighbours, still continue to be favourites with the lords of the soil. The facility with which they obtained long leases, at a time when the great proportion of the peasantry of the country were mere cottiers to farmers, enabled them to turn their knowledge of husbandry to great account; and although their hopper-plough (which answered the double purpose of ploughing and sowing) has, I believe, generally gone out of use, their custom of producing crops in drills is still almost universally adopted. They are improving and industrious tenants—punctual, whether for the preservation of their independence, or the satisfaction of their consciences, in all their engagements—attentive, even to a degree of puritanical exactness, to their religious obligations—presenting, in the unremitting exertion which they employ in the acquisition of money, and the caution which they manifest in its distribution, a striking contrast to the people among whom they have become naturalized—(a contrast which, perhaps, as much as any other circumstance, tends to foster the contempt with which they are regarded by the latter)—precise in all that regards their domestic economy—addicted to neatness and to the appearance as well as the feeling of comfort in their houses, and imbued in heart and soul with a tincture of religious bigotry and national prejudice which enables them to return, with ample interest, the evil feelings and wishes of the low Catholic population of the country.

Assuming the above to be the general characteristics of the class we are describing, it may, perhaps, be added that there are many individual exceptions; but even where members of the caste are found to derogate from its usually respectable character, it is seldom, perhaps never, observed that they fall into what are looked upon as the peculiar or ruling vices of the more ancient inhabitants, and there remains as wide a distinction between the bad Palatine and the bad Irishman, as may be traced between the estimable and amiable of both classes. Like the scattered sons of Israel, the former are careful to prevent any amalgamation of interests or affections with their neighbours, and the circumstance of an inter-marriage is, to say the least of it, an exceedingly rare occurrence. People may be found to adduce this fact as one cause of the continued prosperity and happiness of the provident aliens—but a more satisfactory one may be found in the inducements held out to, and consequent success attending, their exertions. The Palatines, in short, are amongst those who “feed fat” upon the birth-right of their elder brethren, who are, by the peculiar policy of their governors, debarred the customary means of existence, and punished for endeavouring to devise new expedients for themselves.

Time, the great alchemist by which all incongruities are reconciled and all distinctions amalgamated, has not yet exercised its customary influence on the hereditary habits and external peculiarities of the people we are describing. They still retain, even in their manners and language, as well as in their character and disposition, indications which it would be impossible to misconceive, of their German origin. They are, for the most part, scattered thinly over the southern and western districts of the island—but instances are not wanted in which they form the most exclusive population of hamlets and small villages—and where this happens to be the case, the traces of their extraction are evident and decided to a very remarkable degree.

At the time when the events which we have selected as the material for the following tale took place—in the eighteenth century—the points of distinction were, as may be supposed, a great deal more striking; and the comparative novelty of their introduction into the country, rendered them more liable than at present to the resentment of the indignant peasantry of the island, although the dislike of the latter was not more deeply rooted than at present. There was, however, a distinction. It was then the hatred of injured and excited feelings which was cherished against the usurpers; it is now the hatred of prejudice, and of an almost excusable—at least, a very accountable envy.

We have, ourselves, found a little generalizing explanation so useful and agreeable as a preparation for the introduction of characters and events in a work of this kind, that we are induced to calculate with confidence on the indulgence of our readers in devoting this short chapter to the same purpose.

A number of peasants were occupied in trenching a field of potatoes, in a fine soft summer evening, in the earlier portion of the last century, on the borders of one of the south-western counties of Ireland. Their work proceeded merrily—all being engaged, as is customary in Ireland, in relieving the tediousness of their monotonous labour by wild tales, and light and jocular conversation, which we shall take up at random.

“An’ so you tell me Segur is off, Mick?” said one to a young peasant who worked beside him.

“He never ‘ll see daylight again,” was the reply.

“An’ how coom that?”

“Simple enough—be killen of ‘m.”

“Who kilt him?”

“Oh then that’s more than I’ll tell you this time—one o’ the gang aistwards they say.”

“An’ why did they kill him?”

“Sorrow one o’ me knows—bekays he was alive, may be.”

“It’s little hurt it was done, an’ little matter who done it,” said a dark-looking man on another ridge; and biting his lip hard, while he struck his spade with great violence against a large sod, he added—“an the same loock to the rest of his race, an’ that before long—the left-handed thieves—them Palentina!”

“You might as well be cursing, Davy.”

“D’ye hear the minister?”

“It’s done a fi’penny bit with you, now, we have a fable from Jerry on the head of it,” was uttered half aside, a few paces from the last speaker—a fair-faced youth, who almost immediately verified the anticipation.

“I’ll tell ye a story, then, about that very thing, if ye like to hear it,” said the young fellow.

After a few jibes on the propensity of the story-telling genius, his companions proceeded with their work in silence, while Jerry cleared his voice and commenced as follows:—

“I wonder entirely,” says a learned doctor, that used to be there in old times—“I wonder entirely,” said he, and he going along the road—“what is the reason that the devil doesn’t come upon the earth in some borrowed shape or another, and so tempt people to sin; it would be so much easier to talk them into it than to draw them by means of their own thoughts. If the devil would hearken to me, I think I could put him in a way of getting a deal that’s voted to him, and that he knows nothing of.” And saying this he turned off to take a short cut across the fields, the road having a great round in that place.

Passing by a little fort that was in his way, he was met by a man who came out from among the trees and bid him a good morning. He was as handsome a man as could be—only the doctor remarked him for the smallest brogues, and of the queerest shape that could be imagined.

“Heaven and Saint Patrick be with you!” says the doctor.

“Hum!” says the strange man.

“And who are you that say ‘Hum!’ when I bid Heaven be with you?” says the doctor, looking down towards his heels, where he saw, just peeping out under the great riding-coat, something like the end of a hurly, curling, only very hairy.

“I am the devil,” says the strange man. (Lord between us and harm!)

“I was beginning to have a notion of the kind myself,” says the doctor, again eyeing the tail now very hard; but not at all put out of his way, being used to all sorts of wickedness himself from a creature up, having been once in his time a tithe proctor. “I thought no less; and it proves an old saying very true, for I was talking of you to myself just as you started up before me.”

“No good, I’ll be bail.”

“Believe it, then. No good in the world, only harm. I was wishing that you would employ me in collecting your dues—what’s yours by right only, and let us go halves in the profits.”

“It’s a match—give me the hand,” said the devil. “Let us go along the road together, and whatever you make out to be mine, I’ll have it surely.”

"Away they went, the holy pair, and they soon got out upon the high road again. As they were passing along by a cabin door, they saw an old woman standing with some oats in her apron, and she trying to entice some of her geese and goslings into her, from the middle of a pond where they were swimming about, only the rogue of a gander wouldn't let them do her bidding.

"Why then," says the old woman, "the Diconce take you for one gander; there's no ho at all with you."

"There!" says the doctor, nudging his neighbour, (Lord save us!) "did you hear that?"

"Ah! my honest friend," says the devil, "that gander is a fat bird, to be sure—but 'tis none o' mine still. That curse didn't come from the heart, though it was sinful enough to give me power over the woman."

"In a little time after, the blessed couple were met by a countryman with a little slip of a pig that he was driving to the fair, to make up the defference o' the standing gale. He had a suggan (hay-rope) tied about one of the hind legs, and a good blackthorn switch in his hand, and he doing his best endeavours to entice him on, but he couldn't. The pig, as young pigs will do, darted now at this side, now at that, and would run every way but the right, one—until at last he made a start right between the legs of his driver, tumbled him clean in the mud, from which he rose, painted all sorts o' colours—and saw the pig skelping along the road home, in the height of good humour.

"Why then, the Diconce take, fetch, and carry every bone in your carcase, crubes and all! says the poor man, shaking himself, and turning into a meadow to roll himself in the grass, before he'd jolly the creature home again. "Have I all my morning's work to do over again—bad 'cess to it for a story!"

"There! there!" cries the doctor.

"Not so fast," cries the devil—"that was but a slip o' the tongue after all. The man that curst is mine, but not the thing he curst, for the heart was not concerned in it."

"Well! away they went; and, in passing by a potato-field, they saw a tithe-proctor valuin' a pit o' the cups, and a man standing upon it, with a hammer in his hand, going to cant it off to some Palatins for the rent. There was a poor man standing at the road's end, with his arms leaning on the ditch, looking at the sale of his little property.

"There's ten barrels, all going for an old song, that I raised by the labour of these hands. May the Diconce fetch all the tithe-proctors in the land, and Heaven bless them that sent 'em to us, to take the little means he gave us out of our hands—"

"Well!" said the doctor, "now you have a proctor at any rate—that was a hearty curse I'm sure."

"At this, the devil put both his hands to his sides and burst out in a fit of laughing. "Send you sense! you foolish man," said he, "if the devil had nothing else to do but to carry away all the tithe-proctors that's vote! to him in a summer's-day, he'd be soon compelled to look out for a new corner to take up in, for they'd have all hell to themselves in less than no time."

"Whew!" said the doctor, "if this be the way with you, I'm likely to make a great deal by my bargain. Get out o' my way, you lazy gaffer," said he (growing cross) to a little boy that was sitting on a stile where he wanted to pass.

"I'm no lazy gaffer, you great natural," said the lad, "and I'll not stir out of this, for you have no right to trespass on my mother's ground."

The doctor made no answer, only looked at him for a minute, and then rix his stick, and laid him on the ground quite easy.

"Oh, murder alive! you Turk, you killed my boy," cried the mother, who was sitting combing her wool at the cabin door. "Why then," said she, falling on her knees, and lifting up her two hands, "the mother's curse upon your head; and may the Diconce carry you this night, for drawing the blood of my child!"

"Come, my good man, come!" said the devil, seizing the doctor by the collar, "the favour o' your company down bzhov. The mother's curse is on you."

"Oh! nonsense, nonsense! easy, easy, man!" said the doctor, "but—"

"Before he could well know what he was about, his friend whisked him up and about into the air, and warm was the corner he had for him before night, I'll be your bail."

"Well, Jerry, you bate cockfichtin' for them ould fables; but aisy, an' tell me who are those over the hill?"

The speaker pointed to three horsemen who had just turned from beneath the projection of a small hillock, through which the wild and broken highway had been cut, and who were pushing on with as much rapidity as their ill-conditioned horses could be prevailed upon to use. The better-mounted and better-looking of the two foremost wayfarers belonged to that numerous class of itinerant preachers, one of whom may at this day be always discerned in fine harvest weather, hovering about the Palatine villages, and may be recognised at the distance of half a mile, jogging it softly down hill on a well-fed, fat-hammed, rough-coated pony, an umbrella tightly folded and placed in rest upon the thigh, while the smooth and glazed oil cover of his hat flashes at the same time throwing his perhaps too jovial rotundity of countenance into a becoming and devotional shade. The specimen of the order here presented differed but little from the generality of his brethren. He was a person of immense proportions, particularly as regarded the paunch, which was a region of unparalleled richness and extent, and showed to particular advantage as he sat on horseback, his position there causing it to project considerably farther in advance than was its natural wont when on foot. His pony was a sturdy little animal, but of stature so diminutive, that the feet of the rider might have materially assisted his progress along the road, were it not that the sack-like formation of the members caused them to describe an equilateral triangle, in order to afford space to the fat little beast between—an arrangement which made a clear course of nearly half the king's highway.

The horseman who rode beside him, and who, from his brick-red complexion, sloping forehead, and small eyes, supplied very sufficient evidence of his Palatine extraction, had the appearance of a wealthy farmer, considerably advanced in years, though not sufficiently so to abate or qualify, in the slightest degree, the expression of a countenance which was marked by the strongest and hardest lines which an habitual violence of character could produce, or to soften the fire of a small and piercing eye, which glanced from beneath its grizzled, sandy brow, with a spirit of strong inquiry and resolution.

The third traveller, who rode at a little distance behind, as if rather in the quality of servant than companion to the other two, we shall suffer to be described by the group of peasantry, who, in the indulgence of that idle curiosity which forms a shade on that dark side of the national character, left off their work as the strangers approached, and leaned forward on their spades, to bestow a gibe on the passing Palatines:—

"Mark the nose," said one, "was there ever the aqi'l of it seen? It starts out betune the two eyes fair enough, only then it do be grown hether and thether, and every way as if it didn't know the way to the mouth, down."

"Like the gentilemin's boreens," said a second, "that they doesn't care how many turnens they'll make, so as they coom out upon the high road at last."

"Taken a ramble about the countenance for sport, this fine even."

"An' the legs! You'd imagine the calves o' them got hungry, and went down about the ankles, seeing would there be a wisp o' hay in the brogues at all."

"Paddy Moran needn't ax a better bow to his fiddle at air a dance in the parish, any way."

"Heaven bless your work!" said the eldest of the travellers, in a strong German accent, not unmingled with a degree of the l road, drawing patois of the people he was addressing, as a turn in the road brought both parties within hail.

"An' you likewise!" was returned by a few voices, while some (such is the influence of wealth) conquered their contempt for the race of usurpers so far as to touch their hats.

"The village of Court-Mattress is fifteen long miles from you yet," said an elderly labourer, in answer to an inquiry made at him by the old Palatine. "Who can them be, now?" he continued, as, after a short consultation, the two strangers put spurs to their steeds, and quickened their pace from an equivocal kind of canter to a jolting, bone-breaking trot—"An' the sarvint after 'em, too! Gondoutha! It's easy for ye! But stir—stir, Jerry; what bizniz is it of ours? an' Paddy Barret six sads a-head of uz, an' the master coming over the gap, see."

We will follow the travellers. The evening was bright, still, and sunny. The air was quiet, the sky cloudless, the calm so profound that the voices of some sportsmen on the distant hills were heard almost as plainly by the wayfarers as if they had been speaking in the adjacent fields, and the sound of the Race, though many miles distant from them, came with a faint, but deep and perceptible influence upon their hearing. It was already far into the season of ear and blossom, and the country side over which they rode presented a scene of beauty and abundance which, had they passed the same way in a few months after, would have formed a wonderful contrast to the general appearance of want and misery which, then as well as now, the great encouragement held out to exporters of provision occasioned in the winter season in Ireland. Here a wide plain covered with barley yet green in ear undulated like a summer lake, and there the potato spread its dark green covering over many an acre, one particle of the produce of which was doomed never, perhaps, to supply a day's sustenance to the wretch by whose labour they had been cultivated. On one hand, the sober wheat contrasted its grave and wealthy air with the light rustling of the oatfield that adjoined it; while further in the distance many a field of rape, already in blossom, showed like broad sheets of gold, inlaid, as if to impart additional splendour to the gigantic mosaic of nature.

After they had passed out of the hearing of the group of the peasants, the two foremost of the travellers resumed a conversation which appeared to have been only interrupted for the purpose of obtaining information as to the progress of their route.

"Indeed, Mr. Shine," said the old man, after he had compressed his lips and given vent to a heavy sigh—"the cause is more than I can tell you: that some change must have taken place, I am perfectly certain, and some unpleasant one, too; for poor Sarah was one of the most dutiful children that ever parent blessed. It is very true that I suspected something when she mentioned in one of her latest letters the appearance of that young ruffian about the village, and my heart burned within me when the poor deluded creature hinted the possibility of his becoming a reformed and graceful member. She might as well talk of the Evil One becoming a reformed and graceful member; for except what amendment the gallows will work in him, Dionysius will never be anything better than an ingrate and a profligate."

"He that can ingraft strange branches on the tree may surely at his pleasure revive the old and disseeded," said his companion. "But the common accidents of life may have caused an intermission in your correspondence without any failure of duty on the part of your child, whom I bless in my soul—remembering well her comeliness, and her docility on the occasion of my sojourning an evening at her aunt's, to whose care, I believe, you committed her, on leaving the land, some years past. How long since is the date of her last letter?"

"Five years."

"And how long have you been absent?"

The question appeared to excite some disagreeable associations in the mind of the old Palatine, and he paused for a considerable time, as if following up the train of melancholy recollections which it awakened, before he returned an answer. The details of the conversation which followed the interruption may be more briefly and conveniently given to the reader in our own words.

A sturdy-looking, black-haired, black-eyed little boy about nine or ten years of age, and clothed in a miserable shred of coarse frieze, was observed, at the blush of a fine summer dawn, trotting at full speed along a crooked and broken-up avenue, or borheen, leading to the farm-house of Isaac Segur, a comfortable Palatine landholder in the neighbourhood of the village which we have before mentioned. From the anxious and hesitating expression which was mingled with the natural boldness and darkness of his countenance, it would have appeared to a stranger that the child was conscious of possessing no apology or authority for the intrusion which he contemplated, and he cast cautious and wavering glances on all sides before he ventured to clamber over the stile which brought him on the neat green plot before the cottage door. The windows were still closed, and everything around bore the appearance of perfect repose, inasmuch that the adventurer paused, and remained seated on the stile for a few moments, with the air of one who has a purpose to accomplish, and sees a thousand terrors and difficulties between him and its fruition. A light curling smoke from one of the chimneys at length caught his eye, and having once assured himself on the preparatory indication within, he bounded from the hedge upon the little lawn, disturbing by his sudden and fay-like descent the yet slumbering animals who composed the stock of the industrious and well-appointed proprietor of the place. A flock of geese, goslings, and ganders flew with outstretched necks and loud hisses of unwelcome from beneath the hedge, and then marshalled themselves in battle array between him and the house, the male bird marching like a field-officer, up and down the lines, and warning him, by most warlike cacklings, of the dangers of an assault. Some newly-shorn wethers bounded in dismay to the furthest limit of the area, and there huddled themselves together in a corner, as if in expectation of instant annihilation. A staggering bony calf threw up its hind legs, whiaked its tail, cut a few strange capers, and followed their example. The little fellow did not appear much daunted by the confusion he had occasioned, or the formidable host of enemies who seemed prepared to oppose his progress, and he was about to advance with great spirit; but his cheek grew pale, and his quick, jet-black eye began to assume a more expanded and watery appearance, when the deep thunder of a huge mastiff watch joined in terrific diapason with the cackling of the geese, the bleating of sheep, the quacking of ducks, the grunting of pigs, and the clatter of a hundred different species of domestic fowl. Nevertheless, the invader stood manfully to his ground, and stooped forward in the vain hope of making an effectual struggle with the excited animal, on whom his eyes were fixed, when one of the front windows was thrown open, and a friendly voice interrupted its onset in good time.

"Faust, down! down, ser! back here agen—back!"

The countermmand was given by a female who leaned half-dressed out of the window, while the young stranger, flushing with renewed courage, advanced to the door of the cottage, the dog Faust following, and snuffing inquisitively about him as they proceeded.

"Well, an' who are you, my little fellow?"

The "little fellow" raised his hand to his brow, and plucked himself by the forelock (a black and shining curl), in token of courtesy, as he replied—

"Dinny Mac, thin."

"An' what brought you here, Dinny Mac, at this hour of the morning?"

"Wisha, I dun know."

"Where do you live—or who are you at all?"

"O then, I dun know, ma'am—only my mother, westwards married another husband about a month sence, and I couldn't stand her at all after for beating me without any reason; and the man she took to was as bad as her, and they both tuk an' turned me out o' doores 'istherday, without sayen a word, only bating me, the two of 'em, wit the broomstick till my back was broke intirely."

"And what do you mean to do with yourself now, Dinny Mac?"

"Wisha, I dun know."

"What is it you were coming here for?"

"Seeing would I get me buckisht agin the road."

By this time the cottage door was opened, and a stout-looking hale man made his appearance, accompanied by an exquisitely beautiful girl, whose clear rosy cheeks, long flaxen hair, and full, well-opened eyes, contrasted finely with the strongly-marked and darkly-shaded features of the adventurous "Dinny." The latter remained leaning against the rough-cast wall, and picking off the little protuberances with his fingers, while he cast from time to time a shy and irresolute side-glance towards the fair daughter of the farmer. The man contemplated the intruder for some time in silence, and appeared doubtful of the course which he should adopt, when it was decided by a movement of the child who stood by him. After gazing with a soft and expanded stare of wonder upon the dark boy, she slid cautiously towards him, and again renewing her gaze of admiration, while the other returned her glance with one of unusual fire and intensity; half in intimidation, half in good-will, the little girl protruded a pair of cherry lips, which were instantly honoured with a greeting that "came twanging off," by the unhesitating youth. The old Palatine's heart was struck in the soft place.

"Come, gaffer," said he, "since you have made yourself welcome with the young mistress, you'll have your breakfast at any rate. In with you, and behave yourself."

JAPAN AS WE KNEW IT.

JAPAN, as we knew it some twenty-nine years ago, when the Dutch monopolised the export trade of the country, was a land more marvellous than that moon to which Mr. Edgar Poe's Dutch debtor paid so opportune a visit. No region of romance, no realm of fairy, furnished us with such extravagant fictions. The stories which Bruce related of the wild tribes of Abyssinia seemed like common-sense realities to the descriptions of a country where the men wore petticoats, and the women blackened their teeth; where people adopted white as a mourning colour, and everyone believed that the islands of Japan were formed from the froth of the original creative concrete. Time has reconciled us to many of those peculiarities; and though we are not yet sufficiently credulous to accept the gorilla on the almost unsupported testimony of a solitary explorer and a collection of skins and skeletons, we have learned to believe that other nations have an undoubted right to use their teeth, and mount their horses, and build their houses, just as it suits their taste and convenience. It was only in the beginning of the last season, that, amongst the old heap of information which turned up in Mr. Gladstone's budget, the public at large were told for the first time, that the Japanese build houses and roof them with paper; that a gentleman of that clime wears a paper shirt, and carries a paper handkerchief in his pocket. Everyone was astonished; but there was the truth, ridiculous as it might seem to persons acquainted only with the conventionalities of European society. Within a very few years our knowledge of Japan, thanks to the industry of men of letters and the establishment of diplomatic relations with its jealous government, has increased at a rate which is being accelerated day after day. We know something of the internal economy of the people: and our geographical knowledge is no longer confined to a barren coast outline, and the positions of a few remarkable cities. A month ago, an eminent English consul gave us his experience of the country, in an elegant volume. Let us see what we knew of the Islands of Tea and Lacquer in 1829.

Japan consists of one great Island (Nippon), and the southern part of the peninsula of Sagaleen. This survey is altogether independent of the numerous islands, small and large, which are scattered around the main trunk of the empire. Stretching from the thirty-first to nearly the forty-sixth degree of north latitude, it comprehends almost every variety of climate and every species of production. The winters are very severe, even in the two latitudes; and this circumstance has furnished the basis of many a profitable discussion on the peculiarities of climate. Contrasting the relative temperature of the Japanese possessions with that of the countries of the western hemisphere, under the same degrees of latitude, the explorers of 1829 told us, that the difference was so enormous as to be almost incredible. Matamai lies in the forty-second degree of latitude, and is therefore on a parallel with Leghorn, Bilbao, and Toulon. It is notorious that the inhabitants of those places hardly know what frost is, and never see snow except on the cool tops of the highest mountains. In Matamai all those conditions of temperature are reversed. The ponds and lakes are frozen to the depth of several feet soon after winter sets in; from November till April, the snow, of which the annual fall is inconveniently abundant, lies in the valleys and on the plains, and the streets are as impassable as those of St. Petersburg. Some idea of the severity of the weather may be formed from the fact that the cold often registers fifteen degrees of Reaumur. Then comes summer, and whilst the western inhabitants of a corresponding latitude enjoy serene days and cloudless nights, our poor Japanese are drenched with rains, which descend in such vast quantities, that the scriptural description, "the flood gates of heaven were opened," threatens for the time being to be realized. The horizon is piled up with mountains of black cloud, violent winds blow constantly from the north-east, and a fog, only equalled in London, obscures the sun for days. Then again, the westerns have their oranges, lemons, figs, and grapes; but the poor Japanese must content themselves with apples, pears, and peaches, half ripe and wholly indigestible. Improbable as it must have seemed, we were told that in Jeddo, the seat of empire, situated in the thirty-sixth degree of latitude, snow falls in the winter nights to the depth of a foot or more. By the way, this statement has long since received a fundamental correction, and the quantity of snow been reduced from a foot to an inch. Curiously enough, the snow melts every night, only to be renewed the day after; and this in a city under the same latitude as Malaga! Surely people were not wrong in asserting that the eastern was much ruder than the western climate. But Sagaleen has in reserve for us something still more wonderful. There the snow is thawed to the depth of a foot and a half in the summer, although its latitude almost corresponds with that of Lyons. Sailing off the Kurch island of Roschava (latitude forty-seven degrees), people met with immense fields of ice, although none is to be seen at that time of the year in the Gulf of Finland.

The national (or, perhaps, we should write in digenous) cosmogony of the Japanese is, to say the least, remarkable. Above all things they treat with contempt the theory which assigns to them a Chinese extraction, preferring to be derived from the Manchous, who inhabit the eastern coasts of Tartary to the north of the Great Wall. They relate a tradition of a time when the entire surface of the earth was covered with water, in which condition it remained for innumerable ages, undergoing no change, as Tenko Sama (the ruler of heaven) was enraged, and would not cast an eye on it. When cycle upon cycle had lapsed away, Tenko's eldest son, Kami, obtained leave to put the world in order. To do this he procured a staff to fathom the depth of the incumbent mass, and having plunged it into the lifeless waters, found that they were shallowest in that spot where Japan is situated. Going down to the bottom of the sea, he heaved up a portion of the bed sufficient to form the island of Nippon, which he adorned with all the natural productions which still flourish there. Then dividing himself into two beings of different sexes, he peopled the new country. Stimulated by their brother's example, other sons of Tenko made islands in other parts of the world, peopling them in the same manner. Here the narrator digresses to tell us that, though Kami's brothers wrought with all possible will and energy, they lacked his skill and ingenuity, and consequently in their creation of land and occupant, failed to reach the same degree of perfection; for which reason the Japanese are superior to all other races of the world; and the lacquer, and chairs, and tables they make, and the houses they build, infinitely better than the lacquer, and chairs, and tables, and houses which come from the hands of all other artificers. The staff, by the way, still exists in the shape of an evergreen tree, in one of the loftiest mountains in the island of Nippon. The doctors are not quite agreed in their acceptance of this cosmogony, some holding that at the beginning of the world the first of seven celestial spirits arranged the chaos, or confused mass of land and sea; and from the end of the rod with which this function was performed, there fell a muddy froth, which condensed, and formed the islands of Japan.

As for the national religion, strictly speaking, it was distributed through four distinct systems. One comprised the adoration of immortal Spirits, or children of the Highest Being. Temples, vast and magnificent, we are told, are erected in their honour, and the worship is carried out on a scale of peculiar pomp. That Christianity was introduced into the country at a very early period, there is safe foundation for believing. The second religious system was borrowed from the Brahmins; and the facts connected with it evidence in an extraordinary manner the rapid diffusion of Christianity, soon after it was established, to the eastward of India. About the year A. D. 55 (as closely as can be ascertained from the Japanese chronology) Minti, Emperor of China, heard of an Indian sect, called Xaca. Curiosity induced him to send for one of its disciples, whom he interrogated respecting the doctrines, discipline, &c., of the sect; and the result gratified him so far that he sent ambassadors into India to acquire a perfect knowledge of the Xaca's tenets. When the ambassadors returned home in A. D. 62, they found the Xacas already established in Japan, under the imperial protection. The doctrines of the latter, although corrupted by transmission down through so many centuries, coincide so closely with those of the Christian faith, that it is impossible not to identify one with the other. According to them, there are future recompenses established for virtue, and punishments for vice. Good men are received after death into a place of happiness where all desires are fulfilled, whilst the wicked are imprisoned in a place of torment. Xaca is the Saviour of mankind; and He was born into the world of a woman, that man, whom he had seen err, might be redeemed and attain to a happy resurrection. The God-head consists of three persons in unity—a coincidence in chronology and doctrine, which disposes of the infidel assertions that ascribe the origin of the gospel to the corrupted traditions of the East. It is also remarkable that the few Xacas yet remaining in Japan worship an image with three heads and forty hands—a symbol of the Trinity and of the universality of the divine operations. They believe that no matter what crimes a sinner may have committed, he may obtain salvation if he dies, invoking the forgiveness of the Deity. They believe also that God is invisible, that he had no beginning and will have no end; that his providence is unlimited, and that He ought to be revered as the inexhaustible source of all good.

The religious system of the followers of Confucius is not clearly defined. They themselves consider the sun as the highest divinity, the supreme dispenser of heat, and cold, and fruitfulness. Next to the sun in order of dignity are ranked the moon and stars. Divine honours are paid to all; but a special description of homage is reserved exclusively for the Great Light. Every constellation forms a distinct divinity in itself, and these divinities make peace and war, form alliances by marriage, seek to outwit and cajole one another; in fact, are liable to all the weaknesses of humanity, except that they are immortal, and capable of assuming any shape they like. This system enjoys the credit of having originated the religion of the fireworshippers. The lower Japanese are, for the most part, excessively superstitious, whilst those of higher rank and education are, generally speaking, infidels and atheists. There is, in reality, no state religion. Every one is at liberty to follow the dictates of his conscience; but if he becomes a Christian, it is at the risk of exposing his life and fortune to the severity with which the government visits the worst offenders. The Spiritual Emperor (Kin Rey was reigning in '29), is head of the old religious system. With him rests the bestowal of dignities and the conferring of the spiritual title Kami, which is an honourable designation ambitioned by the first men of the empire. He is invisible to all classes of the people except his own household and the officers of the temporal emperor, who are frequently dispatched to him. Once a year, on the occasion of a great festival, he appears in an open gallery of the palace, where only his feet are seen, whilst the people assemble in crowds below, and fill the air with pious acclamations. He always wears silk robes, the material being manufactured, from the first process to the last, by the hands of maidens set apart for that special purpose. He receives his meals daily in new vessels, which are broken directly he has used them; for nobody is thought worthy to take food out of the same dish and cup with him, and the consequence of doing so would be immediate death. Throughout his whole life he never touches the earth lest his feet should be defiled; and when moving from place to place he is borne aloft on the shoulders of his courtiers. His nails and beard are cut when he sleeps. Between certain hours of the day he is obliged to sit upon his throne with the crown upon his head in a state of immobility—that condition being thought beneficial to the peace and tranquillity of the empire; and should he move himself in the slightest degree so as to direct his face or shoulders towards any particular province, the people become alarmed and predict war, famine and pestilence, for the quarter thus indicated. When the "time of sitting" has ended, the emperor rises, and the crown is deposited on the cushions, in his stead. Polygamy is a national institution, and he is permitted to marry a dozen wives. He changes his dress every day, the clothes which he had worn the day previous being burned, as it is believed that anyone who should put them on would be seized immediately with a loathsome leprosy.

The Japanese character is highly eulogised by writers who have spent much time in inquiring into the habits and peculiarities of the people. They are active, industrious, temperate, inquisitive, and generous; capable of extraordinary enterprises; polite to extravagance, and universally educated in proportion to their opportunities of acquiring information. These good qualities are unfortunately counterbalanced by their propensities to deceit, vindictiveness, and jealousy. All the riches of the empire are in the custody and under the control of the princes, who are extremely proud of their great wealth. Rank is hereditary as with ourselves; and no gentleman, however low his fortunes may have fallen, will compromise his ancestry by forming an alliance below his own caste. As a manufacturing people the Japanese are skilful cabinet-makers, and thoroughly acquainted with the making of all articles of domestic economy. In the production of silk and woollen goods they are scarcely inferior to Europeans. Of astronomy they know little; indeed their knowledge of all the abstruse sciences is exceedingly limited. The empire never produced a great poet, painter, or sculptor; for, notwithstanding the high opinion which they entertain of their rhythmical compositions, everyone who knows the language agrees that they are barren and meagre; whilst their artistic efforts are below the notice of mediocrity. The alphabet is symbolical, or what stenographers call arbitrary; and their writing is made up in vertical, lines like a sum in addition.

In 1829 we knew very little of the domestic life of the people. It was understood that the rooms in the best houses were generally embellished with a portrait of a favourite divinity; or hung with richly ornamented paper, inscribed with moral or philosophic sentences. On the surface is often sketched grotesque caricatures of Chinese mandarins, or with figures of birds and fishes. Behind the windows, on which are arranged flower-pots filled with odiferous plants, or in their default, artificial flowers impregnated with the subtlest perfume, the occupant fixes a screen on which are sketched landscapes, in a peculiar vehicle, composed of gold dust and powdered lacquer. Perfuming pots of brass or silver, wrought in the shapes of lions, cranes, and dogs, swing in silk nets from the roof; whilst on every ledge, bracket and moulding of the apartment, are ranged gorgeous vases of porcelain and ornaments in biscuit and gold. Their love of decoration, indeed, is carried to excess. Their robes have curiously-wrought borders of the richest dye and tissues; even their paper shoes are gilded and spangled. At meals, although the attendants are numerous, not a word is spoken, communication being carried on by an admirably organised signalling system. The plates and dishes will be found ornamented with ribbons; and the beak and feet of the fowls covered with a singular description of gold-foil.

Charlevoix tells us that in his time—most accurate calculator!—Japan contained thirteen thousand cities, nearly all of which were flourishing and populous. They were totally devoid of walls; and the streets, which were extremely narrow, cut each other at right angles, and were flanked at each end by elaborately ornamented gates. An ottona, or superintendent officer, whose functions appear to be similar to those of the British policeman, keeps guard over each thoroughfare; and, like his European brother, is obliged to conform to the orders of the magistrates. A register containing the names of the inhabitants of each street is kept by the ottona, and he is obliged to furnish a faithful account of the births, deaths and marriages which take place in his particular district. In case of a dispute between two persons, he may suggest a compromise, but has no power to enforce his recommendations, nevertheless he can punish slight crimes with imprisonment. He is assisted in his duties by three petty constables.

Such is a summary of our knowledge of Japan in 1829; since then we have grown more incursive and inquisitive; and the result is that we should not be surprised to hear that Cambridge or Oxford contemplated the erection of a chair of Japanese Belle lettres. One of the least romantic consequences of the increase of knowledge is, that whilst it opens up new fields of thought and action, it tends to destroy or limit the domain of imagination. Japan, the land of the salamanders, of the beautiful Fusiyanan shadows of fairy lakes and heavenly skies, has been stripped of much of its finery since the European poked his stick through its fragile screens, and saw what was going on inside them. Frozen to-day, in the breath of the Siberian wind, it blazes like a furnace when the south wind blows up from the Pacific; then come the rainy months, when the snake and scorpion leave their holes for a plash in the muddy streets, and the rats swarm in the thresholds. "Centipedes hide in your shoes," says a late writer, "or crawl up your wife's muslin dress as she sits in her drawing-room; and beetles bury themselves in your pockets, and serpents look in at your paper windows." Such was—such is Japan. The deeper we dive into the well of Truth the nearer we get to the mud.

POESY.—Poesy serveth and conferreth to magnanimity, morality, and to delectation.

BOOKS.—We should make the same use of a book that a bee does of a flower: she steals sweets from it, but does not injure it.

HOW THEY MANAGE SOME MATTERS IN BELGIUM.

I AM in the quaint old city of Bruges. It is a pleasant place, and if the country around it was just a little more picturesque and a little less flat, I know few of the lesser cities of the continent which could be considered as a more desirable place of residence. To any one with any love for old times—for the history of the middle ages, and particularly of those old municipal commonwealths that were so jealous of their liberties, and too often so bitterly at feud with each other—Bruges, as well as the other cities of Flanders, furnishes an almost exhaustless mine to investigate. Its grand churches, its town-hall—which the worthy Flemings are restoring with all the slowness and deliberation which are supposed to be characteristic of their race—the hall, with its tall tower and musical chimes, the admirable Hospital of St. John of God—all are so many monuments which perforce take away the mind from the present, and lend it to a day long past. Here and there, as we walk through the streets, we come upon the statue of some worthy of the place whom S.P.Q.B.—Senatus populusque Brugensis—not Romanus—delighted thus to honour. In one quarter we are pointed out the house in which King Charles the Second of England lodged, in his out-at elbows days, before the Restoration; and a little inquiry will satisfy us that his Majesty's example has been followed by a pretty large number of his Majesty's successors' subjects, who, being in like case with his Majesty, have followed the royal lead, and quietly settled down here, where a small income will go a much longer way than at home. The people whom we meet in the streets have hardly a foreign appearance; the men are strong-looking, well-built, and would easily pass for Englishmen or Irishmen. The women are more comely than continental women usually are, and, with their clean caps and long black cloth cloaks, remind us not a little of the peasant women of the south of Ireland. All men and women, have a substantial, well-to-do appearance, and if a traveller wishes to see a good sample of continental peasantry, let him repair to the market-place at Bruges, on Saturday, and walk leisurely through the crowd that is assembled there. Here is a perfect little town of booths erected, in which every imaginable article is exposed for sale; the brave Belgians are there in myriads, gathered in from the surrounding country, and dressed, the women, at least, in all sorts of quaint costumes. Some have the plain caps and long cloaks of which we have spoken. Others wear their caps bedizened all over with lace, which we believe—for being inexperienced we can speak with small confidence on the subject—is of priceless worth in female eyes. Some wear queer head-dresses, with things that look like horns standing up from them; others, again, have caps with lap-pets that fall down on the sides, in front like the long wigs of judges and queen's counsel upon gala days. Many, instead of cloth cloaks, wear cloaks of a similar form, but made of linen or calico, and light in colour; they are neither as graceful nor as comfortable looking as the others. Through all the crowd there prevails the most perfect good conduct, and through all there is kept up a loud buzz of Flemish talk, not pleasing in sound, I must say, to the uneducated ear. But, over all, from the lofty tower that looks down upon the square, peal forth the chimes, ringing out harmoniously the praises of "La Vivandière," or "La Belle Flamande," and whatever other fair ones inspired the Flemish musicians of old. Come away with me, reader, from the crowded market and let us seek the quiet rampart; there, undisturbed, we can better listen to the chimes wafted to us by the wind, and mellowed by the distance. We will walk along, looking down at the broad canal which comes up from Ostend and the sea, and passes on to Ghent. And now we come to a famous spot, the Minnewater, a broad lake-like pool which ran with blood in old times. For when the people of Bruges were digging a canal here, the men of Ghent came suddenly on them, attacked them, and slew great numbers of them. But now all is peaceful, and there is nothing that could make us imagine that such a tragedy had been enacted here.

Utterly at a loss for occupation, I begin to think that I will study the lane behind my lodgings, and its inhabitants. Accordingly I turn my attention to my humble neighbours, and one morning I find that there is a considerable amount of excitement prevailing amongst them. The lace-making is going on as usual, but it is evident that the tongues of the ladies, who are sitting at their street doors, are going just as nimbly as their fingers. Little local committees assemble, and a vast deal of debating takes place, all in Flemish and, therefore, to me unintelligible. Many groups form themselves in particular, at which there stands a portly dame, the wife of an honest carpenter who lives in that house. She is idle, but apparently there is some great thought in her mind. She is the centre of attraction, and hundreds of questions are addressed to her by the gossips of the lane. The carpenter himself seems also, like his better half, to be neglecting his business, and appears to devote his energies to the two objects, of keeping his pipe lit, and of answering the innumerable inquiries of the various Jans and Piets who come up to him. There is something great, evidently, on the minds both of himself and of his dame, and the something is manifestly a matter of which neither of them is ashamed, but in which both take rather considerable pride. But the good old lady suddenly towards evening becomes energetic, and the great thoughts which she has been revolving in her mind, take the outward form of "welling" her house, as they call it here, that is, of getting a huge pail of water, dashing it about in all directions, and scrubbing as if the salvation of the entire city of Bruges depended on the cleanliness of her residence. She comes out with her pail, and she dashes the water against her door and windows, and she scrubs them. She goes in, and I can hear the splashing of the liquid element over the floors and stairs, and then I can discern the hissing sound of more scrubbing. Something of the same kind, though in a lesser degree, takes place in all the neighbouring houses. Then I see that some public festivity must be at hand, for men come and erect a little triumphal arch, with flowers and evergreens, at the entrance of the lane, and most of the houses are more or less decorated, but especially that of my friend the carpenter, which is plainly to be made to bear the foremost part in whatever rejoicing is going to take place. I stroll out, and as I pass through the market-place, I observe that preparations are being made for an exhibition of fireworks. I go on towards the railway station, and everywhere on my way I see that the worthy Brugeois are expecting something. At the station itself, there is a crowd assembled, two or three carriages are drawn up at its gates, and from all the signs abroad I conjecture that the arrival of at least a German grand duke, if not of some higher potentate, by a very early train, must be anticipated. I address one of the crowd in French with the view of finding out what it all means, but the person I have selected can speak nothing but Flemish. I try another and another, and at last my perseverance is rewarded. I confess I am not a little astonished, perhaps disappointed, as perhaps you will be, my reader, at learning what all the fuss is about. It is not that the king is coming, or the Duke of Brabant, or the King of Prussia, or the Queen of England, or, in fine, any of the illustrious personages whose names appear in the Gotha Almanac. Neither are the preparations made in honour of any individual, who, to the great benefit of the human race and his own immortal renown, has either by cotton-spinning or bill-discounting amassed a fortune which entitled him to that highest of modern titles, the name of millionaire. The whole matter is simply this. A young lad belonging to the city—a lad not of any very exalted extraction either—who has been studying art at the government school of design at Antwerp, has borne away the prix de Rome; in plain English, his proficiency in his studies has entitled him to a prize of 12,000 francs, about £420, which is given him to enable him to go and spend three years in the art-capital of the world. For this, to do honour to their young townsman, all Bruges is on foot. For this the crowd is assembled at the station to await his arrival, and receive him with acclamations. The carriages are waiting for him. I must say that my independent British blood boils at the notion of such honour being paid to any one under the rank of an earl. But the people here do not seem to think that they are doing too much. They are all excitement, and appear to be under the impression that the young gentleman's success really confers some substantial fame upon their city, and that they cannot do enough to testify their gratitude for what he has done for them. But this is not all. I am also made to understand the meaning of all that has been taking place in the wretched lane behind my lodgings. Will my readers believe me when I state that the triumphal arch, the scrubbing, and the general excitement in that locality, all had reference to the fact that the carpenter's son had borne away the highest prize at the local school of design? I am meditating upon the folly of these wretched continental people, when a buzz arises among the crowd, the Antwerp train is arriving, and with it the hero of the day. Up comes the snorting engine with its load of carriages behind it, and out of one of them steps a young man, who is forthwith greeted with an enthusiastic welcome by every one present. He passes through the station, escorted by two or three priests, his old schoolmasters, as I am told; with them he gets into one of the carriages that were waiting, and followed by the other vehicles, and by as many of the crowd as could keep up with them, drives off to the town-hall, where is taking place the local distribution of prizes, in which, as I have heard, the carpenter's son is to have the principal part. I follow, but when I arrive at the town-hall, I find it impossible to effect an entrance there, every available spot of room being fully occupied. I return to my lodgings meditating on the superiority of our people at home, who never waste their enthusiasm upon a set of wretched daubers, and I begin, as evening falls, to get into that comfortable frame of mind which is produced by self-satisfaction. All this humbug is over, I think and the good Brugesois have by this returned to their senses. But when evening has fallen, matters become worse. The lane is all alive, and suddenly comes on my ears the noise of a band below. I look out, and see a sight the like of which I hope I shall never see again. The band, a good one too, is actually serenading the young artist, the carpenter's son, and the neighbours are all standing about, evidently proud of the honour done to their lane in the person of its denizen. I shut my window and go out to walk through the streets. As I proceed I hear the noise of another band; this time, as I hear, the serenade is in honour of the priests at whose school the young man who obtained the prize at Antwerp was educated. So that the people appear determined to heap honours, not merely on the successful man himself, but also on those who may, even remotely, have been the cause of his success. I try to fly from the sound of the music, and make my way to the Grande Place, but there worse awaits me. There is a large crowd gathered, there is more music, and in a short time the whole square is lighted up with the blaze of fireworks. Rockets, Bengal lights, Catherine wheels, squibs and crackers,—everything that is made of pasteboard and damp gunpowder are firing away, breaking into sparks, going off with loud reports, and turning night temporarily into day, to the intense delight of the assembled crowd, who every now and then burst into loud applause, mingled with cheers for M. C. Bourgmestre, and for the two young lads, the heroes of the festivity. And all this is in honour of a carpenter's son, and of another youth of equally humble birth! all this is done for one lad who, to the knowledge of every one, lived in a poor house in a wretched lane, and another who equally, to the knowledge of every one, has been educated at a charity school. I am very sure that it will be long before any place either in England or in Ireland will go into such raptures upon such a subject. Only imagine any one of our large towns, Cork for instance, or Limerick, or Belfast, putting itself into holiday array, making its streets noisy with music, and bright with fireworks, because one of its children has achieved some such success as the prizes obtained by these two young Belgians. Of course the thing could not be. Our people have far too much self-respect for such nonsense, and both Englishmen and Irishmen will always know how to reserve their enthusiasm for some more worthy objects than a couple of canvas-stainers. As to Bruges, I declare that the ordinarily quiet town does not regain its propriety and usual tranquillity until early in the morning, and at times I believed, from the uproar about me, that I must have been transported into some noisier land than West Flanders. But all things must cease at last. The last note of the music is played, the last spark of the last rocket dies out, leaving a blacker night behind it, the last enthusiastic admirer of the arts and their votaries goes home; I follow his example, and retire to rest. Reader, good night!

MUCROES ABBEY.

THE Abbey of Irrelagh, or, as it usually called, Mucroes, Lakes of Killarney, is, perhaps, more generally visited and better known than any ecclesiastical ruin in Ireland. That a church was situated here from a very remote time appears from MSS. preserved in the library of Trinity College. Ware states that it was founded in 1440, by Donald, the son of Teige Mac Carthy, but there is much reason to doubt the authenticity of this account, as the "Annals of the Four Masters," under the year 1340, record the foundation of a monastery here. The Abbey, the interior of which, as seen through the entrance doorway, is illustrated above, consists of a nave and choir, separated by a belfry of small proportions, and only designed to hold a single bell. This belfry is pierced by a narrow gothic arching, which connects the nave and choir. On the south side of the nave there is a small transept, with which it is connected by a large archway.

KILSHARVAN.

THE civil, military, and ecclesiastical antiquities of Ireland have, for several years, presented a fruitful field of research and inquiry to many able writers, who have succeeded, after much toil, and considerable erudition, in dissipating to a certain extent, the mist of indifference and ignorance that has so long shrouded their history. Still, although much has been done, the subject is still so very plentiful, the harvest is not yet exhausted; and there are yet many of these remains, which, from their situation, add considerably to the picturesque and attractive appearance of the country, yet wholly unknown or disregarded.

It is true, nearly all the extensive monastic and baronial edifices in Ireland are already before the public; but there is another class of buildings that has been generally unnoticed; those small oratories which were built on spots already consecrated by the residence of an anchorite, or on the site of a decayed monastery or abbey; and not unfrequently owed their origin to the performance of a vow, or for the support of an ecclesiastic whose office it was to pray for the soul of the founder, whose tomb usually was within the walls.

The church of Kilsharvan is situated about a mile and a half east of Duleek, near the banks of the little river Nanny Water, county Louth, and appears to be of great antiquity. Of the portions of the walls that remain, the most prominent are the chancel arch, which is pointed and clothed with ivy, and a semicircular arch dividing the nave from the choir. In the south wall are two windows, square-headed and deeply recessed.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER IX.

"Jamaica Lodge.

Y DEAR MR. FAVERSHAM—You will, I am sure, be delighted to hear that Timothy Darling, the policeman, is now, through your great kindness, installed as porter to the "Wide World Life Assurance Company." He has his lodging, coals and candles, and £40 a year.

"He has desired me to thank you on his behalf, but your best reward, I am sure, will be the pleasure of knowing that you have been permitted to be the instrument of doing good.

"Mamma desires her kind regards, and bids me remind you that there is a little spot out of the gay world, called Jamaica Lodge.

"Very sincerely yours,

"ARAMINTA ASHBY.

"Tuesday evening.

"You once, if I am not mistaken, expressed a desire to hear an oration in the City Hall. There will be one delivered there on Monday next."

Mr. Henry Faversham, in elegant morning costume, a pipe in his mouth, (it was always there) and a cup of cold tea before him, rocked himself in his American chair, in Arty's sanctum, as he read Miss Ashby's letter. Was the style thereof so polished that it would bear three or four readings? Or was Mr. Faversham sympathising in the good fortune of Timothy Darling? There was interest to the sight of Mr. Faversham in the direction upon the envelope, eye in the post-mark. It was hardly necessary that Mrs. Ashby should desire her daughter to remind him that Jamaica Lodge, to quote a Clapham platitude, "stood where it did." But the oration! Why was he reminded of that? Would Miss Ashby be there; and had she the hope of meeting him when the oration came off? The idea was too flattering to be put aside. Mr. Faversham nursed it therefore, as he smoked his pipe and sipped his cold tea.

The girl is not such an icicle after all. These serious young ladies, once in love, throw themselves head over ears into the business. Your demure reader of Jeremy Taylor and Bunyan drops the heavy family editions, and takes to a shilling's worth of highly-seasoned sentiment. She is very difficult to ignite, but once on fire, the flames gather over her head, and her friends should hasten to the rescue. The lips of Mr. Faversham puckered as these thoughts, stimulated by tobacco, swept through his brain. Decidedly, on reading the postscript for the fifth time, the reference to the oration was a broad hint. Delightful to have one's vanity so splendidly banquipped! The delight to Faversham was modified by his own sense of his superb manners; of his outward graces; of his great claims, in short, to feminine admiration. Naturally the girl admired him. He might have been certain that if he maintained a reserved position, the poor fascinated creature must advance.

The first transports of this magnificently vain conception over, Mr. Henry Faversham laid his pipe aside, and wrote to Jamaica Lodge. He was delighted to hear that the policeman was placed comfortably: it was indeed a privilege to be the humble means of helping Timothy Darling; he was obliged by Mrs. Ashby's kind message, which was, however, an unnecessary one; and he would unquestionably endeavour to find time to hear the oration. He rose proudly from his desk, proud as a mighty conqueror. His silent eloquence had vanquished a frigid girl, before whom hundreds of men would have trembled. She had actually made the first advances!

Pressing business bore Mr. Henry Faversham speedily to his chambers in London, in the company of Mr. Clifton. The parental oracle was delighted to see that his boy would not permit pleasure to interfere with business. A few highly sensible remarks on the value of punctuality and perseverance, on the unhealthiness of late hours, and on the necessity of being prudent in the choice of friends, dismissed Mr. Henry Faversham from the presence of the starched oracle, grave and reverent. Mr. Clifton was thanked for his visit, and a brilliant career was provided for him, if he would, as he no doubt would, abandon those rabid ideas with which vulgar fellows and bad fellows like Mr. Thomas Paine and Mr. Cobbett had unhappily inoculated the minds of the young men of the day. Clifton acknowledged the hospitality, and swallowed the advice, of his friend's governor.

Half an hour afterwards, shillings were being dropped into the hands of railway officials, winks were being exchanged with the guard, and there were inquiries about lucifer matches. The governor and his precepts were forgotten. Where should the evening be spent in town? Where would Namby be smoking? Where would Stackington be airing his last new coat?

Sad young dogs! The Grove goes honestly to bed at ten o'clock, while they are throwing themselves into a Hansom cab at London-bridge. Clara Faversham is wishing that somebody would invite her to London, as she shakes her solid flakes of hair over her ample glistening shoulders; and Ada, quite dull, dropping upon her knees, in a robe of angelic whiteness, hopes Henry has arrived safely at his chambers. The Oracle has said his prayers, polishing his heavy seals the while, and is disturbing the swallows in the ivy, with his sonorous nose. The wind is gently lifting the yellow leaves from the trees without; and the night is travelling quietly to meet the day.

Far on will the night have journeyed before the young fellows who left the Grove an hour or two since, speeding on their way to study, go to rest—feverish and fagged.

Mr. John Ashby was glad to welcome his chum back. Faversham was still sleeping heavily when Mr. Jack was panting and hissing in his sponge-bath. This gentleman had his tooth-brush in his hand, when his curiosity to learn something about the sleeper's trip, vanquished his resolution not to disturb him. Mr. Jack whistled; Mr. Jack moved the chairs noisily in the sitting-room. The sleeper grunted and moved in his bed.

"Wake, old boy?" shouted Mr. Jack at once, determined to be heard.

"Let a fellow have his sleep out,"

"All right!" But Mr. Jack still whistled. He was impatient to hear and give news.

"Any letters?"

Jack was delighted to hear this question, and darted into Mr. Faversham's bed-room. Two young friends who are in the habit of meeting and dining together daily, who share the same knocker, and the same tobacco-jar, have much to report to each other when they have been parted during ten days. Jolly evenings have been passed; Harry has lost four pounds upon the billiard-table; Julius has been "screwed" at O'Rollikin's call party; a very pretty legacy has been left to that lucky dog Fanshawe, and wretched little Bill Harris is in the Bench. Jack had his quiver full of points to shoot at his chum. Namby had had another "row" with his governor; Mocatta had told another lie; Stackington was corresponding angrily with his father from the British debtors' sanctuary, opposite Folkestone; and Topley, the fool, had married!

"Married!" exclaimed Mr. Faversham. "But how did he manage it?"

"Didn't cost much. Wedding-breakfast, ale and sandwiches; honeymoon trip, a run to Gravesend and back; bridal chamber, College Place, or Street—I forget which—Camden Town."

"A lively beginning," said Mr. Faversham. "Has the girl any money?"

"Not a screw—not a brass farthing—not a button," was the emphatic answer.

"Poor devils!" Mr. Faversham was pleased to add, in his sympathising way, and the conversation wandered from the connubial prospects of the Topleys—to Jamaica Lodge—hither was the thread of conversation drawn, by the delicate touch of the gentleman who was interested in a certain lady of the establishment. Everybody was very well, according to Mr. Jack. Araminta was as serious as ever; and Ashby père had been asking after Mr. Faversham.

Would Miss Ashby be at the oration? The City Hall was a large place. If she were there, where would she be? Would her desire to catch every word draw her into the reserved seats; or would her humility land her among the common people? Over his first pipe o' mornings; as he drew his gown upon his shoulder, for the Hall dinner; while he brewed his toddy, and while he sorted his cards at the whist-table, Mr. Faversham asked himself these questions. Should he see that serious, cold, little face fixed upon the orator? Would those cool lips fall apart, as those dainty, pink ears were gathering in his brilliant periods?

What a miserable wretch is a man with one vehemently dominating idea in his head! He may seek friends, take violent exercise, indulge in narcotics, and still this fiendish idea dogs him. Once in an easy chair, in the corner of a carriage, or upon his pillow, and the idea stalks into his presence, tugs at his attention, and will not begone on any conditions. He has been rid of it while the blood was dancing through him, during a gallop or a hearty laugh; but the horse in the stable and the laughter sunk to stillness, and at once the idea twitches at his elbow. It vanishes while he is playing a losing hazard, but it plucks at him while he is chalking his cue. How he twists it about and tortures it! How he endeavours to believe in the morning that it is a pleasant idea; and how, at night, it lies heavily upon him, the nightmare of his waking moments. Suddenly he turns warmly upon it, and imperiously dismisses it; but it fades only to wait for his quiet moments, that it may sneak into his brain again. Give up the fight, and leave the tyrannical idea in possession, and, if you be a rich man, your relations will speedily introduce you to Dr. Conolly.

"Oh! very eloquent! There never was a larger subscription in the Hall, so Mr. Hoddinott told me. Never."

It was Sunday morning when it occurred to Mr. Ashby to ask his daughter whether she had been pleased with the oration in the City Hall.

Saint Araminta was refreshing herself with a crust of bread and a glass of sherry, after morning service. She looked pretty with her bonnet strings untied, and her black silk mantle lying loosely around her. Her serious white little face, with that demure little mouth slowly devouring a chip from the staff of life, was cold enough, however. Faversham must have been mad when he believed that the little marble hand, which we remark steadily conveying some sherry to the cold little mouth, had written him a serious letter, to hide a suggestion of a tender nature.

"I saw Mr. Faversham at the door, as I was coming out," said

Miss Araminta, still slowly munching her crust. She looked colder than ever.

"Did you speak?"

"No. I had almost passed before I saw him. I don't know whether he saw me." Frigid as water-drops from ice fell these words. "I don't think I shall go out, papa, before dinner. Victoria, take my bonnet and mantle," the saint added languidly.

Amy was giggling in the next room with her young brother, and was tarrying, when Mr. Ashby peremptorily called upon her to mind her sister's words.

"What Victoria can find to laugh at all day long I cannot imagine," said saint Araminta. She threw herself upon the sofa, and vowed that she was quite exhausted.

"Victoria," Mr. Ashby called, "fetch your sister her salts!"

"You walk like an elephant," the saint observed faintly, as her sister handed her the bottle.

"I cannot help being heavy, dear," was Victoria's simple and good-natured answer.

"Don't take the luncheon away," cried Mrs. Ashby to the servant, "I expect Mr. John and his friend here presently."

"What friend?" asked Mr. Ashby, as he drew his amber bandanna daintily round his Sunday hat.

"Why, Mr. Faversham to be sure!"

"How could you ask Mr. Faversham here, on a Sunday, of all days," cried, or whined the saint. "You know how dull he'll find it."

Mr. Faversham as those words were passing from Miss Ashby's lips, was lifting himself to the box seat of the omnibus, that was to bear him and his friend to Jamaica Lodge. Little, dim, vapoury shadows of dancing Cupids were playing about him, and he was whisking them energetically away, but there they were, wrinking under his hat, fluttering upon his hands, dallying with his hair. They might have their fun out, for, in a few hours it was his determination he would know who had sent them to plague him. Valiantly did he hold to his resolution, while the omnibus rolled past the places and terraces that lay between London and Jamaica Lodge. It was only when Mr. Jack Ashby was leading the way from the gate to the house, that it struck Mr. Faversham he was on a fool's errand. Pleased with this penetration at the last minute, he would watch and see whether the girl would give him a hint. Victoria warned his welcome with her beaming eyes, and Mrs. Ashby, in Sabbath colours and fragrance, declared heartily that she thought she was never going to see Mr. Faversham again. Miss Ashby rose from the sofa, and dropped her fingers into the gentleman's hand. She was sure she was very much obliged to Mr. Faversham for the interest he had taken in the case of Timothy Darling, the policeman. Mr. Faversham must really beg that Miss Ashby would not mention such a trifle. And then silence between the two.

Mr. Faversham took cherry with his host, and continued to keep his temper while he extricated himself from the barish embraces of Master Walter, (whose mother declared, when he brushed Mr. Faversham's hat the wrong way, that "he had such spirits.") The dinner had been eaten, and Master Walter's voracious finger had been dipped into every dessert dish (not excepting that in which the preserved ginger lay), when the host, having exhausted the topics of the day, and deliberately stated his firm conviction that Messrs. Spatterby, Hodgson, and Spatterby would not pay one farthing more than four shillings and eightpence in the pound, suggested a cool bottle of claret upon the lawn.

A NEW PIGMENT.—Artists will be glad to learn that a new and important yellow pigment has just been introduced under the name of aureolin, which will be found to be a most valuable addendum to the palette. It is of a splendid yellow colour of rich and brilliant hue, and possesses the invaluable and long sought for combination of qualities—brilliance, permanency, and transparency. Its tints are very pure in tone, the lighter ones being extremely delicate and clear. Aureolin mixes well with all other colours, forming with blues a magnificent range of brilliant greens; and by the side of ultramarine and madder-red, it completes a triad of brilliant, permanent, and transparent primitive colours. It is absolutely permanent, being equally unaffected by long continued exposure to the sun's rays, or to the action of the action of the impure gases which may contaminate the atmosphere.

A FEW NOTES ON PAPER.

IN prefacing a few notes on the material on which we write, we may remark incidentally that the term "book" is derived from the ancients, who, when writing on the leaves of trees was superseded, so named the inner bark of the lime tree, which was their paper—"biblica," a book; thus we have the term Bible, the Book, the most eminent of all books. The term "leaves" comes from the fact of the leaves of trees having been used to write on—as the leaves of the talipot-tree are still used in the East—and the word "page" is derived from the Latin pangio, to write; all substances written on were called pagina, whether the substances were leaves, bark, or parchment; hence page; and lastly the word paper comes from the Egyptian word papyrus, a plant which grew on the banks of the Nile, to the height of ten or twelve feet, having a bulky stem with a bunch of loose silky filaments growing at the top, from which the first paper was made. The method of manufacture was curious. From the centre of the stem of the papyrus were cut long thin stripes, which, being laid at right angles on a smooth table, were moistened with Nile water, which was supposed to possess glutinous properties, and then pressed by and polished with smooth stones. Paper thus made is supposed to have been used as early as the departure of the children of Israel from Egypt, and there are yet many specimens extant. In the museum of Turin is a manuscript said to have been written two hundred years before the birth of Moses, and we have read somewhere of rolls of papyrus manuscript which contain the history of Sesostris, said to have been written during the life of that monarch. The pens used were made of the "calamus," a reed growing on the banks of the Nile, cut and fashioned somewhat in the way we cut and fashion quills, and the ink was probably a compound of soot and vegetable extracts. The papyrus plant is still used in Egypt for sails, fuel, cordage, and clothing.

From the use of papyrus, lead, brass, copper, and wood for the leaves of books, the step to parchment was easy and natural. But the discovery and first application of this substance is due to accident, as are many improvements in that and subsequent ages. The inhabitants of Pergamos were desirous of procuring a library equal to that of Alexandria, then the most celebrated in the world. For this purpose they sent to Egypt for a supply of papyrus, which supply one of the Ptolemies, who was clearly no free-trader, refused to afford, on the supposition that a second library was not required in the world! The inhabitants of Pergamos were in despair, till one bright genius among them proposed to apply the skins of sheep to the purpose of paper making; and the hint being quickly taken, parchment was the consequence. The method of preparing the skins has scarcely altered from that day to this. They are steeped in pits impregnated with lime, taken out and stretched on frames, scraped and rubbed to half their original thickness, dressed and smoothed with chalk and pumice stone, and afterwards dried in the sun and pressed fit for use.

The most ancient parchment books of which we have any knowledge, are the Hebrew manuscripts, rolled on cylinders; and next to them the Arabic and Persian, which were usually formed of several square leaves folded together like a tailor's pattern-book. Rolled books were called volumina; hence the word volume.

While on this subject of parchment we may here note that its invention called into requisition a number of persons who were employed as writers for the public libraries. They were generally slaves, who wrote with pens made of the calamus reed, and a kind of ink similar to that now used by printers, but not quite so oily. In the seventh century the art of illuminating books had risen to be a regular profession, and about that time, too, quills were first used by the scribes. From the difficulty of reading ancient monuments and parchments, the modern science of palæography, or the art of deciphering, has arisen. Montfaucon, the author of the "Palæographica Græca," a work of immense utility to antiquarians, has been esteemed the most celebrated decipherer in Europe. By means of a process called, "Photo-lithography," recently introduced, faithful portraits of old records, for they are more than transcripts or copies, have been, however, produced. The art has been long known, though not much used. In 1803 a patent was taken out for "an improved process for producing photographic pictures or designs on the surface of stone or metal, so that impressions may be taken therefrom by the process of lithographic printing." A lithographic stone was coated with a solution of gum, sugar, and bichromate of potash, and when the picture was printed on this, the action of light acted on the gum, and rendered it almost insoluble. The stone was then washed with a solution of soap, and by this and the washing away of the parts not affected by the light, a printed surface was formed. Still earlier, in 1840, methods were suggested for photolithographic printing, but it remained for Colonel Sir H. James, R.E., to adopt various modifications, with very successful results. He first obtains, by means of the camera, an ordinary photograph on wet collodion; this is printed by exposure on a sheet of sensitive paper, formed by washing over engravers' tracing paper with a solution of gum-arabic and bichromate of potash. The picture so taken is then laid face down on a metal plate very evenly covered with a greasy ink, and passed through a lithographic press. It is then placed in a flat porcelain dish of warm water, and gently brushed with a soft brush, the ink being thus removed where it overlies the soluble gum, while it is retained on the parts constituting the picture. This "print" is then transferred to a polished zinc plate, and the transfer gummed and brought up by being rubbed over with printing ink and olive oil. When the details appear clear and strong, the plate is etched with a weak solution of phosphoric acid in gum water, and it is then ready for printing in the ordinary manner of a lithographic stone or zinc plate.

The invention of paper, it is said, took place in China, not long after the Nativity of our Saviour. During more than seven centuries its use was confined to the Chinese, who, whilst every modern civilized nation had been advancing in wisdom and practical knowledge, have remained stationary. In the eighth century—when, in wealth, knowledge, commerce, and civilization, the Arabs were the greatest people on earth—the Chinese paper was brought to Mecca, whence its use was successively introduced into those countries that afterwards, in their career of conquest and colonization, fell under the dominion of the Arabs. About the beginning of the twelfth century, the Arabians transmitted the art of making paper from cotton to the Spaniards, and from them to the Italians, French, and Germans; and in 1588, one Spielman, a German jeweller, obtained permission from Queen Elizabeth to set up a manufactory at Dartford, in Kent; and from his mill came the first paper made in England. We may add that the paper of the Chinese was made of silk, while that of the Hindoos was a coarse, rough tissue, manufactured from the bark of trees.

Paper is manufactured from cotton and linen rags. They are brought in waggons to the mill, whence they are transferred to a large cylindrical frame, covered with wire cloths, called the dusting machine. Here, as the machine revolves, they are rapidly turned about to free them from dust and foreign substances; and this preliminary step over, they are taken to the sorting-room, where the white rags are separated from the coloured by women and children; and from them conveyed in small boxes and baskets to the rag-cutters.

The rag-cutter consists of a knife fixed in the centre of a board in a vertical position, over the surface of which every piece of material is passed—after having been carefully examined to free it from buttons, pins, etc.—and then thrown into a large box beside the worker. Beneath the cutter is a drawer, covered with a wire cloth, to receive the dust. From the cutter the rags pass under the inspection of the overlooker, whose duty it is to see that no foreign substance is allowed to be present, as if the least bit of any solid material be suffered to remain, it would be ground up with the rags, and diffused in minute particles over the surface of the paper.

These preparations completed, the rags are boiled in a strong alkaline ley; and after being sufficiently freed from impurities and colouring matter, they are subjected to the action of a revolving cylinder, whose sharp teeth, aided by the water, which is freely admitted, soon reduce the mass to a pulp, which is technically termed the "stuff." This is received through a valve in the bottom of the engine into a pipe which conveys it to the draining chest of the bleaching-house; where, by the aid of chloride of lime, the dirty rags are brought to a pure and perfect white. By the same process, also, coloured rags are entirely deprived of their colouring matter. After being dried and pressed, and greatly diminished in bulk, the "stuff" is again subjected to the action of a washing machine, which reduces it to a material about half-way between rags and paper, called "half-stuff," which in its turn is taken to the beating-house, where it undergoes a further beating and tearing, which finally reduces it to a fibrous condition fitted for making into paper. It is then conveyed to the "vat-house," where at each vat two workmen are engaged in the actual process of forming it into sheets. In each vat is a revolving wheel, called the "cog," whose action prevents one part from becoming heavier than another. And now commences the real hand process. The "vat-man" is provided with two moulds, each of which is covered with a wide bottom like a sieve. Seizing the mould, he plunges it obliquely into the pulp, and raising it carefully to a level, so that the stuff may be equally distributed over the mould, he allows the water to drain through the interstices of the wires, applies the "deckle," or movable raised edging to the sides, which prevents the "pulp" from escaping from the mould, and hands the newly-made sheet of paper to the "coucher," whose duty it is to hold it a minute in his hands, and then deposit it on the face of a felt sheet, which takes the paper off the mould. The empty mould is then exchanged for the one charged with "pulp," and it is almost inconceivable with what swiftness and dexterity these operations are continued. When the wires are woven into a kind of cloth, the paper made is called rove, and when the wires are placed across the mould, the kind known as laid is produced. The water mark is made by the introduction of a device into the wire-work of the mould. The delicate note and letter paper, known as "cream-laid," is made on a mould having the wires all placed in one direction, at regular distances from each other.

The duty on paper, we need scarcely remind our readers, was repealed by Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 1st of October, 1861. This, however, is not the first memorable instance in which this tax upon knowledge was remitted. In the early part of the sixth century the Emperor Theodoric abolished the duty on papyrus, which contributed to the revenue of the Roman empire, and upon which fresh imposts had been laid by successive rulers until they became oppressive. Cassiodorus congratulated the whole world on the repeal of the impost on an article so essentially necessary to the human race, and the general use of which, as Pliny says, "polishes and immortalises man." We may add, that on the morning when the duties on paper were to cease in these kingdoms, a large flag was hoisted from the paper-mill buildings at Brechin, in Scotland, bearing the motto, "The Devil's awa' wi' the Excise-man!"

Various substances have been tried to supersede cotton in the manufacture of paper, but with no great success; and M. Schaffer, of whom it was said, that "the whole world assumed to him the character of one mass of latent material for paper," produced it from various incongruous products, such as the bark of the vine, cabbage stalks, straw, wood-shavings, hop-vine, and husks of Indian corn. The coarser kinds of paper are now made from old ropes and straw, while the very finest sorts are made from new linen and silk. Bank notes are made from new linen, with a small admixture of pod cotton; and tracing paper is manufactured from the bark of the poplar tree. Cotton and linen rags, however, have been found to be the best materials for the manufacture of paper. Amongst the multitude of materials which have been proposed as a substitute for them, perhaps wood has been suggested the greatest number of times. On more than one occasion the manufacture has been actually carried out, and we saw, some years ago, really good paper for printing purposes produced from deal shavings, by the patent of J. and C. Watt. It is now said that a French lady has succeeded in manufacturing excellent paper from wood, and at a price much lower than that made from rags. Her method consists chiefly in the use of a new kind of machinery for reducing the wood to fine fibres, which are afterwards treated with the alkalis and acids necessary to reduce them to pulp, and the composition is finally bleached by the action of chlorine. By means of a series of parallel vertical wheels, armed with fine points, which are caused to pass over the surface of the wood in the direction of its fibres, the surface of the wood is marked, and the outer layer is formed into a kind of net, without woof, composed of separate threads. This layer of fine threads is afterwards removed by means of a plane, which is passed across the wood, and the portion thus removed, which resembles lint or flax, is then treated with chlorine, etc. Specimens have thus been made consisting of a mixture of 80 per cent. of wood-pulp, and 20 per cent. of rag-pulp, and sheets have been tried by printers, lithographers, and others, with very satisfactory results. It is the unanimous opinion of the engravers and lithographers who have used it, that paper made according to this method, from wood, and which costs only £16 per ton, is quite equal to the China paper, which costs £214 per ton. It is confidently expected that experiments upon a larger scale will confirm the results already obtained.

The most ingenious method of disintegrating the fibre of wood which we have yet heard of is a Yankee "notion." Wood is placed in a cannon, the mouth of which is plugged up. High pressure steam is then forced in through the touch-hole, and when the pressure rises to a sufficient degree, the plug, together with the wood is blown out, the latter being reduced to the appearance of wool by the expansive force of the steam, with which its pores have been filled whilst in the cannon !

WITHERED LEAVES.

SHE took the little cabinet
Beneath her hands, so warm and white,
That all the dark-grained rosewood gleamed
Under her palms, with tender light.
Up rose the curious, carven lid,
All ivoryed with twisted sheaves,
And from their crimson cell she took
A slender spray of faded leaves.

A moment, thro' the Summer room,
An air of faintest fragrance stole ;
The withered branch sent out and out
The secret odour of its soul,
Dead ! but how many memories
Clung nestling round the wasted bloom,
Old mornings in the wolds and meads—
Old evenings in the garden gloom.

Awile she stood in trifling mood,
A dream of idling loveliness ;
Awile she strove to guard her tears,
With ill-assumed forgetfulness.
Around the room the odour swooned,
Her heart at the old passion leapt ;
Upon her hands she leant her head,
And, bending o'er the casket, wept.

Love, great is thine inheritance
Within the heart, within the brain !
Thou rule'st the mysteries of life,
When stronger influences wane.
When years have settled on our brows,
And snowed them with unceasing strife,
The fountains of our secret tears
Obey thy call, and spring to life.

Leaves—mournful leaves—their tablets bore
A hopeless story of the past ;
Of bright affections changed to pain,
Of hopes by fickle faith o'rcast.
Yet, grief will consecrate its own,
And fold its idol day by day,
Tho' truth may whisper in her ear,
Its feet, for all, are potter's clay.

Back to their crimson cell they go
Poor relics, loved for evermore ;
A tranquil splendour folds her brows,
The hour of agony is o'er.
Oh ! if there be one living truth
Adorning life—surviving death—
The radiant passion-flower of life,
'Tis woman's deep, unswerving faith.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

II.—RHEBAN CASTLE, COUNTY KILDARE.

HEBAN was, in the second century, one of the inland towns of Ireland. The castle stands on the western bank of the Al Berba, Birgus, or Barragh, (the boundary river,) now the river Barrow. It was built, or greatly enlarged, in the early part of the thirteenth century, by Richard de St. Michael, when this and Dunamase, an adjoining district, were erected into a barony. Rheban was found of consequence to the first English settlers, who repaired and strengthened the castle, as also the opposite one of Kilberry, both intended to protect a ford on the river. The name of this castle was anciently Raiba, or Righ-ban, that is, the habitation of the king ; and though now in ruins, some idea can be formed of its former grandeur. Its massive walls—its mullioned windows, with its imposing situation, show it to be a place designed to awe the surrounding country, and forcibly call to mind the days when the chivalrous De St. Michael held his court here in feudal splendour, and lorded it over the petty chieftains of the borders of the Pale.

The Richard de St. Michael in question founded a monastery in Athy, on the west (his own) side of the river for crouched friars, under the invocation of St. John. A burial ground and some remains still exist. There was another religious edifice erected by the families of Boesel and Hogan, at the east entrance of the town, and dedicated to St. Michael, which is erroneously stated to have been the one founded by De St. Michael, Lord of Rheban. A coincidence between the names of the supposed founder and the monastery, called as it is St. Michael's, may have led to the mistake.

In 1325, in the absence of the English settlers, Rheban, Dunamase, and all their dependencies, were taken by O'Moore.

In 1424, Thomas Fitzgerald, Lord of Offaly, and afterwards seventh Earl of Kildare, marrying Dorothea, daughter of Anthony O'Moore, received in dower the manors of Rheban and Woodstock.

In 1642, the Marquis of Ormond took Rheban from the rebels, after an obstinate resistance.

In 1648, it was taken by Owen Roe O'Neill, who was afterwards defeated by Lord Inchiquin, and compelled to surrender Rheban and Athy.

Near the castle was a very high conical mound, thought to have been a sepulchral mound, raised over some king or chieftain, and though artificial in a great degree, there was, nevertheless, advantage taken of a natural height, as may be seen by the undisturbed beds of gravel that have been taken from it for road purposes.

Rheban is situated in the parish of Churchtown, and union of Athy, about two-and-a-half miles north-west of the latter.

THE BLACK DOCTOR.

CHAPTER X V.

HE hand-chair at the door at once attracted the attention of Jonas, who gave instructions to his companion to hide the pewter measure while he would go and ask the new-comer his business.

"Has Doctor Bramble been here to-day?" asked Stammers, as the elastic Quill bowed respectfully to the question.

"He has, sir," replied Quill, "and he will be back soon—I expect him every moment. Perhaps you will come in and wait for him?"

"No," said Stammers; "I will remain here until he comes; but as soon as he arrives tell him that Mr. Stammers wants to see him particularly."

The curiosity of Quill became at once excited, and he made every kind of excuse for the object of having an opportunity of seeing to his satisfaction a person of whom he had heard so much in connection with the forged bill passed to Abraham Isaacs.

Stammers was aroused from deep, and anything but agreeable reflections, by Quill, informing him that Dr. Bramble was inside.

"Tell him," replied Stammers, "that I am unable to leave this chair, and that I want to see him particularly."

In a few moments Bramble made his appearance, and said, "I have been informed, Mr. Stammers, that you required my presence;" as he placed his hands in his pockets, and bowed with affected politeness.

"Tell me, I conjure you," said Stammers, "what have I done to you. Not seeing you I left my bed to come in search of you, but I would rather a thousand times endanger my life, than run the slightest risk of losing your friendship."

"Did your sister tell you nothing relative to me?" inquired Bramble.

"She told me this morning, that you proposed for her, and that she wrote to you, declining your proposal."

"I want to ascertain," continued Stammers; "if there was anything contained in that letter, calculated to give you offence—she told me there was not."

"She spoke the truth," replied Bramble, "I acted wrong in having written to her, and I deserved the punishment which I have received. I have to regret that you found it necessary to leave your bed in your present state, on my account."

"Won't you give me your hand," said Stammers. "It will be harsh of you to refuse me your friendship, when you consider the weight of the obligations I am under to you, as well as when you remember our old and long-tried acquaintance."

"As you wish it, here is my hand, Stammers; and whenever you need the humble services of one so worthless as Brutus Bramble, you may reckon on them," observed the Black Doctor.

"With reference to the correspondence you have had with my sister I want to say a few words."

"Not a syllable to me," replied Bramble. "There is an end for ever to my thoughts on that matter; and unless you intend to give me pain, and inflict humiliation on me, you will never mention her name in my hearing."

"As you will it, it shall be so," replied Stammers, "but when am I to see you," continued he, "as I will be miserable unless I can see you at least once a day."

"I will write often to you, and when you are recovered, I can meet you as frequently as you please. I have not been well for some days, so you must excuse me, Mr. Stammers, for any bad temper which I have shown."

Stammers, who observed a great change in the manner and appearance of Bramble, felt very sad when taking leave of his friend, prior to returning to Elm Place.

When the Black Doctor returned to the office, Barman observed: "It was illegal, Bramble, to give Isaacs into custody, but after all if the fellow says a word, we can say that we only kept him safe to hand him over to the authorities."

"Have no fear on that point," observed Bramble, "the Jew is too knowing to make a mistake of that kind. Long and earnestly did I watch to have him in my power. I have him clutched now, and no human power shall save him from my vengeance. We must see him early to-morrow," continued the speaker, as he left the office, accompanied by Tony.

The Jew remained silent for a considerable time, while Wisp was calmly smoking his pipe. At length Isaacs said:

"I think your name is Mr. Wisp, and I want you to grant me a favour for which I will reward you. I want to go out into the city to get the papers your friends require. I will pledge my word I will be back with you soon. I will, upon my honour."

"Your honour will remain where you are for this night in my company, and the sooner you think of going to your bed the better, because I am as sleepy as ever a sworn bailiff could be," observed Wisp.

A ray of hope broke in on the Jew, who still affected to urge the bailiff to comply with his request, but Wisp was immovable.

"When this fellow is asleep," thought Isaacs, "I will make my escape, and I will put means to work to have deep revenge on Stammers, Bramble, Barman, Foster, and Company."

"After we have had some supper, Mr. Wisp, we will retire to rest," said the Jew, whose brain was busy with many plans for the regulation of his future movements.

"All right," replied Wisp, who with the cunning of his class observed that there was some deep motive at the bottom of the civility of the wily Isaacs. The bailiff determined to keep a close eye on his prisoner.

"I will give you some excellent wine which I have here," said the Jew, as he opened an oak press, and produced a musty-looking bottle. "Take some of this, it will do you much good. I will take some brandy."

The Jew filled out nearly a tumbler full of the wine and presented it to the bailiff.

A sudden thought flashed across the mind of Wisp, and he said, "Mr. Isaacs, do you drink this, and I will take the brandy."

"Very well," replied the Jew with assumed indifference, "give it to me."

He turned to the press and immediately Wisp heard the splash of liquid falling on timber. Isaacs turned round and holding up the empty tumbler observed, "That is fine wine, I feel so comfortable after it."

"I never could like wine while I could get spirits," said Wisp, who never took his eye off the arch fiend who was prepared for any desperate act, provided it would secure his liberty.

"I have been made a present of my life this time," thought Wisp; if I had drank the old fellow's wine I think it would be the last drink I would take in this world. How many more escapes am I to have this night?"

"Come Mr. Isaacs, I will wait no longer, you must get to bed; I am tired," continued Wisp; "do you go before me."

The Jew ascended the stairs leading to his bedroom, followed by the bailiff. When they had arrived at the first landing Isaacs suddenly extinguished the light, and rushed up the creaking stairs for the purpose of making for the attic room, and from thence to get off by the roof.

The bailiff sprang after the fugitive, who had a great advantage from his knowledge of the place. It was pitch dark, but the creaking of the old stairs under the tread of the Jew told Wisp the way the despairing runaway was taking.

When the Jew had arrived at the top lobby he found to his dismay that the garret door was locked, but in a moment he made a desperate resolve. He drew aside and waited the approach of his pursuer, and on the bailiff reaching the top of the stairs he made a thrust at him with a dagger knife, and wounded him in the left shoulder.

Wisp shouted out "murder," and before Isaacs had time to repeat his blow, he was firmly grasped in the arms of the bailiff, who, with all his strength dashed the Jew prostrate on the floor, and kicked him until he became all but senseless. Wisp kept his feet on the chest of the prostrate Jew while he was striking a light with the assistance of some tinder, and a flint and steel, which he always carried in his pocket. When he had succeeded in obtaining a light he literally threw the Jew down the stairs before him, and dragging him into the squalid bed-room in which the man of Israel used to repose, he threw the half-unconscious wretch on his bed, and proceeded to examine the window, which he found was strongly secured by iron bars.

As the hour approached when Bramble promised to call, Wisp proceeded to tell the Jew to get up. He knocked and called repeatedly, but getting no answer, he opened the door. The Jew was in the same position that he was in when the bailiff last saw him. His eyes were open, and looked exceedingly brilliant. Wisp called him again, and getting no reply, he seized him by the arm, and for the first time discovered that Abraham Isaacs was stone dead.

"I am glad you are come," said Wisp; "the Jew is dead up stairs in his bed; when the Black Doctor arrived, he first attempted to poison me, and after to murder me with a knife."

"Let us see him at once," said Bramble, as he went up stairs, followed by Barman and Wisp.

When the Black Doctor entered the Jew's room, he said:

"I smell almonds. Hydrocyanic acid settled Mr. Isaacs's accounts in this world—it was too good a fate for the wretch. Did you hear no noise?" continued Bramble, addressing Wisp.

"I did," replied the bailiff; "I heard the Jew give one scream, and when I went to see what was the matter, he was lying as you now see him."

"Here is the phial," said Bramble, as he took a small bottle from the right hand of the dead Jew. "I knew it was prussic acid that killed him. Don't allow any person to stir anything in this room until you inform the coroner of his death."

The numerous keys of Abraham Isaacs were soon put into requisition, and it was stated that Bramble, Barman, and Wisp reaped a golden harvest from the coffers of the Jew before the Black Doctor and Barman left for Equity-row, and Wisp to inform the coroner of his fate.

Amongst the treasures of the Jew—his ill-got gain—did the Black Doctor, Barman, and the bailiff rummage; and having amply repaid themselves for all the trouble Isaacs had given them, they retired from the house, leaving the corpse of the Jew in sole possession. There he lay, stiff and cold, with his glazed eyes staring on vacancy, hunted to his death by the deep and unrelenting vengeance of his pursuers.

The usual formality of an inquest having been gone through; the coroner having written down the verdict of the jury before a word of evidence was given, all that was mortal of Isaacs was ordered to be buried at some cross road; and, as the worthy deceased was stated to have committed self-murder, his property was confiscated to the crown.

Barman and Bramble rejoined Tony at Equity row, when the two former entered into close conversation.

"I have to thank you, Barman," said the Black Doctor, "for the part you have played in the transactions in which we have been lately engaged. I trust that you feel that I have acted fairly towards you in all my dealings, and, now that I am going to leave this country, perhaps for ever, I would like to hear from your own lips that you are satisfied with my conduct in the desperate game which we have brought to a sorrowful conclusion. We have made well, but you must take care of Quill and Wisp, as both have the Fosters in their power."

"In all things, Doctor, you have acted straightforwardly with me," replied Barman, "and I am not only satisfied but grateful to you. Now, may I ask, what induced you to come to the determination of leaving Ireland?"

"On that subject I would rather not be questioned," observed Bramble, who bade the attorney and Quill a cordial good bye, and accompanied by Tony, took his departure. That night the Black Doctor and the boy left by the mail packet for England.

The attorney lost no time in informing the Fosters of their good fortune, and they who had endured so much privation, and felt the bitterness of poverty, were now restored to affluence and comfort. The regret of Foster and his wife on hearing that Bramble and

Tony had gone without seeing them was deep and sincere, as was also that of Stammers, who was apprised by Quill of the circumstance, but "out of sight out of mind," as far as Bramble and Tony were concerned, was soon proved to be true;—they were seldom spoken of or even thought of save by the Fosters, who now resided at "Rosemary," one of the most delightful spots that could be selected amidst the mountain glens of Wicklow. Often in the tranquil evenings would the Fosters speak of the wanderers, and, with hearts full of gratitude, wish that Bramble and Tony were present to share the peace and comfort which they had restored.

Barman's office went through a thorough revolution. It was painted, cleaned, and proper furniture succeeded the rickety old desk and tumble down chairs and tables. Jacob Barman paid his licence to practice, which he had never done before, and a large brass plate on the door announced the fact that he was a solicitor. Wisp was retained in the office with Quill, and the latter became remarkable for the care he took of his personal appearance, and for the amount of money which he was wont to spend on shilling gloves and penny cigars. Business thrived at Equity Row, and Barman took a country house, and became even more aristocratic than other attorneys. The folk at Elam place lived as usual—the Berkeleys called to see them or they called to see the Berkeleys, and after some time it was whispered that Charlotte Stammers was to be married to a gentleman past sixty, who was very rich, and who called daily in new white kids, and a crimson and blue nose. This was Sir Pudding Plump, Bart., a great man at his club, who at length made up his mind to become a Benedict. But this, like the thousand and one rumours which gossip sets afloat, was erroneous.—Sir Pudding was a friend of Colonel Stammers', and his frequent visits at Elm place were for the purpose of negotiating a match between his nephew and Charlotte. This nephew was Walter Lindsay Plump, heir to the title and estates of his uncle—a dashing young fellow, with just as much brains as would qualify him to be a cornet of dragoons. He was accepted as the husband of Charlotte, who was duly married to him with all the formal solemnities of a fashionable wedding.

Time rolled on, carrying its burden of griefs and joys to their destinations, bringing hopes to some, and despair and death to others; but subduing all things in its silent though triumphal progress. A mighty victor, sparing neither age or sex, and dealing out impartial justice to all—bringing down the most exalted, and raising the most lowly; putting the parvenu above the aristocrat—sparing old age and infirmity, and smiting the beautiful, the strong, and vigorous. Time works wonders, but none so great as that of craving from the human heart, a lingering wish to revisit familiar scenes, where that portion of life was spent, no matter whether in pain or pleasure, that never can be recalled—that period which "even in sorrow is sweet."

The mail coach dashed along a dusty highway in the county of Wicklow, on a scorching day in the June of 1820, and drew up at a stage to change horses. While the steaming and jaded animals were being unharnessed from the conveyance, two persons alighted. They appeared to be in a very humble position in life, and bore about them the signs of travel and exposure to the weather, and to a hot sun. One seemed to be most feeble, as he had to avail himself of the assistance of his companion to descend from the place on the top of the coach which he had occupied. Notwithstanding that the day was very hot, his face was muffled up, and he appeared to be enduring great suffering.

"We will stop here, Tony," said he, "at least for a while, until we provide a car which will drive us over to Foster's."

It was the Black Doctor who spoke; how changed, what a miserable wreck of the once strong and fearless Brutus Bramble! There he stood, apparently dying, leaning on Tony, now a fine young man, who never left his patron in his long and weary wanderings.

"Very well," replied Tony, "we can easily get a car, but you require some rest."

"I will have it soon," replied Bramble,—"rest that will not be broken by the cares of this life, of which I am weary—most weary. How little changed this place appears since I saw it last, and how many happy days does it recal to my memory," observed the speaker, as he gazed on the glorious panorama spread out before him. "Is there anything in the world more beautiful," continued he, and he said musingly, "how true it is that in search of pleasure, we leave true joys behind us."

Physical suffering had entirely subdued the animal, and developed the man in Bramble. He was no longer the fiery, impulsive young man, but one, patient, reflective and humbled, and showing forth the light of his fine, intelligence, which vice and passion had clouded, when we last knew him.

A car having been obtained, Tony and Bramble proceeded on their way to "Rosemary." As they drove along, the poor invalid became quite altered, as the perfume-laden air breathed upon him, and a smile of tranquil peace was expressed on the face of him, in whose breast at one time the fiercest passions had unbridled sway.

After an hour's drive, the car stopped opposite the rustic gate leading to the lawn of "Rosemary." Two elegantly-dressed children in charge of a servant, were playing with a large dog, in the vicinity of the entrance.

"How like his mother that boy is, Tony," said Bramble, as he pointed to one of the children.

"Yes," replied Tony; "the very image of Mrs. Foster."

At a signal from Bramble the servant opened the gate, and in a few minutes the travellers were in front of the hall-door of Rosemary Cottage, around which the honeysuckle, clematis, and sweetbriar twined. It was a rustic bijou. It was thatched, and furnished with one of the most charmingly constructed porches. The windows were in perfect keeping with the character of the structure, and the extensive grounds which spread out around it were kept with exquisite care. A stream of the purest water, after meandering through the garden at the rear, found its way in front of the house to a fish-pond, after visiting which it took another excursion in the fields, and then ran hiding into deeply-wooded nooks, where it pretended to be angry with everything. It then would take another thought, and tumble head and heels over a number of moss-covered rocks, and after getting at the bottom, it would be off in search of another stream as eccentric as itself. Indeed, "Rosemary" was a delightful place, but its chief charm consisted in the splendid views which it commanded of mountain, wood, and water.

Before Tony could knock at the door, Mr. and Mrs. Foster, who had been sitting in one of the front windows, recognised Tony. They simultaneously rushed to the door, and warmly embraced him.

"Welcome a thousand times," said the lady and her husband, in a breath; "come in; bring in your friend, Tony. I am so glad; Tony, I will die with joy," and a thousand such expressions were poured forth as Tony was turned round and round to be inspected.

"Laura, as I live, here is Dr. Bramble on the car," said Foster.

In one moment Tony was forgotten, and the lady was soon beside her husband, who was tenderly assisting poor Bramble to alight. Big tears rolled down the gentle woman's face, as she observed the change which had come over the deliverer of her husband and herself, and it was with much difficulty Foster could control his emotion, as he led the Black Doctor into the cottage, followed by Mrs. Foster and Tony.

It would be superfluous to say, that all that kind and gentle treatment could accomplish was done by Mrs. Foster for her benefactor, and she had the pleasure of seeing her patient, after a few days, regain a little strength; but Bramble's days on earth were destined to be few. He walked occasionally about the grounds, and amused himself with the children, the eldest of whom was called after him; but his malady increased in virulence, and he gradually sank under it; and often in his short rambles with Tony he spoke with philosophic calmness of death, which he knew not to be far distant.

Towards the close of a fine autumn evening, Bramble, whose life was ebbing fast, addressed Mr. and Mrs. Foster, who with Tony were standing near his bed, and said:

"If the thanks of a dying man be of any use to you, you have my heart's sincerest thanks for all your kindness; but to show you that I am not yet done asking favours, Tony, my true and trusted friend in all my wayward journeyings through good and through evil fortune, must be your special charge. You owed me little; to him you owe everything; but with that dignity of true worth, he concealed his merits beneath his modesty. I leave him to you, as my only bequest;" and calling Tony, who was sobbing as if his heart would break, to come closer to him, he placed his favourite's hands in those of Mr. and Mrs. Foster, who were quite overcome with grief. The dying man continued, "Be as faithful to the Fosters as you have been to me, and you shall be deserving of all honour. I have now done, but to bid you an affectionate good-bye."

The effort he had made was too much for him, and he sank back exhausted on his pillow. His mind began to wander, and from time to time he would mention the names of Tony and Charlotte. Every moment his breathing grew less distinct, and as the sun was sinking behind the distant mountains, the spirit of Brutus Bramble tranquilly passed away.

The day but two after his death the remains of the Black Doctor were placed in the secluded spot which he himself had pointed out, in an adjacent church-yard, and over the grave Foster had erected a simple tomb, on which was inserted merely the name, age, and date of the death of his friend.

Our story has now drawn to its close; but perhaps it is necessary to say that Tony became one of the family circle as "Rosemary," and became a most respectable man, and when we heard last of him, he was no less than a grandfather. Old Nelly lived to an advanced age with the Fosters. Squint, who figured in the earlier part of our little narrative, it is said, is doing very well in the colonies. Joey Dix stole and sold dogs, and stole and sold them again, up to the period of his demise, a few years since. The Stammers forget or seem to forget all about forged bills, and even Robert Stammers Esq, D.L. is not much pleased when the name of the Black Doctor is mentioned.

And now, kind and gentle reader, good bye; our little story has arrived at that to which all things however great or however lowly must come—a conclusion. We have made an humble effort to sketch some people as we have found them; and if we have failed, we will not be much disappointed, as very few men, however gifted, can expect to give general satisfaction, if they prefer to draw on their experiences rather than on their imagination for facts.

CHAPTER II.

INNYY Mac went in as he was desired, but not, as the event proved, to make so brief a sojourn in the household as the proprietor intended. A succession of incidences not worth detailing prevented his departure that day, and the next, and the next after that, until habit, hospitality, and convenience combined to establish him among the retainers of the domicile, in that equivocal office which in Irish rustic families, is designated by the word gorsoon. His duty for many years was to run on messages to the neighbouring hamlet—to fetch a daily pennyworth of tobacco for the old woman—to keep the pigs upon their good behaviour—drive home the cows at night—watch the gardens at seed time—and in short, “turn his hand,” and his feet, too, occasionally, to anything which it needed not the exertion of maturer limbs to accomplish. As far as attention to, and cheerfulness in the execution of every trust confided to him could go, it was impossible for Dinny—or Dionysius, as his new and more formal protectors called him—to give greater satisfaction to his patron than he did; but there was one evil occasioned by his presence in the house, which more than counterbalanced all his merits. The effect which his first appearance had produced on the infant daughter of the Palatine continued progressively on the increase, through the subsequent stages of childhood, girlhood, and youth; and at fifteen years of age the sensation with which she regarded the daring and dark-minded lad, might be found to resemble, in every particular, the mingled emotion of fear and admiration which he had occasioned her on the morning when accident first conducted him to her father’s house. The real nature of the feeling continued precisely the same, but that time, long habit, unavoidable proximity of intercourse, and the gradual development of her own character as it approached the seriousness of womanhood, had strengthened and deepened the affection into a rooted and engrossing passion—a circumstance evidently unfortunate for the poor girl, and the more extraordinary as the progress of intimacy with, and consequent insight into the character and disposition of her father’s dependant, was not calculated to add a well-founded esteem to the emotions which he had already excited in her mind. With this, however, we, as her historians, are not disposed to quarrel, for it is apparent that if love were not in the gentler ex altogether an anomaly—if woman made her reason on all occasions the counterpoise to her affections, and never yielded her heart on any terms but those of convenience, the very foundation of all romance would be annihilated. Her father, however, who was no philosopher, and could by no possible train of reasoning bring himself to discover, points of coincidence or suitability between two characters filling situations almost as distinct as those of menial and mistress, was overwhelmed with indignation and astonishment when the probability of so preposterous an attachment first broke upon him. A few words of fierce recrimination ended in an oath of eternal hatred and enmity between him and his protégé, and the latter was ejected from the dwelling where he had spent the greater portion of his life, with as little ceremony as was used in a similar predicament by the Baron of Thunderclonk.

Some confinement, a little reasoning, a great deal of menace, and a natural pliability of character, soon produced all the effect which her father could have wished on the affections of the imprudent Sarah Segur. The proud spirited beggar-boy never appeared in the neighbourhood after—and seemed even to have extended his ready hatred to the gentle and suffering cause of his dis-favour. 'Twas but a few weeks' peaking and pining—some dozen sighs—half dinners—tears—and one fit of hysterics, and Sarah Segur was again the bright-haired, blue-eyed, soft-cheeked ornament of her native village, and delight of her father's heart. What became of her first love, she neither asked nor seemed to care.

Two years after this transaction, a very strong inducement held out by a commercial relative in Germany, occasioned a total revolution in the affairs of the worthy farmer. Committing his farm to the care of a cousin, and his daughter to the guardianship and tutelage of an experienced female relative, he exchanged, during some years, the land of his birth for that of his ancestors, and found the advantage of the sacrifice he made of his domestic convenience, in a considerable increase of wealth. For some time, the accounts which he received from home were such as to leave him no ground to regret the step which he had taken, and he went on, boarding money, and forming a thousand different schemes for its disbursement, when a letter from his daughter, informing him, though in the most guarded and cautious manner, of the re-appearance of the delinquent Dinny in the neighbourhood, and even at the cottage of the Palatine, startled and filled him with dismay and apprehension. She described him in the most touching manner, as presenting a picture of misery, of repentance, and abject poverty, which would make resentment not only inhuman but ridiculous, and ended by suggesting, in a very circuitous way, the possibility of an entire reformation in the young man, in case her father should give him another trial. The sagacious Palatine, however, judged that either the inexperience or the enthusiasm of the letter-writer had led her into error, so far as her prognostic was concerned; and he was, although much against his inclination, compelled to suspect that she had used more or less exaggeration in her account of the young rebel's mean submission. His estimate of Dinny's character was right, although it was very true that the latter had, as Sarah mentioned, made his appearance on the farm. Segur immediately answered the letter in a tone of violent and unabated indignation, and the subject was not again renewed. In a little time after, an account reached him that his kinsman had been struck with blindness, and that several losses in consequence had accrued to the property. This latter circumstance, however, which he was sufficiently provided against, gave him not a tithe of the uneasiness which was occasioned by the irregularity, and at length the infrequency of the letters which were transmitted to him from his family, and the conviction that some dreadful change had taken place, was soon confirmed by the total cessation of all communication whatever. Filled with a thousand alarms and uncertainties, he was now returning to ascertain the cause, whatever it might be, of the singular neglect which had pained him.

In the meantime it is necessary that we should glance at the fortunes of his young foe during the interval. He had contracted, soon after his expulsion from the Palatine's household, a close friendship with the sole offspring of his unkind mother's second marriage, who had been, for some years past, left with himself in a state of orphanage, under circumstances peculiarly calculated (if that alone had not been sufficient) to bind them to each other; in a league, too, much closer than that involved by the general claims of their relationship, which, according to the opinions of the class in which they were brought up, are sufficient grounds for a casus fœderis of mutual offence and defence on all occasions. The brothers resided together in the cabin in which they had first seen the light—held their acre of potato-ground in common, lived together, worked together, fought together, and drank together. This very closeness of attachment, however, had unhappily the effect of involving them in a greater number of quarrels with their neighbours than that to which the hereditary privilege of an Irish peasant might be supposed fairly to entitle them. The secret of this tendency to disunion might be found in the fact that either of the friends was far more apt to resent an insult, real or imagined, offered to the other, than if he had received it in his own person; and the natural consequence was that before long, their hands, like those of Ishmael, were against every man's, and every man's hand against theirs. Still, however, there was no deep moral offence, of such a nature as could awaken the serious indignation of their neighbours, imputed to them, and their extraordinary fondness for fighting had only the effect of injuring themselves, and increasing the custom of the village apothecary.

Great therefore was the consternation which spread through the cottage circles, when one summer morning as the Macnamaras were leaving their humble cabin with their slanes on their shoulders, in order to proceed to their daily toil—a party of soldiers, with a magistrate at their head, intercepted their progress, and laying hands on the younger brother, arrested him in the name of the king for a midnight assault on the dwelling-house of the very man who was appointed the guardian of his property and his child, by the Palatine. It came like a thunder-stroke upon the mind of the elder brother, Dinny—as he was still called—he thought it impossible that the transaction could have taken place without his knowing it; he remonstrated violently, but the civil officer persisted in the course he was pursuing, and the sullen silence of the younger, joined to the paleness and conscious anxiety which overspread his features, operated with a more fearful influence upon the incredulity of the youth, than all the confident pertinacity of his accusers. The prisoner was led away and flung into the county gaol, after wringing the hand of his relative with a bitterness of feeling, which those only can imagine who part for the first time with a good friend, and leave him no legacy but shame and loneliness.

Neither has it fallen to the lot of many to know what the degree of that loneliness was in the instance of the elder Macnamara. Unacquainted with, from the manner of his education, as well as unfitted, from the nature of his disposition, for the exercise of any of those noble resources by which more cultivated minds are enabled to support themselves beneath the pressure of an unforeseen affliction, he abandoned himself without an effort at resistance, to the spirit of desolation which came upon him. He became spiritless and desponding, neglected his employments, forsook the wake, the dance, the fair, the hurling match, and the public-house, and awaited in helpless anxiety the issue of his brother's trial, stalking like one that is moped with sorrow, around the precincts of the prison, shunning the sight and converse of his old acquaintances, and pitied even by those whose heads bore frequent testimony to his promptitude and ready spirit in earlier and prouder days. Had the offence with which his brother was charged been merely an outrage, it would only have affected his fortunes, or his personal safety, and left some consolation to those who bore his name; but theft—sheep-stealing had been superadded, and disgrace was fixed upon his reputation; for, among the peasantry of Ireland, their proverbial honesty is not so much occasioned by their abhorrence of the positive injury which the contrary practice inflicts on their neighbour, as by their contempt for the indication which the latter affords of a low and mean spirit on the part of the perpetrator. Thus, for instance, on one occasion, when the elder brother overheard a neighbour "wondering that anybody wouldn't drop down with the shame, to be caught doin' such a mane thing," and retorted on the hag, that she had herself had a son hanged for murder, she replied with infinite composure and satisfaction, "Oh, the heavens be praised that it wasn't a cow or a sheep he stole!"

The compassion entertained for the elder and unsuspected brother, was sufficient to procure him admission on the day of Macnamara's trial, within the precincts of the bar, and at the foot of the table appointed for the accommodation of evidence and of the crier, a bustling and important personage, whose duty it is in Irish courts to be as noisy as possible in procuring "silence"—to perform the part, of mouthpiece to the clerk of the crown—marshal the spectators to their different places—thrust out the orangewomen—knock little boys on the head with a long white wand—and convey by means of a slit in the end of said wand, epistles from all quarters of the court. Under the patronage of this great man, poor young Macnamara was permitted to occupy one of the steps leading to the witness table, while his brother was called on before God and his country, to answer to a charge of life and death.

It is needless to enter into any detail either on the particulars of the case, or the feelings of the friends, according as every circumstance of corroboration was brought forward; until at length, the deep and deadly conviction of the guilt of the accused became stamped upon the mind of every spectator, and was manifested by the emphatic nod and compression of the lips, which passed in silence among the more intelligent of the listeners. Still, however, the eyes of the devoted wretch and his forlorn relative were fixed, in all but utter hopelessness, upon the door of the jury room; the stake at issue being too awfully great to permit them to yield up their reliance upon the hope which they knew to be unfounded, until circumstances should have forcibly torn it from them. That door at length was opened, and the doom of the prisoner was manifested in the solemn and reluctant manner of the foreman, as he tendered the written verdict to the clerk of the crown. The criminal cast a dreary glance around him, when called upon to plead against his sentence, but could not utter a word; and the judge had already proceeded far in his discourse to the prisoner, and was approaching the usual form of condemnation, when a figure, pale, wild, and haggard in gesture and appearance, appeared on the witness table. It was that of the elder Macnamara. He raised his hands imploringly toward the bench, while his frame shook and his features quivered with emotion.

"My lord!" he exclaimed, "stop talken to the boy, for 'twas I done the deed."

A universal murmur of astonishment passed through the court at this declaration. A whisper at the same time was circulated among the counsel, the import of which seemed to be confirmed by the half-crazy appearance and demeanour of the youth. The prisoner was appealed to.

"My lord," he replied with a mournful toss of the head, "I wouldn't have you give in to him—I won't say it was myself done it—but it wasn't he any way."

The young man was in consequence removed, as a person whose enthusiastic affection had affected his reason, and, as the legal phrase is, judgment and execution followed accordingly, in the person of the younger brother.

The original character of the elder Macnamara was now completely restored. He once more resumed all, and more than all, the ready violence and fierceness of demeanour for which he was formerly far more remarkable than his dead brother, and seemed to exist only in the hope of being one day enabled to avenge the blood of the latter, against his prosecutor, the guardian Segur, and the whole of his family, excepting perhaps the innocent object of his own early attentions. He now seemed to have abandoned every other care but that of gratifying this single passion. His cabin was forsaken, his garden left untilld, all his accustomed haunts appeared to be forgotten or deserted, and he might occasionally be observed gliding at nightfall, like a spectre, among the sally-groves and along the hedges in the neighbourhood of his enemy. The latter felt that he had deep cause to regret a transaction which rendered him obnoxious to a being so desperate and ill-conditioned as his persecutor. He was a weak, sickly man, of a nervous and almost feminine feebleness of mind and frame, and never dared venture out unaccompanied by some person of strength sufficient to protect him against any attempt which could be made on his life; and even with these precautions he found himself compelled to eat his bread amid all the terrors of insecurity. All the exertions and persuasions of his friends, his niece among the number (who calculated much on her own influence over the mind of the young man, if they could but find an opportunity of using,) were ineffectual in restoring calmness to his mind. His sleep was broken by frightful dreams, and the oath which his foe had taken in his own hearing, that he would have "blood for blood before the grass should wither on his brother's grave," sounded for ever in his ears. After many fruitless efforts, however, to obtain an opportunity of accomplishing his threats, young Macnamara suddenly disappeared from the neighbourhood, and nothing more was seen or heard of him for several months. Better hopes began to break in upon the mind of the object of this hate, and he ventured, after some time spent in many vain endeavours to ascertain the position of his enemy, to resume his wonted occupations about the farm without fear of personal danger.

He was returning on a bright moonlight night from a water-mill in his own neighbourhood, where he had remained to a late hour, superintending the grinding of a considerable quantity of corn, and making the night jovial with the miller, in the excess of his delight at a piece of good news with which the latter had been entertaining him. This was no other than that one Dennis Macnamara had been tried and convicted at the assizes of Cork, for some felonious offence, and obtained a free passage in a king's ship bound for the new world. They had been quaffing to the favourable passage of the young emigrant, until Segur became

"Na that fou
But just a drappie in his ee," and solemnly protested, in a speech much more remarkable for the emphatic energy and needlessly vehement gesticulation with which it was delivered, than for its eloquence or sound sense, against taking another tumbler.

He had proceeded already a considerable distance on his way home. His health appeared to have been restored at a word. He trod the earth as if he were not of the earth, he threw his hat airily upon the side of his head, stepped on his toes, and with gay and expanding bosom chanted (in a manner which sounded to his own ears extremely loud, articulate, and musical, but which in those of an unprejudiced listener appeared remarkable for the irregularity of its cadences, the unreasonable vehemence of an occasional bar, and a general tendency in the pronunciation of the words to dispense altogether with the use of consonants)—chanted, we say—a recollected stanza of the famous national air:

"He that goes to bed, and goes to bed mellow,
Lives as he ought to do,
Lives as he ought to do,
Lives as he ought to do, and dies an honest fellow."

He was in the act of ascending a slight acclivity covered with furze bushes, through which the pathway winded, when a heavy panting, and a sound of footsteps in rapid pursuit, alarmed, and made him turn round. He beheld, in the clear moonlight, not more than three yards from the spot on which he stood, the figure of his enemy in the act of rushing upon him, while the pantings of his weariness were mingled with a horrible self-suppressed laugh of ecstatic expectation. The light shone full upon his countenance. It was wasted almost to the very skeleton, the eyes were distended and protruding to an unnatural degree, and the thin lips were dragged back by the ghastly smile, so as to expose the teeth, which were fast clenched, half in rage, half in triumph. The sight instantly and perfectly sobered poor Segur. Uttering a low cry of horror, he clasped his hands above his head, and fled down the hill with the speed of winged Fear itself, in the direction of the mill.

It lay at a considerable distance from the spot, and the poor, sickly wretch's heart sank within him when he recollected, even in the extremity of his affright, the reputation for agility as well as strength which the youth had obtained in his neighbourhood. But the latter was no longer the man he had been in those days. Famine, disease, and anguish of mind and frame had fastened upon him, and reduced his personal vigour nearly to the same level with that of his intended victim. Fear, moreover, is perhaps a fleetier passion than revenge, and Segur did not speedily lose the advantage which he had at the outset. His pursuer was so close upon his track that he sometimes felt his fingers upon his shoulders, but the slight touch operated with an electrical influence upon his frame, infusing new and sudden vigour into his limbs, and enabling him for a moment to place a wider distance than before between his enemy and himself. Lights were seen still burning in the windows of the mill as they approached, and the broad door stood invitingly open at the distance of a few hundred yards, while several figures passed to and fro in the interior, fully revealed in the strong light. Both now made a desperate effort—Segur, cheered by the prospect of succour—his pursuer, maddened by the apprehension of losing this single opportunity of vengeance. Putting, therefore, to its extremest trial a frame into which a morsel of food had not entered for the last two days, he closed on the frightened Palatine just as he gained the doorway—fixed his fingers on his throat, and staggered with his prey into the centre of the mill-house. Half-suffocated by the pressure of his neck, the latter could only give vent to a low gurgling sound, and extend his arms for aid towards the astonished workmen. The desperate youth endeavoured to drag him towards that part of the room where the great machine was performing its rapid and gigantic evolutions—but his strength failed him—the struggles of his victim were sufficient to baffle his efforts until the workmen rescued him from the death-grasp—when extending his fingers in a feeble and delirious effort to renew the hold which he had been compelled to relinquish, he fell forward on the earthen floor in a state of utter exhaustion.

A few days after this adventure, while the young man was still confined to a sick bed in the neighbourhood, by the consequences of the dreadful exertions of body and mind which he had undergone; and while the object of his hate still continued half-bewildered by the recollection of the hair-breadth escape he had experienced, a fair ambassadress arrived on the part of the latter. It was a long time since the youth had seen Sally Segur, with her light straw hat tied simply under her small chin—her gentle soft eyes, and blooming healthful countenance—her light and neatly attired figure, so characteristic in all its details of cottage peace and comfort—and the sight affected him more deeply than he imagined anything could have done. It was not that his love for her was at any time of a deep or ardent nature—on the contrary, he had been suspected by some few individuals of being visionary enough to entertain such a sentiment towards a young person far his superior in rank and endowments, who had once condescended to honour him with her hand at a village merry-making, but he had regarded Sally with feelings of affection notwithstanding, and her appearance now, unexpected as it was, suddenly threw him back upon the memory of happier days, and overpowered him with the anguish of retrospection. It was long, too, since Sally had seen her old lover, but all that she had heard, and all that she could imagine, was insufficient to prepare her for the shocking alteration which he had undergone. She reached him her hand, and turning in dismay and agony from the wild and sepulchral stare which he fixed upon her, sunk with a burst of tears into a chair at the bed-side.

All that the eloquence of passion, and of virtuous enthusiasm, all that youth, beauty, and suppliant tears could do to move him from his purpose of revenge, was done by the affectionate girl. She bade him remember their former friendship—modestly urged her own sufferings and truth—and conjured him, for his sake and hers, to forget what was past, and wait patiently for a time of happiness that was sure to come. He heard her without argument or acquiescence, and suffered her to depart with the conviction that she had prevailed nothing.

Her visits were frequently renewed, as the convalescent began to improve in health and spirits. She had, unfortunately, at length, an opportunity of strengthening her plea by the intelligence that her uncle and guardian, whose nerves had been completely shattered by this last shock, had on that morning, when all the world arose to the enjoyment of light and mirth, awoke to the dreariness of an eternal night—he had been struck with blindness.

The news gave no pleasure to his enemy. He appeared even to regret a misfortune which had not proceeded from his own hand, and in the prosecution of what he considered his just revenge, but he could not altogether appear insensible to the anguish of the gentle mediator. He took refuge from her entreaties in counter solicitations—urged, as she had done, their ancient vows, and stipulated as a condition by which his amity, or rather his indifference, was to be purchased—that Sally should at once consent to have those vows accomplished, and accompany him to a distant part of the country. He met, as in all probability he had himself anticipated, a direct, though not an indignant refusal; but the young maiden did not deem it necessary to avoid his society, while she persevered in the observance of what she was taught to consider her duty.

Again the evil spirit appeared to have taken possession of the soul of the young man. Finding that he could not prevail on his love to sacrifice to him her obedience to her parent, whom she both loved and feared, with an intensity only inferior to that which she felt for the youth himself, he overwhelmed her with reproaches, renewed his protestations of vengeance, and left her half dead with grief and fear. Several months rolled on, and nothing more was heard of him in the neighbourhood. Divers reports then got into circulation; it was asserted by some that he had joined the smugglers on the western coast—by others that he had enlisted under the banners of the successor of the notorious Redmond O'Hanlon (the Robin Hood of his time and country) and his mates—while a few were found to say that he had selected the more honourable and legitimate standard of his lawful sovereign. Nothing certain, however, was learned of his proceedings, and in some time further his name appeared to have been forgotten. Sally, in the meantime, had greater difficulty in reconciling herself to this his last desertion of her than to the former—for, in the unresisted intercourse which subsisted between them, the passion which she indulged had become more firmly rooted in her heart than ever.

It was an unfortunate circumstance for her, likewise, that her uncle's misfortune prevented him from exercising that rigid surveillance over her motions, which might be necessary to the prudent government of a young maiden of her rank, gifted with spirits so light and heedless, and feelings so deep and susceptible as hers. She contracted a greater number of intimacies among the girls of her own rank in the neighbourhood, than was in accordance with the injunctions of her rigid father—frequented their houses—parties—and festive assemblies—furnishing, on those occasions, when she happened to be detained from home for an unusual length of time, such excuses as were likely to satisfy her querulous old guardian.

Considerable agitation was produced in the adjacent village, by the appearance, one Sunday morning, of a placard, nailed against the trunk of an old elder tree in the chapel-yard, written in characters which the schoolmaster declared, with a countenance of deep and serious reproof, he could compare to nothing more intelligible than "the scratchen of a bantam-cock in a haps o' sand"—and stating that Mr. O'Flanagan, travelling dancing-master, would give lessons during the ensuing fortnight, at Davy Dogherty's barn, at the low rate of two skillens and a tester the week—(precisely what the village Dionysius aforesaid, as he himself declared in terms of high indignation, charged for a whole quarter's instruction in the rudiments of general learning; marvelling deeply in what consisted this superior importance of the heels above the head, unless it originated in people's conceit and vanity)—the said handbill moreover announcing that the week's lesson would be concluded by a ball—"tickets, including a tumbler o' punch, ten-pence—gentleman taking a ticket, allowed to trate a lady, &c., &c."—and concluding, as it has been maliciously, and we believe falsely asserted, with a request that "no gentleman would come without shoes and stockings."

The inhabitants of an Irish village must be reduced very low indeed, when a call, such as that just mentioned, is suffered to pass away unheeded and unanswered. The Albert of the bogs had many pupils—and before the evening of the "ball" arrived, he had disposed, on his own terms, of nearly twice as many tickets as the barn could hold.

Sally was ignorant of the village etiquette which presumed that no "lady" would appear among the belles of the evening, who had not been "trated" by a "gentleman"—otherwise, as she would have allowed no chaperon, she must have remained, much against her own inclination, in her own house. She hesitated not therefore to indulge the strong curiosity which she felt to witness the village festivity, and having provided herself with the master key of all public amusements, she stole away from her uncle's side, and joined a motherly female acquaintance, who was proceeding to the "dance-house," to ascertain the progress made during the preceding week by a hopeful, sleek-headed "boy of her own." They arrived, fortunately for Sally, as she thereby avoided the sneers and whispers of those more fortunate maidens, whose attractions had procured them the protection of cicisbeos, sometime before the ball opened, and while the greater portion of places were yet unoccupied.

DETACHED THOUGHTS.—A helping word to one in trouble is like a switch on a railway track—but one inch between wreck and ruin and smooth, on-rolling prosperity.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

III.—SELSKAR ABBEY, COUNTY WEXFORD.

HE remains of the once celebrated priory of St. Peter and St. Paul, usually styled Selskar, are situated near the west gate of Wexford. It was founded about the year 1190, by the Roches, lords of Fermoy, though it was not an original foundation, but like most of the ecclesiastical buildings in this county, a re-erection on the site of an old church dedicated to the apostles in question. The first treaty ever signed in Ireland with the English was on this spot, in the year 1169, when the town of Wexford surrendered to Dermot M'Murrough and his allies.

This church, with six others, were demolished by order of Oliver Cromwell, when in possession of the town in 1649. The churches so destroyed were St. Patrick's, St. Mary's, St. Bride's, St. John's, St. Peter's and St. Maud's, commonly called Maudlin Town. Not satisfied with levelling these various places of worship, together with the plate belonging to the priory of Selskar, he took possession of a very fine peal of bells, which he shipped for Chester, but which, being of a superior description, were removed a few years afterwards to Liverpool.

The engravings which precede convey a very correct idea of the ruins of the Abbey as they appeared some years since.

The annexed cut represents a sepulchral flag in the ruins, which covered the remains of Richard Stafford, of Wexford, and Anstace, his wife.

The Staffords were descended from John Stafford, a third son of a Buckinghamshire family, who acquired the estate of Ballymachrane, in the county of Wexford, about the reign of King Henry the Seventh; and from him descended the family of Ballyconnor; George Stafford, who built the castle and hall of Wexford; Richard Stafford, above-mentioned, who was descended from a second brother of Ballyconnor; and two other branches who possessed considerable property in Wexford in the reign of James I. and Charles I. The family of Sutton were also of very ancient residence and respectability in Wexford and the adjoining counties; they possessed Old Court, as well as Ballykerrogmore, and were of the same original stock as the Suttons of Tipper, in Kildare. The arms on the stone are empaled, baron and femme.—1.—Argent, three staffs of oak, ragules, two and one for Stafford. 2.—or. the lion rampant gules, treading on a lizard, vert, for Sutton.

WELDING STEEL COLD.—It is well known that lead may be welded in a cold state. If a leaden bullet be cut into two parts, and the bright surfaces be immediately pressed together before they have time to oxidise, a slightly twisting strain accompanying the pressure, the pieces will adhere together as firmly as before they were cut. Steel may be welded by a similar process. At some large mills seven runs of stones are driven from a drum on a vertical iron shaft, which is ten inches in diameter, and fifteen feet in length. This shaft is supported by two or three plates of steel, formed in circular discs, and revolving one upon another, so as to divide the motion of the shaft between them, and diminish the velocity of the rubbing surfaces. The plates, by their revolutions, of course become worn, so that their flat surfaces coincide throughout, these surfaces being perfectly bright. Now occasionally the great weight of the shaft presses out the lubricating material from between two of the plates, and when this occurs, the plates are welded together.

COAL.

N familiar language we may say, with a modern writer, coal is a product of covered-up vegetable matter, retaining its bitumen. When the bitumen drains away, or is driven off, be it by gravitation, solution, heat, or any other means, the solid carbon of the coal-bed from which it has been extracted remains undisturbed in its position in the earth. Anthracite is an example. Perhaps even, as the miners' driftway proceeds, this anthracite may be seen graduating into true bituminous coal—for true coal must be bituminous—at either end, and the whole may form one continuous stratum on the same horizon, unbroken from end to end. Still the part which has lost its bitumen is not the same as the parts in which it is retained. The fragments from the one burn differently from those of the other; their qualities and composition are not alike, and no one would say, under such circumstances, that anthracite and coal were the same thing. The pleader might argue that "anthracite is only coal which has lost its bitumen, and therefore it must be coal after all." Not so.

Change anything you will, and it is no longer the same. Pour sulphuric acid on chalk, the chalk does not go away, it remains where it was; it has not moved, but it is changed. It may be converted into gypsum, but it is no longer chalk. So, when you have burned your coal in your fire, the undestroyed carbon remains. There is in it the fibrous, vegetable structure to be seen, but the cinder is not coal, for it has lost its bitumen and gases. So, if from a coal-bed the bitumen drains away and floats to the top, forming an overspread layer of pure, hard bitumen, that upper stratum of bitumen cannot be a coal-seam. Neither, if the bitumen, in draining away, permeated and saturated the porous shales on which the coal-seam rested, would the bituminous shale thus formed (burning freely, and full of gas) be a coal-bed, any more than if you saturated a brick with tar would that be coal.

As far as the meaning of the word COAL itself is concerned, it may be said that it originally expressed charred wood or charcoal. It was, however, to the Newcastle coal, under the term of sea-coal, that it was first applied to fossil fuel in a general commercial sense. In charters granted by King Henry III., in 1229, privilege is given to certain parties to dig coals in Newcastle, and seven years after (1306) sea-coal was in such extensive use in London, that the Parliament complained to the King of the pollution of the atmosphere by its noxious vapours.

But without going into the etymology of the word, or the history of coal, if the term coal be currently applied at the present day to any specific mineral substance, can we do better than to take, as identifying the substance meant, a mineral, from what is of all others the place for coals? Let us take a piece of true Newcastle coal as a type of what coal is. Undoubtedly everyone will say it is bituminous coal, so then we argue coal must be bituminous. The pleader may remind you that there is Welsh coal, which is anthracite; Devonshire coal, which is culm; and Bovey, or Brown coals, which are lignites. None of these are like Newcastle coal. Is anthracite coal because it comes from Wales? or culm coal because no other sort of fossil fuel is dug in Devonshire? As well would Irish peat be coal because it is plentifully burnt in Ireland. Calling minerals by wrong names does not constitute them what you call them. A shale would not be a slate because you called it so.

How, then, was coal formed? The lands on which the coal-plants grew have passed away; no human eye will see their like again—no human eye saw them, no human hand touched a leaf of those gigantic trees and ferns. No limner's art ever portrayed those dense forests, nor surveyor's pen mapped down the broad estates on which they rankly grew. But certainly as the rays of light tell us of burning metals in the sun, so will the segregation of the earthy particles into which their long and creeping roots penetrated, the bedding of the grains of sand and clay which ultimately covered them up, tell us the story of the ancient physical conditions under which lifeless trunks, and leaves, and boughs became converted into coal.

Low were those ancient lands, surrounded by broad, marshy swamps, bounded by shallow estuaries, up which the salt sea-water gently rose and fell; one can scarcely speak of tide, so smoothly between the stems and undergrowth of water-loving tree-rushes, and through the tangled jungle sluggishly it flowed. Into the muddy waters of estuary and lake, and on the oozy ground around, the leaves fell year by year, as autumnal chills unclothed the trees. And the trees, too, in the roll of time, rotted at their bases by the watery medium in which they grew, toppled over, and became immersed in the boggy soil, under a surface-coating of ferns and humbler plants, mixed with mosses; the rank herbage ever growing, rotting, and fermenting. Green and verdant at top, dark, black, heated, and distilling out from the decaying vegetable matter globules of bitumen below, to mingle with and penetrate the half-rotted, closely-matted mass of leaves and fibres, and of porous wood. Then this putrifying mass was covered up with mud, so that neither gas escaped nor bitumen floated away. Thus was the coal-seam formed. It was not open to the day until it had dried into turf or rotted into soil. But it was covered up at a certain stage of its elaboration, and so preserved for human use.

It may have completed in the earth the process of its conversion into coal, but it was originally the debris of a living vegetation buried under a covering of mud. The accumulation might have been long going on near the surface, new vegetable matter heaped up at top, new bitumen secreting below;—going on for ages before the mass was buried in. Covered in at last, stratum after stratum of mud and of sand are piled over it, the weight of the superincumbent materials press down the spongy fibrous upper part of the future coal-seam into the bituminous lower portion, the semi-fluid bitumen is squeezed upwards amongst the compressed fibres and forced into the pores of the wood, the thickness of the vegetable bed is reduced, and it becomes an almost solid mass of wood and vegetable fibre, impregnated with the bitumen distilled from itself. If it had parted with its gases and bitumen before it had been covered in, it might have become fossil peat. But coal, the product never would have been. Briefly, then, such was the origin of coal. This view of the matter excludes at once the anthracites from any right to the term of coal. Next, to dispose of the lignites. Lignites may or not at some future period—ages to come—be converted into coal. They are not coal yet; they are still ligneous. The woody structure is so well preserved in the brown coal of Switzerland and Germany, that in some places it is used for rafters, beams, and other building purposes. The stages of elaboration are not yet complete, which are requisite for the production of coal. It is the babe, not the man. Anthracite has lost its bitumen. It is the corpse. It might have been coal once, it is less now. Shale is the earth on which the corpse was laid. It may be saturated with its blood, but it is not the body.

Cannel-coal means "candle" coal. When the workmen cut this mineral into long and narrow strips, and light them, they burn like candles—hence the term "candle," or, shortly, "cannel-coal." The affix "coal" does not absolutely mean that the substance is coal. It was added by miners, who called it coal, as they would any other black bituminous substance which they were in the habit of digging from the earth.

If, then, bitumen, whether pressed out of a coal-seam formed, or forming, or issuing from one by its lighter gravity, its liquidity, or from any other cause whatever, settles on the top of that coal-seam, and hardening there, forms a compact bed, can that bitumen correctly be termed coal? Assuredly not. But all this shows how careless and meaningless has been the use of the word. Why not call the "ozokerite," or mineral pitch obtained from the sandstones of the Edinburgh coal-measures, "Candle-coal." It is true it is in some localities soft, for the peasants of Moldavia employ it for greasing their cart-wheels; but the reason why the Scotch "ozokerite" and the "hatchettine," or mineral tallow, of South Wales have escaped the term would seem to be, because they are not as "black as coal."

The so-called "Boghead-coal," from Torbane Hill, Edinburgh, is a lustreless mineral, and apparently closely resembles some of the darker and more bituminous shale from Kimmeridge, in Dorsetshire, rings of which were used for money in ancient times, while the shale is now made to yield a richer revenue, in the shape of 9,050 cubic feet of gas per ton.

SCIENTIFIC JOTTINGS.

ELECTRO-MAGNETISM.

PLUCKER, of Bonn, to whom this branch of physical inquiry already owes so much, has discovered a new field of research in the action exercised by a magnet on an electric discharge induced through a gas in a highly rarefied state.

In a recent memoir, in Poggendorff's "Annalen," M. Plucker has drawn attention to a class of phenomena first described by Ruhmkorff and Du Moncel.

Taking the powerful inductive coil of the former giving off sparks more than a foot long, and bringing the two electrodes between the poles of an electro-magnet in the equatorial direction about half an inch away, on commencing the action the sparks are surrounded by a kind of aureola, which, under the magnetic action, spreads out into a beautiful thin disc, formed of arcs of concentric circles on the same side of the spark, and reaching to the electrodes, as in M. Leroux's experiment with incandescent platinum wire. In the beautiful experiments carried on by M. La Rive, the gaseous conductor revolves round the pole, as the metallic wire is made to do by Faraday, in gas not too highly rarefied. When the exhaustion is extreme, phenomena of a different order present themselves.

When the spark proceeds from the negative electrode, and the vacuum is as perfect as possible, a beautiful electric radiation takes place from the electrode in all directions. M. Plucker points out that this radiation does not obey the laws which regulate the ordinary currents, as under magnetic influence the several rays are all brought into the direction of the force exercised by the magnet, and that all the light is concentrated in this line. Where the force is rectilinear, an electric current following any of the primitive rays would revolve round the line of force without approaching it, in one direction or the other, according to the polarity of the magnet. But in these experiments of M. Plucker this polarity is no longer in question, as all the rays are brought into one direction, forming the curve of magnetic force, which is a neutral line relative to the electro-magnetic action, the magnet exercising no action on its elements. It is M. Plucker's opinion that a nascent current would necessarily take this direction. The phenomena presented by the light surrounding the positive electrode under the influence both of the magnet and the negative electrode, were shown to result from the action exercised on the nascent current, first by the magnet, and secondly by the attraction of the negative electrode.

These new ideas are strongly borne out by M. Ruhmkorff's experiments with an apparatus resembling the well-known "electrical egg." If a vacuum, as perfect as possible, be made in this, and the electric spark be passed through it, instead of the disc mentioned above, a magnificent vault of violet light is seen, formed by the magnetic curves passing by the non-insulated points of the electrode, towards which spreads out a quantity of feeble whitish light from the positive electrode. If now a small quantity of air be admitted, the beautiful violet vault disappears, to give place to a jet of fiery red, issuing from the positive electrode.

AN AUTUMN EVENING.

Low, to the south, the brown woods lay,
And purpling fell across the west,
Where gloomed the heavy river's breast,
Under the waste of cloudy day.

The willows drooped along the brim,
And instant gusts that breathed showers,
Shivered the fiery blossomed flowers
That scattered all the water dim.

And bowed the opal chalices
Of the cold lilies in the mere,
And turned the willows white with fear,
And blanched the tangled poplar trees.

With narrow arch across the flood,
A gothic bridge shot up the ford;
Below, the frothing rapids roared,
And, in the surf, the brown wheel stood.

Heavy, heavier falls the day,
As twilight broods along the hills,
And pointed roofs of water mills
Are hooded in the gathered grey.

The leaves are blown in crimson whirle,
And strike the trunks with flatted palms;
And, in the intermittent calms,
The rain against the window hurle.

And, ghost-like, in the yellow west,
The church spires of the distant town,
Stand black and tall, and tremble down
The vespers of the bells of rest.

Toll out, toll out, the day is done,
Fold down another leaf of time,
The panes are damp with mist and rain,
The golden sand of light is run.

DUNBRODY ABBEY.

HIS ancient and venerable pile, anciently called Dunbrothy, situated at Port St. Mary, once a small town near the confluence of the rivers Barrow and Swire, (now Suir,) is a lasting monument of monastic greatness; but the pealing anthem and the swelling choir have died away in the distance, on the stream of time. Visiting this ancient pile, we will never forget the awe which the grandeur of its stupendous arches and gloomy cells imposed on us. The entrance is on the north side, and a winding staircase brings the visitor to the top of the northern wing, over whose broad wall he may walk in safety to the body of the building, which is ascended by stairs of cut stone, till he arrives at the turrets; some are bold enough to stand on their giddy heights, and some years ago, a gentleman, in attempting the feat, fell to the ground, and was killed on the spot.

Ware informs us that this Abbey was dependent on St. Mary's Abbey, at Dublin; Dugdale, on the other hand, calls it a cell to the Abbey of Bilde-was, in England. These opinions, though apparently opposite, are not without some share of truth, for Jungelin says it had a dependence on St. Mary's, and it also paid a certain yearly acknowledgment to the Abbey of Bilde-was, in token of its ancient dependence. Neither of these authors agree any better as to the time or circumstance of its foundation. It was founded, according to Ware's "Monastereologia," in the year 1182 A.D., by Hervæus de Montemarisco. Du Chesne makes the founder, De Montmorency, marshal to Henry II., and seneschal of the Earl of Pembroke's lands; he further says, that this founder became a monk himself in the said Abbey, and was buried there.

The "Monasticon" acquaints us that Hervæus de Montemarisco gave to the Abbey of Bilde-was the lands of Ardfeithin and Corsnorgop, with their dependencies, provided that they should build an Abbey at Dunbrothy, or St. Mary's Port, in Ireland, and for that purpose gave them the lands of Dunbrothy, on the further condition of their having a sanctuary in the Abbey for all malefactors that should fly thither, which Edward the Third confirmed. The charters in the "Monasticon" mention all these particulars: the Bishop of Ossory and a Bishop of Wexford signed the charter of foundation, whence, it may be concluded, that it passed in Ireland, and not in England; therefore Ware's opinion seems the more probable, did not those charters expressly make out, that the donation was made to the Abbey of Bidevas, in England, and not to that of St. Mary's, Dublin; Jungelm agrees in this foundation, which he dates 1171, A.D., or 1175. Another difficulty occurs by Flatberg asserting that the founder returning into England, became a monk in the Abbey of the Holy Trinity, at Canterbury, which Monks dis-

The ruins of Dunbrody are great, and have a grandeur which at first sight inspires reverential awe; to which the solitude of the place and its wilderness not a little contribute. The walls of the church are pretty entire, as is the chancel. In the church are three chapels, vaulted and groined. The great aisle is divided into three parts by a double row of arches, supported by square piers; the first Chene denies in his genealogy of the house of Montmorency.

The principal benefactors to this Abbey are, first, Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, and Walter, his nephew, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, and after them, Harlemin, who, being a Bernardin monk, was made Bishop of Leighlin, built some part of the church, and was buried in it, A.D. 1217.

side of the arches have a moulding, which springs from beautiful consoles. The tower is rather low in proportion to the building, and is supported by a grand arch. The foundation of the cloisters only remains; they were spacious. The western window is of uncommon form, and the western door under it was magnificent, with filigree work cut in the stone.

LISCARROLL CASTLE.

THE town of Liscarroll is situated in a mountainous part of the county of Cork, and is a very inconsiderable, queer town. In it are the ruins of a very large and strong castle, built, as is generally supposed, by King John, though some attribute it to some of the Strongbowian adventurers.

In the latter end of the month of August, 1642, it was besieged by the Irish army, under Lord Mountgarret, consisting of seven thousand men; and on the second of September, after a siege of thirteen days, it surrendered. However, the very next day, the Earl of Inchiquin came to its relief, attacked the Irish army, and after a very severe contest defeated them, with the loss of fifteen hundred men. It was again taken in 1646, by Lord Castlehaven, with an army of five thousand men.

The Castle is an oblong square, two hundred and forty feet by one hundred and twenty, and was flanked by six great towers, two square and four round, and the walls were thirty feet high. The south entrance was defended by a strong fort, of which very little now remains, as may be seen by the above drawing, which represents the south side.

There are some subterranean passages near the castle, the entrances to which are now entirely filled up.

There was, about fifteen years ago, an extraordinary well, or rather hole, in the vicinity of this town, the depth of which was so great, that if a stone were let fall from the brink, it would not be heard to plunge into the water below for sixteen seconds afterwards. This was a local tradition, but we are not aware that it has ever been satisfactorily authenticated.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER X.

ISS ASHBY rose, very serious, followed by her mother, also very serious, followed also by Victoria and Walter, very jocular both. Is it upon this cold heart leading the way that Mr. Faversham would rest the comfort and the hope of this life? He follows the saintly figure with his eyes, and we tremble for him. Cupid's teeth chatter as he approaches her, and he sets out the feathers of his wings as doves set theirs, when the east wind blows.

The saint is presently seen walking alone to chapel. Plain straw bonnet; plain black mantle; sober brown silk dress. Faversham must be excused when he wonders what on earth his sisters, or the lively Brocklebantes, or the stately Cremdelacremes, would think of the sober little body. Thread gloves weareth she. Let not this page wander near Belgravia. De grace, good Mr. Westerton, take not a single copy; for we would not have it known to Lady Fluke or Countess Deuceace that our heroine is not of "the upper classes."

Jack has lit his black pipe and is puffing the smoke under the rose-buds, pleased to see the drunken flies fall from the moss upon the mould. Mr. Faversham is rocking himself, uneasily, we may be sure, in an American chair, while his host airs his extensive and confused reading. From learned dulness on the one primeval language to sixpenny books on flirts and ballet-dancers, Mr. Ashby is with you. He may confuse the author of the flirt with Dr. Mantill it is true, but he has attacked both. His head is as full of incongruous things, in short, as a clown's pocket. Mr. Faversham respectfully listens. It is easy to agree. An occasional "just so" leaves the listener leisure to speculate on his own plans and troubles, to talk with his inner self, and ask this self what he means to do in that little love matter, or with that little bill. Mr. Faversham had much to say to his friend and counsellor, self. He must agree closely with this self. Here he had been at Jamaica Lodge, during five or six hours, and he was no nearer an explanation with Miss Ashby than he was yesterday. He might have offered to escort her to chapel. As that he was, he had let a good opportunity pass here. When Mr. Ashby proposed that the party should stroll to meet the good young lady on her way home, self declared emphatically to Mr. Faversham that now he must be a man.

And Mr. Faversham was man enough to offer Miss Ashby his arm, and walk before the rest of the party. Now he was alone, and his way was clear. Now, also, a cold shiver came upon him when he saw the unconcern of his companion. Now he felt that he had been a fool to go to the City Hall, and to wait in the passage there for the glance of Miss Ashby's eyes.

A plunge into a general conversation was the natural result of this embarrassment.

"I hear that Mr. Blank brought a very large sum of money," said Mr. Faversham. This subject was as good, he felt, as any other.

"Very large."

"He is very fluent."

"Because he is very earnest."

"I have heard more graceful speakers."

"He wishes to be truthful, not graceful."

It was time to shunt this topic from the main line.

"What was the text this evening?"

"Oh! I'm sure that cannot interest you much, Mr. Faversham."

Here was an opening; and Faversham availed himself of it.

"I am sorry to find, Miss Ashby, that you cannot believe I have serious moments; and that I do occasionally give a thought to religious matters."

Mr. Faversham looked very serious indeed.

"Occasionally! Is religion to be thought of occasionally?"

"Certainly not: most assuredly not. But, unfortunately, men, and especially young men, who are studying law, or medicine; who are artists or authors, are seldom drawn by a strong guiding hand to the church—or chapel—or meeting-house, where as children they went with mother or sister—full, as Sydney Smith says, of 'catchism or bread and butter.'"

"But people should be drawn by their own hearts." Miss Ashby was tapping her skirts thoughtfully with her parasol, as she said this, and was looking to the ground.

Faversham took the opportunity to examine her face. It was pale, and a little thoughtful in expression. He said to himself, here is a strong, devout soul, striving its utmost to be pure! The little saint had given him a home-thrust. Of course, a man's heart should lead him to worship.

"Nothing can be truer. But there are vagabond hearts."

Miss Ashby looked up quickly, and astonished, into her companion's face. What did he mean?

"Vagabond hearts! I mean hearts that are warm, and true; alive to the goodness of God; but that wander, sore and weary, always turning back in the right direction, but as constantly straying in the wrong. Led away from deep-rooted convictions, in an evening's talk with a clever sceptic. Tossed about by all kinds of sentimentalities. Now dazzled by St. Barnabas; now impressed by the quaker's drab."

"I cannot understand this weakness. God's holy words are written, and man's are not to set up in opposition to them. I could hear the most eminent, the brightest men talk, and yet be firm. Human lips cannot falsify Gospel truths."

"Men have not the strong faith of women," said Faversham. "They tilt at everything. There are intellectual autocrats who would delight in the proof that the Christian religion was a baseless dream. It is the life and soul of women to have faith. It is because they put their whole trust in us, that we are so proud to put the rugged shield of our arms about them."

"I thought that you were talking about religious faith," said Miss Ashby.

At the very moment when he was touching the frontiers of the subject upon which his thoughts were bent, he was rebuffed—from the borders of his sweet, warm Italy, he was tossed into the centre of Lapland. But he started at once to his feet; took his stout staff of argument in his resolute hand, and turned his back with determination upon the north.

"But one may be suffered to pursue the natural train of one's thoughts," he expostulated. It is well, at once, even when courting a woman, not to lose the upper hand; to answer boldly anything weak the woman may speak to you. She will graciously give up her untenable positions, and be proud of the man who has shown her that he is the stronger head. Once proud of him, she is ready when it may please him to take her into his arms, and teach her to mould her waxen soul to the image that is his ideal.

"I meant to say that it is the peculiar faculty of women to trust, as it is the nature of man to analyse, and weigh, and doubt, till he can botanize, to use Wordsworth's illustration, upon his mother's grave. I have been too much among these botanists."

"So has John, I fear," Miss Ashby answered.

Jack Ashby! He, among the refiners of intellectual gold; he, among the self-appointed perfumers to the violet. Jack was never shaken, save by an overdose of brandy. Jack's ideas, religious and mundane, were never disturbed by the subtle analysts of creeds, nor by social philosophers of the topsy-turvy school; for, it is our belief, that Jack never had an idea worth disturbing—never, in that hard skull of his, had a cobweb worth the brandishing of a broom. Find us a better heart than Jack's; find us an emptier head than his.

"I believe it is a very bad thing for men to mix almost exclusively with men," said Faversham, working his way to the warm south; "for this reason, that they are apt to put everything into the crucible—to reduce it to powder, and to tease it with their testing paper."

"I don't understand you quite, Mr. Faversham."

Mr. Faversham felt strongly inclined to take the thread glove that was lying upon his arm, and press it to his lips; or to put his arms about a certain slender waist; or to fall on his knees, and say that what he meant was, he should be a good and steadfast man henceforth; a devout man; a regular sitter under—aye, even under Mr. Blank, if the five feet one of angelic purity before him would take him under her spotless wings, and hold him to her virgin heart for ever.

But a sense of the proprieties was very strong in Mr. Faversham—strong almost as his sense of the ludicrous. He remained erect and respectful. There was a light in his eye just then—as it turned to the young lady—a light that dazzled her. He had resolved to press her hand; and, instinctively, she withdrew it. His voice, softened almost to a whisper, was about to speak tenderer words than it had yet uttered, when Miss Ashby said, with the perfect hypocritical calmness of her sex—

"Papa is holding the gate open for us."

And she tripped into the garden of Jamaica Lodge. As she turned the corner of the house, Faversham, watching her, said to himself:

"A blush, as hot as June, comes flooding o'er Her too proud paleness."

Is it only the sunset upon her cheek?

The young lady went direct to her room; and poor trembling Mr. Faversham returned to his American easy-chair, his cool claret, and his cigar. He had been bold—but not bold enough. Yet he was not certain that he had not managed matters for the best. He had laid siege quietly and scientifically; and in laying his plans he had become more strongly determined to enter the gates of the girl's heart, and dwell in the white marble citadel of her soul.

"Well, where shall we finish the evening?" Mr. Jack asked, on the way from Jamaica Lodge to the Temple.

"I shall go direct to bed." Mr. Faversham was serious—and not inclined to talk. But they had missed the last omnibus, and Mr. Jack was not inclined for a silent walk into the great city.

"You're down," Mr. Jack said, therefore, by way of probing his companion's solemnity.

"Not a bit of it; one can't be always standing upon one's head."

"We've had a precious dull evening of it."

"I didn't find it dull. The society of a good woman keeps a man from becoming a brute beast."

"Society!" Mr. Jack exclaimed; "why, my pious sister never showed after chapel time. Grumpy, I suppose, in her own room."

"I'm afraid you cannot understand your sister, Jack. Men are apt to sneer at women's wholesale trust in Bible and Prayer-book, in high church neckcloths and coal-scuttle bonnets."

"If this is going on," (Mr. Jack meant if his little brain was going to be taxed to understand something)—"I shall have a weed."

"Think," Mr. Faversham pursued, as he stood nose to nose with Mr. Jack, lighting his cigar from the burning tip of his companion's cheroot, "think what it costs a woman to close her 'Follet' for ever, and take to the snuff-brown silk, and the grey, great bonnet of a Quakeress. Consider her, my boy, without novel or piano, opera or Chiswick."

"It's her own look out," was Jack's profound answer. "I wonder Jane Clarke doesn't borrow my sister's bonnet for a pattern."

Mr. Faversham would not see Mr. Jack's sneer.

"You don't see, my dear Jack, all the earnestness there is in this kind of thing."

"Don't I?" said Mr. Jack, accompanying his words with a very knowing wink—a wink that appeared to say (winks leave so much to the imagination), 'I saw you this afternoon looking under sister's bonnet, drawing sister out, anxious to press sister's hand, and with almost the courage to do it, when father held the gate open, and the opportunity had gone.' Blunt, unreasoning creatures of the Mr. Jack class see much. It is well for the knowing and the profound, and diplomatic, that these Mr. Jacks are not able to turn their free observations to account.

"We men, (Mr. Faversham was pursuing his train of thought,) think we have accomplished a very great intellectual height, when we say we decline to believe this and that, and when we are able to draw to our help apt quotations from clever disbelievers."

"What's up?" was Mr. Jack's interruption.

"Be serious, you brute, Jack," said Mr. Faversham. "Hang it, let us get off the saw-dust sometimes. Don't let us narrow our minds to the foul circle of a public-house. By George, are we to forget that we have mothers and sisters, and sisters' friends, who would hate us if they could see us boozing at the 'Dolphin,' or pelting one another with oyster-shells in the small hours at Roulé's? I say that when I have been among good, honest, cultivated women, I feel—well, then, I feel a coarse beast with my tavern habits and loose life."

"To-morrow, I begin a month's hard reading."

"Or the next day," Mr. Jack suggested.

Some men are familiarly addressed throughout their lives. Goldsmith was naturally nicknamed,—but he did not call Johnson "Sam" in return. I think it will be found that, as a rule, the man with a nickname has something specially good in him. He attracts men's hearts; they call him, by the nickname they give him, to their bosom. There is a vulgarity in nicknames, it may be; but we must have a truce sometimes with the world. It is the delight of us all to break away occasionally. We have lately seen that an empress enjoys mightily a ride in a hackney carriage.

Now Sam Topley was called Sam, and Sam only. People who met him for the first time, fell into the habit of calling him by his nickname before the evening was over, and were laughed at when they apologized for the accidental familiarity. It was held among his friends to be the height of comedy to call him Mr. Samuel Topley,—even Topley was ceremonious. Sam Topley was known—and only Sam Topley. It was decided to be mighty presuming on his part, when he sent marriage cards to certain strangely-wild acquaintances of his, with "Mr. S. Topley" upon them. Sam Topley was a man who was acquainted with everybody, save with those persons who might have furthered his view in life, if, indeed, he ever had any views. He was simply a hearty man; and would rub his hands over an onion and a crust, for dinner. He was also a careless man, and he contrived adroitly to exhibit his carelessness to the world, by wearing his hat upon the back of his head, and by shewing dogs-eared pockets. He heightened the picture, occasionally, by a lively whistle, or by a light spontaneous dance. When he had only a shilling left in the world (and this was not rare with him), he expressed as much to the company in which he found himself, by holding it in his eye, foppishly, as an eye-glass. At heart there was no better gentleman. Who was his father? and who was his mother? had he a sister? or had he a brother? were questions on which he never deigned to enlighten even his most intimate friends.

Nevertheless, Sam Topley was a gentleman, and gently born:—we will be security for this. A sad, reckless dog, he still showed the gentleman, through the pipes and beer. His courage was cool; he never said an unkind word—so far as we know—to a human creature. He frolicked and played his foolish practical jokes, but never with misfortune nor with the helpless. We saw him one day, when he could not have seen us, piloting a blind beggar across Fleet-street, at four o'clock in the afternoon. This was not heroic in Sam, but take it as the deed of a man whose heart is somewhere very near the right place.

Some people said that Sam was an artist; some that he had a strange, very little property of his own; some that money was left for him at a certain place, on a certain day by relations, who hoped never to see him again. Where did he live? He laughed and poked the man in the ribs who asked him the question. Namby found him, and conveyed him as an oddity to Clifton's chambers. It was not likely that serious Mr. Clifton would feel himself under a heavy obligation for the introduction. The new comer, however, speedily made his own welcome. Faversham used to stare and smile at him, as a most humorous beast. Namby got suggestions out of him for his burlesques. He became one of the friends of Faversham's set, whom this great gentleman would rather not meet west of Charing Cross, or before sun-down. Between Sam Topley and Namby, however, a strict and intimate friendship arose. The two young gentlemen were at war with their families (at least if Sam had a family); and they were free to meet the world after their own fashion. To the horror of Mr. Faversham they adopted wide-awakes, and declared that they should henceforth spend no part of their respective incomes in gloves. They delighted, did these young savages, in setting the usages of polite society at defiance. By degrees, therefore, they became, not estranged, but parted from their Temple friends. Sam mimicked the airs of Faversham with irresistible humour, and Namby became accustomed to imitate the ponderous sentences of Clifton. They called Stackington "Haw, haw," and hated him chiefly because he was audacious enough to be a peer's son.

Nothing had been heard in the Temple of this precious pair for some weeks, when, on a certain morning Mr. John Ashby found a letter upon his breakfast table, the envelope of which was enlivened with two silver doves.

"Who's turned off now?" said this gentleman, addressing himself. The seal broken, he fell back in his chair, and roared his laughter forth, till his face was purple.

"Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hopley!" Mr. Jack read the card again, and again and still he rolled and laughed in his chair. He propped the card against the wall upon the mantel-piece, took a distant view of it, and again laughed his loudest. In the course of the day, he and his friends agreed that Topley's marriage was the finest caper they had heard of for a long time.

Why poor Sam Topley should not take unto himself a wife after the fashion of other men; with bride-cake, favors, a best man and a honey-moon trip if only to Gravesend—it would not be easy to determine. But it pleased his patronizing friends of the Temple to resent this deference to the usages of society. It was suggested that he had been so long a social outlaw, and that he derived so much of the amusement he afforded his friends from this outlawry, that he would not be worth his salt as a decent member of society. Poor Sam Hopley! It is difficult for an amusing man to distinguish his friends from his enemies. That dull man, Pygled, is safe. Where he is tolerated, he may be sure that he is respected, and held in the warm chambers of his companions' hearts. But how shall Larfingass feel his footing? Even his bill discounter, whom he cannot pay, asks him to dinner. Lady Comeefo invites him to her dancing teas; and vows at the breakfast table, that he is a vastly entertaining wretch.

Love———Nature never made
A heart all marble; but in its fissures sows
The wild flower Love; from whose rich seeds spring forth
A world of mercies and sweet charities.

NUT BURNING.

THE hearth was swept, the fairy nuts
 Within the glow were burning;
 And, with a rod of scented heath,
 John gaily kept them turning.
 The ash was white,
 The nuts grew bright,
 Then reddened to a strawberry light;
 "Oh, love," he cried, "sure, my heart's a feather,
 Darling, who knows but we'll fly together?"

A rain drop plashed upon the fire,
 And dimmed the right nut's splendour;
 ('Twas John's) he gazed in Margaret's face,
 And his look grew sadly tender.
 "You see, you see,
 The rain caught me,
 Now for a proof of constancy;
 Oh, love, bide with me this cruel weather,
 Darling, who knows but we'll fly together?"

Over the nut a damson hue—
 A violet tint—grew slowly,
 And Margaret sighed a mournful sigh,
 And John looked melancholy.
 "Oh, love, again
 'Tis plain, 'tis plain,
 The strawberry light breaks through the rain,
 My heart, oh, sweet, will burst its tether,
 If we fail to flame and to fly together!"

They burst, they flew from right to left,
 Like a scattered orchard blossom,
 Straight into John's lap bounded one—
 One hid in somebody's bosom.
 "Ah, sweet," cried John,
 "The charm has shewn
 That I am somebody else are one."
 "Wait," she whispered, "till spring-tide weather;
 By hand and word we shall fly together!"

THE THEATRE OF THE ANCIENTS.

SO much is now said and written about the theatre, that it will not be irrelevant to make some remarks on the theatrical representations of the ancients, seeing that in many respects they serve as models for our imitation.

We may premise that there are two words, the sense of which is generally misunderstood. We allude to the terms "song" and "dance." The former was used in speaking of declamations, as Strabo mentions. Homer, Horace, and others called the actor a singer (cantor), yet he did not sing but declaim. Thus, in Cicero, it is said of Lælia that she pronounced, with great ease and fluency, very frequent and strongly-marked accents; "so that," adds the relater, "when I hear Lælia speak, I thought I heard the pieces of Plautus or Nævius sung." These examples are numerous, and the same is the case with dancing. For Terpsichore's art is, according to Plato, the art which assists in the imitation of all the attitudes and motions of which men are capable. In fact, the word saltatio (dancing) did not come from saltus, a leap, but from Salius, an Arcadian, who first taught this art to the Romans. Dion Cassius relates that that epicurean tyrant, Heliogabalus, danced not only when he saw dramatic pieces performed, while sitting in the imperial seat in the theatre, but also in walking, while giving audience, or even when addressing his troops. Now this would be entirely absurd, if the word saltatio did not include gesticulation, or what we properly do not call dancing: hence this was also termed "cheironomie"—literally the law of the hands. According to Juvenal, the carver of the viands at the tables of the great, carved the meat dancing; he would certainly not have performed this office very well, if he had really attempted to dance. "Orchesia," therefore, properly comprehended action; hence Aristides Quintilianus, who wrote a book upon music, calls the celebrated actor, Roscius, an "orchestes"—a dancer, and they used to say, to dance a drama; that is, to perform it. The reason of this denomination probably is, that the mien and movements of the actor were as much regulated by measure, and certain rules, as the steps and pirouettes of a dancer. This explains that passage of Aristotle, where he says that the chorus danced in the most melancholy parts of the tragedy. Now the chorus consisted of a number of excellent actors, sometimes of venerable old men, sometimes of women or children, who answered the questions of the acting personages, and made the suitable attitudes, expressing in every look or motion the most lively interest; their joy, their sorrow, their fears, or their hopes, so that this must, in fact, have been a very moving spectacle. In a certain chorus of Æschylus, consisting of fifty furies, we find that such a general horror was spread among the spectators, that the chorus was reduced, by an ordinance, to fifteen. The highest species of "saltationes," were the pantomimes; this "mute music," as Cassiodorus calls it, where everything was represented merely by the posture, gesture, and action, according to a certain measure. The oldest performer of this kind was Telesis, the dancer of Æschylus, who danced the seven chiefs before Thebes, and knew how to mark properly the character and the deeds of these heroes. The Romans, in particular, carried this art to a very degree of perfection. The two most celebrated pantomimic actors among them were Pylades and Bathyllus, the first of whom was particularly happy in tragedy, and the latter in comedy. They represented at first only single scenes, then acts, and at last whole pieces. These pantomimic representations were called dances, and the performers themselves dancers (saltatores); they were, in fact, a kind of ballet, which word is derived from them, for they were also called, especially in Sicily, "balliomi." The titles of some of them are preserved, from which we may pretty well infer their contents—for instance, the dances of the Cyclops, the dance of Hector, Ajax, etc. One of the most celebrated pupils of Pylades was Hylas, who once danced an ode, which ended with "the Great Agamemnon." To express this, Hylas stretched himself out, and stood on tip-toe; but this did not please his master, who informed him that he did it wrong, on which the audience desired that he would dance the ode himself. He did so, and when he came to the above passage, he stood still, in the attitude of a person in profound thought, because he conceived that nothing was more suitable to a great commander than to think. The same Hylas once danced Oedipus, but with his eyes open; whereupon his master called out—"Thou seest." The Romans were so charmed with these pantomimes, that they often wept at them, and the applause given them was so extravagant, that it was ordained, under the reign of Tiberius, that no senator should visit the theatre of the pantomime performers, and no Roman knight should walk in the street with them. Caligula, however, abolished this ordinance by his example; for he was so extravagantly fond of the pantomimic actor, Lepidus Mnester, that he embraced him during the performance, and beat, with his own hand, whoever made the least noise! But the task of the pantomimist was very difficult, and Lucian requires of one who will distinguish himself in it, great knowledge of poetry, music, rhetoric, philosophy, and psychology—demands which the actors of the present day will doubtless think very absurd.

With respect to the proper theatrical representations, we may remark that with the ancients poetry and music were most intimately connected. In general the word music was taken in a more comprehensive acceptation, and Aristides Quintilianus, in his work upon it, declares it to be the art which proves the principles on which it proceeds, and teaches everything relative to the use which may be made of the voice, and at the same time shows how to perform with grace all the motions of which the body is capable. Augustine calls it expressly the art of graceful motion. Music, poetry, as well as everything that tends to form the person, were among the ancients essential parts of a good education; hence Quintilian says that without understanding music a person cannot lates that that epicurean tyrant, Heliogabalus, danced not only when he saw dramatic pieces performed, while sitting in the imperial seat in the theatre, but also in walking, while giving audience, or even be a good philologist, much less a good orator. Can poems, he asks, of whatever kind they are, be composed without music? For one unacquainted with music was considered a barbarian. With respect to dramatic pieces the declamation was written in notes, and composed. The same marks were employed for this purpose as were used in indicating the accents. Before the piece itself began, some instruments, especially flutes, played a prelude, which were in admirable harmony with the subject. Cicero, therefore, observes that persons who understood music would immediately perceive from the first notes of the prelude performed by the instrument, whether "Antiope" or "Andromache" was to be acted. The instrument then continued to accompany the actor. Quintilian even says, that one of the most celebrated orators of his time had an instrumental performer behind him, who, from time to time, gave him the proper measure. Thus Cicero sometimes declaimed, and Roscius made the gesticulation. Among the Romans the declamation was often divided between two actors, one had to recite, the other to make the gesticulation. Livy and Valerius Maximus relate, that a celebrated actor, named Andronicus, performing in one of his favourite pieces, and having become hoarse by repeating several passages which were highly applauded, placed a slave before the musician, who recited the verses while he himself made the gesticulation. Lucian says, formerly the actor who recited also made the gesticulation; but because the action hindered him from breathing freely, and consequently injured the pronunciation, an assistant was given to the actor, who recited for him. But both had to observe a certain measure. Above the verses the attitude was marked in notes, which the actor (histrion) had to follow in exact time. We read in Cicero's paradoxes, that a comedian, when he made a motion out of time, was hissed, as much as an actor who committed a fault in the pronunciation.

With respect to the dress of the actors, it was as diversified as the characters of the persons represented. Every thing possible was done to dress in a becoming manner, the actor who appeared in the figure of a divinity or a hero; they, therefore, gave him the "cothurnus"—properly a Cretan shoe—which consisted of four cork soles laid upon each other, and was at least four fingers thick; but often, in proportion to the whole, of much more considerable thickness. The shape of the soles was originally four-cornered, though they were probably, at a later period, rounded off, according to the shape of the foot. On the other hand, they sought to make the figure of the actor more heroic by placing on his head, over the forehead of the mask, a raised piece running to a point like the Greek letter delta (Δ), which was covered with hair, and so formed into a peruke. Besides those high shoes and head-dress, all the other parts of the body were stuffed out in due proportion. Over the whole was thrown the long "talar," with the train, "synna," which covered the "cothurnus," so that the hero, thus dressed out, must, doubtless, have had an imposing appearance in the eyes of the spectators. Four ells, or eight feet, was the usual stature of heroes on the stage; hence, as Athenæus says, a tragic actor, who in the procession of Antiochus, carried the horn of Amalthea, measured four ells. The chief expression of an actor lies in the face; it may, therefore, be supposed that the ingenious Greeks paid particular attention to this in their theatrical representations. For this purpose they used masks, which were of the most various sizes and forms, according to the characters of the persons. Thus, the mask of Medea expressed ferocity, that of Niobe grief, that of Hercules pride and strength, etc. Fathers, for instance, who were to be sometimes cheerful, sometimes melancholy, had a mask of which one eyebrow was frowning, the other smooth, and they very dexterously contrived to show always the proper side. In the theatres of the present day we often see pieces in which the intrigue arises from the confounding of two persons, who in general are so unlike each other, that the spectator cannot conceive how a mistake can ever arise. In such pieces the masks on the ancient stage were admirable. The spectator was himself deceived, for he could not well distinguish two masks closely resembling each other, and therefore believes the more readily that the performers were deceived. Another advantage attending masks was, that female characters, which required too strong lungs for a woman to be able to fill such a vast theatre, could be very well performed by men. Upon one occasion it happened that the actor Polus, in the character of the "Electra" of Sophocles—in the scene where she comes upon the stage with an urn containing the ashes of Orestes—appeared with an urn which really contained the dear remains of a child lately deceased; and, as he addressed the ashes, was so affected that the entire audience was penetrated with the most profound affliction. With respect, also, to the ideal excellence of tragedy, the masks had a great advantage, by removing the representation from the real and ordinary scenes of life to the higher regions of art. In comedy, especially, the masks must have produced the highest effect; for they were either true copies, or caricatures of the originals represented, whose stature, dress, etc., were most faithfully imitated. Something was indeed lost, namely: the expression of the passions in the countenance, and the sudden turning red or pale, which produces a great effect. This expression of the passions necessarily escaped most of the spectators, on account of the vast extent of the theatre; however, the actors knew how to remedy this defect, by expressing all the gradations of passion with their eyes. Cicero and Quintilian cannot sufficiently praise their art in this particular. Juvenal, speaking of Nero, says, the masks, the thyrsus, and the robe of Antigone, ought to be placed at the feet of the emperor's statues, as so many trophies of his great deeds. The emperor, therefore, it is evident, had played the part of Antigone in a tragedy. Suetonius relates of him, that when he acted the part of a goddess or heroine, he always wore a mask resembling the lady with whom he was at the time in love. Aulus Gellius commends the derivation which Cuius Bassus gave to the Latin word persona, a mask, deriving from the verb personare, to sound, since as the face and the entire head were inclosed in the mask, and the voice could therefore issue only out of a single very narrow opening, it follows that the voice, thus compressed, must produce louder and more distinct tones. We observe in the masks on stones, coins, etc. always a very large opening of the mouth. It is not improbable that the mouth of the masks was surrounded with metal, forming a kind of mouth-piece, to increase the sound. In later times, according to Pliny, they used thin pieces of a marble, which in sound resembled metal, and was therefore called Chalkophōnos, or metal sound. The ancients also used certain brazen vessels (echaca) on the stage, which served instead of an echo. They wore large brazen plates which were placed on the sides of the stage, having different tones, and being placed at equal distances. Pliny complains that these vessels and arches confused the voice of the players, while Cassiodorus, on the contrary, affirms that the voice of the players became so full and strong by their aid, that it could hardly be believed the tone was produced by human lungs.

A SPANISH WELL.

WHERE the cork-tree, fringed and dim,
Bloweth by the fountain's brim,
And the amber mosses fall,
Like gold gusts from the fretted wall;
Bubbles, in the winking shadows,
The quiet well amid the meadows.

And floweth down a little pool
Into the woodland darkness cool,
Apost the solemn cheanut trees—
Apost the brown-roofed villages—
Thro' April corn fields white with blossom,
Sun, clouds, and skies within its bosom.

All around, the dreamy upland shines
And glimmers thro' a world of vines;
And, in a star-like atmosphere,
The blue hills tremble near and near,
While the slim cork-trees' tangled shadows
Dial the sun along the meadows.

Thro' one white gorge—a chasm of blaz:—
Floats the far town above the haze,
Seen vague and white. Across the plain
The blue air palpitates with rain;
And, scarcely blown, the water mallows
Flash phantom splendours thro' the shallows.

With dew-fall comes the muleteer,
Jangling his bells, and sitteth near
The bright-haired mosses. Down the wold
The wild fog gathers fold on fold,
And, sily, in the sun-crisped grasses,
The green grasshopper chirps and passes.

A ghost amid the lengthening glooms,
The village girl, at sunset, comes
With empty urn; light carols swell
Around the silence of the well—
Old-fashioned ditties, quaint and tender,
Touched here and there with antique splendour.

Then blooms the east; and roundly hewn,
Low, thro' the olives, looks the moon;
The sea-wind breathes across the west,
The drowsy world rolls into rest;
From the high folds the sheep-bells tinkle,
And the broad cork leaves dance and twinkle.

THE GRIEVANCE PAPERS.

CHAPTER XII.

RELATES THE TRAGIC END OF MRS. SQUEEZER'S OAT, AND THE COMPLETE AND FINAL SUSPENSION OF ALL RELATIONS BETWEEN THAT LADY AND THE WRITER OF THESE PAPERS.

THE crisis has come at last—more suddenly, indeed, than I had expected, but a crisis to which I have, nevertheless, been looking forward during the last three years, and for which I was not, therefore, altogether unprepared. However, it has come suddenly upon me, and consequently, writing as I am, under a state of considerable excitement, I hope that all due allowance will be made for any incoherence which may be evident in the construction of my sentences. My two portmanteaus, my three carpet bags, my hat-case, a large wooden box containing my books, and, in a word, all my household goods, my penates, are strewn around me in confusion as I write, whilst from the room under my own ascend the cries, the screams, and the groans of Mrs. Squeezer, who has been for the last six hours in a state of violent hysterics, requiring the constant aid and assistance of several aged ladies, her friends and confidants; and, to crown all, Mrs. Squeezer's cat lies cold and stiff, and crushed flat as a pancake, "foully done to death," Mrs. Squeezer indignantly asserts, by your very humble servant, Mr. Incog. Under this complication of events, are you at all surprised, dear reader, to hear that I write these lines under considerable excitement of my nervous system; or, to learn that the crisis to which I have alluded is one of no less serious a nature than the complete and final suspension of all relations, to speak diplomatically, between Mrs. Squeezer and myself? I will now proceed to inform you, as coherently as my excitement will allow me, how this unexpected dénouement has come to pass.

Since the "Grievance Papers" began to appear in the pages of this journal, Mrs. Squeezer's mode of acting towards me underwent a very decided change; or, to put it more correctly, her manner, always sufficiently imperious and tyrannical, became perfectly unbearable. As to whether she suspected the authorship, of course I cannot speak with perfect certainty, and am not, therefore, in a position absolutely to affirm that the altered state of our relations was due to such suspicion. But, at all events, as to the fact there is no doubt or uncertainty whatever; and I shall now merely state the facts connected with this last and closing encounter between the redoubtable Mrs. Squeezer and myself.

As I have just said, for the last few weeks Mrs. Squeezer's conduct has become perfectly unbearable. She never was remarkable,

I must say, for her attention to my linen, which she undertook to "do for," as well as for myself; but whatever little attention was at any time lavished upon it, has, for the last few weeks, been altogether discontinued; and I venture to assert, and Mrs. Squeezer is at liberty to deny my assertion if she is able, that my dozen and a-half of shirts do not possess that number of buttons amongst them. My morning chop has been sent up either perfectly raw, or burnt to a cinder; and my polite and mild remonstrances have been met with violent invective, or angry declamation, interspersed with vindictive and sarcastic remarks having reference to concealed and stuck-up things for whom nothing is good enough, and who expect their betters to wear the skin off their feet in order to satisfy their sinful appetites, and their unwholesome cravings. My books have been more thumbed—more extensive "black mail" has been levied on my tea, my brandy, and other little luxuries of this nature; my rooms have been left undusted for days together; and my boots are actually cracking and splitting in all directions from absolute dryness and want of nourishment to the leather in the shape of blacking; and to crown all, although I suppose, in reality, that there is nothing very remarkable in that, the depredations and the arrogant impudence of Mrs. Squeezer's cat, assumed proportions which were perfectly intolerable. I will give an example. I dare say that Mrs. Squeezer's cat was quite as cleanly in his habits as the generality of cats, and amongst the denunciations which I have hurled against him from time to time, I never said anything against him on this point; but, when I say that probably Mrs. Squeezer's cat was quite as cleanly in his habits as the generality of cats, it by no means follows that I assume that any cat is perfectly cleanly in every respect. Mrs. Squeezer accommodated a certain number of lodgers; her cat, I have every reason to believe, did the same; although, of course, of a different species, and by no means limited, as was the case with the lodgers of his mistress. When he has been stretched before the fire on my hearthrug, on the very few occasions on which I so far forgot myself as to invite Mrs. Squeezer to tea in my apartments, I have seen them, with my own eyes, gambolling about him in every variety of playfulness and agility; and hence, no wonder—for I confess that I am extremely sensitive on this point—if I were emphatically indignant when a few weeks ago I discovered that Mrs. Squeezer's cat had begun to show a much more decided partiality for the bed in my sleeping room, than was at all pleasant to the legitimate occupier of the said article. So surely as by any accident the door of my room happened to be left open, did the indentation on my pillow, or the disturbed state of my blankets, bear witness to the fact that my bed had been diverted from its legitimate use into a bed for Mrs. Squeezer's cat. Now, this was, I think all will agree, decidedly unpleasant, if not offensive. It wasn't in the nature of things that the foul animal should occupy my bed for any length of time without leaving some of his parasites behind him in my blankets; and being, as I have several times had occasion to remark in the course of these papers, of a highly sensitive temperament, I became almost afraid of returning to my couch like other reasonable and better-protected people. However, this wasn't the worst of it. I don't know, courteous reader, whether you have ever observed the nature of the animals in question (for obvious reasons I forbear speaking of them by their own proper name), but if you have, you will have discovered that they possess an extreme facility in changing their quarters when those in which they have taken up their abode are not to their liking. Now, I suppose the animals in question don't like me, for several times lately have my friends, with ill-concealed jocularly, cried out—"Hallo! Incog, what's this, old boy," at the same time pointing to the sleeve of my coat, where, sure enough, one of the agile creatures was perched, waiting, no doubt, for a favourable opportunity of transferring himself by a well-timed leap to some individual who might be more suited to his appetites. Now, such an incident, of course, covered me with blushes and confusion, and having appealed to Mrs. Squeezer with no more satisfactory result than an impudent declaration, that if I didn't take care to keep my door shut, she wasn't going to do it, I vowed vengeance against the beast, and at once entered upon a course of decided and energetic hostilities. The war was carried on somewhat in this wise. Upon returning to my apartments I crept quietly up stairs, having taken care to provide myself with a boot-jack, a good, heavy book, or some such offensive weapon. If my door were open, I judged that my enemy was there, and entering my room as quickly as possible, I strove to come upon him unawares. I never succeeded altogether in doing so, he was too sharp and too cunning to admit of the perfect success of such a manoeuvre, and the most that I could accomplish, was to get a good flying shot at him with my weapon as he sprung from his bed, and darted out of the room. I must confess that I broke a good many articles of crockery-ware, by this desultory system of warfare, neither can I say that I ever absolutely hit him, but several times I nearly did, and at all events, I am quite sure that I frightened him very considerably, for his manner, when he chanced to meet me on the stairs at other times, was a good deal cowed, and less arrogant than before. I need scarcely say that Mrs. Squeezer and I had several violent altercations on this subject, and that expressions much more forcible than complimentary, passed between us; but I didn't mind her; I was determined to banish that beast from my sleeping apartment.

Well, things went on in this way until yesterday. I had been invited to spend yesterday evening with some friends, and I intended to do so. During the afternoon I laid out my "things" on the bed, that they might be ready for me when I began to dress. Amongst the articles which I intended to wear was a shirt with a beautifully-wrought front, for which I have a particular liking. I may say that this article cost me a good deal of money, for I bought it to wear at a "conversazione" which the Lord Lieutenant was expected to attend (he didn't come after all), and I only wore it on very particular occasions. Well, I laid out my clothes, and the article in question on the top of all. Discovering that I needed some little article for my toilette, I went out to purchase it, and having met my dear friend Jenkins (the gent you may remember who circulated that unlucky story about my sour grapes), we sauntered up Sackville Street together, talking of our mutual friends, of course, and consequently it was some little time before I returned to my lodgings. When I did so, I proceeded at once to my room to dress, and what do you think, sympathising reader, was the first object which met my sight? I give you my word for it, that the foul beast had actually made a bed for himself on the identical shirt front I have just mentioned, and had coiled his carcass upon it the whole time I had been absent, to judge from the crumpled, soiled, and utterly unwearable appearance which it presented. To say that the sight raised my indignation to its highest pitch would be the very mildest form of expression which I could use. There was no sign of his presence, my shirt front of course excepted; but judging that he might be lurking somewhere, I armed myself with my heaviest Wellington boot, and peeped cautiously under my bed. There he was, and no mistake, and his savage green eyes glared at me from the furthest corner of the room, and the next question was how to dislodge him with comparative security to myself. I had such a conviction of the untamed ferocity of that animal, and his power of doing mischief, that I knew well enough that if the opportunity offered, or if he were driven to extremities, he would scratch my eyes out before I knew where I was; and as I have always considered eyes in general, I say nothing, of course, of particular cases, as considerable embellishments of a human face, I took care not heedlessly to expose myself to such a casualty. Hence, after having set my door wide open, I procured a long stick, and transferring the Wellington boot to my left hand, I took the stick in my right, and began to poke cautiously under the bed. After a good deal of "shoo," "shooting," and poking on my part, and after a good deal of spitting and swearing (I believe this is the proper word) on the part of my enemy, he suddenly darted out, and made for the door. I threw down my stick, grasped my weapon, to wit, the Wellington boot, in my right hand, and made after him. I arrived on the landing just in time to see him, tail erect and eyes glaring like two burning coals, darting down the stairs at full speed. I stood, took aim for a second, and then launched my weapon at his retreating form, with all the strength at my command. I only attempt to justify this act by the excitement under which I laboured, and any of my friends will testify, I know, to my gentleness and kindness to all dumb animals in general, but Mrs. Squeezer's cat provoked me beyond all endurance. Whether I hit him or not I can't say with certainty. I am rather inclined to believe that I missed him; and now, considering what has happened, I hope that I did. At all events, he gave a tremendous screech, and bolted down the back kitchen stairs, whilst the boot flew with all the force which I had expended on it right against the panels of Mrs. Squeezer's own private door. That amiable lady, it would be quite superfluous to say, responded at once to the noisy summons thus conveyed, and throwing open her door before I could effect a retreat into the privacy of my own apartment, at once attacked me in terms of utmost virulence and animosity. I tried for a minute or two to stem the torrent of her invective, but finding myself utterly powerless, not able to get in a word, even sideways as they say, I took the only course open to me, viz, to retreat into my own room and bolt the door, leaving Mrs. Squeezer to let off her steam on the landing outside. My feelings were by this time, and after an encounter of such a nature as this, far too much excited to allow me to think of the evening party to which I had been invited, and so I gave up all idea of it. About eight o'clock I slunk out to the confectioner's round the corner, and got a cup of tea for myself, for I candidly own that I was, considering the state of the war between us, positively afraid to ring for that beverage at my own apartments. I would not, under existing circumstances, and after this last outrage on her cat, have faced Mrs. Squeezer for a trifling consideration. I dodged in again as quietly as I could, and made my way up to my own room, without having encountered Mrs. Squeezer on the staircase. Not having seen her, I cannot of course speak with certainty as to the state of my landlady, but judging from the groans which issued from her room up to a late hour of the night, I conclude that she, too, was labouring under very considerable excitement.

I retired to rest last night at my usual hour, and with a full determination of bringing matters to a crisis, and of bearing Mrs. Squeezer's tyranny no longer. Urged on by my natural disinclination to change, the timidity and nervousness of my nature, which Mrs. Squeezer had turned to such account in her own favour, and some kind of a fear that I might only jump out of the frying pan into the fire, I had patiently borne with Mrs. Squeezer for full three years, but I determined to bear with her no longer, and to give notice to quit, in real earnest, the very first thing in the morning. How little did I anticipate the course which events were to take, or the circumstances under which this notice was to be given by me, and accepted by Mrs. Squeezer.

I had barely completed my toilet this morning, and had not left my room, when I was suddenly startled by a succession of piercing screams, which I at once recognized as proceeding from Mrs. Squeezer. Thinking that some fearful calamity had fallen upon her, I at once hurried to her assistance, generously forgetting our encounter of the previous evening. I found my landlady in the hall, just inside the street door, wringing her hands with frantic violence, and giving utterance to such a succession of piercing shrieks as it has rarely been my lot to listen to. I was for a second or two quite at a loss to comprehend what it was all about, but my surmises were soon set at rest. Two or three days ago I attended a sale of pictures, and, in a moment of weakness, purchased a "real" Claude, of considerable size. This picture was put into a large packing-case, and only arrived at my lodgings yesterday. It was placed on one end in the hall, and the end of the packing-case being only very narrow, or, in other terms, the base being very disproportionate to the height of the article, the whole affair was naturally in a very "shaky" position, and very little force would be quite sufficient to throw it down on its side. On making my way down stairs, this packing-case immediately caught my eye. During the night something or other had thrown it off its end on to its side. It was lying quite flat on the floor of the hall, and from beneath it protruded, quite stiff and rigid, the tail of Mrs. Squeezer's cat. I put forth my strength, and lifting up the packing-case, we at once discovered the lifeless body to which that tail pertained, cold and dead, and crushed flat as a pancake. I took my ancient enemy by the tail, and raised him from the ground, holding him in a deprecating manner before the eyes of his mistress. Life had evidently been extinct some hours, and so I laid him down again, for he wasn't a pleasant object to look upon, much less to hold in one's hand. Mrs. Squeezer, however, didn't seem to think so, for, bending down, she took the dead body in her arms, then folded him up in her apron, and finally, after some ineffectual efforts to speak, as I concluded from her exertions, gave vent to her feelings in screams of such redoubled violence that several of the neighbours came rushing in, evidently expecting to find the house in flames, and Mrs. Squeezer's garments enveloped in the devouring element. As soon as she had thus secured an audience, the infuriated old creature, hugging her favourite to her breast the while, turned round on me, and attacked me with a fury which absolutely made me tremble. I shrink from polluting these pages by writing on them the foul language with which she accused me, before the neighbours, of having murdered her darling Tom, her poor, dear, harmless, unoffending cat, the only comfort of her widowed days. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the language in which Mrs. Squeezer couched these accusations was "Billingsgate" of the very lowest order; nay, I doubt whether there is a fishwife in all that classic region who is fit to hold a candle to Mrs. Squeezer in this respect. I give my word of honour that I had nothing whatever to do with the murder of Mrs. Squeezer's cat. I never saw him after he bolted down the kitchen stairs, after destroying my shirt, and I am as innocent of any direct participation in his death as the child unborn. The way in which he came by his end was, I suspect, in this wise. Prowling about during the night, and, perhaps, making a spring from the top of the first landing to the bottom, he probably came with the whole momentum of his carcass, (not a small one, as I have several times remarked,) against the packing-case, and, overturning it, thus brought destruction and death upon himself. This may have been the case or it may not. I cannot speak with certainty, but of this I am certain, that I had nothing to do with his death. Fancy, then, my feelings, when Mrs. Squeezer assailed me, before the assembled neighbours, with every kind of bad language, and accused me of murdering her cat, vowing at the same time vengeance of the direst kind against me. I strove to speak, but in vain. I might as well have striven to check the Mississippi in its course, as to check that woman's torrent of abuse. Deeming it due to my own character, and the assertion of my dignity before the neighbours, who were evidently seriously prejudiced against me by Mrs. Squeezer's denunciations and accusations, I faltered out a notice to leave my lodgings that day month. Mrs. Squeezer's face changed from burning red to livid white, as she laid the remains of her dear departed on the hall table, and turned on me anew. That day month, indeed, did I say—would I, if I pleased, repeat that—it was so very kind of me, (here there was an hysterical demonstration on the part of Mrs. S.) And did I think that she would let a bloodthirsty, sneaking, cowardly "feller" like me, sleep another night under her roof? Catch her at it. She had too much regard for her own throat ever to live under the same roof with me again. She had been more than a mother to me. No mother would have put up with half of what she had borne from me, with my junkettings, and my carousals, and my nasty, bad company. And this was the way I had repaid her, by destroying that poor innocent, because I knew that he was the only company that she had in her loneliness and her widowhood. Oh, yes, it was like me! why didn't I attack somebody who was my match, and not wreak my bloodthirstiness on a poor, lone widow, who had no one to stand up for her. That day month, indeed! Oh! poor dear Tom, my poor murdered darling, my poor innocent victim. There he is, the vile murderer! and he talks to me about this day month, indeed!—(more hysterical demonstrations and violent screaming.) Would I get out of that, and pay her what I owed her, and take myself and my things away at once, or would a poor lone widow have to call upon her neighbours for protection against a murdering, slaying, swindling, cheating, lying, cowardly "feller" like me. [Threatening demonstrations on the part of the neighbours.] Oh, yes! I might deny it as much as I liked, but she knew who did it, and if there was law to be had on me, she was the woman who would have it. She was the woman who would make me pay for that poor murdered innocent; and would I pay her what I owed her, and take myself off at once, for I shouldn't sleep another night under her roof, no, not if I were to cover my bed with golden guineas? Thank goodness, she hadn't come to that.

Finding reason and remonstrance equally unavailing, I have left Mrs. Squeezer and her cat in care of her sympathizing neighbours, who seem fully convinced that I am his murderer. My things are all packed, and, whilst I am waiting for a conveyance to carry me hence, I have bolted my door and penned these hurried lines. I don't see my future way quite clearly as yet, but, having suffered so much from Mrs. Squeezer, I feel strongly tempted to take a small house and start housekeeping on my own account. Should I determine upon this step, and should I meet with any trials or adventures worth relating in the carrying out of it, I will not fail to let you hear of them in due time. Meanwhile, I am afraid that the unexpected crisis in my relations with Mrs. Squeezer may somewhat interfere with the further development at present of the interesting subject of "Grievances," which, through your kind indulgence, courteous reader, I have thus far pursued. You may, perhaps, remember that I referred my own peculiar grievances to three heads, arising from the description which I gave of myself, as a single gentleman, of a certain age, with a literary turn of mind. The two latter of these heads I have not been able to touch as yet. I hope, however, in a very short time, to find myself sufficiently settled to be able to resume the consideration of the momentous question of "Grievances;" whilst I trust that the investigations which we have already made on this point have only been half as entertaining to you, dear reader, as they have been interesting to me. If such be the case, I am amply rewarded for any little trouble they may have cost me. But, as I hear the vehicle which is to convey me hence, I must bring this paper to a speedy close, merely delaying long enough to subscribe myself, dear and indulgent reader,

Your very faithful servant,

INCOG.

Two hours later, I just open this paper to inform you that I have done it. Mrs. Squeezer's parting benediction is still ringing in my ears, but, thank heaven, I have heard the last of her voice, and I feel like a free man at last. When I was leaving her house, her conduct became so excited and violent that I verily believe if the neighbours hadn't restrained her by absolute force, she would have committed an assault and battery upon me. However, I have done with her, and that is my consolation.

P.S.—A seedy-looking individual, who represents himself as an attorney, has looked into the hotel where I am temporarily sojourning, to give me legal notice that an action has been lodged against me by my late landlady, for having slayed, or caused to be slayed, a valuable cat, of purest Angola breed. Damages £25. So that, it seems as if I hadn't done with Mrs. Squeezer after all.

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER III.

R. O'FLANAGAN received them, violin in hand, at the door of the barn, or assembly room (as it had the honour of filling that office this evening) — described a flourish with his bow in the air, and then lowered it smartly to the ground — drew his heels gracefully into the first position, turned out his toes like Sir Christopher Houghton in the "Critic," and completed the ceremony of reception with a bow which was evidently intended as a pattern for all the male spectators — lowering his head until the queue of his periwig (a fashionable article of dress which added materially to his importance in this region of shock heads) arose, and culminated to the zenith. He then marshalled the ladies to their seats on one of the forms which were ranged along the walls for the accommodation of the guests — and which was strewn with fresh rushes, in order to afford a "saft sate" for the gentle sex — while he proceeded to put the young pupil through his evolutions.

"A very fine boy, indeed, ma'am — if he had only a little polish. Now, sir, spring up off o' the ball o' your futt, an come down in the third position. Very good. Hold up your head, sir, — no fear your feet will run away from you while you watch them too close — keep in your tongue, sir, — there's a handle o' your tongue thrust out, as if that would be any use to you in the step. Now — one — two — three — very good," etc., etc., etc.

The company soon began to thicken, and in a little time complaints began to arise of the scantiness of room, which were ingeniously obviated by arranging a few forms in the open air — and preparing a second dancing area in the bright moonlight, the master of the ceremonies carefully dividing his time and attention between the guests within and those without, so that neither party might complain of a deficiency in this respect. The latter were accommodated with the violin of the dancing-master himself, while the company within received sufficient reason for dancing from a long and lean piper who had been hired for the evening as an assistant in the orchestral department.

The ball opened with a most tortuous dance called the Reel of Three — which, however scientific, did not fully satisfy the longings of the mercurial spectators, whose mettlesome heels were eager for livelier operations. For some time no occurrence took place to disturb the gravity and decorum which prevailed in the assembly, with the exception of an awkward blunder made by Sally, who during a pause in the music leaned back unwittingly on the piper's unexhausted bag, from which proceeded a squeal so mournful and so like the remonstrance of a living creature in pain, as convulsed the hearers with laughter, and covered our poor heroine with confusion. Soon after, while the floor was again clear, and the gentlemen were plying their fair ones with agreeable attentions in various parts of the room, the piper seeing Sally disengaged, and perhaps willing to show that he harboured no malice, danced up to her, throwing the drone up over his left shoulder, playing a rapid jig tune, and capering away with a pair of enormously long legs, looking—in his close cropped head, black worsted stockings, torn blue jacket, tight pantaloons, and red woollen cravat or comforter—more like the ideal of an evil genius than any thing human. When Sally cheerfully danced forward, amid the shouts of delight and approbation which broke from the assembly, her strange partner retired to the centre of the floor, where he continued to tune his own music, now pounding the earth like a pavier's rammer, now flying from side to side, as if he trod on air, and anon remaining to grind the floor in one spot, throwing back his head, and moving it from one side to another with a certain ravished air. The guests gradually gathered around the dancers, following with eyes and mouth distended to ecstatic admiration the feet of the extraordinary piper, and unable to repress a cheering shout or rapture when, by a fresh wild bound, he seemed to recover all his former vigour as fast as it was exhausted. The contagion at length spread—the floor was covered with emulative groups, and the dancing-master's genteel reels and figures were all merged into the national and inspiring mourners. Overpowered with fatigue, Sally at length permitted herself to be danced and played to her seat by the piper, who whispered in her ear as she turned to sit down—“There's one you know waiten for you in the sally-grove, Miss.”

The words were almost inaudible, but such as they were they made Sally start and look up suddenly. The speaker was already in his former place, playing on, and directing his attention to the dancers. She imagined either that her senses deceived her, or that the words were addressed to some other person.

The dancing and music proceeded with no less enthusiasm on the green plot without. Longing to breathe the cool night wind, after her exertions in the house, Sally walked to the door, and, leaning against the jamb, contemplated the motions of the dancers in the moonlight. While she remained in this position, the name of her old lover, Macnamara, pronounced by some one of a group of persons who occupied a seat near the door, caught her ear.

“And did you hear,” said one, “how Miss Byrne herself was gotten on?”

“She never 'll get over it,” replied a middle-aged woman. “I spoke to-day with James Mihill, their servant-boy, an' he toul me himself that she was gettin worse and worse every day. It seems the match is broke off out an' out betune herself and Mr. Robert Kumba, a kind-hearted boy he is too, indeed, but not over and above knowing. She never was heard to screech or cry after her father's death, an' that's a sign, for the silent grief is always that that lies heavy on the heart an' breaks it.”

“I'd be sorry anything should happen her,” said one of the hearers, “she was a good sweet-tempered young lady, an' a nice dancer. Did you mind her the day she danced with Dinny Macnamara, that they say is listed since, at the May-pole?”

“I did,” replied a young man, who had just been danced out of his place, “an' if you'll b'lie' me, I didn't think so much of her. She trod so light, there wasn't hardly a blade o' the grass turned under her. Not so with Dinny I'll be bail. That was the boy for pounden! The place was if a pig had been rooten it after him.”

“They say Dinny Macnamara was taken with her himself after that, in spite of all that come and went between him and Sally Segur, the Palatine's daughter, over—”

A sudden “huah!” and a low murmur which passed among the group of gossips informed our heroine that her proximity was discovered, and she retired a little farther in, continuing to fix her eyes on the dancers without, where a new spectacle had caught her attention.

This was a young man much better dressed than the remainder of the company, who had not made his appearance in the interior of the house, and who seemed anxious to partake of the amusements that were going forward as freely as it was possible to do without exposing himself, in any remarkable degree, to observation. In a short time, as he turned round and approached her, so that the glare of light from the open door fell on his features, her heart bounded at the sight of her lover, once more restored to health and bloom, and apparently enjoying a degree of affluence to which he had never at any time been accustomed.

“Is it you, Denny?” she asked, in a low whisper.

“Huah!” replied the man; “that is not my name now, Sally. I'm going to the little grove beyond, and do you follow me in a little time, for I want to speak to you.”

He disappeared, leaving the astonishment and curiosity of the girl excited in the highest degree. She did not hesitate to give him the meeting as he requested.

Soon after she had left the dance-house, the mirth of the evening became more uproarious than ever, until it seemed likely to terminate, as Irish festivities frequently do, in a general engagement of a serious nature. The symptoms began, as usual in vehement protestations of eternal friendship, after which a few blows were given in pure love, and gratefully returned with good interest, until, at length, their excited affections began to be demonstrated in a series of kicks and fistycuffs, which a stranger might mistake for indications of earnest resentment. The men hulloosed and fought—the girls screamed and fled—the dancing-master himself interfering to keep the peace, received an unmerciful drubbing, which prevented him from renewing the exercise of his profession for some weeks, and the sounds of rage, wailing, and lamentation terminated an evening which had been devoted, by common consent, to purposes of mirth and harmony. A few were killed (that is, severely beaten), many wounded; but the list of “missing” on the next morning was found to be confined to Sally. She was seen no more in her native village.

We now feel it necessary to return to our travellers, whom we deserted, for the purpose of laying these details before the reader, in the first chapter.

After riding about two miles farther, on a narrow, broken road, leading through a tract of alternate crag and marsh, or bog—during the progress of which Segur gave his old companion, the only old acquaintance whom he had met since his return, the principal facts of the detail with which I have just furnished the reader—the travellers, made anxious by the first shades of evening, sought to obtain farther information as to the proximity of their destination. As they looked round them for some person from whom they might make the necessary inquiries, a stout, wild-haired wench jumped on the road from a stile leading to a little avenue, along which she had been running towards them, and dropping a short courtesy was about to pass on, when the Palatine put a switch before her, and made his question with as much civility as he could muster. She looked at him for a moment, then at his fat companion, then at the comically-shaped attendant, shook back her thick and greasy hair, so as to disclose a countenance that showed at least a week's abstinence from the luxury of an ablution, and curled her dark and hardened lip into an expression of the most forcible contempt, after which, without answering the question, she tucked up her stuff gown, so as to disclose an enormous unstockinged ankle, and making a short run at the fence on the road-side, jumped, with considerable agility, on the top, where she waved her huge arm above her head, and shouted, at the top of a shrill soprano voice—“Hoo ee!—Shane, Dick, Davy, Ned, and Shamus, come in to the paxies—Hoo-ee!”

The men to whom this welcome exhortation was addressed, were at a quarter of a mile distant at least. Perceiving them depositing their spades in the furrows, the fair herald drew an enormous reeking cup [potato] from her own pinned-up stuff petticoat, and seating herself down on the fence, condescended to notice the individuals of the despicable race of Palatins, who stood waiting her leisure, half amused, half irritated:—

“How far are we from the village of Court Mattress, my good girl?”

Another pause ensued before the reply (as usual, a counter interrogation) could be elicited:—

“Tisn't aistwards from behind ye're comen?”

Segur explained.

“Why then, Court Mattress is twenty long mile from ye yit, every spade o' the road.”

The preacher, and the layman interchanged a glance of surprise and disappointment.

"Our journey is lengthening then as we lessen it, for we have travelled two miles since it was only fifteen."

"Petere semper fugientem Italiam," said a voice close behind them. Segur turned, and beheld a thin-faced lad, hatless and shoeless, a ragged coat, surmounting a still more patched and ragged under-costume, and a leather covered ink-bottle dangling by a strap from the only button he was master of. "Tace, puella mea, whist! howl, you jade—why mislead the gentlemen?"

"A pretty fellow you are, indeed, to hope for any luck, an' you here directen the Palatina."

"Uncharitable being," said Mr. Shine, "the Samaritan inquired not the creed nor the country of him whose wounds he dressed by the wayside."

"Faix, I meant no harm," said the girl. "Av ye take the long and the safe road, ye'll find it's twenty good miles, every wattle of it; but to be sure, an' ye like to fall in with the highwaymen (the plundherers, that are murtheren the country), ye may take the short cut across by Mark Spellacy's inn, on the common, an' ye'll shorten the way four miles."

"It's worth trying," said Segur.

"Who toul't you dat the highwaymen was out, now?" inquired the thin-faced lad, bending a sharp look on the girl.

"Who toul't me, inagh? Wasn't it themselves, with Suil Dhuv at their head, that shot Segur in the glyn, there isn't hardly a fortnight there sence."

The old Palatine bent forward on the neck of his horse, and repeated the name in a low and anxious whisper, as if to assure himself of the reality of what he heard.

"Iss, thin, Segur,—the Palentin, the blind man that was returnen by the glyn from the pattern, and was shot through the head upon the haith, nobody knows for what, nor for why, only them that done it."

"It is no matter," said the old man, who had recovered his self-possession during the last speech—"I am well provided against such accidents, and I will take the short way. Switzer! ride close behind us—Mr. Shine, come, dash on, man—I'd like to know what we have to learn next."

"It is a tempting of Providence," muttered the reluctant Shine.

"Dere's enough o' de daylight before ye yet if ye stir," said the poor scholar. "Af ye'd want a guide across the common—" he concluded the sentence by a significant gesture, and shuffling of the feet, which was readily understood.

"We intend to ride hard, and you have no horse," said the Palatine.

"O, never let dat trouble your honour, dere's many a worse roadster than old Shank's mare." And throwing himself into an easy flinging trot, he dashed forward at a rate that showed he had some ground for his confidence. The three travellers followed at a brisk rate. Doctor Shine, whose condition showed that he had been accustomed to regular hours and comfortable living, did not at all approve of the sudden and seemingly hazardous resolution formed by his companion. They had been travelling together for more than eight hours, having fallen upon one another accidentally at the inn where the worthy self-constituted ecclesiastic stopped to breakfast. The double duties of lunch and dinner, neither of which this conscientious divine would have very willingly neglected, remained yet undischarged, and he felt exceedingly reluctant to prolong the season of abstinence if by any contrivance it could be terminated. No means of doing so, however, appeared likely to present themselves in the dreary tracts of soil over which they were now journeying; and the tone of feeling into which the last conversation had thrown his friend, was such as to make him altogether oblivious of his own, as well as of the doctor's necessities in this respect. All the sympathy of which he could confidently assure himself, was such as Abie Switzer, the queer-shaped servant of the Palatine, and their horses afforded. The perils, too, of another and darker nature which belonged to the route they were pursuing, and which became invested in the mind of the man of peace with gradually deepening hues of terror, in proportion as the shades of evening advanced—and the road, unguarded by ditch or dyke, began to assume a still more rugged and unfrequented appearance, as it wound among a series of black, craggy, and close set hillocks, covered only in a few places with the tufts of broom and brushwood—the dangers, we repeat, of every description, which now became more strikingly evident, afforded new grounds of reluctance to the unadventurous Shine. Nevertheless he proceeded for a time in silence, judging that a proposal of delay originating in merely sensual or carnal motives, would come with an ill grace from a mortified professor of religion; and he even began to entertain thoughts of a martyr-like perseverance in the purpose laid down by his companion, when the plans of the whole party were counteracted by a resolution of the preacher's little pony.

They had now arrived at the head of an acclivity, from which a somewhat more extended tract of country was visible than had as yet been afforded them by the nature of the land which they had passed. Immediately before the door of a public-house, which formed the only dwelling within sight, the road divided and cast off on both sides of a steep and toilsome ascent (which we believe is one of the minor national evils that have lately been removed by the English benefaction of 1822). A few yards from this junction of the ways stood a ruined bridge, which made but "two paces and a stride" across the Ovaan, or the White River—a little stream so called, perhaps, from its waters being of an unusual blackness, owing to the boggy ground in which they have their source. The inn, which, as is customary, went by the name of its owner rather than its sign, was a low thatched house, with a withered branch and sign protruded over the doorway. One side of the latter presented to the view of the carman, returning with vehicle unburthened and groaning pocket from the nearest corn-market, a rosy-faced, well-vested, full-length portrait of the Patron Saint of the kingdom, with crook in hand, and extended arms, gesticulating a significant welcome, made still more significant and irresistible by the following lines scrawled in white paint underneath:—

Pass You Est or Pass you West, pass Spellacy's Punch
And You'll Pass the Best.
Morgan's Entire.

The day-labourer, who with spade on shoulder, and forehead pale and moist from the forenoon's toil, descended the hill on the other side, had his admiration excited by a flaming battle scene, which was also explained underneath to represent—

[the Stormin of Dendermond be Mark Spellacy's! Good Beds.]

And if abundance of smoke and fire can be supposed to compensate for the absence of all other characteristics of a battle scene, the artist had been most successful in his representations of the horrors of war.

The comparatively comfortable air of this mountain hostelry soon arrested the acute and experienced eye of the preacher; and it appeared, too, as if his faithful pony shared his feelings, for as soon as the travellers arrived opposite the feeding-trough, which was placed before the doorway, the sturdy little animal, to the great delight of its master, pulled up, and remained stock still, with an air of determination in its eye which was sufficient to show that no inducement whatever, but the gratification of its desires, would be able to influence its movements. What those desires were the doctor readily perceived.

"The creature," said he, "has been accustomed to have its daily sustenance administered about this hour, and its bowels yearn for the usual allowance."

"Dere's good lodgen for man or beast at Mark Spellacy's," said the young man.

The Palatine urged their departure.

"We have temptations enough to struggle with," said Mr. Shine; "we pray to be delivered from them, and we ought consequently to seize every opportunity of avoiding them where there is no end to be gained by exposing ourselves to their influence. Mechanical modes are sometimes allowable in fitting the mind for successful resistance against the assaults of the Tempter."

"Manen," said the poor scholar, "that a good dinner will prepare and strengthen a man for the spiritual combat?"

"The Turks," continued Mr. Shine, not heeding the query, "about from the top of a minaret; the steeple folk announce the word by clanking together a club and prodigious cylinder of metal; we who are of the wiser class conceive that the best possible mode of preserving a Christian-like evenness of temper, a saint-like indifference to the operation of events around us, is by using all such internal and external appliances as Heaven has furnished us with, for the purpose of preventing unprofitable irritation. And that such as has been the object of allotting us a number of senses capable of receiving gratification is sufficiently evident; for, what were noses made for, except to smell, what mouths made for, except to eat?"

"Not a ha'p'orth," said Abie Switzer.

"Barren to drink now an' den," said the foot-traveller.

"Soomthen dat way meself talks when I owe a man a grudge, an' see a fair vacancy for giving him a knock on de head. What were fists made for, except to strike? says I. I wish I could persuade de priest of it. May be your honour would try it wit him?"

"As for myself," said Abie, "I'm always most patient after dinner, or a good hot supper, an' I don't care who knows it."

"And for me," resumed the preacher, "I see nothing short of a visible tempting of Providence in rejecting a proffered consolation. Besides, the instinct of my animal decides against any further postponement of the customary reflection."

After pausing a moment, the old Palatine dismounted in silence, and led his horse to the door of the inn, in the manner of one who had been prevailed upon by a train of reflections in his own mind, rather than by the reasoning of the self-ordained divine. The most convincing argument, perhaps, which the latter employed might be indicated in the obstinacy of his pony. He did not enter the inn until he had seen the sturdy animal accommodated with a due portion of oats, which he tied in a bag about its head.

Some circumstances having taken place in the interior of the inn, a few hours before, with which it may be useful that the reader should be made acquainted; we will leave the travellers just at the point to which we have brought them at the close of the last chapter, for the purpose of introducing a new group of performers on the scene.

The kitchen, or principal apartment of the house, presented modes of accommodation by no means usual in a lonely abode of this class among the highlands of Erin. Although, from its deserted and solitary position, it had appeared impossible that the chance custom of passing strangers could constitute a very considerable portion of the landlord's revenue, and the distance at which it stood from anything deserving the appellation of the word "neighbourhood," seemed to form sufficient grounds for supposing that the permanent customers could not be very numerous either—the appearance, nevertheless, which the interior presented was not such as to estimate any lack of company. It was abundantly though plainly supplied with articles of furniture, such as suggan chairs, a table, settle-bed, wooden dresser, the shelves of which were well stocked with pewter dishes, plates, and wooden piggins, or drinking vessels. The rafters, well-seasoned by the influence of a settled cloud of smoke, were graced with sundry fitches, hams, and other departments of bacon, which were visible through the bluish mist, and from the many fresh indentures observable to the glance, gave the most direct negative that could be wished to the sneer of the apostate Goldsmith—or proved, at least, that this was not one of the "Irish houses where things are so-so." By the confused and rakish manner in which all the furniture, however, was tossed about—a chair lying prostrate in one corner—the table pushed awry, and strewn with drinking vessels, which appeared not to have been meddled with since they had fallen from the impotent and infirm grasp of the last toper—it would seem that the apartment had been made, a very short while before, the scene of a riotous merry-making. The fire yet lay mingled with the ashes into which it had been raked on the previous evening. A miserable half-burnt cat sat near the hearth, vainly employed in an endeavour to impart a degree of comeliness to her face by washing it with her feet, and sometimes casting a sleepy blinking stare on the dull embers before her. The shutters of the window being yet closed, admitted scarcely enough of the mid-day light to enable the drowsy inmates to distinguish the lateness of the hour. A female figure, slipshod and in undress, glided into the apartment from an inner and still darker room, and often stumbling against various articles of furniture which were scattered on the earthen floor, and opening the window-shutter, used a gesture of astonishment as the bright noon-tide glory rushed in upon and around her. Raising her hand quickly to her eyes to protect and shade them from the effect of the dazzling light, and retiring from the spot, she proceeded, in some appearance of haste and anxiety, to re-establish a degree of order in the house. The woman was of a slight and perhaps graceful figure, although her hard discoloured skin, and bony wasted arms forbade the conjecture that she could, under any circumstances, lay claim to the praise of feminine loveliness—yet there was something both in her manner and her appearance which was calculated to attract the attention, if not to excite the interest, of the spectator. Her countenance was wasted and yellow—apparently rather from the influence of ill health than of age or toil. Her long, dry, light, coloured hair, dabbled in dust and ashes, and hanging neglected about her sunken cheeks, and over her thin sinewy neck, would have given her an air altogether hideous, if its effect were not met and contradicted, by the expression of a full, soft, clear eye, which, the instant that it met the observation of the spectator, engrossed all his attention, and altogether abstracted it from the remainder of her person. A soiled white muslin wrapper buttoned up in front, and a pair of brownish, ashy, light slippers, constituted nearly all the visible portion of her costume.

While she was occupied in regulating the furniture, and brushing off the coat of turf ashes with which every article was covered, with the wing of a goose, a man made his appearance at the same inner room from which she had entered, and stood for a few moments lazily stretching himself on the threshold. From the way in which his dress hung about him—his neckcloth turned awry—his coat covered with feathers and ashes, his knees unbuttoned, and his coarse gray woollen stockings "down gyved to his ankle"—it evidently appeared that he had retained the same habiliments during his nocturnal repose which he had worn on the previous day. The woman gazed at him for a moment with a slight emotion of that disgust which the "green and sober" look of the companion of an unlimited debauch is apt to excite in the mind of one not yet wholly inured by custom to the hideous and nauseating consequences of excess, when the gay and healthful morning light steals in upon the scene of revelry, and pours its rosy splendour over pale and yellow cheeks—dull, dim, and sleepless eyes—sickly and expiring lights, and all the disgusting details of a spectacle of prolonged indulgence. The individual here presented seemed to entertain a kind of unacknowledged sense of his own repulsive appearance, for he walked in a shuffling yawning, shambling way, to the darkest side of the apartment, while the woman continued her occupation, turning away her eyes from his person, as if unwilling to contemplate, under circumstances so unfavourable, an object in which her affections had an interest. From the portrait we have given of the man, it may appear improbable that this should be the case, but we omitted to state, that no portion of the distaste which his costume and bearing on this occasion were calculated to excite, extended themselves to his person and features. The latter were, in fact, remarkably striking, and, perhaps, beautiful. His hair, short, curling, and glossy, revealed, by its perfectly classical disposition, the shape of a finely-formed head, which it fitted with a Grecian exactness. His features, sharp and sudden in their expression, were rendered still more poignant and characteristic by the fire of a violent eye, of exclaiming darkness and brilliancy. His figure, rather low, though by no means stunted, was slight and muscular; and his limbs were set with that firmness and ease which renders the movement of a vigorous man a spectacle of so much delight and beauty, even in moments of the most arduous exertion.

"Ye had a noisy night of it last night, Mark."

"Iss."

"I couldn't get the child quiet the whole night long, for the noise."

"I heard him indeed."

A pause.

"Are they to be here again to-night Mark, darling?"

"Where else would you have 'em be?"

"And when are we to have peace and a quiet house? Or is the child to be brought up here in this way, and to be as bad—as ourselves—in the end?"

A fierce look was the only answer which the man returned to this query, and both were again silent.

"What more of Mr. Kumba, Mark?" was the next question put by the woman.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

MAN.—Man, "Symbol of Eternity imprisoned into time!" it is not thy works, which are all mortal, infinitely little, and the greatest no greater than the least, but only the spirit thou workest in that can have worth or continuance.

THE SEXTON OF SCHAKEMSWITZ.

A LEGEND NOT FROM THE GERMAN.

IN the little town of Schakemswitz, which is not exactly on the Rhine, the crankiest, surliest, and least-good-for-little man of all who abode therein, was Elp Verren the sexton. Not one ever got, in the memory of man, a civil answer to a civil question from the same Elp. When he waited at the church door for a wedding party, he was in his worst humour, and scowled at every body. When he had to dig a grave, he was as merry as a cricket. No body liked to meet Elp Verren the first thing in a morning; and a ghost would be as welcome the last thing at night. He never seemed to be on good terms with himself, and he was certainly on bad terms with every body else. He lived in a corner of the old tower of the ruined monastery in the church-yard, a vicious cat and a snarling cur enjoying the possession of the same chamber with him. Winter and summer, for years, Elp Verren had gone on thus, a dry and withered piece of humanity, and on the New Year's eve in whose last hours we introduce him to our readers, he was sitting with his dog and his cat, one on each side of him, at the fire in his chamber.

"Them bell-ringers," said Elp Verren, "will be pulling the jangling things just now, for it is near midnight, I know by the stars, as the Plough fronts my window. Wish the tower would fall right away down on them."

Elp snarled like his own little dog, and showed his teeth with as vicious a grin at the notion of the peal of bells coming down on the bell-ringers in their joy.

"Ho, ho, ho, ho!" laughed Elp, tickled strangely in his fancy, "ho, ho, ho, ho!" rang down the old tower into the vaults where the dead lay, out from the stony ruins, and back again in the echoes; "ho, ho, ho, ho!" rang on each side of Elp, and he looked at his dog, and he looked at his cat, to see were they repeating the strange cacchination. But the cat began to wash her face in most cat-like manner, and the dog looked into the fire for his bare life.

"You didn't laugh?" said Elp, nervous for the first time in his existence, and committing the foolish act of questioning his canine and feline companions.

"You didn't laugh, did you?"

"Catch us at it," said the dog and cat together. "Ho, ho, ho, ho!" rang again down the vaults, out from the ruins, and into the chamber. "Ho, ho, ho, ho!"

"I have done wrong to have wished anybody ill," said Elp Verren, somewhat frightened.

"You've been going wrong a long time, Elp," said the dog and the cat together. "That little error isn't new to you; but catch us laughing all the time, you know!"

Again echoed the peals of disagreeable laughter down through the old tower, until they appeared to come back hoarsely from its very foundation, and resounded again through the dim chamber, until all the air shook with their vibration. Elp caught a strange desire to laugh too, and joined the hideous chorus. Suddenly he ceased, and the laughter around ceased as suddenly. Elp Verren looked about to see if he had any other companions beside his usual ones, and seeing none, he looked at his dog and cat, to detect them in their cacchinations; but a more sober pair of domestic animals, to all appearance, never sat before a fire. The cat was purring and the dog was dozing, as cats and dogs of agreeable manner should do. The burning wood was flickering and flaring, and nothing met the old man's eyes to cause him any uneasiness. Still the uneasiness was in his thoughts, for Elp's conscience, like that of every other man, once awakened, was by no means easily put to rest.

"It is very strange," said Elp, "but I'd swear they had a mouth in the guffaw; and yet look at them now; no one would ever think a smile crossed that dog's countenance, or wrinkled the ugly lips of that tom cat; but I know what I'll do—I'll hang the dog and drown the cat the first thing to-morrow, if I live."

"He'll hang you," said the cat.

"He'll drown you," said the dog.

"Ho ho! ho ho!" the demoniac laughter rang out again, and went its usual course out of the room into the vaults, and up again through the chamber.

"The first thing to-morrow if he lives," they continued together.

Now there is no one would feel happy to find a dog taking one side, and a cat joining in the other side of him. And Elp Verren thought of making a rush for the chamber door, and flying from such a place of unhallowed noises and speeches; but, when Elp endeavoured to rise, he found himself perfectly incapable to move a limb, and the laughter went its usual round of peals, as if there were forty clowns, and any number of pantomimes, in full operation before delighted audiences.

"What a fool Elp Verren is to think he will live till to-morrow," pursued the strange talkers.

"The hands of the clock are going to the last hour of the old year, and before the new begins, if there is no one who will pray for the safety of Elp Verren, we will do our duty, and make no mistake about it either!"

Elp heard the sentence thus uttered, and a cold sweat broke out upon his forehead, and fell in large drops down upon his hands clasped before him. The dog grew large as a lion beside him, and the cat seemed bigger than the biggest tiger. The sight did not at all alleviate the sexton's excited spirits, the more so as his chances of existence were limited to such a condition as that mentioned by his unpleasant companions.

"Ho, ho! Master Elp," said the pair, "ho, ho! You have kept no companions but us, for many a long year. Envy and Ill-will you called us, and you called us aright. We have been beside you at your hearth, we have been beside you at your going forth, we have been beside you at your coming home; step by step we walked with you wherever you went. Us you fed, and us you cherished of all things, and now we do the work of so fond a master unless you find a saving prayer before thirty minutes sweep away. But, of course, some one or other will pray for you. Won't they, Elp?"

Again those worthies repeated their laughter, for the notion of any one praying for Elp seemed too good a joke not to enjoy it. The laughter grew re-doubled, until there seemed a thousand voices joining in its fearful revelry; and not a spot in the room, not the breadth of a pin's point, seemed without a special laughter yelling out the horrid mirth which shook the echoes. As for Elp Verren, horrified and appalled, the dreadful satire conveyed in the words fell upon him like remorse. Elp never did a kindly act since he was a boy, and it was with a dread, despairing feeling, he recalled the reflection. He had rejoiced in his unkindness to his species, he had mocked at their pain, and scorned their sorrow. When woe or want fell upon his neighbours, Elp laughed grimly. When sickness or death made desolation amongst them, Elp rejoiced. When the aged and feeble asked him for charity, Elp spurned them with a curse. When the young and helpless besought his compassion, Elp drove them from him with a threat. On earth there was no one who would kneel for Elp Verren, and he had long ceased to ask a boon of heaven. The sexton thought his case over, and this was the point his thinking came to—he had no chance of a prayer to save him, and there were only thirty minutes to his existence remaining.

"Not thirty minutes, Elp," said the fiends behind him, replying to his thought, "not thirty minutes. You will find it considerably less. You have been thinking, Master Elp, you have been thinking, and we have been laughing, but never give it up so soon, twenty minutes are a long time; oh, dear, bless you, yes! Twenty minutes are yours yet. Why, all the people in Schakemswitz will be down on their knees for you, before the bell-ringers begin their noise. Everybody prays for such a good man as you, Elp, such a kind man, such a generous creature. We'll have our joke, you know, but there's not the slightest use in being frightened, you were never frightened; other people might, but you weren't."

It was a curious thing, Elp observed, for in all his horror he could not avoid observing, that although the pair of visible companions he had, spoke together, there was only one voice between them. The curiosity of the thing, though, was not pleasing. Elp Verren would have rather they had possessed a voice each.

"Droll rogues you are," they went on. "You have saved money, Elp—a good deal of money for your receipts, and some one will be praying for you when it is found out, but that won't take place by twelve to-night, nor twelve to-morrow night either. Some one may take courage to search when you're buried, for they know you're a close fellow. You'll be prayed for, no doubt you will."

One fact seemed to be clear to the terrified listener, that those conversational characters knew the weak points of his chances, and put them in an insinuating manner, which was anything but encouraging. Now, Elp had threatened a little child with the house of correction that very morning for asking him for a groschen, and imploring a blessing for him at the same time, and the little creature ran away crying. Elp watched him, and saw him go into a miserable tumble-down house, where his mother, a widow, had got leave to take shelter until the builder was prepared to knock it down and commence another; and Elp laughed when it occurred, to think how completely he had prevented him from begging by his harsh refusal. If the little child were near Elp now, he should have had thousands of groschen and welcome for a prayer—one breath of his lips—one sigh from his little heart. Elp had lost this chance clearly, and like many another in the same position, lamented it when too late. The board he had saved would have preserved his life, and soul, too, perhaps, in this strait twenty hundred times over, and there it lay inutilised, whilst death was approaching him. The gold which he had pinched himself to accumulate out of very spite, that anyone should enjoy the benefit, or the pleasure which might be obtained from its use, would soon be lying a prey to the most daring plunderer amongst the scamps of Schakemswitz. Elp Verren began to think what a fool he was to have hoarded the yellow dross for such a use; for the criminal who would curse him for his thrift would fling his thalers about in cafés and low gambling-houses, and places of debauchery, and add an imprecation on his head where it lay, to make its pain more woeful. Elp would have given every grain of the coveted metal for an opportunity to bestow upon the little hungry child whom he had frightened away in the morning one hearty meal; but he would have yielded up his existence for one whole day of life to dispose of the coins he had gathered so as to make one poor, miserable family, happy, for the rest of existence. He spoke—

"I will come back to you," said Elp, "in twenty minutes, if you let me go down to the widow Gedschen, and leave the money inside her door. I don't want to be saved from death, and I won't let myself be seen, lest she might pray for me. I only ask to face eternity with one good action on my memory. I only want to feel in my heart the joy of a kindly, human, and holy deed, and I will die as is decreed at your hands, then."

"Well, now, Elp, this really is ungrateful—wanting to leave us for the first occasion in our long connection," uttered the curious pair of the one voice, "besides you have the most strange notions of time ever we knew you to possess before. Why, a good five minutes are gone since you were becoming charitable, and virtuous, and disinterested, and you have just fifteen minutes longer to live, according to the big clock in the tower face. The thing can't be done Elp; we'd be happy to oblige you, but certainly not that far. O dear, not at all!" The clamour of the horrid laughter again greeted on his ear, and roused the echoes of the old place.

"Is there no mercy in ye," said Elp, "demons that ye are! Is there no mercy, that ye mock me thus in pain, agony, and fear, as I am but fifteen minutes for me to live, and I must face judgment. Minutes, that whirl by so fast, that to me it seems the least part of a second was longer when time was less precious than now."

"You never knew the value of time, Elp, or of opportunity either, when you held both as you willed. We are not accountable that we know the value of ours, and you may be sure that we will lose neither. But man, don't be nervous. You'll be saved by some of the prayers we expect to be offered up for such an affable benefactor every minute by the people lodged by your bounty—fed by your labour, and rendered happy by your toil through so many years. It will be all right yet, and you'll go down and order the bell-ringers a pleasant supper after their merry peal—if you're prayed for, you know. That's a very easy condition of safety for you. Why its only a pleasant joke for you—that's all."

Elp bowed down his head on his hands, hopeless, and helpless, as he heard the horrid sounds once more which formed a chorus to every speech of the fiends beside him. The reality of his fate grew more intense, as the consciousness of the approach of midnight forced itself upon him, in the flight of each second, and the muscles of his frame contracted and relaxed in a species of convulsion, which might well seem to him the commencement of the death throes. He raised his head with an effort, and turned his glance toward the lancolated window of the chamber, and looked out. The last star of the seven of the Plough just showed itself at the edge of the casement, gleaming brilliantly, ere it disappeared from the point of view in which Elp sat and beheld it. Strange shadowy shapes growing out of the darkness in which the subsiding blaze of the embers on the hearth left the room, seemed to approach and retire from him, and the one feeling of terror dominated the cowering man, until, fearful to look around him more, he bent down his head and attempted to pray. But the effort was vain, the words would not shape themselves to his lips, nor would his thought await the words. He could think of nothing but his appalling situation. His expressions became incoherent ravings of fear, his ideas became images of fear, any movements he made were contortions of fear, and the soul of the stricken being seemed possessed of nothing else.

"Pray away, Elp," said the voice again; "pray away, Elp, you have ten minutes for the work; and as it is a long time since you did anything that way, you'll be very fresh at it now. You haven't exactly been charitable; you haven't been very kindly or consoling, and ten minutes will give you no opportunity for doing much to prove that you would be if you could from henceforward; but ten minutes will give you a fine opportunity for showing your piety, and of course you'll do it well. You did everything well, Elp, you know!"

With a great effort the appalled sexton lifted his head and looked through the darkness. The fire was almost out. Two gigantic outlines raised themselves upon his right and on his left; and from the height to which they rose, the fiery glare of huge burning orbs looked down each side of him. The heart of Elp sunk within him; an ejaculation of mercy broke from his lips—a breath of prayer—and suddenly his spirit became calm, although not a hope of deliverance rose before him.

Clear, as though in the same apartment with himself, he beheld another scene. Beside a truckle bed stood a little child, whose face Elp recognised as that of the infant he had frightened from him with a curse in the morning. A pale woman whose countenance bore the impress of want, undressed the child and laid aside the wretched, but cleanly, clothing of the young creature. The lips of the child moved, and Elp heard his voice clear as though it were beside him.

"Joseph not hungry now!" he said. "The crust was good mother gave him."

"Yes, my child," murmured the pale woman.

"And when the New Year comes will some good man give us more bread, mother?" continued the infant, as if referring to a previous portion of the conversation.

"We shall not want, darling," she answered, bending over him; "all are fed from heaven, and it has not forgotten us."

"The bad man that frightens Joseph at the church gate will not be fed from heaven, will he, mother?"

"If he is not forgotten there, he will be provided for," replied the Widow Gedschen to her little son.

"I hate the bad, wicked man," said the child, passionately.

"Joseph was hungry and he frightened Joseph."

"I hate him!" he pursued.

"O, my child!" said the mother, as she fondled the fair flaxen head between her hands, "you must not hate those who wrong you. Little as you are, the teaching of the world must not blot out the light of love in which the world lives. Don't you know the lesson the good lady at the school taught you—bless them that hate, pray for them that curse you. Surely Joseph does not forget the good lady's lessons."

"No mother! I pray for the lady, but why should I pray for the bad man. He told me Joseph should go to prison, when Joseph asked him for bread. The bad man, Joseph, will not pray for."

For a moment the sexton felt free from the thought of his fate; but the last words of the child recalled it once more to his mind, and he shuddered and clasped his hands upon his eyes. When he removed them again he was in the darkness of his own chamber; beside him sat the two hideous watchers, and the horrid voice once more grated upon his ear.

"Well, Elp, so the praying won't do either. Well, well! it is a pity the world is so ungrateful, and that men will forget such generous creatures as you. Time is going though; five minutes are yours yet, and you may use them as you can."

"Five minutes!" ejaculated Elp. "Surely I have longer to live than five minutes!"

"Not a moment longer, Elp. Sorry for it, but it can't be helped. You had a pretty long cord, and you've run the full length of your tether. To convince you, look at the bell-ringers!"

Instantly Elp seemed to stand in the belfry, and, sure enough, there were the seven bell-ringers waiting for Hans Morritz, the blacksmith, to make up their company. They removed their coats, and stood in their shirt sleeves ready to catch the ropes. A knock sounded at the door.

"Here is Hans Morritz," they shouted, as one of their number ran down to open it. In a moment the brawny form and good-humoured countenance of Hans was before them.

"Just in time," he said, "two minutes to twelve. Wont we give them a rattling peal, and wish everybody a happy New Year out of the brazen throats of our instruments. To your ropes, my hearties, and at the last stroke of the clock be ready with a will, and altogether."

"Ring loud enough to waken old Elp Verren with a tone that wont be hushed at his ill-will," said another; "the cross old brute would silence us if he dare."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the bell-ringers. "Wont Elp swear a trifle?"

A sigh swept through the belfry as Elp felt himself recalled to his chamber to meet his death. One minute, in the full moonbeams, intervened on the clock ere the hand pointed to the hour of twelve, and before the ringers shook the first note out of the bells he should be dead!

"Do you give it up, Elp?" said the demon voice.

"Let me see again the chamber of the Widow Gedachen," said Elp.

"Anything to oblige, you know."

Elp looked. The child was kneeling by the bedside now, and its lips moved in prayer. The widow lifted her eyes to heaven, and Elp Verren saw in the glance of confidence, which raised beyond the darkness of the night, and the darkness of her lot, the hope of that human heart which trusted in the midst of trial in Infinite mercy, love, and bounty. As he gazed the clock of the tower pealed out the first stroke of the twelve. The clangour of the second swelled upon the air and over the little town, to echo among the mountains far away, and startle the peasant from his sleep. The third pealed, the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth fell like strokes of doom upon the ear of Elp. The mother and her child—the widow and the orphan—prayed still. Innocence and suffering knelt to God before the gaze of the agonizing sinner.

"Mercy!" he murmured—"is there no mercy for me?"

He heard the accents of the prayer in which they both joined. Around him there rose a clamour of horror which terrified him, but above which he heard the voice of the child making responses to the supplication of the mother. The words rose clearly to his ear as the clock told the eleventh stroke.

"All who are in temptation, trial, or danger," prayed the Widow Gedachen.

"O Lord deliver them!" murmured the little child.

TWELVE!

Such a pull at a peal of bells never surely was made before. Everybody asleep in the town of Schakemswitz heard it, and every one that heard it sprang out of bed incontinently, or sprang up in it frightened. But there was no need for all those startling symptoms; after the first clang the bells fell into the modulation of their regular cadences of joy, and from lip to lip rang the wish which fell from all. "The New Year is ringing in a happy new year and many of them." In his chamber Elp Verren, too, heard the musical thundering from the tower—in his chamber he heard the hearty laughter of the bell-ringers, as they tugged and yielded to the great pulls of the ropes, which aroused all the wondrous harmony. With the rich, and full, and solemn melody, rung still in his ear the prayer of the little child, and the supplication of his mother. "All who are in trial, temptation, or danger, O Lord, deliver them."

Elp could not mistake it. He was living, breathing, listening to the bells as they told the story of the dawning year to sleeping and waking men. He had been in trial, in temptation to despair, in danger—and the prayer of the widow and the orphan, "arose for such as he, for him surely as well as others. Ships might have been drifting on rocky shores, where the waves broke and fretted into spray above their treacherous crags—men might have stood above precipices blind, and giddy, and fearful with that strange impulse of despair which hoveled them to spring under the yawning depths; human souls might have hovered over the great abyss, wheresin and sorrow, and pain would have swallowed them up, but not one of those were so near the snapping of the thread of fate as he, and he knew and felt it even as he thought. Higher and louder—wilder and more swelling rose upon the blast the music of the bells, and Elp Verren sank upon his knees to pray, and who shall say his prayer was not heard?

When it was over he looked around him, the fire was almost extinguished upon his hearth, and beside it sat his old domestic friends, the dog and cat. Elp sprang to his feet, and a yell from the dog and a squall from the cat attested the force of his pedal muscles. With a hearty laugh, such as never broke from him since boyhood, Elp Verren rushed down the winding stair across the corridor, and into the tower of the bells.

"A happy New Year," he shouted among the ringers.

"A happy New Year," cried Hans Morritz.

"A happy New Year," roared the ringers.

Elp hardly heard them. He rushed out, and down the street to the house of ruins, where dwelt the widow Gedachen. There was no widow there, nor any living tenant. The winds came and the winds went. The shadows of the night dwelt there, and the echo of the bells swelled through the passages, but not a child knelt, not a woman prayed that night, nor for many a year, within its walls.

"I have dreamed it all," said Elp, "but the dream shall not be without its fruits."

It was as Elp said. Never after did the poor or sorrow-stricken implore Elp Verren in vain. Never after did the weak or youthful supplicate him without benefit, never did the woeful or wandering stand beside his door without experiencing the mercy which dwelt in the heart of the man who had received mercy. Through all the years which were his, there were none so filled with the work of Faith, of Hope, of Charity, and none, above all, to whom as Time swung round the bells swung out at midnight a greater blessing, than when they broke over the thoughts of the sexton of Schakemswitz announcing the birth of a new year.

W.

IN THE NIGHT-TIME.

THROUGH blinded street and garden space,
On tossing breadths of walnut bloom,
On leaf and lead, on stone and spout,
The black rain clatters in the gloom.
The dog howls from the river side,
The red cock crows on outpost farms,
And, far and wide, one ghostly cloud
Swathes earth and star in dripping arms.

Sit close to me, for I am faint,
And need thine whole companionship,
The human peace that lightly slides
From touches of the hand and lip.
Sit close to me, I sit deject,
Horizoned round with prison bars,
And only catch, through blotted dusk,
One little strip of waning stars.

Is it our neighbour's horse that smote
The stall floor with his restless hoof?
I fancied that I almost heard
The feet of Fate cross half the roof.
Hark, how the dark-ribbed wainscots groan,
And the doors clash in hall and stair,
And the wild lightning leaps and leaps
From branch to branch of walnuts bare.

Sit close to me, for I am sick,
And beaten down by smiting cark.
Alas! the wisdom of the day
Is baffled in the heart of dark;
Peace—something stirs athwart the air,
Yon cloud is blotched with saffron dyes,
The bird chirps on the window sill,
The morn, at last, is in the skies!

GREY ABBEY.

GREY ABBEY was situated in the vicinity of a small town of the same name in the county of Down, about ten miles from Belfast, and within a short distance of Strangford Lough. The ruins are of considerable extent, in good preservation, and finely situated for effect. The Abbey is thus quaintly described in an old work entitled the "Montgomery MSS.," published about thirty years ago:—"Neare and in view of Rosemount-house, are the walls of a large Abbey of curious work, (ruinated in Tireowen's rebellion); it is called in inquisitions and patents Abathium de fugo Dei; in Irish, Monestrea; in English, Grey (or Hoare) Abbey, from the order of fryars who enjoyed it; and had, in ancient times, belonged thereunto, all its own parish, both in spiritualibus et temporalibus, conferred by De Courcy, at the instigation of his wife, the king of the Isle of Man's daughter, as Camden reports (if I remember aright) in the annales of that island. To this Abbey belonged also divers lands and tithes of this fine tract of country is gathered from the "Great Inquisition of the county of Down."

"Con O'Neill, chief of South or Upper Clandeboy, whose castle was that of Castlereagh, having about Christmas, 1602, a 'grand debauch' at Castlereagh, with his brothers, friends, and followers, he sent his servants to Belfast for more wine; but, in returning, a quarrel took place between them and some English soldiers, near the Knock Church, and they lost their wine. Con, inquiring into this transaction, learned from themselves that their number exceeded that of the soldiers; on which he swore 'by his father, and the souls of his ancestors,' they should never be servants of his till they had beaten the 'baddagh Sassenagh soldiers.' On this threat they returned, armed, and attacked the soldiers, several of whom were killed in the affray; and Con was soon after taken up as an abettor, and sent prisoner to Carrickfergus castle. The severity of his first confinement was soon mitigated by a permission to walk through the town during the day, attended by a soldier, who returned him to in the county of Antrim, viz., out of Ballyment.....Campion reports (p. 69.) that the said Abbey, Innes and Comer, were built A.D. 1198 and 1199; but in all my researches I could not find figures or any stones either of the Abbey or of the castles aforesaid, to denote the year when they were erected; and who views the walls and ruins of this monastery, will allow many years to the building of it. The church thereof was in part roofed, and slated, and re-edified, and a yard thereunto walled about, and a competent stipend given for that by the first Lord Montgomery."

Of the parish of Grey Abbey, in the year 1634, an old writer says, that it contained "a double-roofed house, and a baron and fower flankers, with bakeing and brewing houses, stables, and other needful office houses; they are built after the forraigne and English manner, with outer and inner courts walled about, and surrounded with pleasant gardens, orchards, meadows, and pasture enclosures, under view of the said house, called Rosemount, from which the mannor taketh name."

The way in which the Montgomery family became possessed the provost-marshal at night. He at length obtained his liberty in the following manner:—"Thomas Montgomery, master of a barque, which traded thither with meal for the garrison, was employed by Hugh Montgomery, his relation, to endeavour to effect Con's escape. Having got letters conveyed to Con, acquainting him of the steps about to be taken, he began by making love to Annas Dobbins, daughter of the provost-marshal; and marrying her, through her effected Con's escape, who was conveyed on board Montgomery's vessel, and landed at Largs in Ayrshire. In 1605, Con obtained his pardon from James I. at the suit of the above Hugh Montgomery, and James Hamilton; but for their effecting his escape, and this service, he had previously made over most of his lands to them, of which they immediately obtained a new patent from the crown. In April, 1606, we find Con granting the lands of Ballyrosboye, in the Galliagh, between Castlereagh and Belfast, to a Thomas Montgomery, probably the above-mentioned Thomas, for his share in effecting his escape.

COURTSTOWN CASTLE.

THE ruins of Courtstown Castle present to the notice of the tourist the remains of one of the most splendid ancient baronial residences that ever existed in this country. They are situated within a few miles of Kilkenny, to whose noble castle alone they are said to have once yielded in magnificence.

Raymond le Gros, the founder of the powerful family of Grace, the lords for centuries of this castle, and a vast territory surrounding it, whose representative, even in the reign of Elizabeth, was designated as "An Grassagh more Ballynacourty," (the great Grace of Courtstown) is well known in Irish history as the bulwark of early English power, as the brother-in-law of Earl Strongbow, and as the first viceroy of Ireland.

Though we are unable to fix a precise date to the building of this castle of Tullaroan, or Courtstown, we may be allowed to conjecture that it was nearly coeval with Grace's castle, in Kilkenny, erected by William le Gras.

The ruins of this edifice evince considerable grandeur, as well as great strength. They exhibit the spirit of a powerful chieftain, and the taste of a feudal age. Courtstown Castle consisted of an outward ballium, or envelope, having a round tower at each angle, and also at each side of an embattled entrance to the south, which was further defended by a portcullis. Within this area, or outward court, comprehending about an acre of ground, stood the body of the castle, enclosing an inner court of an oblong form. A massive quadrangular tower, or keep, projected from the centre of the south front, directly opposite to the embattled entrance of the exterior area we have mentioned.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XI.

Larfingass is unaware that his chum despises him; the girls who flirt with him, because he is so very young, would sharply box his ears with their fans, if he whisper a word that made the most distant allusion to marriage. And so he dies alone; or he grows grey and foolish, and is sent away to get through his remaining years on a shabby allowance. Look at his epitaph; there is not a willow twig to bind the sod round his eyelid sleeps, under marble deftly carved; and his actions are verbosely recorded in letters of shining brass.

How poor Sam Topley share the fate of unhappy Larfingass? Surely all these, his young friends, whom we have presented to the reader, will not desert him, and his song shall be over, and his laughter be still! But reader be sure that we shall tell the truth, nothing but the truth, about them, when the time shall have come.

Sam Topley is now only just married; he is hardly out of the church. But his friends have already looked on his prospects. How does he propose to feed his wife of Hymen's somewhat costly torch? When his love-letters has he had due regard to the part the butcher plays in married life? His friends kindly peer into the distance for him, and behold the torch he has imprudently lit burnt to the handle, and showing only ragged edges of faint light. It is agreed, however, that Sam's home will be a place to visit—it will be deemed odd, so confoundedly comic. Mrs Samuel Topley could not fail to fall under the criticism of her husband's friends. They speculated as to her condition in life; the colour of her hair; her property; and her height.

Namby presently appeared, and told the whole truth. Sam Topley met at a discussion club, which he frequented, a vehement talker on the liberal side. The honourable speaker, Mr. Bastin, was a man who possibly kept his heart in the right place, but most undoubtedly put his aitches in the wrong. He was fluently inconsequential, and brilliantly ungrammatical. Yet at the Glowworm Debating Club, he was an established favourite. There were cries for Bastin early in the evening. He was the star set up by the regular Glowworms to reply to a gentleman who occasionally condescended to come among them, accompanied by some lofty friends, for the purpose of informing them that the landed gentry of England were the born rulers of "the cad," and that the cad might howl, but he would never be able to disturb this most wholesome and proper arrangement. Bastin gave this spokesman of blood hard hits occasionally. Sam Topley was a liberal to the backbone. He and Namby agreed to abhor and detest these two-penny oligarchs, as they called them, who gave themselves mighty airs over their gin and water, and bird's-eye. Whenever Mr. Bastin rose, therefore, to reply to the spokesman of the "two-penny oligarchs," he was received with loud applause by Messrs. Sam Topley and Namby. To the ironical cheers and to the interruptions of the two-penny oligarchs, Sam Topley and Namby replied with cheers. These cheers smote the heart of the honourable speaker, Mr. Bastin, who thereupon sought the acquaintance of the young gentlemen.

Mr. Bastin had only one way of opening a conversation, or of making a new acquaintance.

"Gentlemen," said he, one brilliant night, while he mopped his forehead with a blue handkerchief, after his oratorical exertions, "you must have a glass with me."

Now, this is all dreadfully vulgar. But I pray the reader to observe that I am not to be blamed, because young gentlemen of decent parentage, passable education, and fair abilities, resort to boozing rooms, and make the acquaintance of men who would not be received by their father's housemaids. My business is to hold my brush steadily, and to copy as closely as I am able, every tint and form of the groups that fall within the design of my picture.

Messrs Sam Topley and Namby fell in with the honourable speaker's suggestion, I am bound to say, with alacrity; and the three, at the host's suggestion, drank to their better acquaintance. This better acquaintance arose rapidly. Mr. Bastin was charmed with the vivacity of Mr. Sam, as he respectfully called him; and evinced his admiration by christening this gentleman "the grig." Mr. Bastin improved his young friends, by relating so much of his worldly experiences as he could disclose with safety. As Namby remarked slyly to Sam, "there was evidently a screw loose somewhere."

"Or a tile off," was Mr Sam's handsome amendment.

Mr. Bastin had been everything by turns, and nothing long. He had patented inventions that had failed; two or three joint stock companies had been killed under him; he had been a general agent to nobody in particular; he had started a newspaper; and he had been a rate-collector. In the course of these transitions from one sphere of activity to another, he had found time to pay three visits of ceremony to Basinghall Street, and to confer with divers persons there as to a certificate with which he felt bound to provide himself before he opened a new career. These visits had proved healthful exercise to him. There was not a line in his plump, red face (it was round and red as a danger signal); he was fifty, and still his hair was flaxen, and thickly matted over his skull; his eye-brows were massive as an ordinary moustache. Trouble swept over him again and again; but he dipped, and rose untouched. His character in the city was not of the sweetest. He had been actor in very shady bill transactions. Money filtered out of his pocket, he knew not how. He was no master of accounts. When he had a hobby to work, he overlaid it with expense. He spent all his money building noble ships, and when the last length of rope had been bought, and they were ready for sea, he had not the money to man and victual them; and so they rotted in port, and were towed off to Basinghall Street to be broken up, and sold for what they would fetch. So many of these wrecks had been seen about the city, that east of Temple Bar, our honourable speaker of the Glowworm Debating Society, was known as Whirligig Bastin. He had other nicknames, less complimentary than this. Yet he bore his shames as lightly as his misfortunes: and still filched little sly advantages in the world, which he enjoyed none the less, because very strict folk called him ugly names. He had always something to sell, in his pockets. He could accommodate a friend with a watch, a pair of slippers his lodger had ceded to him, because they were too narrow for the said lodger; he had always a house to let, although he had never possessed a brick in the course of his life; and he had an interest in every description of trade—drawing percentages upon all his recommendations, so that money dribbled into his pocket through a hundred little channels. He lived at Islington, where he kept a dingy house full of city clerks, at a few shillings a head. His clothes cost him nothing, (he recommended his clerks to his tailor,) he ate of the spare leavings of his first floor and parlour; his wife and daughter were the servants of his house. He was a brass-plate coal merchant to boot.

Many weeks had not passed when both Namby and Sam Topley were fairly ensconced under Mr. Bastin's roof. The house was a house of bed-rooms. People slept in the attics and kitchens, in the parlours and drawing-rooms. Shakedown of all descriptions and degrees of dilapidation were known to the Bastin household. The clerks poured in every night. There were boots outside every door, and in the afternoon candlesticks of all kinds held candles of every length, in the hall. Latch keys were perpetually in the street-door. Early morning produced calls for shaving water from every floor. The house had a stifling, damp, coffee-and-bacon odour. The best knives, and forks, and crockery went into the drawing-room, while deep blue cracked coffee cups, flanked by forks, the prongs of which described all degrees of angles, were clattered to the second floor. I suspect that the third floor stole shivering into the morning air, to some mechanics coffee-house, where breakfast might be had cheaper than under Mr. Bastin's roof.

When Mr. Sam Topley was prevailed upon to accept the cheap hospitality of his new friend, he packed up his "traps," as he called them, and went merrily on his way towards Islington. Mr. Bastin received him graciously; although he looked strangely at his young friend, when he perceived that his worldly goods were packed, and loosely, within the compass of an ordinary carpet-bag.

"Will your luggage come to-night, Mr. Sam?" Mr. Bastin asked, taking Mr. Sam's bag from his hand, and courteously leading the way up some steep stairs, (with stair-carpet upon them about the width of tape, and showing, or endeavouring to show, a pattern that reminded Mr. Sam of a convict's coat).

Mr. Sam laughed, and addressing his new landlord as "old cock," said, "I make you my sole heir of every thing I have in the world, save and except the contents of that bag."

It was, perhaps, this candid admission made by Mr. Sam, in that airy way of his, that decided Mr. Bastin to land his new-comer in the third floor back room of his well-populated mansion. "Here," said Mr. Bastin, as he entered the room, "here you will be comfortable enough."

"I should snore, the night through, in a rat trap," said Sam. The room permitted its inhabitant to shut the door, when he had carefully squeezed himself into a corner by the bed. More light came down the chimney than through the yellow panes of the window. The window had warped, and defied all attempts to be fastened. A slip of muslin was loosely swung across it by tape, and nailed to the walls. The towel-horse, being weak in one leg, was generously supported and comforted in its endeavours to bear the burden of a towel, by the wash-stand. The bed appeared to have seen better days in a hospital. The drawers were littered with broken buttons, pins, wafers, scraps of paper, collar strings, and other precious relics of former lodgers. But Dans au grenier qu'on est bien à vingt ans !"

Sam blew the rubbish out of the corners of the drawers, (he had little enough to put into them, poor fellow!) picked up the horse when it fell; made a wedge for the window, to prevent the rattling of the warped frames; and declared that he should sleep like a top.

When Mr. Namby made his appearance, he was received by Mr. Bastin with marked distinction. The second floor front room was happily at his disposal, its recent occupant having left yesterday. Mr. Namby brought some hundred rather ragged volumes of books with him, two solid portmanteaus heavily packed, his duodecim rack, and the pictures of actresses, and the caricatures by Gavarni, that had enlivened his chambers in the Temple. From his pockets he discharged a dozen pairs of soiled gloves, a corkscrew, a pocket comb, and a few cakes of cavendish tobacco, without which, he observed, no young man's bedroom was complete. It was the belief of Mr. Bastin that Mr. Namby was a shining literary genius, not a skirmisher making stray shot on the outskirts, but a general perched upon the eminence, and directing a wing of the army, at any rate. Our young gentleman gave himself airs accordingly, and permitted his landlord to pay him compliments to his heart's content. Mr. Namby in return for these civilities, commended the oratorical force of Mr. Bastin.

"I don't agree with your party," said Mr. Namby, loftily, (Mr. Bastin's party!) "but I can admire the courageous defence of a cause that is in peril. Besides, your enemies, our friends the two-penny oligarchs, are unbearable."

Mr. Bastin bowed his red face, and declared that having elicited the approbation of the author of "Combust," the admirable burlesque of Milton, he had lived long enough.

Mr. Bastin found his lodgers almost nightly amid the Glowworms. What indeed would mamma have said, had she seen her dear, clever boy, flourishing a long clay pipe in the companionship of querulous shoemakers and chartist lawyers' clerks? Sam Topley appeared to be in his proper element. It never occurred to any of his acquaintance that he had mother or father. Still less did his friends believe that the day would come when the young gentleman would make early sacrifice to the graces, and lead a trembling creature to the altar.

When, for the first time, Miss Sophy Bastin, carried shaving water to the third floor back, of her eloquent parent's populous establishment, was there a flutter at the young lady's heart? Did she see a rosy little love perched upon the pewter? When Mr. Sam thrust his shock head into the passage, and with a pleasant smile surveyed the retreating form of Sophy (who was on her way to the second floor front with clean towels), he made no note of the prospect before him. He proceeded with the air he was humming; and he dipped his razor into the hot water with the careless unconcern which only he enjoys whose heart is calm as a polypus. Yet, in Sam's chapter of accidents, a very notable accident had happened.

A friend, we call to mind, was on his way from his father's parsonage, to the railway station. He was trudging across the meadow that lay between the parsonage house and the high road, followed by the bearer of his portmanteau. He had determined to leave England, friends and home; and as young Englishmen will, to seek wild adventures in far-off prairies—in untrodden wilds. He reached the gate of the field. He was lifting the latch thereof, when a lady approached, and asked him the way to the house of his father's nearest neighbour.

Half an hour later, our friend was retracing his steps to his father's parsonage. A year later our friend, came out of the parsonage house, in the morning, and went, with his reverend father, to the village church. The bells were ringing; and at the altar stood the lady of the meadow-gate. She had asked her way, but had not stopped with the rector's nearest neighbour. Our friend had returned to beg that she would come nearer the parsonage, on his arm—then in his arms. It was only the other day that our dear friend said to the lady of the meadow-gate, as he calls her, playfully; "Had I been ready for the 8.30. train, as I fully intended, on a certain morning, I had not had all these brats about me now."

"Oh, papa!" from the children.

"It's a pity you were not in time;" from mamma, who plumped a red and infinitely dimpled baby into our friend's lap. They are a happy couple, and live—but no, let them live in peace. This, by way of illustration. Truth is stranger than fiction; because men cannot create schemes of life as intricate as those which hours and years evolve from the sad strife, the loves and hatreds, the follies and the crimes of men. The smallest pebble of a life dropped into the stream of time, widens infinitely upon its bosom. We see only the deeper, nearer ripples, but there they are, faint, where the water, to our feeble sight, is smooth as a lady's mirror.

The loves of Miss Sophy Bastin and Mr. Sam Topley grew slowly. The opportunities were few and far between.

The first expressive glance Miss Sophy caught from the eye of Mr. Sam, was wrung from his manly nature when, on a certain evening, she was lighting his bed-room candle, in the hall. The second step was made by Mr. Sam, when he declared to the lady that she looked as fresh as a rose.

"Ha! sir," said the coy damsel, as she disappeared rapidly down the kitchen stairs.

The first present the lady received from her admirer, was a copy of one of Namby's burlesques. Men woo strangely. It is on record that a fair lady was won by an admirer, who laid the foundation of his suit with a copy of the "Sporting Almanac." Sam was not a sentimentalist; Miss Sophy, on the contrary, was. She had read exciting romances by the dozen; and pleasantly contrived a love of Bulwer, and James, and Ainsworth, with the constant and passionate perusal of penny journals of all descriptions. She was one of those fat, red, highly-dimpled girls, who are to be seen in the dingiest of London houses, occasionally. Everybody believed that Sophy belonged, by right, to the country; that the regions of cowslips and buttercups were hers. But, she was born in Pentonville. She had lived, her life through, in London. She knew little of the pastoral, beyond that spare instalment of it, which may be found amid the lilacs of Brompton or St. John's Wood. It may be that she had in the course of her various childhood, plucked daisies upon Primrose Hill. Sophy, it must be confessed, did not express sentimentality in her face or manner. She trolled her songs about the house, as she carried the comfort of tea and muffins to the voracious chief clerk of the first floor, or retreated to the kitchen with the remains of Mr. Namby's breakfast. Her answer was ready, when a lodger dared to joke with her. It was the pride of her eloquent parent, that his Sophy could "give anybody as good as they sent, any day." This enviable power was exercised on Mr. Namby frequently; even on the favoured Sam Topley. But Sam enjoyed the retort that hit him. Miss Sophy amused him. He vowed that she beat all the girls he had seen in the course of his life. His conferences with her lengthened. Mr. Sam always wanted hot-water; a button upon his wristband, (how charming when she was sewing it on!) the clothes-brush. He was ashamed to trouble her so often. She laughed, and blushed a little; and still came tapping at his door, content, it was clear, to be there.

THE ANGEL GUARDIAN.

AN ICELANDIC LEGEND.

A mother kneels by a crystal well,
In the green Icelandic woods.
For Spring has risen and trees put forth
Their leaves in the solitudes.

Gold-haired, with eyes of tender blue,
Her infant by her lies,
Looking up to the gracious sun,
And the changes of the skies.

She stoops above the cold, clear well,
Puts forth one milk-white arm,
And, through the arch, beholds her face
A-fresh with gentle charm.

Sure, never did she look more sweet,
Her rosy finger-tips
Touch, with the pensile touch of flame,
The roses of her lips.

Dreaming, she gazes in the lymph,
Flings back her forehead's braid,
Meshed in the toils of sinful pride—
Caught by her own fair shade.

A shrill, wild cry; she hears it not,
Though it clamours at the skies,
Uncared, the gentle boy has slipped
Down the wild precipice.

Sudden, she turns with knitted palms,
And white lips dead-apart;—
A daggered hand springs from the well
And stabs her to the heart!

NOT DEFUNCT.

HAVE always entertained an unhealthy aversion for coffin-makers, undertakers, hearse-drivers, and the other functionaries whose presence at a man's funeral has been rendered indispensable by social usage. An undertaker, to me, is the executor of the ghosts; his breath smells of corroding lead and rotting cedar,—I can even trace a metallic sympathy between his rings and watch guards, and the breast-plates and handles of his coffins. The Germans may be able to explain this mental phenomenon; for my part I set about investigating it a dozen years ago, and am, at this moment, as remote as ever from any rational conclusion. I never attend funerals; I would go a league out of my way to avoid a church-yard. I hated my son, Tom, when he was three years old, in consequence of a resemblance which I fancied he bore to an egg-cheeked cherub on the upper section of my grand-mother's tombstone. When the boy squalled I hated him; for his resemblance to the conventional spirit grew daily more and more obvious, and was further increased by an attack of water on the brain which rendered his eyes as prominent as a couple of tulip bulbs. In the presence of these confessions it will appear rather inconsistent that the strongest friendship I ever formed was contracted with a celebrated undertaker, the late Mr. Hammercloth. The circumstances which led to this strange acquaintance were these. Crossing the high street of Yewburg one winter morning, when the lamps were enveloped in fog, and the damp air clung to one's flesh like a cuticle of court plaster, I was knocked down by the leaders of the mail-coach, and would have been crushed to death under the wheels but for a gentleman who darted forward with the celerity of a swallow, and rescued me from imminent death at the peril of his own life. My deliverer was Mr. Hammercloth, and my thankfulness was increased by reflecting that, in rescuing me from death, he had resigned all pretensions to the profit of an economical £10 funeral. Mr. Hammercloth was a gentleman peculiarly adapted by nature and inclination to adorn the profession of undertaker. His complexion was a rich mauve, his eyes retiring and sinister, whilst his sunken cheeks imparted to his nose the prominence of the handle of a jack plane. His body was supported on legs as uniform as a pair of bamboo canes; he was slightly stooped, and turned out his toes to an extent that indicated an ambition to take up as much room as possible in the world. Gratitude to Mr. Hammercloth induced me to accept an invitation to his table, where I met his daughter, an attenuated demoiselle, whose life was a prolonged rehearsal of the rôle of Milton's Il Penseroso. The evening used to pass heavily over us then. We all sat down in silence, and long before the accustomed hour for retiring, Miss Hammercloth, who was in mourning for her mother, would gather up her crapes and float out of the room like an animated pall. Then Hammercloth would cross his legs, touch the decanter with a suggestive nod to me, and open a conversation on the cycles of epidemics.

"Tell me, Burt," he would say, "did you see that paragraph, stating that the cholera has broken out in the Danubian provinces? it appeared in the Evening Prognosticator."

"No; what about it?"

"What about it? Can you afford to treat such a remarkable event so inconsiderately?"

"Inconsiderately! why, my dear sir, how does a Danubian cholera affect me?"

"Ah, Burt, but that's selfish, and selfishness is sinful, you know. Just imagine what a revolution it may produce in the timber yards, and amongst the coffin decorators!"

"The timber yards! Hammercloth."

"The timber yards, Sir. Let us have easterly winds for three weeks, and the first case of cholera announced in the papers, will improve deals by fifteen per cent."

"Indeed. Is your stock heavy?"

"Well, I have a fairish supply. I am rather well up in the ready-made department. I am prepared to execute, say 1000 orders of all sizes in the bespoke time."

"Then there are two departments. Now look, Hammercloth," I would say, drawing closer to the fire, and placing one foot on the fender, to give myself an appearance of ease, "suppose you took a coffin to a customer, and found it too short, how would you manage?"

"Why, the course of action would be evident. Send the family out of the room, make the lamented deceased a bit short, tuck him up comfortably, screw him down. By Jove," Mr. Hammercloth would say, digressing from the subject, "that's an easterly wind blowing at the windows. In a few days, the land may be filled with rejoicings, and every street converted into a forest of draped knockers."

"Surely," I would say, "you do not desire such a catastrophe."

"Well," Mr. Hammercloth would exclaim with a felicitous evasion, "the principle on which I work is a principle recognised by the highest and lowest subject of the realm—my own interest first, and the public's afterwards."

I remember the last evening my friend and I passed in each other's society. It was about the middle of January. The streets were muffled in snow, the watchmen were hoarse, the mail-coach horn, as it sounded through the village, evinced bronchial symptoms, and the howling of Mr. Hammercloth's watch-dog resembled a rude series of descending flats. The undertaker was unusually lively. His uncle, Mr. Grimjoke, a rich and venerable bachelor, was announced to be in extremis; and, as my friend was his only surviving relative, the probabilities of a legacy were decidedly in his favour. I never saw Mr. Hammercloth in better humour. He laughed, he joked, he cracked grim jests, and appeared to be excessively happy. We had brewed our punch, and Mr. Hammercloth was about to open a new chapter on the cycles of epidemics, when our attention was aroused by a vulgar, single, yet authoritative knock at the front door. Hammercloth went to the head of the stairs, and listened as the door was opened, and a boy's voice announced that Grimjoke had breathed his last.

"All flesh is grass," observed Mr. Hammercloth, retiring from the lobby. "He'll want a coffin five feet six by four."

There was a pause, which was interrupted by the entrance of Miss Hammercloth, who, with a kerchief, evidently fresh from the custody of a dozen folds, enquired in a voice of the deepest emotion—"Is dear uncle dead?"

"He is, child; there, don't cry," responded Mr. Hammercloth. "And now it becomes my duty, as affectionate heir, to provide him with a suitable and comfortable coffin."

"We'll require sixty hat scarfs," interrupted Miss Hammercloth.

"And a dozen mourning coaches," added her father. "You will come, Mr. Burt," he continued, addressing me.

I hesitated.

"Of course you'll come. And look you here, I'll put up a coffin, and we'll take it across to Mayfield, box up the old fellow, and make things nice."

"Not now, certainly," I said.

"Now," emphasised Mr. Hammercloth, "I'd consider it an act of gross disrespect to the lamented dead if we hesitated one moment."

I consented reluctantly. The coffin was quickly procured, and with the aid of two workmen we crossed the road to the deceased's residence. Now and then the men would be rebuked by a "steady, steady, gentlemen!" from the undertaker. At times some villager, straggling homewards, would encounter us with a look of bewilderment, standing stock-still until we had passed. I thought of the old Teutonic stories of witch processions and spectral funerals, and I confess, my mind became uncomfortably excited. A turn in the road brought us in front of Mayfield. The house, which was thickly shielded by larch and beech shrubberies, was a low structure, flanking the extremity of a broad lawn. Not a single light burned in the windows, not a smoke wreath from the chimneys betrayed the presence of a human being within those walls where the dead man reposed in the miserable isolation he so loved in life. Mr. Hammercloth knocked and rang, and was answered by a reverberation of peals from the empty halls and corridors within. The bearers exchanged looks of mysterious import and trembled under their burthen. The knocking was repeated, and once more the deserted interior howled through all its arteries. After some minutes of horrible suspense, the fanlight was faintly illuminated, and we heard footsteps in the passage.

"What do you want?" asked a woman's voice, in the shrillest and ghastliest falsetto.

"Open the door, my good woman," cried Mr. Hammercloth, "open the door."

"Who are you?" asked the falsetto.

"Mr. Humphrey's legatee, ma'am. Come to make him nice and tidy. Let in the coffin, won't you?"

"Why the gentleman's hardly dead yet—who knows but he's only in a thrance—you wouldn't smother him intirely, would you?"

"Where the tree falls it lieth," said Mr. Hammercloth. "Do you know whom you are speaking to, ma'am? I won't forget you when the time comes. Let us in."

"Ah, thin, is that yourself, Mr. Hammercloth? I'd be sorry to keep you out, I would."

And scarcely were the words said, when the door was opened, and to our horror Mr. Grimjoke, in his dressing-gown, and holding a stable lamp in his hand, stood up on the threshold. The old man, shrunken and withered as a dry pear, and wrapped up tightly in the faded gown, bore such a terrible resemblance to a re-animated skeleton, that we fell back by a common impulse, I stumbling over the body of Mr. Hammercloth, who had fallen down insensible.

"I'm not dead yet, nephew," said Mr. Grimjoke, as he held the lamp close to Hammercloth's face, "I'm not dead yet; and when I am, you won't be much the better for the burying. I've made over every penny I scraped together to the Blind Asylum, and as for my coffin, it's seasoning these three years in the house. Do you hear that?" and with these words Mr. Grimjoke banged the door in our faces and retired.

We lifted Hammercloth—we bore him home. At parting, he pressed my hand significantly.

"Never," he whispered, "breathe a word of this business in human ear; and (still lower) your coffin shall cost you nothing." I promised to obey.—I never saw him since.

A SERENADE.

O! LILY, shining by the gate,
Blush roses flaming from the wall,
Dim palms whose cores reverberate
The voices of the waterfall;
From amber casements, where she sleeps,
Full in yon white star's snowy light,
Awake my love, awake my love,
And bid her haste to bless the night.
And tell the maid she need not bring
Her pretty bonnet, trimmed with blonde,
Or pork pie hat, with pheasant's wing,
Of which, she knows, I'm very fond.

Full on the river shines the moon,
A path of pearls to yonder star,
And light that trembles like the noon,
Floats o'er the linden woods afar,
O! vine tree, jewelled o'er with dew,
And looking towards her happy room,
Cry out and bid the richest flower
In earth or paradise to bloom.
O! rare exotic, happy I
To share with thee one small square plot,
Where I should be your gardener,
And heaven supply the watering pot!

Low, in yon chamber, deep, she lies,
A perfumed lamp to watch her dreams,
The folded curtain of her eyes,
Like opal in the moonlight gleams;
The shadows of the tangling vine
Darken her radiant loveliness,
And, floating, linger where her lips
Lie locked in rubied silence;
Awake her lily, awake her rose,
By Jove I'm shivering in the dew;
And if the watchman caught me here,
'Twould be a precious how-d'ye-do!

She comes, she comes, auroral light
Flames from her presence thro' the pane,
She lifts her hand divinely white,
And folds the casement back in twain;

Hush! all you birds in heaven and earth,
Prison your songs in golden beaks;
Silence thou diamond waterfall,
She moves, she smiles—O! bliss, she speaks:
"Young man, take pity on your health,
And let this nasty howling cease,
Or if you don't, I'll feel compelled
To charge you on the night-police!"

PENCILLINGS OF IRISH ANTIQUITIES.

I—METHERS.

OST of our readers have heard of the ancient Irish drinking cup called the mether, now entirely disused, or only to be found in the remotest mountain wilds of Ireland. It is associated in our minds with the simplicity and hospitality of by-gone times; and those who have drank out of it in their youth—if there be any such centagenarians—as well as those who are yet unacquainted with its form, will, we have no doubt, be alike gratified at seeing it preserved in our little depository of national remains.

The original from which the above illustration is taken, was found in a bog, in the county of Armagh. It is of the usual form and proportions, round at bottom, but quadrangular at top, and with a handle on each of its four sides. The material is crab tree. Its height is $7\frac{1}{4}$ inches, and its circumference $10\frac{1}{4}$ inches; it holds about three pints. The specimen is, as we have already remarked, the usual size and form of the mether; but it is sometimes found of considerably greater size, and sometimes with only two handles. The use of the four handles appears evidently to have been for the greater convenience of passing the cup round from one to another.

The use of the mether appears to have been universal in Ireland, for it is found in the bogs in all parts of the island; and judging from the great depth at which it is often discovered, its antiquity must be extreme indeed.

The size, dimensions, and contents of the following mether exceed those described above. Its height is eight inches three quarters; its circumference round the top is eighteen inches, and its contents exceed two quarts. The material of which it is made appears to be solid crab-tree, excavated so as to form a circle towards the bottom, while the upper part is perfectly square; on each side is a handle with hieroglyphic carvings, not intelligible; and on one side is the inscription, "Dermot Tully, 1590." This inscription is evidently much later than the making of the mether itself, and only shows that it was in the possession of Dermot Tully in the year in question.

The appearance and contents of the mether prove that it was intended for the rich wines, foaming ales, and other generous drinks which were used in Ireland long before whiskey had been known to its natives. That wines, ales, and such drinks were used by the people, and that whiskey is really a spirit of comparatively modern invention, may be a matter of surprise now-a-days to some, yet decidedly they are at the same time facts most easily shown. Parliamentary proceedings regulating the sale of wines in Ireland date so far back as the year 1269; afterwards wines continued cheap, and were generally used by the inhabitants, and in the year 1545, when the mayor of Drogheda was fined for selling wines by retail in a tavern, contrary to an act of parliament prohibiting mayors from selling wines during their mayoralty, we find he had sold 8 hogsheads of sack, value only 100 shillings each hogshhead; and two hogsheads of Gascony wines, value four pounds each hogshhead, all by retail, and during one year only. In fact, it was not until 1569, that any tax or duty was imposed upon wines coming into Ireland, and the very reason given then by parliament for imposing this, most fully shows its general use amongst all classes of the inhabitants: "because by the superfluous abundance of wines that are yearly discharged within this realm, grievous decay of tillage and husbandry, and illiness, the mother of all vices, have been perniciously bred and nourished." To check this, a duty was made payable to Queen Elizabeth upon all wines imported, but this duty was moderate, and left wine still within the reach of the least affluent. Thanks to recent legislative enactments, the consumption of wine is no longer confined to the more affluent classes.

Ale, beer, mead, etc., were in almost universal use from the earliest period in Ireland. So early as the year 1185, Prince John endowed Thomascourt Abbey with a toll of beer and mead, payable out of several places in Dublin.

"Aqua vite," or whiskey, is but of comparatively recent introduction or invention. Whiskey in the middle of the sixteenth century

(and the fact is now undeniable) was found to be made amongst the English settlements in Ireland for supplying the native Irish. Queen Mary was the first who endeavoured to check this evil, and the parliamentary enactments then made, describe whiskey to be a drink, "nothing profitable to be used and drunken, is now universally, throughout this realm of Ireland, made especially in the borders of the Irishry, and for the furniture of Irishmen, and thereby much corn, grain, and other things are consumed, spent, and wasted; to the great hindrance, loss, and damage, of the poor inhabitants of the realm;" wherefore it was ordered no person but peers, etc., should make it without license from government. The restrictive, or licensing power, thus through the best motives vested in the crown, was afterwards turned to good account by James the First, who rewarded his favourites by licenses to make "aqua vite," and to keep public houses for sale thereof. But this system of licensing proved so profitable at length, that whiskey selling became one of the regular items of the excise revenue, and, we need scarcely tell our readers, so continues to the present day.

When Lord Townshend left the viceroyalty of Ireland, he had two massive silver methers made in London, where they were regularly introduced at his dinner parties; the guests most usually applied the side of the vessel to the mouth, and seldom escaped with a dry neckcloth or vest; Lord Townshend, however, after enjoying the mistake, usually called on his friend, the late Colonel O'Reilly, (afterwards Sir Hugh Nugent) to "teach the drill, and handle the mether in true Irish style."

A LOST FRIEND.

I QUARREL not with Fate, or Circumstance,
That she deprive me of the gifts of life,
Inspire Detraction's tongue, arm Envy's glance,
And cloud my days with bitterness and strife.

Who looketh in himself and seeth there
A toiler fashioned by a god-like hand,
To taste the fruits of earth, to breathe its air,
And realise his mission, poor or grand,
May calmly watch the vulgar bonfire hurled
At the white radiance of his Innocence,
Thrice-armed against the meanness of the world,
By the strong dignity of Common Sense.

But I am wrath, and hostile unto Fate,
When, with blind issues serving no fair end,
From me she takes, with ill-disguised hate,
The dearest jewel of our life—A FRIEND.

BARON CUIVER.

It is not easy to estimate the debt, perhaps we should say the obligation, which the science that busies itself with the study of living organisms, from the animalcules discovered in the fluids of the eye to the leviathan whose flesh and bone were found embalmed in the ice-pile of the Arctic Ocean, owes to George Cuiver. Before his time "natural history," as "Carpenter's Spelling Book" has it, was, at best, a confused and incoherent mass of observations and results. The brick and mortar, the timber and tiles of a great edifice were to hand; but, until George Cuiver rose, no architect had attempted the task of building with them a structure, possessing any pretensions to symmetrical truth. The old naturalists were, as Vaughan quaintly remarks of a few of his contemporaries, "a droll set." Theirs was the epoch of credulity, when every traveller brought home an authenticated description of salamander, unicorn, or merman, when the centaur was not wholly discredited, and birds of paradise, which never touched earth, and lived on the distilled atmosphere, were accepted like texts of gospel. To this succeeded the reaction, when people turned up their noses at everything that smacked of newness. This was the age of conservative naturalism. Du Chailin would have been hanged for an impudent impostor had he dared to preach gorillas to a generation that never heard of a platypus, and persisted, notwithstanding all evidence to the contrary, in esteeming the lion king of the beasts, and the eagle emperor of all the winged inhabitants of heaven. Credulity and scepticism had their day. Both were rebuked harshly, be it confessed, by the hot voice of increasing discovery. The germ of the British Association, that inquisitive body to which we owe so much, was planted in a drawing-room carpet; German savans had begun the study of pond-slimes; and the restless genius of France fell to experimenting upon bloods and clays, tissues and fibres. As a back ground to this general activity, lay the disorganised elements of a natural history, confusion upon confusion. It needed a giant to give order to the demoralised mass, George Cuiver was the giant.

In 1769, that year so remarkable for great men and eminent achievements, the future naturalist first saw the light at Montbéliard. His family were of Swiss origin; Cuiver pere held a commission in a Swiss regiment, in the service of France; his fortune was small, and, were it not for the admirable economy observed by his wife, must have been wholly insufficient for his wants. Madame Cuiver was one of those noble women who, leaving hard sciences, politics, and agriculture to their husbands, occupy themselves with the care of their families and households. To her her son was indebted for the rudiments of his education, and that early formation of character which influenced his whole life. George made the meekest, most attentive, and worthiest of pupils, for it is related of him that, long after he was sent to the public school, he would abandon his companions in the evening, and hasten, book in hand, to seat himself at his mother's feet. The prodigious activity of which he was afterwards capable, the high rectitude which characterised his opinions and actions had their source, no doubt, in this filial attention; whilst his passionate appetite for knowledge was always attributed by himself to the fostering appreciation with which his mother rewarded his first ventures into the world of books. He loved grave reading from his earliest years. Metaphysics and history were his favourite studies; but Buffon's great work (great for its day,) delighted him above all others. It is said that he committed it in its entirety to memory; and, in order to copy the engravings with which it is enriched, applied himself to designing in which he rapidly became a consummate adept. He was scarcely thirteen when his portfolio contained nine thousand copies, many of them highly coloured and exquisitely finished, of Buffon's engravings. When asked how he had acquired sufficient industry for such a task, he replied in these memorable words: "Whatever I begin I finish, for I undertake nothing without a careful conscientious consideration of the difficulties to be encountered." These early labours laid the deep foundations of the anatomical knowledge on which his fame chiefly rests. When he had exhausted external form and outline, he plunged into the bewildering intricacies of internal animal structures. A new world was suddenly revealed to his eyes, a world which puzzled whilst it delighted him. Naturally, without the assistance of books or teachers, he had to grope in the dark, and satisfy himself to-day with conclusions which were razed to the ground by the observations of to-morrow. His case was something like that of the country gentleman, who, having spent half a life in elaborating a gun lock, rushed up to London to sell his invention and amaze the world; and who found, on submitting his work to a manufacturer, that one identically the same had been in use for many years. We may be satisfied, however, that Cuiver lost nothing by his early investigations—it has been asserted that to them may be attributed the science of comparative anatomy, which originated with himself and was perfected by Owen. Frank and Corvisart exhausted their lives and energies in the effort to make medicine a science of analogies, and they failed. Cuiver had not entered his fifteenth year when he had conceived and projected the rigid classifications to which all animal life is theoretically subjected.

At the age of fourteen, Cuiver, then a disappointed theological student, accepted a post in the gymnasium of Stuttgart, to which he was invited by Duke Charles. Schiller, by the way, had been a pupil of the same academy, and left behind him the reputation of being "the most honest of men and the most dangerous of poets." German, of which George knew nothing, was the only language employed at Stuttgart; so he had sat down to acquire it, and was able to converse with tolerable freedom at the end of six months. His fortunes must have been at a low ebb at this period: for, although he sedulously cultivated mathematics and natural history, we find him nervously anxious to qualify himself for some small post in the civil administration of Montbéliard, a department with a capital of four or five thousand inhabitants. Four years dwindled away, and his hopes dwindled with them. No money, no friends, no prospects, no appointment! The future was indeed a dark one, when it was suddenly brightened by a letter which reached him from M. Parrot, an old friend then residing in Normandy. M. Parrot had, up to that time, been the tutor of the son of M. de Hercie, a gentleman of fortune, living in the chateau of Figuinville; he was setting out for Russia, and offered Cuiver the succession to his late post. The offer was joyfully accepted.

In 1788, whilst France was lamenting above the ashes of Buffon, our poor student, whom a French biographer likens to a tempest-tossed sailor, glad to find refuge in any port, sat down patiently, under M. de Hercie's roof, to the drudging duties of a family tutor. The old chateau was situated at a distance of two leagues from the sea, and within easy distance of the town of Fecamp. The country around was but thinly populated, it resembled a cultivated solitude. France was then about to feel the first throes of the convulsion which soon afterwards set Europe in a flame; but no omen of disturbance penetrated to the retreat where the first mind in Europe was preparing for the intellectual revolution that laid so many idolized but fallacious systems in the dust. Not a moment was wasted. He devoted all his spare hours to the study of insects, fishes, molluscs, and the other animals roughly but happily sketched by Aristotle, some of which fulfil almost every function of the fish, without having the slightest analogy to it. Many of his suggestions at this period are invaluable, and bear the highest testimony to his patience and keenness of research, as, for instance, when he hinted that the poulpe was constructed on a plan different from any other animal, and that in its nature marked a palpable blank (lacune) which was inconsistent with the received speculative system of the continuous chain of beings. One curious speciality of this animal is, that it furnished to Cuiver the ink with which he wrote its history. This ink, which resembles, if it is not identical with that made by the Chinese, is soluble and indelible, and was used by him in copying those structures, or parts of structures, which his delicate scalpel had prepared for illustration. Those designs are still preserved, and considered masterpieces of artistic skill. His copies of crustacea, made at the same period, are wonderful examples of vigorous drawing, portraying with a curious exactness and nicety of expression, the grotesque outlines of those singular organisations. His investigations of the structures of insects convinced him that, when deprived of circulation, they respire, like plants, by the tracheæ, and are nourished, as are zoophytes, by imbibition. Subsequently to this, he established the curious and, till then, undiscovered relations between respiration and circulation, and those of the former with muscular energy; as well as the amount of vital force which an animal should produce in a given time. At St. Cœn he discovered, in the possession of a rich citizen, an amateur in natural history, a magnificent collection of Mediterranean fishes. He rapidly sketched the specimens, and was in the habit of saying that the crayons were as valuable as the originals, for, in natural history, the faithful copy of an object is the object itself. Meanwhile, war was raging over Europe; and France, the self-constituted Ishmael of nations, was sustaining the combined shocks of almost the entire Continent. A revolutionary society was established at Fecamp. It was a secret organization which proposed to improve the condition of the masses by deliberately butchering the aristocracy. Cuiver, sensible of the dangers which such a conspiracy threatened, urged the proprietors of his district to form a society for their mutual protection. The advice was taken, the society was established; but its seances, instead of being occupied with political questions, were devoted to the discussion of agricultural theories. M. l'Abbe Tessier, the author of the agricultural articles published in the Encyclopédie Méthodique, having to fly the persecution to which he was exposed at Paris, took refuge in Fecamp, where he had accepted the post of hospital physician. He was admitted into the society, no one at the time being aware that he was the writer of the condemned articles. One evening he was prevailed upon to read a paper on agriculture to the members. Cuiver listened with profound attention, and at once identified the essayist with the Encyclopédist. When he congratulated the Abbe on the discovery, the latter turned pale and exclaimed—"You know me, then; I am lost." "You are saved," replied the naturalist; and from that moment the tenderest confidence was established between them. One year afterwards, the Abbe, who was delighted with the fine qualities he discovered in his new acquaintance, wrote to M. de Jussieu: "M. Cuiver is a great man—a violet hidden in the grass." He also wrote in similar terms to La Méthvie, to Lacépède, and M. Geoffroy Saint Hilaire. The education of his pupil having been finished, Cuiver was again thrown upon the world. "What shall I do?" he asked the Abbe. "The Commission of Agriculture" was the reply, "has called me to Paris. Come with me,—your lodging shall be my lodging. Your talents shall do the rest." Cuiver arrived in Paris in his twenty-sixth year.

The great city received him with outstretched arms, for his fame had preceded him. It was the epoch of speculation; and Paris was ready for any man capable of starting a new idea, or even a strange conjecture. The poor tutor became the centre of a number of youthful savans, who looked up to him as their guide, philosopher, and friend, in the science which he was engaged in founding. He was appointed member of the Commission of Arts, then Professor of Natural History in the central school of the Pantheon. There was a struggle for the chair of Anatomy of the Jardin des Plantes. Mertrud, the friend of Buffon, and the collaborateur of Daubenton, was entitled to the honour, but his infirmities balked his ambition, and he resigned his claims in favour of Cuiver. No sooner had the latter placed his foot within the sanctuary, consecrated by the memories of so many great men, than he gathered the wreck of his family around him. He may not have been rich, but he was extremely happy. In a few months he was surrounded by the most brilliant society of Paris, the first rank and talent of the growing empire. But nothing could distract his attention from his beloved studies, to which he clung with a fidelity above all praise. In 1795, he published a description of two newly-discovered species of insects, and communicated to the Society of Natural History a series of memoirs which bore unmistakable evidences of a gifted and inquisitive intellect. In one of those he sketched the first outlines of his classification of animals, which has since been universally adopted. He described an animal as a certain combination of wants and faculties; two essential and correlative elements. A faculty cannot exist without a want, nor, vice versa, a want without a faculty. The first of those elements manifests itself, the second is exercised by organs or instruments, and these instruments, each appropriated to its particular purpose, are also balanced against one another, for the special end of all—the maintenance of life. But these instruments are not all of equal importance. The animal exists; and the organs on which it mainly depends—brain and heart—are unquestionably of the first rank and order. So it is of the rest, with this exception, that the nearer any organ, in the chain which binds all together, unites itself to these essential ones, the more it partakes of their qualities of indispensableness and fixity; and the less it unites itself with them, the less it shares their peculiarities. This conceded, it is obvious that if we wish to establish permanent principles of division amongst animals, we must seek them in these profound relations of organisation.

In this source alone can the naturalist find the real and fundamental characteristics which lead to the determination of classes and order of genres and species, for such is the object of natural history. With these laws as the basis of operations, Cuiver mapped out four grand compartments of animated being. It is not denied that he availed himself pretty freely of the researches of Duverney, Ferrein, Petit, and Vieq-d'Azyr. He has been unjustly compared with Linné, whose system, at the best, is irreconcilably shaky, and long since totally abandoned. His classification of insects was a veritable chaos, for in it he placed animals, the least resembling, side by side; nor was he more successful in his dealings with the quadrumania.

In arranging the anatomical collections of the Museum, Cuiver followed out the order laid down in his lectures. Comparative anatomy was the test of precedence; what the ear heard the eyes saw, and when one was thus fortified by the other, the impressions made on the observer became ineffaceable. The collection was one of the richest in the world, and he was never tired examining it.

Between 1795 and 1804 he published a series of papers, on the megathorium discovered in Paraguay, on several varieties of animal fossils, on differences of brain and on the scales of fishes. In 1798 he composed the Tableau Elementaire d'Histoire Naturelle des Animaux. Much of the material of which it is composed had been furnished by Storr, St. Hilaire, Linné, Buffon, Lacépède, Pallas, Fabricius, and Latreille, but for number and novelty of facts, Cuiver equalled, perhaps, surpassed them. The tableau subsequently underwent important rectifications, for, in 1798, the author discovered the presence of red blood, and blood-vessels of the first order, in the leech. This discovery extended to analogous animals, and further led, in 1802, to the establishment of a new class, which seriously deranged the constitution of the tableau. He rejected the theory of Duchesne and Lamarck, which proposed to divide all animals into two grand classes, vertebrate and invertebrate; and discovered for himself four principal forms—four distinct types on which he assumed all animals to be modelled by nature. This he further simplified in the epigrammatic theorem—"C'est le système nerveux est tout l'animal," "the nervous system is the animal." But, after all, the greatest triumph with which his name will be connected in the eyes of posterity, is his re-construction of the fossil remains of extinct animals, and the laws laid down by him for the guidance of future comparative anatomists. Those laws cannot be dealt with in a short article like the present. They were the fruits of the labours of a generation, and do not deserve to be lightly disposed of.

He died in 1832, in the bosom of his family, of an epidemic which ravaged Paris. The moral of his life will not be lost upon those who, with the humblest materials to begin with, have faith and perseverance, and are sensible of the value of time.

SUIL DRUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER IV.

T appeared as if, whether by accident or intention, she had now started a theme more likely to lead her companion into good humoured converse than the last, for he raised his head from its drooping, meditative posture, and his face brightened as he replied:—

"We have him, heart, we have him."

Come, sit near me, here on the settle, love, an' I'll tell you all about—how it was—an' everything."

"You told me, I think, yesterday, when Maney O'Neil interrupted us, that he went that morning to Miss Byrne, and that she would have nothing to say to him."

"Because her friends would have nothing to say to him. He went, thinking himself sure of her, because her father wasn't in the way now."

The woman groaned.

"Young Kumba himself is, as we all know, a wild harum-scarum sort of a lad, and between us two, not at all likely ever to attain to a creature of that kind, white and delicate, and reared like a lady in all respects. So he has come into my advice, not without a great deal of arguing, to take her whether she likes it or not. And he's to be here this evening, and I'm to take him abroad to make him known to the boys, Maney O'Neil, an' Awney Farrell, his man, and three more spirited lads that wouldn't fall back of anything we propose."

"And when is it to be?"

"To-night—or never. Nothing like keeping time behind you—and that's what I said to you, the night in the sally grove eastwards, when I had your hand in mine, and the horses waiting, and you wanted me to let it alone till mornen, till you'd see the old people once more, and leave a token on your dressing-table for 'em, and I wouldn't stop an hour, and wasn't it well for us, for there was a watch set for you that very night."

The soft eyes of the female glistened and expanded on the speaker, but the sigh which accompanied the look of tenderness rendered it a doubtful matter whether she really did consider it as "well for her" that she had escaped the watch set for her on the occasion alluded to.

Before the conversation was renewed, a slight knocking at the door of the inn announced to the ear of the male speaker the approach of the young man whose affairs had constituted its chief topic. His dress, manner, and language were such as to place him, at first sight, in a superior point of view to those whose society he was about to seek, although those of the latter were not of the very lowest grade, and there seemed to be in the manner of his greeting, as he entered, an unconquerable and involuntary consciousness of self-abasement, though so fleeting and so slightly marked that the quick eye of the host could not, had he been so inclined, arrest it with sufficient certainty to take offence. Before we proceed to lay the consequences of his arrival before the reader, it may not be amiss to enter once more into detail on the character and fortunes of the new-comer.

Robert Kumba, the youngest son of a comfortable farmer in the neighbourhood of the inn, was one of those anomalous personages whose characters are made up of a series of paradoxes. He was shy, to the appearance of a reprehensible timidity, and yet daring to a degree beyond rashness itself, both in the formation and execution of any design in which his happiness was at all involved—unsatisfied with ordinary means, and still more so with ordinary ends, seeking for higher, yet unequal to these—scrupulous to a perfect exactness in all transactions where his heart exercised no influence over his conscience, but frequently led into the wildest and most apparently dishonest practices, by mistaking the arguments of passion and feeling for those of reason—sensitive even to finery, when tried with moderate and limited excitements, yet easily capable of being wrought up into a savage disregard of all social and moral restraint when heated by a skilfully-used and violent impulse—suspicious in the minutest trifles, yet flinging himself and his fortunes with the most unguarded confidence on the chance-honesty of a stranger whom his enthusiasm or his weakness of mind led him to select as a friend, untried and unknown—proud, fierce, and irritable, when any, even of those who might reasonably claim such a right, attempted to assert a natural dominion over him, yet submitting himself with a voluntary, and sometimes almost pitiable docility to the guidance of a man who was his inferior in rank and education, and whose only advantage, in point of intellect, was in the possession of that quality which Iago so flatteringly and falsely attributed to his Venetian dupe, Roderigo, a firm and resolute “purpose.”

Circumstances had contributed to render the character of the young man more positive and confirmed, at the same time that none of its contrarities had been blended or softened down by the lapse of years and the growth of experience. His family, of which, as I have before mentioned, he was the youngest member, was numerous; and being placed precisely in that rank of life in which appearances are consulted with the greatest anxiety, as one of the tangible modes of rendering its position, with respect to the relations of society above and below it, less equivocal, their humble means were tasked to an extent which made it absolutely necessary that a mortifying privation should fall on some, or all. Little Bob felt the influence of this necessity before he was able to remonstrate against its particular application to himself. By a course of reasoning very pardonable, if not free from error, his older friends and protectors measured his wants by their own estimation of his claims, and they would, in all probability, have laughed at the idea of taking the little urchin's feelings into account. It was by no means, therefore, considered either unwise or unreasonable that Bob, about whom nobody cared, should run barefoot, while the extremities of his elders, who had begun to assume a place in consideration of their neighbours, were invested in the shining luxury of polished calf-skin and lambs-wool; nor for the same reason did any of his friends question the propriety of allowing Bob's little bundle-cloth shirt to hail the light of day through the fissures which time had made in the elbows of his coarse frieze jacket, while the well-ironed and neatly-frilled inner garments of his brother were protected by a yearly suit of glossy broad-cloth illuminated with rows of the most resplendent gilt buttons, and modelled after the most approved specimens which the capital of the country (the emporium of all fashion and taste in costume) could supply. The very circumstance, moreover, of the mortifying distinction which was thus unwarily drawn between him and his brothers, subjected him to what his boyish spirit felt to be still further degradation; and his ragged and neglected appearance seemed, in the eyes of his philosophic friends, to afford good reason for employing him in many menial offices about the farm, which would otherwise have been allotted to a menial, or shared with him by the other members of the household. “Bob is not dressed, so he can help to foot the turf”—“Bob has no shoes nor white stockings on, so he can turn home the cows”—“Bob will run to the village for—” whatever it might be, “for nobody will remark his carrying a bundle,” were sounds no less familiar to the ears than grating to the feelings of the boy—although the custom which he had been in from his infancy of taking upon trust the opinions of those above him, and adopting them without consideration, prevented his once entertaining suspicion of the justice of any arrangement of the kind. His parents were the best-meaning people in the world, but they laid, without being aware of it, a train of circumstances very sufficient to darken a character of a much gayer and less sensitive nature than that of the subject on which they now practised. According as his mind filled and strengthened, and began to originate its own sensations, the peculiarities of his situation pressed upon him with increasing acuteness. He began to ponder on the cause, as well as to fret and chafe at the effect. The circumstance of his natural guardians' having neglected to furnish him with the means of appearing on an equality with his friends, did not any longer appear a quite satisfactory reason for depriving him of their society when any prospect of amusement or advantage called them from home; or if it did appear so, his anger now referred itself from the privation to its apology, and found quite as exciting and irritating a subject in the one as in the other. The comparatively slighting and careless manner, moreover, in which he was regarded by the visitor of the house, and the occasional stare of contemptuous scrutiny which he underwent from the rude eye of a stranger, rankled in his soul, and turned all the current of his thoughts and feelings to gall and vinegar. A young and ardent mind has arrived at a terrific crisis when it begins to suspect that it is treated with injustice or neglect; and more especially if that injustice is inflicted by those on whom it is dependent for instruction and support, and who are, by the authority with which they are invested, exempt from the possibility of remonstrance. Naturally of a shy and reserved habit, the course of life which we have been describing, was highly calculated to increase the timidity and consequent susceptibility of character which young Kumba already manifested—and this apparent blocking up of every avenue through which his feelings, dark, light, dangerous, or laudable as they were, might find their way to the observation of those whose censure or approval could have any influence upon them—threw the youth back upon himself, and forced him upon habits of brooding and gloomy meditation, which laid the foundation of many a black design and many a wretched hour in his after life. Before we dismiss the subject of his education, one observation may be allowed on a very general mistake which is made with respect to childish reserve and backwardness. We have seen it usually commended by teachers and guardians as indicative of gentleness and a proper docility of temper, most probably for the obvious reason that such children occasion them least vexation and annoyance at the moment; but it by no means follows that the quality, though convenient, is at all beneficial or estimable. Every possible means should be put in use for the purpose of drawing a child in whom this disposition to secrecy is observed, into a bold and frank habit of declaring his mind on all occasions; and this habit would be very lightly purchased by the omission of punishment for certain instances of mischief or criminality. An over-bold, noisy, passionate disposition in a child, is always safer than a temper too easily governable and ductile. It is the business of education to restrain, direct, and expunge, but it can never supply a positive want in character.

It was with the result of all the unhappy influences we have been detailing, fresh upon him, that the mild and the mettled, the soft-worded and the violent, the crouching and the fiery, the confident and the suspicious, the shy, and shrinking, and daring youth of whom we speak, found himself, with all his crudeness of heart and mind, established, by one of those impossible accidents which occur every day, in the possession of that property on which he had been suffered to vegetate from his childhood. It will not be difficult to suppose, that as his fortunes thus suddenly outstripped his expectations, so they found him unfitted, from inexperience as well as indisposition, for the management of the means which they placed under his government. Miscalculation of their extent was the obvious and immediate evil; and the unsettled and wavering mind of the young proprietor precluded all hope of an industrious inquiry in that particular, or a persevering and rational system in their application. A few years of expense and indolence, or rather fitful and misdirected exertion, did all for the farm which indolence could have done; and Kumba, almost before his minority was ended, found himself the possessor of, or rather the responsible agent for, a ruined and encumbered property; neglected by his acquaintances, censured, and only censured, by his friends, once more flung back upon himself; and more—far more—than all, rejected with a wholesome and almost laudable spirit of displeasure from one house, which contained for him an object of the most stirring ambition which had ever been excited within his soul, after the degradation of unsuccessful solicitation, and by one in whose eyes he had, in times of greater happiness and prosperity, read a promise of a kinder and more enduring interest.

This last blow, which he could not bring himself to consider as other than undeserved, succeeded in unsettling the purposes and pursuits of the young man. He was now placed in a more immediately dangerous position than when he lived in a state of dependence on the will of others; for although the world might exercise just that degree of influence over him, which made him keenly sensible of its injustice, it could not govern the consequences of that sensibility. The most immediate was a seeking to supply, by the excessive use of every species of mere vulgar excitement, the loss of that tender and delicious incentive, upon which his spirit had lived for years; and, finding himself, as we have before stated, shut out by his unfortunate circumstances from that society to which he had lately been accustomed, and to which his habits and his feelings induced him to cling most affectionately, the natural result was his reasoning himself into a toleration of any whatsoever, in which he could secure himself a place. This great imprudence met with a fatal retribution. Among the many low fellows who sought, yet vainly, to fasten themselves upon his regard, the fiery young man who now rose to bid him welcome beneath his roof, and in whose character, at least, though not in his habits of life, he had found many traits of resemblance to his own, succeeded in fixing a single claim on his attention. This person, however, had a great advantage, so far as the heart's ease was concerned, over his superior friend (for such he speedily became), in his perfect freedom from, and almost ignorance of, all those delicate susceptibilities and compunctions which education, no less than nature, had breathed into the soul of the latter; and he found, consequently, much less difficulty in complying with the violent impulses which were common to both. Few descriptions of characters are more likely to acquire an influence over an unformed and self-diffident mind, than one of a more vigorous and persevering energy; and the contact between two such spirits is dangerous or fortunate, precisely in relation to the good or evil nature of that which is in the ascendant. Our readers may ere now have conjectured, and not unwisely, that the character of the young landlord was not such as to render a conjunction indicative of very great benefit to Kumba. Spellacy, who, from some motive which it is not necessary here to explain, seemed to look on his new associate as one whose co-operation might be of incalculable importance to his own designs, managed their acquaintance with the art of a master. Never presuming to affect anything like a consciousness of the influence which he was acquiring most rapidly over the mind of his companion, he was on all occasions, when the absence of a potent stimulus left the reason of the other at liberty to discriminate and decide, the humble and parasitical dependant—honoured by the presence of his superior—governed, or seeming to be governed by his breath—gratified by his converse—grateful for his friendship—all, in fact, that Kumba's vanity could desire; and it was only when he had flung the latter off his guard, when he had startled him with some astounding difficulty, oftentimes existing only in the lying imagination that had framed it, that he assumed the privilege of leading the way, and gained himself credit for genius as well as intrepidity—that he dared to point out his course to his superior—to fill his ears with the accents of command—to say "Do this!" without qualification, and it was done.

Far, far, by this artful and sinuous course, had the ruffian succeeded in conducting his dupe from the equator of moral rectitude, before the evening on which both have been presented to the acquaintance of the reader. He had not yet, however, ventured to propose to him a participation in any act of foul and positive guilt; but the last train which he had laid was so perfectly skilful and deceptive as to place the youth entirely within the dominion of his tempter. The circumstances, at least as much of them as is needed to make the narrative comprehensible, may be gathered from the scene which followed.

As soon as Mrs. Spellacy, in obedience to a slight action from her husband, had left the room, Kumba, who till that moment remained half dubious of his course, holding the open door in one hand, and gazing intently into the eyes of his host, nodded, as we have before mentioned, with a very slight air of superiority, and passing in silence to the centre, took one of the rude chairs which lay scattered about, and sat for several minutes in apparently a total recklessness of the presence of a second person. During this mood, the observer maintained a respectful and delicate silence, wandering about the room with noiseless steps, to arrange a fishing rod, or examine some domestic utensil; occasionally directing a glance, into which he contrived to throw all the interest and humble attachment which he was capable of assuming, at the contemplative and rapidly changing countenance of his friend. One of these glances, at length, as was the intention of the man, met the eye of the latter, and the effect which it produced was as he desired.

"Well, Spellacy, what is your genius now to do for me? I come to you, a ruined man, to tell you that your scheme has failed, and I am now left without one hope in the world. I have a great deal to say to you, Spellacy, on the subject of these repeated disappointments. I do not suspect your sincerity, but I think you careless of my fortunes, and that, with your professions, is little better than soul play. Never look upon me—what I have said, I say. You told me yesterday that you had laid a plan which could not fail to restore me to all I had lost, and you made my head dizzy with hope. You sported with me, sir—you mocked me. I have been disappointed."

"Great Heaven!" Spellacy exclaimed, drawing back with a stare of confusion and dismay, blended with an expression of deep dejection. The emotion was sufficiently well counterfeited to impose on Kumba, who thought he could discern, moreover, a certain degree of self-reproach in the attitude, downcast and drooping, in which his friend remained—his hands clasped, and hanging down before him—his mouth agape, and his black eyes fixed on the ground with the air of one who has received news of a sudden misfortune from a quarter to which he looked for joyous intelligence.

"For my part, Spellacy," the young man continued, "I do not come to ask you to tax your ingenuity for any new advice. All is over with me now, and I only seek you for the purpose of laying before you my intention; for I have at last formed a design for myself. And first hear me. You know that it is to me you owe this house in which you dwell, and all that you possess."

"I am proud to own it, Mr. Kumba, I am proud to own it."

"You came to me poor, destitute, and moneyless—and you came to me in a lucky hour. I had just received Mrs. Byrne's cold-hearted letter, in which she bargained with so much keen-sighted precision for the exact quantum of prudence and good behaviour which was to entitle me once more to a re-admission into their family circle. You found me endeavouring to drown the consciousness of the heartless repulse in the fumes of strong drink. You seized the moment—you told me that a lovely girl had eloped with you from the comforts of a wealthy home, and that you had not one guinea in the world to secure her even the means of subsistence for a week. There was some story about your losses, too. You told me, I think, that you had been reduced to that extreme poverty by having had the misfortune to fall in with the remnant of Redmond O'Hanlon's gang, who had taken up their residence for some time in that part of the country, and who, by the way, are strongly suspected of being the fabricators and utterers of the false coin that has spread to such an extent through our towns and villages, although every attempt to discover their retreat has been hitherto unavailing."

Spellacy here turned aside for the purpose of concealing a smile, which he seemed unable wholly to suppress.

"My heart," Kumba continued, "torn and wounded as it was with its own injuries, was open to your plea; and, what perhaps was more to the purpose in your eyes, my purse was open also."

"It was—I freely own, sir," said the other, "I freely own it, Mr. Kumba."

"Well," said the young man, "since that time, you have been forming plan after plan, to enable me to carry into effect the views which you knew I entertained, with respect to that dear—but rigidly righteous being—and every scheme has ended in fixing my despair upon me more firmly than ever. I will not suspect your truth. I believe you really were grateful—but you have brought me to the gates of ruin, and I will take the liberty of lifting the latch without your assistance. I have resolved on selling off the remainder of my little property, and purchasing a pair of colours with the product. I am careless now of life or fortune, and had rather die in the noise and tumult of a camp, than let sorrow waste me to death in this desert. I have not forgotten you, however. You meant well, Spellacy, although you were not so successful as I could have wished; and I have, therefore, taken care to secure the leasehold of your house and small farm to you, for the original term of my holding. Here is the instrument."

"You had always a generous heart, Mr. Kumba," said Spellacy, whose manner expressed at once satisfaction at the gift, and alarm at the step that Kumba meditated, and which appeared likely to thwart most effectually the progress of his own designs; "but surely, sir, I haven't heard you rightly. Go into the army! And is that the way you'll give her up, after all that has been done—and with the fairest chances in your favour that mortal man could wish for? Let me know the cause, sir, at any rate; what is it that has made you give up all hope at once, that way? I heard to a certainty that Miss Byrne would pass through the sally grove this morning. I knew how much one word from you to herself, face to face, would do to soften her heart towards you once more; and at any rate, I was quite certain, that she would not be angry at just being forced to go off, if it was necessary, and so I sent word to you about it; but I suppose she didn't come, by what you say?"

"She did not. On the contrary, I discovered that she had received, by some unknown hand, an intimation of my design. I thought you would keep the secret better, Spellacy."

"Me keep it!" the other replied, in some confusion. "Human ears did not hear me breathe a word of it, except the pair that belonged to Awney Farrel, who carried you my message—and if I thought he—Oh! but that's impossible."

"I do not charge him with treachery. However, no matter where the treason lies, my doom is sealed, at all events. I will not run the risk of farther disappointment. Suspense is worse than hanging."

"Why should you say any such thing, sir? Is that acting either with sense or spirit? There is one of the most beautiful creatures that ever walked the ground, dying for you, and you talk of leaving her and the country for ever, on account of a little difficulty thrown in your way by her friends! Think for a moment, what a prize it is you are leaving after you."

"Have you ever seen her then?" said Kumba, encouraging the subject, in the manner of one who was not unwilling to be dissuaded.

"I saw her," Spellacy replied, "on an occasion that I never will forget. It was on the first of May, when the mummers of our village stopped on the lawn before Drumsanlon, her father's house, and the family came out upon the field to see our dance. Miss Byrne herself was—but I beg pardon, sir; I'm interfering with your time."

"Go on," said Kumba, "I could hear you speak on that theme until my hairs were gray."

"Miss Byrne herself," Spellacy resumed, "was dressed in her fine flowered-silk gown (a thing that would stand on the ground of itself), and her red, gold laced Spanish-leather shoes, as small as robin-redbreast's—her fine scarlet silk stockings with silver clocks—her darling real Spanish cloth jacket, fastened over her bosom so handsomely with ribbons—and on her fine lady-like head, so stately and so sweet at the same time, her beaver hat with the beautiful silver-lace trimming and the buckle!—Well 'twas a sight for a king to look at. And with all that now, she had no more pride than an infant. She talked to us all, just as if she took a delight to see us that way, dancing about the Maypole. And she gave her hand to myself with such a smile, when I asked her just for one turn of a slip-jig, just to have it to say. And she did dance in style. Oh! the cutting—and the shuffling—and the pretty little quibbling o' the feet over the ground!"

"You speak as if you were in love yourself," said Kumba.

"Me in love!" Spellacy replied, starting in some confusion; "Oh! that's all over with me now, sir, I have only the one love, and I desire no more." [This was said in a loud tone, evidently with the intention of being heard in the next room.] "Herself is listening to us," he added, in a low voice, nodding his head aside towards the room door, with a knowing smile and wink. "No. Mr. Kumba; but I thought then, and I often thought since, what a happiness it would be to your tenants, and to us all, if they could have such a mistress over 'em. What a delight it would be, if we could all meet that way once a year before your own door, to see you come out and join the dancers, with that beautiful young lady locking arms with you. And she'd be a treasure to any man too, for, let alone her beauty, there isn't a better housekeeper in the country, I hear."

Kumba paused for some time, and sighed in secret, while he ran over in his mind the picture of rural happiness which Spellacy had presented to it, and which he had often before, in days of prouder hope, loved to summon up and contemplate, as the ideal of his own ambition.

"If there was a possibility of its accomplishment," said he—"but why will you vex me by those idle dreams? Her father is dead—and cannot recal the pledge which he extorted from her when dying, that she would never more receive me to her confidence. Her cold and formal mother is confirmed in her hatred of me by the line of conduct which I have pursued—and I have not the remotest hope of being able to tempt her to disobedience. They want me to toil like Jacob for seven years, and to prove myself a true penitent. I am not one of those cold and patient spirits—I cannot wait day after day to gratify a humour that may change and deceive me after all. They have made me desperate, and I had rather now risk all on one bold cast, than throw up the tables and repair my losses by tardy industry, as they desire."

"If you are disposed that way, sir," said Spellacy, with some hesitation, "there is one way left that would be certain enough, I think, but I was loath to propose it to you, as it is more violent and dangerous than I believed would please you."

"I shall like it the better," said Kumba; "what is it?"

"It is too long now to talk of, sir, but if you'll meet me this evening late, say about seven o'clock, at the rath on the hill above, I'll explain everything to you, and we'll set about it as soon as can be. Stop! who is that's knocking?"

The interruption was occasioned by the arrival of the travellers, and the tintinabulary application of the handle of the old Malatine's whip to the plain unpannelled door.

"Travellers!" said Spellacy to himself, after he had peeped through the window; "a new decoy of Awney Farrel's, I suppose. Come away, out the back door, Mr. Kumba, for 'twould be as well, may be, if you weren't seen by 'em. Mrs. Spellacy, look to the door, honey, and attend to the travellers. Mr. Kumba, you won't forget seven o'clock—at the rath."

"I'll be punctual," said Kumba, as he closed the door behind him.

"Now," Spellacy continued, turning with sudden energy to his wife, as she made her appearance from the inner room, "you'll not forget our usual plan. Those appear to be comfortable people, and you know we are reduced to our last shifts. You will see whether they are armed, and take care to provide against that mischief."

"More guilt!" exclaimed the woman, "more blood! Oh, Mark, when will our measure be completed?"

"Poh! no blood, fool," exclaimed the man, "I wish to prevent it. Listen to me. Do as I desire you to do this one night, and I never again will ask you to serve me in the same manner."

"If I could believe this—"

"Here is my hand and word."

"I have no choice but to take it," said the woman. "The time is gone by when I could have made one."

"What do you say that for now?" said Spellacy, fiercely.

"Didn't you know who you were marrying when you came with me?"

"Yes, Mark—but—" here she hesitated, as if unwilling to hazard the whole truth.

"Oh, I understand you," said Spellacy. "You didn't know all—You didn't know what a complete ruffian I was. You thought you were only marrying your father's sworn enemy—you were very ready to destroy the old man's comfort for ever, but you had no notion that you were risking your own—and now you have found it out, you are sorry for it."

The woman bowed her head in deep feeling, as if she would say—"I am answered, I deserve this;" and before Spellacy could add another word, the knocking at the door was repeated. Softening the effect of his last speech with a few words of rough kindness, and charging her not to neglect his injunction, he hastened through the same door by which Kumba had taken his departure.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

HRICE honoured in the day previous to which the twenty-fourth number of this journal was placed in the hands of its readers, for was it not the fourteenth of February—that day consecrated to St. Valentine, and which causes the myrmidons of the Postmaster-General to groan beneath the weight of accumulated tender missives? Cross-grained old bachelors and prim ladies of uncertain years may anathematise and denounce the pleasant traditional observance if they will—but who cares? With an enthusiastic writer on the subject, we affirm that there shall be Valentines as long as love endures and loveliness is revered. Why should true hearts be ashamed to confess what it is the pride of all true hearts to feel?

St. Valentine, we are told, was a devoted preacher of the gospel, who, about the year 270, suffered martyrdom in brave witness of the truth as he received it. How he came to be made the especial friend of all tender, anxious hearts, we are informed by Mr. Douce. It was the practice, it appears, in ancient Rome, during a great part of the month of February, to celebrate the Lupercalia, which were feasts in honour of Pan and Juno, whence the latter deity was named Februsta, Februalia, and Februlla. On this occasion, amidst a variety of ceremonies, the names of young women were put into a box, from which they were drawn by the men as chance directed. The pastors of the early Christian Church, who by every possible means endeavoured to eradicate the vestiges of pagan superstitions, and chiefly by some commutations of their forms, substituted, in the present instance, the names of particular saints instead of those of women, and, as the festival of the Lupercalia had commenced about the middle of February, they appear to have chosen St. Valentine's day for celebrating the new feast, because it occurred nearly at the same time. It should seem, however, that it was utterly impossible to extirpate altogether any ceremony to which the common people had been much accustomed; and, accordingly, the outline of the ancient ceremonies was preserved, but modified by some adaptation to the Christian system. It is reasonable to suppose that the above practice of choosing mates would gradually become reciprocal in the sexes; and that all persons so chosen would be called Valentines, from the day on which the ceremony took place.

Misson, who wrote about a century and a half ago, says that there was formerly extant a singular method of selecting Valentines. An equal number of maids and bachelors get together, each writes their true or some feigned name upon separate billets, which they roll up, and draw by way of lots, the maids taking the men's billets and the men the maids'; so that each of the young men lights upon a girl that he calls his Valentine, and each of the girls upon a young man whom she calls her's. By this means each has two Valentines; but the man sticks faster to the Valentine that has fallen to him, than the Valentine to whom he is fallen. Fortune having thus divided the company into so many couples, the Valentines give balls and treats to their mistresses, wear their billets several days upon their bosoms or sleeves, and this little sport often ends in love. This ceremony is practised differently in different countries, and according to the freedom or severity of Madame Valentine. There is another kind of Valentine, which is the first young man or woman that chance throws in your way in the street, or elsewhere, on that day.

St. Valentine's day is supposed in the old rural tradition to be the bridal day among the winged songsters, and a poet in the "British Apollo," considers that the custom among human bipeds originated in imitation of the feathered bipeds. He asks:

"Why's Valentine a day to choose
A mistress, and our freedom lose?
May I my reason interpose,
The question with an answer close?
To imitate we have a mind,
And couple like the winged kind."

A TRIAD OF VALENTINES.

TO ELLEN.

AST thou a charm, incarnate Dream
Of all that's sweet and beautiful,
To shape the happy, happy thoughts
With which my heart is over-full?

Thinking of thee, comes o'er my soul,
A violet wind from out the south—
Sucked from the cores of budding flowers—

The rich, ripe odour of thy mouth.

Ah! let this life,

In peace and strife

Pass o'er, in lights and glooms divine,

When all's o'erthrown,

Thou art mine own,

Sweet love, sweet hope, sweet Valentine!

There's not a star that soars or wanes,
In yonder heaven, but hath some tale

That feeds the passion of my heart

And turns this brow from red to pale.

There's not a bird that sings aloft,

In the blue dusk of wood or tree—

On blossomed ridge or dripping cave,

But hath a message, sweet, from thee.

So fly the hours,

Across the flowers,

Whilst thy dear heart doth answer mine;

If joy be brief,

Well, so is grief,

Dear light, dear sweet, dear Valentine!

There is a glow in yonder west,

The evening sets in storm and rain,

Hark! the sleet beats, the sharp wind taps

Tremulous at the window pane:

But, look! above the bank of cloud,

That rolls o'er moor, and field, and park,

The crescent of the wilds of heaven.

Love's planet soars above the dark.

Oh! happy star,

While wild winds war,

Bring brightest peace to me and mine;

Night fills the sky,

Good-bye, good-bye,

A little while, sweet Valentine!

TO JULIA.

WHAT bird, high soaring in a happy heaven,
Can catch thine ear?

What summer gust blown out of blossomed woods

May linger near

The honeysuckles which cold February

Breathes to thy feet,

When thou dost pace the brown sward of the meads,

Most bright, most sweet?

Rich is the yellow star that nightly looks

On thy cold pane;

Rich is the maiden moon that sees thy light

Ere midnight wane.

Blest is the little glove whose warm hues hold

Thy gentle palm,

Sweetest of all companionships of earth,

Oh! love, Oh! balm.

Ah! maiden, when the bird shall droop his wings
To soar no more;

When summer winds shall brag on sea and cliff,
 When flowers are o'er;
 When stars shall set and Time his sickle plunge
 In the dusky moon
 Be mine; the heart alone, of all reserves
 Some light of noon.

Hark! 'tis thy spinning wheel, I hear it whirl,
 The spindles turn;
 Thou suggest some quaint-knit ditties of the night,
 And now of morn.

Chir, chir, chir, ra, ra, ra, hums the wheel,
 The song is wove;
 I hear its echo float into the night—
 "I love, I love!"

TO HELOISE.

FLOAT up, Oh! moon, from the green baths of brine
 Where the sea seethes its misty melodies,
 And, from the rim of yonder saffron cloud,
 Pour thy slant arrows through the beech trees;
 For there she sits, beneath the oriel, blazed
 With fiery crimson, melting into pearl,
 Lost in the twilight reveries of thought—
 My idol girl!

Sink, sink, Oh! moon, not now in azure baths
 Of pulseless mere, but in the windless west,
 Trailing the morning planet in thy wake;
 For on her lids hath dripped the dew of rest;
 She sleeps, and slowly on the tiled roof
 The winds of day-break round the tall vines swirl.
 Oh! Paradise, light up her closed brain—
 Sweet heart, sweet girl!

When thou awakest, and the Morning fires
 The twinkling splendours of thy lattices,
 And the first bird that feels the breath of dawn,
 Pipes a low treble in the aspen trees;
 Remember me, for I am thine, most sweet,
 However stars may wane, or tempests whirl,
 Remember me. Ah! bless me with thy thoughts—
 My idol girl!

SKELETON LEAVES.—A good method of obtaining these beautiful dissected leaves is frequently asked for. The following is a process which we can recommend from experience. Steep the leaves, seed vessels, or other parts of the plant, which are required to be dissected, in rain water; leave them exposed to its influence until the whole of the soft or pulpy matters are decomposed. The period required for this operation varies much in different leaves, etc., according to their texture; thus, some require but a few weeks, others as many months. When the pulpy parts are completely decomposed, the next operation consists in their removal from the fibro-vascular network with which they were originally connected. This requires much care and patience. There are two ways of accomplishing it: one, which consists in carefully exposing them to a stream of fresh water, using at the same time a brush; and the other, by simply placing them in fresh water, and removing with care the decomposed portion, in like manner, with a brush. Some difficulty will be found at first in doing this without, at the same time, breaking the fibro-vascular net-work; but a little practice will soon render it easy of accomplishment. The adoption successively of simply fresh water, and a stream of the same, applied by means of a syringe, will be frequently found desirable. The pulpy portions having been removed, and the fibro-vascular net-work obtained, the latter must then be bleached. For this purpose prepare a weak solution of chloride of lime, by adding about an ounce of a strong solution of that substance to a quart of distilled water; then soak the skeletons in this solution for some hours; generally three or four will suffice, but when they are very thick a longer period will be necessary. After this operation has been performed wash the skeletons thoroughly in pure water, and, lastly, dry them by freely exposing them to light and air.

ODD REFLECTIONS OF A BACHELOR.

OW sweet is the sibilation of the tea-kettle, after the toil, bustle, and anxiety of the day! It has a social genial sound, indicative of harmony and good fellowship, thawing one's selfishness, softening the heart to kindness, bringing forth amiable feelings, and calling the affections into play. It is associated with the better part of our nature, and appeals at once to our sympathies. A pleasant, peaceful picture is the steaming tea-kettle, sitting on the shining hob, with the blazing fire reflected in countless luminous points from the polished furniture. How merrily the little lid thumps and bumps an ad libitum accompaniment to the joyous carol issuing from the kettle's metal throat. And how it moves about, quite in a fidgetty sort of a way, as if inclined to dance a hornpipe for its own especial gratification, and the amusement of all present. Right jolly fellows are those kettles, all grimed and burned by the fierce heat of the glowing sea coal, but their jollity is only shown when they get a thorough good roasting. The brighter and better the fire, the more vocal are they. They sing so merrily that scalding tears well upward, and gush forth in the very fullness of their glee. And their mirth is so contagious that face after face which comes into the room from the outer darkness of the street, cold, stern, and impassable, looses the hard lines which the world and its crushing cares and anxieties has been so diligently drawing and deepening there, and brightens, as the jolly fellow's song grows louder. The laugh that came so faint at first gains strength and tone as the steam, curling upwards, floats away and mingles with the smoke in the chimney. And as the little fellow's song proceeds, glossy ringlets are tossed about in a merry way by their pretty owners, the bloom on their cheeks deepens its tinge, and bright eyes grow brighter, and sparkle and flash irresistible electricity, and soft eyes grow softer, and melt into a happy dreaminess of look sufficient to turn the head of a Saint Kevin or a Saint Senanus, to say nothing of an ordinary mortal, with warm affections. May all good angels guard me from women with soft eyes and gentle ways! Your bold, strong-minded women are never dangerous; they attempt to carry your heart by storm, which invariably calls forth a resistance, and ends in their discomfiture, while your soft-eyed, gentle woman steals, like the dew on the flower, inch by inch, into your heart, and her being actually becomes incorporated with yours, and she circulates through your veins with your blood. Her very gentleness is a chain of adamant that fetters every limb; you feel not your captivity, and set her up in the tabernacle of your heart, and worship every smile. May all good angels, I say again, preserve me from a soft-eyed, gentle woman, or my bachelor days would be numbered!

Dinner, in general, is a dull, serious performance, and is essentially an animal gratification, all its details tending to comfort the stomach, minister to the appetite, and to appease the cravings of hunger. Its preparation, too, is often elaborate and costly. But tea, light, elegant, and graceful, like its dispensers, is more social and genial in its character. It is peculiarly feminine in all its details, cheerful, pleasant, sparkling, volatile, and ethereal.

Those with great animal spirits often consign the tea-table and its occupants to the infernal regions, as a "milk and watery affair." Some tolerate it as the prelude to the whirling dance, with its pleasant and excitable accompaniments of rushing gallop, bounding polka, and whirling waltz.

Oh! how you lovers delight in the dance. Under its shadow, and beneath the lynx-eyed mother, with all her starched, tight-laced, puritanical notions, can you clasp the girl of your heart, with whom a desert would be a paradise, and wanting whom the world, with all its beauty, would be chaos. Her glowing cheek touching yours, her waving ringlets mingling with your whiskers and fanning your face. Your young hearts throbbing and fluttering like caged birds in an ecstasy of pleasure. But one cannot always have the merry dance. Besides, "when wild youth is passed," when the blood runs languidly through the veins, and corns and bunions come to abide with us and make their presence felt, what so pleasant as the tea-table, with its happy reminiscences?

Some very good and kind people think, and affirm, that tea-tables are places where colanders are often made of people's reputations, and that the muffins and crumpets are buttered with scandal. "True it is, and pity 'tis 'tis true," that sometimes a few people do now and then get a little polishing off under the spout of the teapot. But that is not the fault of the poor and innocent "Congou," or "the strong and wiry-leaved Bohea," the "young Hyson, particularly recommended," or the "Gunpowder," that is quite harmless, and has nothing to do with "villanous saltpetre, which has cut down many a tall fellow," and on which the interesting cousins of the sun, moon, and stars bestow so much of their terrestrial time. Scandal would be talked any day in the year by a certain class of people in preference to darning stockings, if tea were never in existence. The brown infusion has nothing to do with it; it is an organization, or I should rather say, disorganization. A defect of education, calling into play what phrenologists term our destructiveness, and making our neighbours wonder what the deuce warmed their ears so on Saturday or Tuesday, and on "Tib's Eve."

But what would become of that darling, dimpled little cherub, Cupid and his archery, if it were not for the tea-table? The little fellow would lose the use of his bow for want of practice. He might hang it on a willow-tree, and cut up his arrows for lucifer-matches, in lieu of matches more pleasant and agreeable. Master Hymen, too, would have to put out his torch, and shut up his establishment, become a recluse, and appear so seldom among us that young people would begin to forget him, and cease to visit him and his altar. What lithe, graceful figures, merry faces, and brave, warm hearts have I seen gathered round the ever-cheerful tea-table! What friendships have I seen formed and cemented there to last while there is a life-throb in the veins! What happy hours have I spent at that symposium of repasts, with the young, the good, the true, and the beautiful. How many little touches of love have I noted there, at which the cold and sceptical might sneer, because they were beyond their comprehension, but which to all who have ever loved have such a charm. But, as if yesterday, I can see Julia, the raven-haired and bright-eyed, with all her gentle ways and feminine motions, gather closer to Frederick, and steal her small hand into his smooth, soft palm, to nestle there as a harbour of refuge from the perils of the world. What faith and trusting confidence are in those large, liquid eyes, as they gaze into his face! That look, which a woman who loves only can give. Beyond is the playful Maggy, with her ringing, musical laugh, all life and spirits, making fun of Georgy. But do not you attempt it, or you will turn those merry, dancing eyes into blazing orbs, flashing indignation and withering scorn. The short, proud lip would curl up, and hard, rapid, hissing sentences would be poured from that little mouth, that would pale the bravest cheek. She loves her Georgy, and cares not who knows it. She will toil for him in their distant home beyond the sea, dance for him, sing for him, aye, and do battle for him. That large, quiet man she worships, with all the fire and impetuosity of her wayward nature. With what admirable tact their mother enters into the views of her girls, bringing the broad-shouldered, sheepish young fellows, who do not know what to do with their large, sinewy hands, and seating them at the social board beside the only persons in the room that they can speak to.

Blessings on all you mothers who have warm, generous hearts, and who have not forgotten that you were once young yourselves! Fathers may frown and look grave, but never fear, boys, so long as you have the daughter's heart and the mother's smile. Never seem to hear the father's muttered remark of "what the deuce can she see in the fellow to smile so pleasantly upon him!" And all because you cannot make yourself as agreeable to him as you can to his merry-hearted little girl. But never mind papa. If you find your conversation a bore to him, just let the mother manage him. She knows all his weak points, she found them out years ago, when moonlight walks were just as pleasant to him and her as they are to you and Maggy now, and will help you better than you can help yourself.

Oh! I have met mothers, who, although Time had silvered the once glossy hair, had still young warm hearts and generous sympathies, and, with good-natured blindness, never saw more than they should see, and who waited patiently for their daughters to tell them what somebody had said to them, and what they said to somebody in reply. And I have met mothers who were she-dragons, ever guarding their daughters, fearing to trust them out of their sight, and so anxious to get them married, that they always frightened the young men away. They would not let the young people manage their little affairs in their own little way, but they kept poking their venerable noses, blue with distrust and suspicion, in between them; had them ever and always under the magnifying gaze of their hard stony eyes; and ever and anon dropping in some most unseasonable advice about prudence and caution, which worldly, selfish people are ever enunciating. Like a sudden frost in early spring, they nip the incipient buds of acquaintance which might have expanded into love, and blossomed into matrimony, the flower they so anxiously desired to gather. How those sort of women do manoeuvre for a marriage! It is the greatest pleasure one of them can have when she cannot get married herself. And she gets a few more of her own stamp, and they form a league against some unfortunate young man that they hear is well to do in the world. How freely they draw on their imaginations for the amiable disposition and inestimable qualities of the young lady, which they wish to give him as a helpmate! And what crams they will tell to carry out their matrimonial scheme! If you wish to know a young lady's character and disposition, do not trust to the report of her lady friend, for she will do all she can to promote her friend's hymeneal views. See with your own eyes, and hear with your own ears, but trust not to the reports of her lady friends; they will ascertain what qualities you admire in a wife, and inform you that she possesses them in a pre-eminent degree. If you like domesticity, she is the most domestic person in the world. If amiability is your admiration, she is the most amiable of her sex. If religion be your weakness, she is the most religious of females. If thrift and frugality be your predominant ideas, she is thrift and frugality personified. She files all her bills, enters, daily, her expenditure in her day-book, posts weekly into her journal, and balances her ledger monthly; and has, actually, out of her house-keeping allowance, opened an account in a Savings' Bank. She is such a surprising girl, and not to be matched under the heavens, and quite a treasure to the man who will be so fortunate as to obtain her. But never take to wife, as you value your comfort, a girl whom every one praises, or ten chances to one she will cut you down to one cup of tea in the evening, and that without cream or sugar. Now, I always take three cups, hot, strong, and sweet, with plenty of cream and sugar. And when I go down to take tea with my Ellen, which is every Sunday evening, I take four, positively four; but then, the dear, delightful girl knows my weakness, and makes such nice tea, and her sister makes such exquisite cake, that the tea and the cake slip down in a most agreeable and exhilarating manner.

Oh! Ellen, what a charming girl you are! and with what unspeakable rapture I gaze on that little, graceful, and elegant figure, and how I love the flutter of that pretty barege which enrols all I hold dear. Oh! how I wish I could have you always to pour out my tea, and to help me to cake!

THE POLKA.—Somewhere about the year 1831, a young peasant girl, who was in the service of a citizen of Elbeteinitz, in Bohemia, performed a dance, of her own invention, one Sunday afternoon, for her special delectation, and sang a suitable tune to it. The school-master, Joseph Neruda, who happened to be present, wrote down the melody, and the new dance was soon after publicly performed for the first time in Elbeteinitz. About 1835, it made its entrance into Prague, and then obtained the name of Polka, from the Bohemian word "Pulka," or half, from the half-step prevalent in it. Four years later it was carried to Vienna by a Prague band. In 1840, a dancing master of Prague danced the polka with great success at the "Odeon," whence it found its way, with extraordinary rapidity, to every dancing-room. The first polka that appeared in the music trade was composed by Franz Hilmar, teacher at Kopidlina; and eventually Labitzky, Leibmann, Prochaska, Swoboda, and Titl, produced some first-rate polkas. The girl who discovered this renowned dance was afterwards married, but no one knows her name.

JERPOINT ABBEY.

HIS religious edifice was originally founded by Donough O'Donoghue, King or Prince of Ossory, in the year 1180, for Cistercian Monks. The ruins are situated on the river Nore, about two miles from Thomastown, and are very extensive, occupying nearly three acres of ground. The church was a cruciform structure, and consisted of a nave, the roof of which was supported by a range of six pointed arches, with a corresponding number of massive columns. Above and between these pointed arches are the remains of six clerestory windows, narrow and rather rounded at their tops. The western or great window of the nave consists of three distinct arches, separated from each other by a single mullion, with rounded tops also. The steeple, which is over the cross of the transept, derives and a female figure, habited in the costume of the twelfth or thirteenth century. This monument is said to have been erected for Donough, King of Ossory, founder of the Abbey, who died, and was here interred, in the year 1185. The male figure holds in the right hand, which reposes on his breast, the fragment of a crucifix. The left hand is directed towards a small harp, that hangs from his left side. The base of the monument is cut into compartments, in which are seen various images of the apostles. Two crowned figures appear at the foot of the monument, standing beside a kneeling angel, whose hands are uplifted, in the act of fervent prayer. Most of the figures wear long beards, and appear to be singing or laughing.

On a tomb of black marble lies the full length statue of an abbot, in his proper habit. In the left hand he holds a crozier, the volute of which contains an Agnus Dei, well sculptured. The right arm is uplifted, and the two first fingers and thumb are raised, as if in the act of swearing an oath of fidelity, or of some very serious kind, its support from four massive square pillars, and the arches which spring from them. The two arches of the transepts, and that belonging to the nave, are of the pointed form: the arch which leads to the choir or chancel is secular.

This singular deviation in point of form between them, makes it very probable that the choir was the work of a different period; although the eastern or altar window, which is now built up to a smaller dimension, is also of the pointed form. Such an anomaly in the character of its architecture, can only be accounted for, by the supposition that it was built about the period when these styles—the circular and the pointed—were undergoing that change which occasioned the one to supersede the other. The roof of the choir is a circular arch of stone, quite perfect, and in the chancel, sculptured in rude, though bold relief, opposite to the grand altar of the south cross-aisle, stand the remains of a tomb, upon which repose a male in the manner that is to this day practised on parts of the continent. A serpent, or monster, gnaws at the lower end of the crozier. The head of the statue reposes upon a pillow of much elegance. The inscription is illegible.

A second ancient monument of a religious person sustains a statue, executed with conspicuous talent and delicacy. The crozier is of excellent workmanship, and in the right hand is a sprig of trefoil, emblematic of the Trinity. The table, or altar-slab, on which this figure reclines, is covered with trefoils and roses.

Several other disfigured monuments of ecclesiastics may be discovered amidst the rubbish with which the Abbey-church is now choked up.

The roof of the steeple, over the cross transept, is curiously groined with springers, that are supported on each side by corbels of a neat ornamental form. The nave and transepts are uncovered.

CONNA CASTLE.

FROM three to four miles west of Tallow stands Conna Castle, on a high limestone rock, which rises almost perpendicularly from the river Bride. The exterior of the building is tolerably perfect. It presents a square tower, about eighty feet in height. The first arched floor, called "The Earl's Room," is accessible by a winding staircase of cut limestone, which, for neatness of execution, far exceeds any we have seen in the ancient towers of the south. From this room may be descried, to the west, a tract of finely-diversified country: immediately under is the village of Conna; a little beyond which is a rising ground, called "Gallows Hill," the spot where, we are told, Cromwell stationed his army, and held council for the execution of the defending forces, and from whence he battered the castle, apparently with little effect. Over the entrance is a covered aperture in the wall, which communicates with the upper room, and is evidently for the purpose of letting fall missiles, or boiling water, or lead, on an enemy attempting to force the doorway; this conducting aperture is, with few exceptions, peculiar to the ancient defensive towers, and similarly situated in each. Dr. Smith, in his "History of the county of Cork," thus mentions it: "A mile west of Maguly is Connough Castle, which belonged to Thomas Fitzgerald Roe. It was demised to Sir Richard Boyle by Sir James Fullerton, A.D. 1603. Near is a stone bridge over the river Bride. This castle is a high square tower, built on a steep rock, and commands an extensive prospect over the adjacent country. More west is the small parish church of Knockmourn, in repair, the only remains of an ancient corporation, which was entirely burned down by the White Knights, in Desmond's rebellion."

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XII.

RESENTLY Mr. Bastin observed to his wife (who seldom emerged from the underground apartment of her house) that it appeared to him that Sophy and Mr. Sam understood one another. Whereupon the lady begged to hope that her lord and master would not talk like a fool. Sophy marry a man who had not a change of linen, or a decent coat to his back! The girl would be mad. Mr. Bastin was requested to remember that if he had no pride, his wife had. It was true that her mother was a servant in early life; "but," said the lady, looking hard into Mr. Bastin's face, as though she were about to try how he would stand a severe surgical operation, "but my mother lived to wear a gold watch."

It would be difficult to blame Mrs. Bastin, whose mother had been lifted to the dignity of gold-watch-wearing, that she declined to trust her daughter Sophy's happiness to the keeping of her third-floor lodger. Mr. Bastin was reminded that the young gentleman was only one of his disreputable tavern acquaintances, and that goodness alone knew where he came from, or his belongings. Mr. Bastin was too practised an orator to be put aside by feminine suggestions. He stated that the female mind was decidedly irrational. Mr. Topley, or rather Sam, bore the impress of a gentleman; in any case he was one of Nature's gentlemen.

"Then Nature has some very queer children," said Mrs. Bastin. "Observe," remarked Bastin, losing his interest in his intended son-in-law, in his desire to elaborate his ideas on Nature's gentlemen,

"Observe, Mrs. Bastin, that the outward trappings of the gentleman are nought, save only to vulgar minds."

"I confess to a prejudice in favour of clean hands and shirts. There, don't talk to me, Bastin; you're not at the Glowworms." Mrs. Bastin was losing her temper.

"Women are emphatically irrational creatures," Mr. Bastin repeated. "But, my dear, where is my supper?"

"I've nothing for you but a bit of bread and cheese," said Mrs. Bastin. "The first floor dined out to-day; and your friend, Mr. Topley, I suppose you know, leaves ne'er a crumb nor bite."

Mr. Bastin felt the shaft, but smiled as it pierced him.

"Drat the child, where is she?" cried Mrs. Bastin.

Mr. Bastin smiled his blandest as his passionate wife shrieked up the stairs for her Sophy. Sly Miss Sophy was on the first landing, drinking in the tender eloquence of Sam Topley.

"I've told all to the governor," said Mr. Sam.

"Now, how could you?" responded Sophy. "But, just think of mother, only think of it." Mr. Sam answered with a kiss.

"How can you go on so?" cried the maiden, but more in confusion than in anger. Another kiss—and then a start at the awful voice of "Mother."

Why, these scenes happened any day you might call at Mr. Bastin's house. While the lord and master, in his ample shirt-sleeves, smoked his pipe by the kitchen fire and endeavoured to bring his wife to reason, in other words, to agree with himself, the lovers cooed on the stair-case. Sometimes Mr. Sam was invited to take a pipe and a snack in the kitchen, but these occasions were only when Mrs. Bastin was in a sunny humour, which did not happen every day in the week.

"We were all young once," Mr. Bastin would remark—eyecing the lovers.

"And we're not all of us Methusallites yet," from Mrs. Bastin. "Put the kettle on, Sophy." This to disturb the happy pair.

"When I was courting Polly Bunch," Mr. Bastin continued. But this was too much for his spouse.

"Let's have none of your disgraceful experiences here, Bastin, if you please. It's a pity she didn't have you instead of me. I ain't proud of my bargain, I can assure you, my lord." Throughout this burst, Mr. Bastin slowly blew jets of smoke into the fire, and smiled.

"Most irrational creatures, I'm hanged if they're not," was his answer.

It must be confessed that the specimen of connubial bliss that was here unfolded to the sight of Mr. Sam was not a pleasant one. If, when the argument became very hot, Miss Sophy ventured to say, most respectfully, "Ha! mother," this estimable lady performed that act which her husband described as "jumping down the child's throat." Sam, to be candid, enjoyed the wrangles almost as much as he enjoyed the society of the future Mrs. Sam. Sometimes his fond imagination, leaping the gulf that lay between him and the church, he would venture, whimsically, to call Mrs. Bastin mother.

"Young man, I allow no liberties. I am not your mother; and it shall not be my fault if I ever am. I have not had the pleasure, yet, of meeting that lady." This retort covered poor Sam with confusion. Why he should have been confused when his mother was mentioned, is a secret which the writer of these pages never discovered. He only remembers that he felt a profound pity for the lad, who hung his head, or stammered into another subject whenever the subject was drawn near to his mysterious home. Mr. Faversham was once or twice pleased to say that there were awful rumours, which connected the Topley destinies with a shop, the Bankruptcy Court, and an ignoble flight to Australia, under circumstances that might have necessitated exertions on the part of the Brothers Forrester, of the Mansion House. This was one of the most ill-natured things Faversham ever said: but he could not help turning his phrase, and he really believed, in his inmost soul, that a direct family connection with a shop was to be hidden, like leprosy. It was, in truth, sad to see Sam Topley in the midst of his friends, when the conversation wandered to family matters. They had all their pleasant or unpleasant memories to bring before the board. The nursery pranks they had played; the apple-pie beds they had made for the governor's stately visitors; the breakages for which they had suffered punishment; the cuffs they had borne; the little fictions they had coined to get half-sovereigns from mamma; their loves with mistresses in trousers and mittens. Had Sam none of these experiences to relate? We know only that he never spoke of them; and that from the bottom of our hearts we pitied him. But did the conversation turn upon generous subjects of manhood's life: on good men who had been met in by-ways; on kind, strange hands that had come to the aid of a difficulty, Sam was voluble enough—for Sam had a heart we shall take leave to match with the noblest, and the gentlest nurtured. He took the honey thankfully where he might gather it; if not from the screened bee-hive, daintily set in the recesses of Chatsworth gardens; then, heartily he dug it from under the moss of a moor, where the wild heather was flowering thickly.

There were evenings, and over anxious ones to pass, when in that kitchen where dwelt his love, the conversation ran on his prospects. Sam, as it has been already hinted, had some obscure connection with the fine arts. His pencil had been essayed upon the walls of his garret, much to the annoyance of Mrs. Bastin, who took occasion to remind him that she held the house on a repairing lease, and was bound to leave it in as good a condition as she had found it, which remark suggested to Sam's mind that, unless the tenement was in one of the later stages of decay when Mrs. B. became its tenant, Mrs. B. had her work before her. But, undoubtedly, Sam had used his pencil before he became Mrs. Bastin's lodger. He had dropped hints about hard times, when he had drawn valentines for obscure publishers, at a few shillings apiece, and he had laughed in a peculiar way of his, when he had come across certain humorous snuff and cigar papers. He discovered a curious knowledge of known men which surprised his friends. He had painted ceilings in great houses, and appeared to have assisted in the construction or decoration of some of Madame Tussaud's wax-works.

These strange facts crept out by degrees, and Mr. Bastin became more and more convinced that he had under his roof an unrecognised genius. "The day will come," said he to his wife, while this shrewd lady was "washing up the tea things," "the time will come, when the name of Topley will be known all over the world."

"Get away with your nonsense, do. You're as great a fool as the young people themselves, Bastin. I've heard your pot-house companions call you a genius. I'm sure, when I told sister Sally, I thought she would have died with laughter. Smoke your filthy pipe, and ha' done, do."

Mr. Bastin took up his newspaper with superb disdain, and for the one hundredth time averred that "the female mind was decidedly irrational."

"Another beginning! More new books! Quills by the dozen! And ink enough to float an 'Encyclopædia Britannica!' The old story, Faversham. Caricatures will be drawn upon the paper; the quills will become pipe-tubes; and the ink will be upset in some lively shindy, about 4 a.m."

This was a rather lively sally for Jack Ashby.

Mr. Faversham could not respond in the best humour. He begged that Jack would not favour him with much more of this kind of humour. If "the fellows" would leave him alone, they would soon see that he did not intend to idle away his life in smoking, drinking, and billiard playing.

"You're a capital preacher spoiled," said Mr. Jack. "However, don't say I interrupted you, I'm off. When do you dine?"

"I can't tell when I shall have finished. I shall sport the oak all day, so mind you don't tell anybody I'm at home."

"But what are you about to-night? I'm thinking of giving the governor a turn." Mr. Ashby hereby conveyed to his friend his intention of visiting his father. "Will you come—or is it too slow?"

Too slow! Mr. Faversham, whose thoughts had been wandering often to Jamaica Lodge, would have read Jack Ashby a lesson on his irreverence, but he restrained himself, and was content with the observation, that Jack paid his parents a bad and ill-deserved compliment.

It was agreed that the two should dine together, and repair to enjoy suburban domesticity afterwards. Mr. Jack declared that he liked to "pepper and salt the family circle with a few strangers."

Mr. Faversham arranged his papers, displayed his note-books, and disposed himself for a long day's work. It had been observed to him that the best way to make an early success at the bar was to achieve some literary renown. And he was bound to allow that many of the great successes which he saw before him were mainly due to a previous literary reputation. There was Mr. Sergeant Trumpetone! He began life as an indifferent contributor to magazines. He wrote comic and serio-comic articles. It was never known how on earth he scraped the money together to enter even at Gray's Inn. As a sucking barrister he had eked out his slender income by reporting for a morning paper, and now look at him! The papers to which he once contributed are now delighted to chronicle his success. He is the adopted advocate of all literary disputants; possibly not the most advantageous clients—but valuable in the end, as before their cases are certain to be fully reported. R. Shamblety, Q.C., is surely another instance in point. How did he begin? Why, he reported dinners and vestry meetings for the "Whig News." It chanced that opportunities arose for the display of his latent energy and graphic power. He displayed the happy art of making very dull proceedings the vehicle for agreeable reading. He could set forth the foibles of a speaker, or describe a full room of noodles wrangling over a formal point, with a power that may be ranked somewhere between penny-a-lining and literature. A national disaster, that discovered tens of thousands of poor creatures starving in our midst, was R. Shamblety's, Q.C., opportunity. He went forth with his pencil and note-book, described all he saw in plain English—and returned to London famous. Hundreds of writers, and more scholarly men than R. Shamblety, now Q.C., are glad to sun themselves in the honour of his distant acquaintance. But an indifferent rower pulling with the stream will travel faster than the good rower who pulls against it.

Mr. Apteryx, now holding power over the liberty of hundreds of her Majesty's subjects; an awful presence, in which the to-day rich man may hear that henceforth he is not to control more money than a pedlar carries in his pocket, and that the gloom of the prison of unreason is his prospect; this mighty judge, with counsel laughing as they plead for him, is what? Peep into a meeting of cabinet ministers. It is arranged that there is a nuisance of which her Majesty's government must be rid, so Mr. Apteryx, by the force of his unpopularity, becomes a judge of the actions of his fellow-men. He has crawled to the summit of his pyramid, and is on a level with the eagles, who, with mighty pinions, have only reached his point of altitude.

Again, there was Jubilant, a potent jester, who had widened more mouths in this kingdom than any of his fellow-jesters. He jested, to his honour be it said, on the right side; he laughed shams and nuisances of the highway; cocked the wigs of inefficient grandees comically over their lordships' noses, and merrily rang his bells about the ears of humbugs who were over-conceited in their municipal purple. Underlying all this merry word was a stratum of valuable stuff. Jubilant could be gravely wise. There were few who thought that the good-hearted jester was, at one time, stirring the heart of the empire with his brave and noble denunciation of the atrocities which workhouse jacks-in-office were inflicting on the poor! When the jester was raised to the judgment-seat there were dull writers who cried shame. But Jubilant took his seat, with the air and dignity of a perfect gentleman, and he confounded all who had barked at his heels by his sound sense, his scrupulous rectitude, and the gentleness with which his justice was ever tempered with mercy.

These, among other less notable instances, supported the assertion by which Mr. Faversham was led to purchase pens, ink, and paper, viz.:—that a reputation at the bar is rapidly raised upon a foundation of literary fame, or love of moderate success at the press. It must be confessed that Mr. Faversham might have taken another view of the question. The literary ladder does not afford young Ambition the easiest climbing. Behold the great men at the top! A great, and goodly company! The giant figure, with the thoughtful heart, thatched with early snow! The active and lithe figure, topped with the sharply-lined face, from which two glorious eyes, deep and sparkling, look into the hearts of men! The unstudied figure, bearing aloft the high, broad forehead upon which all the laurels of poetry this nation deigns to give are twined! Aye, but look at the battle-field below. The slain are numerous as the hairs upon the heads of the victors!

Mr. Faversham, with his ink-pond before him and his pen hovering over it, may do well to ponder his chances. Out of that black pool he may draw eternal honour, and make music that shall never die; he may draw out of it a tear with every dip of his pen. It is not fear, however, that keeps his paper clean. Fear comes after repeated blows. His eye rests upon the glories secure upon their cars of triumph, and he is hastening towards them. Grave, and sedate, and calculating fifty is laughing at his audacity, but he will never laugh the confidence out of twenty-four.

Faversham had discussed with his friends the idea he intended to work out, and it had been unanimously pronounced good. It would be a great success. "Fresh as a dewdrop," said Mr. Clifton; "although, if I were you, Faversham, I would not fritter my mind away on fiction. It is unprofitable; it leads to nothing." Mr. Faversham had replied by asking whether such books as the "Vicar of Wakefield" and "Clarissa Harlowe" had led to nothing? "Write a 'Vicar of Wakefield,' and I am with you," said Mr. Clifton. This gentleman was very unreasonable.

It was when Faversham had written BOOK THE FIRST, and CHAPTER I., that all the difference between the conception of an idea and the power of carrying out broke upon him. He must have an original beginning. What a nuisance Jack was with his stupid jokes! Decidedly he was not in the vein. A pipe might do something. Mr. Faversham accordingly lit a pipe, and stood in contemplative attitude, looking out of his window. "Who could write with such a prospect as this?" he said to himself. A very tedious chapter would be set before the reader, if all the phases which Mr. Faversham's indecision assumed were to be set forth herein. When he was dining with Jack Ashby in the evening, he affirmed that he had made a beginning; and that, for the future, he should write not less than a chapter per diem.

"I call that a very fair day's work," said Mr. Faversham, with an air of determination that was impressive. Mr. Jack allowed that a chapter a week would give himself ample employment. Faversham, who knew that Mr. Jack could not "write a line," was too well bred not to observe, that people could not tell what they could do until they had tried.

I must do full justice to Mr. Faversham. Our reader is not yet in possession of the whole truth. Jack Ashby's invitation to Jamacia Lodge had operated unfavourably on the aspiring novelist's imagination. Mr. Namby, in that humorous way of his, laid it down that when a man is thoroughly in love he is fit for nothing save marriage. Now, no aggravating symptoms of this hopeless condition had broken out on Mr. Faversham at this period of his history. He had given rise to some suspicions that the disease was in him, by the production of a few amatory verses. But what would become of us all if the scratching of a few lines to Cynthia were to be brought against us as evidence that love has bound us hand and foot, and that we are ready for the matrimonial curing-process? Every boy and maiden will protest that they have a right to feign before they feel a flame. We try the ice close to the shore that we may be off should it prove unsound. We don't buckle our skates on and skim at once to deep. Une instant then: Mr. Faversham was not in love. I have already had to guard the reader against a premature conclusion on this head; and I must repeat the warning. Since the gentleman most interested in the proper understanding of this question is not actually proceeding on his way to the cosy villa where the lady, also interested in a proper understanding of Mr. Faversham's heart, is busy with her good works. In the first place, Mr. Faversham is not in a position to marry. Does any rational creature imagine, in the second place, that papa Ashby, who flatters himself, not without reason, that his daughters enjoy every luxury that a person in his station can afford; that this man of the world, who has known the want of a sovereign, and could command only the comforts of a "two-pair back," will permit a stranger to enter his house and carry off one of his darlings out of her silken nest, to experience the misery of a two-hundred-a-year home? And Miss Ashby is much too good a girl to do anything against her father's wish. As we value the happiness of these two young people, let us pray that they may not fall in love with each other.

A glance at the young lady, when Mr. Faversham was announced, would have reassured dame prudence herself. Miss Ashby gave the tips of her fingers to her father's guest, and at once resumed the needle-work on which she was engaged when he entered. It was a pity to see these two young men, with their elastic spirits and nimble movements, intruding upon the hours between tea-taking and bed-time, which Mr. Ashby devoted to sleep. The old gentleman was, however, too hospitable to show any resentment he might naturally feel when his evening's rest was intruded upon; indeed, he was remarkable for his hospitality, or rather for the form which he gave it. It was Mr. Ashby's settled notion that hospitality consisted in making his guests eat and drink incessantly. A man who had had enough was his abomination. His doctor would not allow him to take much himself. Why that which was good for the guest was harmful to the host is one of those secrets of Jamaica Lodge which defied the most impertinent inquiries. Mr. Ashby was an anomaly: viz, a healthy man who had a doctor in constant attendance upon him. Mr. Faversham had not shaken hands all round when his host attacked him.

"Now, then, Mr. Faversham, make yourself at home. What will you take? We have had tea."

"That's a pity," was an impertinence from Mr. Jack.

"Dear me, where are the domestic young men gone that used to be in my young days?" Mrs. Ashby said. "I can tell you what, Mr. Jack, when your father, sitting there, was your age, he would as soon have thought of flying as going without his tea and his nice round of toast I used to make for him by the time he came home from the city. And pray, do you despise tea, Mr. Faversham?"

Miss Ashby looked at Mr. Faversham while he answered,

"I am very fond of tea, on the contrary," Mr. Faversham felt himself compelled to say, although he was not an inveterate tea-drinker.

"Make Mr. Faversham a cup," said Miss Faversham, to her younger sister. The young sister laughed, and looked from Faversham to Mr. Jack.

"Do you hear your sister, my dear?" Mrs. Ashby intended to be severe.

"Nonsense!" Mr. Ashby interposed. "Tea! We've something better to offer our friends than tea, I hope."

Mr. Faversham declared most solemnly that, "if the house would afford him a cup of tea—he knew it was very late to ask—there was nothing he could enjoy more. He would not have dared to suggest it, but since Miss Ashby had been so kind," Mr. Faversham turned his most gracious smile upon the young lady, but she did not raise her head from her work to receive it. The cup of tea, if Mr. Faversham was not a consummate hypocrite, was nectar to him.

The general conversation was led to the evening which two at least of the company present had spent in the City Hall.

"I saw you at the door," Miss Ashby said to Faversham.

"I did not see you," the gentleman replied, "until you were just entering your brougham."

The young urchin of the family, who was kissed and scolded at the same time by his doting mother, here chimed in; "Well, I suppose you didn't go there to look after each other, did you?"

Mrs. Ashby threatened to send the rude child to bed if he ventured to open his mouth again during the evening, but Jack Ashby could not be restrained from a burst of laughter.

Miss Ashby only wondered how a person of John's age could encourage his little brother in his vulgarities. Mr. Faversham was confused and silent.

Leave a prudent mother to push through and destroy an awkward situation. Mrs. Ashby hastened to ask Mr. Faversham his opinion on the discourse.

"Very interesting and instructive," was the reply. It would have been bad taste in that house to give the candid opinion Mr. Faversham held, and had expressed elsewhere. The candid opinion would, also, have greatly displeased the young lady.

During supper Mr. Faversham sat opposite Miss Ashby's favourite dish (a dish which £200 a-year could not provide every night for a young couple's supper), and she most amiably allowed herself to be helped twice. It was remarked by Mr. Ashby that he did not know when he had seen his daughter eat such a supper.

"Now, before you go, Jack," said Mrs. Ashby, "will you promise me to come to dinner next Sunday—mind, not next Sunday five weeks—and to bring Mr. Faversham with you, if he can bear one of our dull Sundays."

Mr. Faversham would only be too happy. He was always delighted when he was able to spend his Sundays domestically. It was on Sundays that he regretted most the distance that separated him from his father's house.

"Then, pray understand, Mr. Faversham, from this time that there is a knife and fork for you here, and a hearty welcome, and a good glass of wine (by the way I have a new vintage) any Sunday Don't wait for that scapegrace, Jack. If he will stop away he must. Good night. Go straight home, like good boys."

Faversham went direct home; and was a happier man when he went to bed than he had been during many a long month. But—he was not in love.

PETER PINDAR.

HAT eccentric character, Dr. John Wolcot, M.D., better known by his poetical nom-de-plume of "Peter Pindar," was born at Dodbrook, in the south of Devon, in April, 1737. His father was a respectable farmer, and lived on a little freehold of his own, which descended to his son, who disposed of it in 1796. He received his school education under Mr. Morris, a respectable teacher at King's-bridge, who had been a Quaker, but quitted the Society of Friends, and became a school-master. Under this instructor Wolcot made a good proficiency in Latin, till he was sixteen years of age, when his uncle, a bachelor, who was settled in good business in Cornwall, as a surgeon and apothecary, took him as an apprentice, with the view of making him his heir and successor. The future poet served his term of seven years diligently, and at the expiration of that time went to London, for the purpose of availing himself of the facilities afforded by the metropolis in perfecting his medical studies. After attending various hospitals he returned to his uncle, with whom he quietly resided until Sir William Trelawney was appointed to the governorship of Jamaica, when he expressed a desire to his uncle, who was an apothecary to the family, to recommend him for a situation in that colony. This wish was exceedingly distasteful to the old gentleman; he lost his temper, abused his nephew for his ingratitude, and threatened to cut him off with a shilling. Wolcot, however, who knew his relation's temper thoroughly well, persevered in his application, and, after much altercation, the uncle reluctantly agreed to wait upon Sir William Trelawney, who was also much surprised, but having a regard for his professional friend, and no unfavourable idea of the abilities of the young man, readily gave his consent, and nominated him his physician. To qualify himself for this post, Wolcot obtained a diploma from one of the Scottish Universities. In the outward voyage, the ship touched at Tenerife, and while here he formed several interesting acquaintances; and wrote some of his most pleasing poems. On his arrival at the place of destination he found many sources of enjoyment, for the island was healthy, the planters lived in a style of hospitable luxury, and to them such a man as our author could not fail to make himself agreeable. He was also a favourite with the governor, who appointed him physician-general to the island; a situation, by the way, that was more honourable than lucrative. After some time, however, Wolcot, at the advice of Sir William Trelawney, returned to England, where his uncle being dead, he resolved to set up as a physician at Truro, where he had a numerous acquaintance; and might have established himself in good credit and practice, by a proper regard to the duties of life. Unfortunately, however, his manners were not improved by a residence in the West Indies, and, as he possessed some property, both real and personal, which had been left to him by his parents and uncle, he cared little about his profession, and paid not the slightest attention to the families in his neighbourhood. With one or other of these he was continually on terms of hostility, and his greatest delight was to annoy them by anonymous squibs and caricatures; for the doctor was equally clever and severe with the pen and the pencil. Among the objects of his satire was a Mr. Rosewarne, member of Parliament for Truro, who was lampooned by him in every possible way. On one occasion, that gentleman suffered a most mortifying insult from his troublesome neighbour. After his election for Truro, he invited a large party to his house, to a supper and a ball; but, of course, the doctor was not one of the guests. To avenge himself for this neglect, Wolcot sent a letter of invitation, as if from Mr. Rosewarne, to an old woman, who was a distant relation and pensioner of that gentleman's wife. This matron, who was such a notorious virago as to be the dread of all Truro and the neighbourhood, proud of the honour so unexpectedly conferred, dressed herself out in the best manner she could, and sallied forth, at the appointed hour, to her cousin's house, into which she found easy access, and proceeded up stairs to the drawing-room, where her presence created unusual dismay and confusion. The company stared with astonishment at the gaunt figure, for she was of a most gigantic stature, and the lady of the mansion fainted away. The attempts necessary, though gentle enough, to remove the unwelcome visitor, made matters worse, for having already primed herself, she levelled the footman to the floor with one blow, and smashed to pieces all the apparatus of the tea-table that stood nearest to her; then, throwing down the letter which had been sent to her, she stalked out of the room into another, where she committed similar depredations, and chancing to encounter a musician in her way, she wrested the violin from him, and broke it about his head. Of course, the whole house was in an uproar; the servants, instead of endeavouring to stop the ravages of this Cornish Meg Merrilies, avoided her as she approached them, and thus she was suffered to reign for near an hour within the mansion, while the people on the outside were enjoying the storm.

Jokes of this sort could neither increase the friends nor the practice of the doctor, for, instead of denying the fact of his having written the letter, he made a boast of it; but though this scene occasioned much fun to him and his boon companions, it was viewed in a very different light by the gentleman at whose expense it was played, and all the respectable people of the place were much offended with a trick that had deprived them of a pleasing entertainment. Matters now grew disagreeable to the doctor, and he was subjected to mortifications in his turn. Patients fell off, acquaintances grew cool; he was omitted in the invitations to public meetings, and few were the social parties that would venture to admit a man whose conversation was ribaldry, and whose pen overflowed with gall. At length, in consequence of a litigation between himself and the parish, respecting the right of the latter to saddle him with an apprentice, and the adverse decision of the magistrates to whom he appealed against what he considered an unjustifiable and unjust proceeding, he left Truro, and went to reside at Helston, about seventeen miles from that town, near the Land's End. After remaining there some time he returned to Exeter, where he resided for a year or two.

It is but right to observe here, that the doctor, during his residence at Truro, cultivated the sister arts of poetry and painting with assiduity and effect. Some very charming effusions of his muse, written at this place, make it to be regretted that a genius, so well fitted for the true sublime, should have ever dipped its plumes in the slime of scurrility and scandal. The "Ode on Cambrisa," a mountain in Cornwall, written by him in the year 1776, may vie with the happiest productions of Collins, or even Gray, in pathos, personification, and description.

It was during his residence at Truro, that Dr. Wolcot had an opportunity of introducing to the world an eminent natural genius, who, but for his friendship and assistance, would never have emerged from his original obscurity, or, at most, might have been a sign-painter in his native county. This person was John Opie, a name of which Cornwall has just reason to be proud, and to whose career we have already briefly adverted in the first number of this journal, in the paper entitled "The Land of Tin." Opie was a parish apprentice to a house-carpenter, in the village of St. Agnes. The doctor, in his rides through the village, was so much struck with some rude sketches in chalk, and a few on paper, that were shown him as this lad's performance, that he invited him to his house, furnished him with materials, and gave him such lessons and assistance, as enabled him in a short time to set up as itinerant portrait painter. In the spring of 1780, Wolcot and Opie came to London, where the painter was welcomed as a phenomenon, to such a degree that the street in which he resided was thronged with carriages from morning to night. But this attachment of the poet for the painter did not last long, for a difference ultimately arose between them, which terminated their friendship for ever. The cause of the breach has been ascribed, and we believe truly, to pecuniary claims made by the doctor, which were resisted with indignation, as totally unfounded in justice. Let this be as it may, the bard now became an implacable enemy of the person upon whom he had lavished so much praise, and he now took as much pains to ruin his reputation as he had before done to raise him above his contemporaries.

Soon afterwards Wolcot, who had made himself known by his "Epistle to the Reviewers," formed the plan of an unusual critique on the pictures in the Exhibition, which design he carried into execution, the ensuing season, in the publication of "Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians: by Peter Pindar, a distant relation of the poet of Thebes." If, however, our merry bard had adopted the name of "Peter Aretin," it would have been more in character; for his muse, instead of possessing Grecian eloquence and dignity, was a mere virago, perfectly indifferent to the feelings of those upon whom it was bestowed. It displayed, however, considerable knowledge of the art, and administered much wholesome advice to young painters. Nor could it be said that his censures were altogether undeserved, though the caustic severity of them in most instances was certainly inexcusable.

In 1785, Wolcot, under his accustomed nom-de-plume, brought out no less than twenty-three odes, one of which was devoted, in no very courtly phrase, to his majesty. With the next Exhibition the satirist took his farewell of the painters, with a broad hint that he was now preparing for a much nobler quarry. Accordingly, he soon after appeared in a direct attack upon the king, and the mock-heroic which he produced, worked up by his invention, presented so glaring an evidence of the wanton daring of the lampooner, that even they who enjoyed the joke wondered at the temerity of the writer, and the supineness of the government.

It has often been made a question, what motive actuated the satirist in holding up the king, and almost every branch of the royal family, to public ridicule? Wolcot on being interrogated respecting his conduct in this instance, uniformly declared that his sole inducement was to get money, and that, finding how eager the people were to swallow any ridiculous thing reported of their superiors, he availed himself of the general credulity to perform the part of Thersites to his own advantage. Thus, talents of the richest description, and obviously capable of immortalising the possessor, by benefiting mankind, were perverted to the most sordid purposes. On some occasions, indeed, his satirical powers were well applied, and in all they never failed to create a laugh, even in those persons who despised the buffoon, and shuddered at his profanity. The "Town Eclogue on Johnson's Biographers" is one of the happiest pieces of burlesque in the English language, and extremely characteristic of all the parties. Dr. Wolcot was well acquainted with the great moralist by often meeting him at the table of his countryman, Sir Joshua Reynolds; but Johnson rather repelled than encouraged his advances to a nearer intimacy, from the dislike which he had to ribald discourse. Wolcot, happening to be in company with Johnson one day, observed to him, that his portrait by Reynolds was deficient in dignity, which remark was received with a growl. "No, sir; the pencil of Reynolds never wanted dignity nor the graces!"

We shall not here enumerate the various publications of Wolcot, because they must be sufficiently known to our readers. We may remark, however, that no rank or sex could protect characters of eminence from the shafts of his ridicule; and in some of his convivial moments, when sacrificing largely to Bacchus, he has openly acknowledged, and gloried in the declaration, that he made scurrility a trade. "'Tis my vocation, Jack," said he to a remonstrating friend, "and I am resolved to live and die in the exercise of it!" When asked how he came to assail persons of the most unblemished reputation, of whom he could know but little, and nothing to their disadvantage, his answer invariably was: "Why, they have a name, and that's enough for me! A satire upon scoundrels, and people about whom nobody cares a farthing, would never sell."

Such was the principle which governed the conduct of this man, who, to pamper his own vices, scattered firebrands into the habitations of others, and, laughing at his success, exclaimed that it was all done in sport! The prodigious sale of his works stimulated him to proceed in this nefarious course; and it deserves observation, that the satirist seemed to have no other idea of happiness, than that of getting money, and indulging his sensual appetite.

But while the soi-distant "Peter Pindar" was thus dealing mischief all around, he unfortunately encountered a native genius, possessed of equal powers and better principles, who assailed him in his turn, and made him feel the whip most acutely. This castigation came from Mr. Giffard, the author of the "Baviad" and "Maviad," to revenge which the satirist, instead of reflecting upon the wounds which he had so wantonly inflicted, without the least provocation or regard to truth, on others, sallied forth with a cudgel in his hand, and attacked Giffard in a bookseller's shop, where, however, he was soon disarmed, and ejected into the street. After this he avenged himself, in a manner, with a weapon to which he was more accustomed. But the virulence of his abuse only convinced the public how bitterly he writhed under the correction which he had received, and with what strict justice it had been administered.

At length the irregularity of his living brought on an asthmatic complaint, which gave such strong symptoms of a speedy dissolution, that he assigned the copyright of his literary labours to his booksellers for an annuity of £250. This being executed, he went to live in the west of England, where, contrary to all calculation and human expectancy, the salubrious air of Devon and Cornwall wrought such a surprising change in his constitution, that although he could not previously lie down in a bed at night, his cough left him, and he lived for about twenty years after. He returned to London, where his renovated appearance startled the booksellers, who would have rather seen his ghost in Paternoster-row, and they now consulted how to be free of their engagement. Recourse was had to the law for this object, and a chancery suit was actually commenced, when the failure of the principal house occasioned a compromise, and the bond was cancelled.

At this period the doctor continued to amuse himself on such topics of the day as afforded scope for his mirth. He also superintended a new edition of "Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters;" compiled a "Selection of the Beauties of English Poetry," and printed anonymously a tragedy called "The Fall of Portugal." Soon after a confirmed cataract totally destroyed the vision in both eyes. In this state, however, he dictated some little effusions of his fancy to an amanuensis; among the rest, an "Address" to be spoken at the opening of Drury-lane Theatre. This was his last composition, subsequently to which he employed himself in the arrangement of a complete edition of his poetical works, for which he dictated a kind of biographical preface. Though the poet had now reached the age of fourscore, he still indulged the hope of protracted existence in a world where he was almost forgotten, and the pleasures of which he could no longer enjoy. The very day preceding his dissolution, which occurred on the 13th of January, 1819, he talked confidently of spending the ensuing summer in Devonshire. In accordance with the directions which he gave for his interment, his remains were deposited as near as could be ascertained to the grave of Sam Butler, the author of "Hudibras," in Covent Garden. It would be in vain to assign any just reason for such a choice, seeing that between the two authors not the slightest resemblance can be found. As has been well observed by a biographer of Wolcot, Butler applied his inimitable talents to the unmasking of knavery and the support of loyalty, but "Peter Pindar" made game of virtue, and did all that lay in his power to alienate the minds of the people from their sovereign. Though Butler exposed canting hypocrites to ridicule, he evinced a deep respect for the sacred truths of revealed religion; but the other intermixed with his abuse of persons the most burlesque perversions of Scripture. The wit of Butler accomplished a great national purpose, in providing an effectual antidote to a moral epidemic which had produced inconceivable mischief; but the lampoons of "Pindar" tend to poison society, and to destroy the great bonds by which mankind are united together. In reading "Hudibras" we laugh, it is true; but then our mirth is excited by causes that are obvious to our minds, and we feel obliged to the poet for laying open those pernicious follies upon which grave argument would be lost. The works of Wolcot create risibility also, but it is an entertainment which no wise or good man is proud to recollect, or willing to repeat.

POOR PHILOSOPHY.

HOWEVER dark and drear be life,
The sun still shines upon our doors;
For us the nightly heavens are lit,
For us the lark at morning scars.

Time, with the sickle 'neath his robe,
May steal our dearest wealth away;
Yet never hath the hopeless eye
Seen God's great promises decay.

Our hearths are cold, on tile and roof
The snow may fall like purest heaven;
Shall we despair who warm our hands
At yon increasing fires of Heaven?

Be comforted; when skies are dark,
And the winds roar in Wintry war,
Each flake shall breed a summer flower,
Each cloud reveal a hidden star.

A STORY OF CERTAIN OLD BELLS.

A NEW LEGEND.

HOEVER crosses Thomond-bridge, Limerick, from the English town will see to his left the sadly mutilated towers and curtains of a castle, whose erection is historically ascribed to John of England; and to his right the gingerbread steeple and pinnacles of the church of St. Mungret. Looking over the western parapet of the bridge, he will find the river rushing over a broad but shallow bed, towards a venerable mill, which stands almost in the middle of the stream, and is connected with the "mainland" by a rude bridge. The glorious steeple of the cathedral of St. Mary, which Cromwell attempted to level with chain-shot, looks down upon a wilderness of roofs and chimney-stacks, upon fortification and workshop, upon mill and river. To the east our observer may behold the retreating chain of the Clare mountains, as they change in colour moment after moment, now presenting the rich brown of heath and moorland, now the steel-blue reflection of some passing rain cloud. A circular bank runs round that part of the city lands which lies at his back, almost terminating with the cemetery of the church of St. Mungret. We have something more reliable than tradition for stating, that, about the middle of the fifteenth century, an abbey of considerable architectural pretensions and noble proportions stood upon or near the site of the present church. It belonged to the Franciscan friars, and was called after the name of their founder. By whom it was established, or when, we have no record to show. Stray notices of its existence creep up occasionally in the few archives which the city has rescued from the hands of the great spoilers—time and ruin. Thus, we are told that its occupants had the right to certain salmon wars, and ponds, and pastures, and were the recipients of a primitive description of toll, which formed the revenue of the bridge. Moreover, and this is more important to our present purpose, the abbey and abbey lands enjoyed the privilege of sanctuary, and thus offered a refuge to many unhappy persons whom the violence of the times compelled to seek an asylum from the strong hands by which they were threatened.

The evening of February, 1531, the date of the commencement of our story, closed a weary day of rain, and storm, and darkness. The river overflowed its banks, and flooded the pasture lands at either side, driving the cattle to the high uplands, where they stood dumb and shivering. The Clare mountains were veiled in a mist impenetrable to the eye, save when the wind lifted it for a moment, and revealed the barren hill sides behind. In the west, covered with leagues of forest, the sun went down in a region of orange vapour, ominous for the morrow; with the rapidity of a tropical night, darkness folded the world, and the bell of sunset pealed from the abbey steeple.

In the vast chapel of the abbey, the monks in their brown habits and leathern girdles, had assembled for the evening devotions. The high roof of the building was lost in the thick rain-gloom; one solitary star gleamed on the great flamboyant window to the east, in curious contrast with the yellow glimmers of the tapers distributed along the choir-stalls, and the faint glow of the silver cresset suspended before the high altar. The abbot, mitred and bearing the abbatial staff, passed through his monks to the quaintly-carved sedilium, which it was his wont to occupy, at the head of the choir. Soon the united voices of the brethren were in grand Gregorian volume to the roof, relapsing at times into the melancholy cadences with which that inspired music abounds. Then the eldest of the choir-monks began a pathetic psalm; and the response was about to be given, when the clash of arms and the voices of men raised in anger, with earnest cries for admittance, rang through the chapel, for the time suspending the great chaunt.

"Brethren," said the abbot, gravely, rising and looking in the direction of the wicket, "let us remember laborare est orare, and you, Eustace, hasten to unbar the door, and admit whomsoever claims the protection of our roof."

The monk crossed his arms and left the chapel in silence. He traversed the little cemetery to the west of the great tower, and, looking through a small aperture through which visitors were reconnoitred before they obtained admission, saw a man in the prime of life, struggling with a soldier, who, but for the massive armour by which his motions were embarrassed, would have speedily strangled his opponent. Beside them stood a boy, who watched the encounter with terrified gaze, and down on the group showered and flickered the red light of the oil lamp, fastened in the niche above the doorway. As Brother Eustace looked on, the soldier lifted his opponent from the ground, evidently with the hope of being able to dash him against the nearest buttress; but in the endeavour his strength failed him, and his antagonist, whose garb and demeanour showed he was a citizen, fell from his relaxing grasp. To unbar the wicket and admit the child and citizen was the work of a moment, and scarcely had the door closed again when the voice of the soldier, choked with baffled rage, was heard demanding that the escaped man should be delivered up to him.

"Give him to me," he exclaimed, as he smote the iron-studded door with his mailed fist, "or before John's Day there shall not be a head in a cowl amongst ye. Know ye me? Know ye O'Brien of Inna?"

Brother Eustace spoke to the infuriated man through the aperture. "Sir David, we know ye well, and, peradventure, ye lose much time in vain words, forgetting the privileges of St. Francis. Who hath heard of an O'Brien calling in question our right of sanctuary?"

"They who give can take, starvelling," replied O'Brien, "what we've done who shall gainsay our right to undo? Will ye deliver him to me, monk?"

"The saints forbid," answered Eustace, calmly.

"Then look ye to your roof. We will pile all the faggots in Thomond on your bare heads. Look ye to it!" and, turning on his heel, the O'Brien strode swiftly into the darkness.

When Eustace returned to the great hall, on whose ample hearth blazed a goodly heap of peat and bogwood, he found the citizen seated on a rude stool, with the boy resting on his knee, and both enjoying the warmth of the hospitable flame. The elder of the two visitors was a man of some two score years, dressed in the burgher's costume of the period. It consisted of a doublet of grey serge, fastened at the waist by a rich belt, leggings of tanned deer-skin, and boots of the same material, and a low cap in which a short feather was fastened with a gilt clasp. Though comparatively young in years, the citizen's face bore unmistakable traces of suffering, and there was about him an air of settled melancholy, suggestive of the dignified resignation with which even strong spirits will sometimes succumb to calamities when they cannot resist them. In the boy, Eustace believed he had found a realization of those sweet angel forms which glowed in the rubrics of the abbey. His hair clustered in ringlets around a face almost feminine in its delicacy and purity; his eyes sparkled with a pensive light, which harmonized with the thoughtful expression of his mouth; and this, added to a physique of slender build and exquisite outline, formed so perfect a picture of loveliness and innocence, that the warm-hearted and sensitive Eustace could not refrain from pressing the child to his bosom and exclaiming, "Sweet saints of heaven, bless our little angel!"

As the citizen rose to partake of the viands which the monk provided for his entertainment, the latter said in a tone of kindly sympathy:

"Much thanks is due to heaven for thy safe deliverance from the strong man. How hast thou injured him?"

The boy smiled on the monk, whilst the citizen, looking up for a moment, answered: "Thou knowest it is not in the power of a poor citizen, a bell-founder, to injure the rich, who hold in their hands the power of retribution, and who seldom lack the will to make it felt. Judge, Oh hospitable son of Francis, if I have injured this O'Brien? Ye have heard how he stole the bell of St. Synan from Doonass, and cut down the sacred yew which flourished for centuries within the chancel of the same temple. Peradventure he would have me cast that same bell into 'morning stars' wherewith to break honest heads; for the 'star' is a goodly weapon, and the place where its spike sticks may bid good-bye to selves for ever."

Eustace sighed. "You refused to commit such sacrilege, my son?" he said.

"With God's help, I did," replied the citizen. "It will be a sad day when Simon Brennan, the bell-founder of 'the Close,' shall make vile weapons of the church bells to murder the church's children."

"St. Francis assist you," ejaculated Eustace, "you and our little angel need lack not couch nor refreshment whilst there's a roof over the abbey, or a pint of meal in the bin. Come, ye must be weary."

Simon returned thanks, and taking his son by the hand, both followed the monk, who led them into a range of dormitories running above the colonnades of the cloister.

Ten years passed swiftly away, Simon's hair had begun to turn gray, and his step to lose its elasticity, whilst his son Gabriel had grown to be a youth of much beauty, but of great bodily strength, and much cunning dexterity of hand. Ten years had passed during which Simon had not once left the abbey enclosure, for although his foe had disappeared from the land, and no one could say where he was, the founder feared him, knowing the innumerable devices by which his arch enemy could compass the death and ruin of those he hated. Son and father then had become permanent occupants of the sanctuary, and both grew in exceeding favour with the abbot, who loved the father for his fidelity, the son for his ingenuity and grace. The good abbot had long cherished a pious ambition, which at length he secretly communicated to Simon. He desired, he told him, to have cast and hung, before death should overtake him, a peal of bells for the abbey steeple. The material wherewith to make them was abundant, and he longed to see the work consummated. Simon entertained the idea with great relish, and having obtained from his kind protector a promise that all assistance and machinery should be placed at his disposal, undertook to execute the pious commission. A foundry was extemporised in a remote part of the abbey enclosure, and thither Simon, having collected all the resources of an artificer in such matters, betook himself. The metal hissed and seethed in the furnaces, as day after day their iron sides grew redder and redder, the sand moulds were prepared in the earth, and the founder watched the work with nervous impatience. Beside him stood Gabriel, ready for any emergency, and following with sleepless curiosity the curious operations by which his father was to eliminate sweet bell-music from hot metal and sandy matrices. It was difficult to make the fire penetrate to the heart of the huge heap of bronze as it roared in its fiery prison; and Simon, who had not closed his eyes for several nights, grew exhausted on the eve of St. Francis.

"Gabriel, boy," he murmured, turning to his son, "I shall sleep whilst you watch. When the metal is ready for the moulds call me. At your peril, touch it not;" and, having assured himself that his instructions would be observed with fidelity, the founder turned into his workshop, flung himself upon a rude couch, and sunk into a heavy slumber.

It was nearly daybreak when Gabriel, who had never ceased to watch the furnace intently, perceived the metal dripping from the plug-hole into the canal which was to conduct it to the mould. In an instant, and before he could alarm his father, the plug gave way, and the hissing, writhing stream shot like a cataract of blood into the matrix. Stunned by this unexpected occurrence, and fascinated by the fierce beauty of the boiling flood, he paused, with strained eyes and parted mouth, to observe it, as it wound its way—a serpent of living fire—towards its destination. Now it roared and crackled, now seethed like a brook of the inferno, and now the spine became of a livid blue, out of the joints of which burtled myriads of crimson sparks. "Lost, lost—oh, lost!" were the words which aroused him from his stupor, and looking round, he beheld his father standing near, holding an axe above his head. With the quickness of thought the weapon descended on the boy's forehead, and he fell to the ground a corpse. Simon looked down on the horrible result of his passion, and his heart sank within him. Dabbled with blood, the long hair streaming across his face, hiding its ghastly expression from the light, his limbs stretched out stiff and immovable, lay poor Gabriel, in the midst of the mingled glare and darkness of the foundry.

"Speak to me—but one word, my boy, my Gabriel," shrieked Simon, as he knelt by the youth's side, and raised him to a half-erect posture, until their faces met. "No word—no sign—no forgiveness—oh Father in Heaven, who will wash those foul hands clean? who shall purge them of innocent blood?" and the founder flung up his arms in an attitude of wild entreaty. To the excitement of the moment succeeded an overpowering stupefaction, and to this one of those lucid glimpses, in which self is most seen and cared for. Taking the body in his arms, he carried it to a distant part of the building, dug a shallow grave in the soft mould of the floor, and buried it. Staggering and missing his steps, he reeled back to the bells. As he stood above them the morning light burst through the lattices, and his practised eye readily perceived that the castings were perfect.

"Butchered—innocently butchered, and by these hands!" cried Simon. "Who will give me back my boy, who—who?" There came on his brain a noise like the rush of many waters, the roof of the foundry seemed to open, and the skies above were darkened by a crimson hand, in the hollow of which the sun hung black and rayless; his limbs shook beneath him, his eyes closed, and, grasping at the air for support, he reeled senseless against the wall.

"He hath awoken in good time—the founder hath, for we bless the bells to day" said Brother Eustace to Brother Lafranc, as they stood chatting in the refectory, on the feast of St. Agatha.

"Much toil and anxiety have dazed him, methinks," observed the latter. "Save us, but he did look like one fitter for death than life on the morn' we found him."

"Who would have opined," asked Eustace, with a look of innocent wonder, "that Gabriel would have smitten his father and fled, so comely was he?"

"And yet, such is Simon's testimony, and who shall gainsay it?" replied Lafranc. "Hark, the procession is mounting to the bell-chamber, let us follow it."

It will be gathered from this short dialogue that Simon, in order to shield his head from the consequences of the murder, had invented a story which, in the absence of all contradictory evidence, was freely accepted by the community. He had accused Gabriel of attempting to kill him, and then fleeing for his life.

The two monks having ascended the narrow and tortuous stairs for "twelve turns," found themselves in the bell chamber, under the five great bells furnished by the founder. Before them was the abbot, in full holiday pomp; around him the monks who were to participate in the ceremony. In a corner retired from observation, crouched Simon, shielding his eyes with his hands, and evidently shunning the conspicuous position to which his services on that day entitled him.

"Let us hear our bells ring glory to the Lord," exclaimed the abbot.

Two lay-brothers obeyed the injunction by stepping forward and catching the ropes suspended from the tongues of the bells. Nevertheless, although the ringers pulled "with might and main," the bells, to the astonishment of all present, would emit no sound.

"Mystery!" cried the abbot. "Simon man, dost thou see—if thou canst not hear? Thy bells are not even as melodious as a tinkling brass or a sounding cymbal. Hath thy cunning, then, forsaken thee?"

Alarmed by the mild reproaches of the abbot, Simon came forward, and catching a rope in either hand, pulled them with a force which showed how deeply he appreciated his credit with those around. The bells sounded. "Hark!" cried the abbot, "the bronze speaks good Latin;" and, as he spoke, the whole peal rang out in silvery syllables those words:

"Miserere, miserere,
Toll, toll, toll, toll,
Let us ring a solemn peal
For the dead man's soul,
Toll! toll!"

"Woe, woe, for Gabriel,
Woe, and woe again for thee.
Who didst shed his blood yestr'een?
Miserere, domine,
Toll! toll!"

As the last echoes of the bell-music died away, and whilst all eyes were turned on the founder, the abbot approached him, and, laying his hand upon his arm, asked, "Good Simon, didst thou hear what the bell said? Tell us, as thou prizest thy life hereafter, who hath shed the blood of thy son Gabriel?"

Simon bowed his head in shame, and answered, "I, holy father, I," and, turning to the assembled monks, he asked in a supplicating tone—"Alas! brothers, whom I have so long known, will not any of you pray for me?"

The monks were silent until there stepped forth from their ranks one, with air dejected and tottering footsteps, "I," he said, taking the founder's hand, "I, Simon Brennan, who have been the cause of all, as well as this great sorrow, shall pray for you," and lifting his cowl, he discovered to the bewildered founder the features of O'Brien.

"Then, God pardon me," exclaimed Simon, "as from the bottom of my heart I pardon you."

"Be ye merciful and ye shall obtain mercy," said the abbot.

"In that hope, then," exclaimed the founder, "I die," and, falling into the arms of O'Brien, he expired.

The legend goes on to say that, father and son were laid side by side in the cemetery of the abbey. Not a stone remains to mark the spot where they sleep; but the old inhabitants of the district say, that on the eve of St. Francis, spectral bells are heard tolling down the river, and between the roaring of the wind and the clamour of their music a voice is heard—"miserere, miserere!"

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER V.

RS. Spellacy hurried to admit the company. The old Palatine first entered, and was closely followed by his companion, the preacher, whose immense proportions darkened the doorway so completely as to leave little opportunity, for the moment, of observing or acknowledging the courtesy with which they were both received by the good lady.

"Peace be on this house!" said the preacher. "Woman, what have you for dinner?"

"Travellers I brought you, Mrs. Spellacy," said the poor scholar. Then apart to her, "Tell Suil Dhuv I gev do not to Miss Byrne's man."

Abie Switzer's salutation was a mute nod, and a most extraordinary contortion of the face, which, he would perhaps have been surprised to hear, was more like a grin than a smile.

"Come, come, my good woman, stir yourself a little," said the old Palatine; "get these gentlemen something to amuse themselves with as they desire—and show me to a room, where I may lie at full length for half an hour; my old bones are aching with fatigue."

The woman glanced listlessly from one to another of the speakers, while her thoughts were evidently yet wandering after those who had just departed, and whose conversation, overheard as it had been, contained matter of, to her, a far more absorbing interest. The Palatine was obliged to repeat his request for a separate chamber.

"The parlour is this way, sir," she replied, still abstractedly—"there's an old bed in it." And having placed the materials of a plain dinner on the table, in a manner so careless and absent as to draw down some very severe though silent reprehensions from her sectarian guest, with respect to her total inaptitude for her calling—she conducted Mr. Segur into the room to which she had pointed. The preacher, unwilling to leave any portion of his time unoccupied, set himself, with a very commendable industry, to complete the dinner arrangements—observing wittily, that "the beef, for country beef, was very passable"—while Abie went to look after the horses; and their thin-faced guide, whose finances obliged him to wait the summons of his superior, before he ventured to incur the expense of so unusual a luxury as a good dinner, sat by the fire, rubbing his hands, and directing, in the intervals of some snatches of merry talk, a glance of intense interest and admiration towards the board where the worthy preacher was signaling himself by a display of really extraordinary prowess—watching, as a well-regulated house-dog might be expected to do, every mouthful of provision that was sacrificed—following it with his eyes from the dish to the plate—from the plate to the fork—undergoing the stimulating application of mustard and salt—then the delicious ablution in the lake of rich gravy—and subsequently in its upward flight until it disappeared behind the ivory portcullis of the hero of the board—while the observer's own jaws opened and shut with an involuntary and sympathetic action—closing, however, like those of a Shacabac, upon a vision of unsubstantial air.

"Where's de little master?" he at length exclaimed, looking gaily about him, as the lucky thought suggested itself—"Ha, are you dere, sir? are you? High jockey! here sir," stretching out his arms to a fine, sturdy little boy, who came crowing and tottering from an inner room. "Dere he was—dere he was—de tief! Come here now,—ride a cock horse!—here—put your foot upon my toe—give me de hands—de two little fat paw de war!—dat's it! Up we go. Hoo-ee hoo-ee! heigh jockey—ho! ho-ho-ho-ho! Dat's it. Sit down here upon my knee.—Cetchee! Cetchee! Cetchee! O de 'eetle tief he was—and de 'eetle fat neck he had—and de two blue eyes, like de moder—two beautiful eyes—Creep mouse—creep mouse—O! ho-ho-ho-ho! Come, where's de song. Come, now—stop de laugh, and give us de song. Come on—sing—don't be afered o' de gentleman—open de 'ittle mouth and sing—

"My father died, I don't know how;
He left me sixpence just to guide de plough.
Wit my whim wham whaddle, O!
Jack straw straddle, O!
Pretty boy bubble, O!
Under de broom."

Mr. Shine here found sufficient time, while occupied in transferring the fourth reinforcement of cold roast mutton from the dish to his plate, for an observation—

"The infant memory of that child," he said, "might be stocked with words of greater profit than those idle rhymes." Then, after a pause—"Some of the steeple divines think otherwise: to wit, that member of the established church, who, at a very late period, excited so great a sensation in the metropolis of the kingdom, by his strenuous opposition to the introduction of the brazen coinage, for the patent had been accorded unto the man, Wood. I allude to a man of whom you, in your station, may be ignorant—the dean, as he is entitled by those of his belief, of St. Patrick's Church—Jonathan Swift—who hath employed a portion of time which he might have turned to far better uses, in composing certain ridiculous verses for the service of the nursery—replete with nothing salutary or instructive." By this time the doctor had replenished the plate which was before him; but, unwilling to relinquish the subject upon which he had launched—he continued speaking, interrupting himself at each of the breaks, thus.....which follow, in his speech, for the purpose of administering yet further consolation to the interior—"nothing salutary or instructive—but formed altogether of a certain absurd and nonsensical combination of unmeaning terms—to wit:

'Here we go up, up, up
And here we go down—down—downy—
Here we go backward and forward—
And..... heigh for Dublin towny—' and the like. And this.....—this is the man.....who has all 'Dublin towny'—to use his own.....ridiculous phrase, congregated in his.....track, with shouts and applauses which they would not accord to Swedenborg himself, if he sojourned amongst them—"

"Gendoutha!" interposed the apparently edified and admiring guide—

"For my..... for my part—I am of opinion, that.....my lord Carteret, with all his worldly civility, will make the dean repent his brazen interference in.....so unclerical an affair. For I am convinced by the report of Isaac Newton, though he differ from me on many points of faith, as one by his office in the mint necessarily skilled in all varieties of metal coins and medals—that the man Wood hath worthily approved his trust."

"O, dere is no doubt o' dat," said the guide, tossing his head in the manner of one who speaks of a thing assured—then resting his head on the soft neck of the child, and turning his eyes downwards towards the fire, he hummed, in a very low murmuring key, the following words of a ballad then popular in a certain part of Ireland—and which, in all probability, some of my readers may recognise:—

"Come hidder and try,
I'll teach you to buy
A pot o' good ale for a farden—
Come—treepince a score,
I ask you no more,
And a fig for de Draper and Harding!"

Mr. Shine's eyes first dilated in astonishment, and then contracted with as much of darkening scrutiny as the fleshy protuberances around them could be made to assume, upon his humble companion. It may be useful to say, that the preacher's opinions of Wood's celebrated brass coinage—a subject of which he knew no more than it was impossible for any but a deaf man to avoid learning—were entirely modelled from his religious influences—and he needed no more than the whispered report which had reached him of the name of the real author of the "Draper's Letters"—to decide his judgment at once, and array all the little argument he possessed on the opposite side of the question. Few opportunities, however, were afforded of achieving anything like a triumph for his graciously assumed opinions in his converse with the city people, every one of whom was as familiar with every possible hue and form of the subject as with the faces of his family. It was something like a gratification to him, therefore, to light upon even this poor youth, whom he easily calculated on impressing with what opinion he pleased, and from whom, in this wild region, he did not certainly expect to meet with his gentle sneer—indicating at once a superior acquaintance with the subject, and a settled conviction in the other way.

The lad did not appear to observe the effect which he had produced on the mind of the preacher, but recommenced his noisy play with the lively child, whom he still held on his knee—intermingling the "combination of unmeaning and ridiculous terms" with sundry sly hints, which would have succeeded even with the phlegmatic doctor, if they had been addressed to him at a less interesting moment:—

"Look at de gentleman—now—do—what is dat? who is dat dere? What's dat? what do you say? O you tief! He's aten all de beef and de mutton intirely, is he? O, have manners, master! O fie, sir! Av he ates de mutton, he has de money to pay for it, and dat's what he got be his learnen'—be his minden his, A, b, ab—an' his e, b, eb,—an' his b, a, ba—and his b, e, be—and every whole tote dat way. And do you mind 'em sir, an' you'll be like him, haven' money to spend for what you like best, and enoof o' dat to lave for the smart boy dat would be showen' you over de wild mountain in a evenin', and would be hungry for his dinner may be, and not haven' de price of it in his pocket—so he wouldn't—"

Although no impression was yet produced by these manoeuvres, which could be discerned on the equable and distended countenance of the preacher, it is impossible to say with what success they might have been ultimately attended, had not a new and most startling interruption cut short the design of the operator. A scream—wild, piercing, and spirit-riving—such as might be imagined of the possessed, whose heart was torn by the departing fiend at the command of Him whom "they knew,"—one long-continued and shrilly note of sudden agony rung through the house, and trans-fixed the hearing of its inmates. The young man quickly put down the child, and started to his feet. Even the fat Shine followed the example, and sprung—no—clambered to a standing posture—his eyes staring and protruded—and his fair rosy hue changed to a purple-pale—one hand grasping the back of the hay-bottomed chair, and the other elevating a fork, on the points of which the untasted particle of roast meat remained impaled. The sound which occasioned their alarm proceeded from the chamber into which the landlady and Mr. Segur had retired.

Suddenly, and with the rapidity of thought, the figure of the woman was seen darting through the still open door. She cast one swift and shuddering glance behind her, again darted forward—struck her bosom with a maniac violence—looked wildly around her, like one in search of some place of swift concealment—gaped on the two astonished guests—on the child—pressed her expanded hand on her brow—on her heart—sighed heavily and repeatedly—tossed back her hair from about her face—then clasped her hands together—wrung them above her head—and with a renewed scream of anguish if possible more harrowing than the last, dashed herself headlong against the closed door of the bed-room on the opposite side. It yielded, with a crash of wrenched and frittered latches, to the wild assault, and she disappeared in the darkness.

For a few moments all again was perfect stillness. The preacher and his companion remained staring on one another in all the helplessness of astonishment and ignorance, and the child gazed in anxious silence from one to another, until at length, unable to account in any way for this unusual conduct in its mother, the little creature set up a passionate clamour of tears and lamentations, which in a little time recalled them to their senses. Both turned their eyes on Segur, who now made his appearance at the door of the parlour, with a countenance of still more vivid alarm and astonishment than they seemed themselves to feel; as if expecting from him some explanation of the mystery which perplexed them.

Nothing, however, was revealed in the series of enquiries which ensued. The old man was as ignorant of the cause of the poor woman's agitation as those who were in the outer room. He had flung himself on the bed, after shortly conversing with her on some indifferent subject, in the course of which she had evinced a great deal of listlessness and inattention. Wearied as he had been, he was in the act of dozing before she left him, and while she was yet occupied, as he believed, in some arrangement at the other end of the room, when that piercing cry, the effect of which on his hearing he could compare to nothing less than the passing of a small sword through his brain, startled him from his slumber. As he sprang from his bed and gazed around him, he beheld the woman in the act of flitting through the doorway, with the same frantic action which had amazed the guests in the outer chamber. And this was all the information which he could give them on the subject.

"An apparishun she seen, I'll go bail," said the guide.

"Truce with your levity, fellow," said the Palatine, with a sternness which at once banished the smile from the other's countenance, and drew forth an humble apology. Then, turning toward the still open door of the bed room, he continued—"I am unwilling to let the affair rest here. The good woman may do herself a mischief."

"O don't, sir—don't—for the bare life!" said the lad, in a loud and earnest whisper, as he saw Segur moving toward the bedroom. "I know the place and her ways better, and I'll see after her myself."

He was prevented by the re-entrance of the woman. She stood a moment at the door, gazed firmly, with an expression of devouring inquiry, successively on each of the travellers, and then, in silence, and, with the unconscious loftiness of carriage into which the humblest and gentlest natures may be struck by the application of some powerful excitation, she put her extended hand against the breast of the youth, removed him from her way, and walked forward slowly, and with a steadiness, in which only their observation of her movements during the previous scene could enable the beholders to distinguish the calmness of high-wrought passion, governed and restrained by its own energy, from the repose of a spirit perfectly at peace.

"I ask your pardon for disturbing you, sir," she said to Segur, "and I would not have done so if I could have helped it, but this youth"—laying her hand on the shoulder of the poor scholar, while she continued gazing on Segur—"this youth knows my infirmity. Will you sleep again? The footsteps of a mouse shall not disturb you. Sleep, and I will sit on the threshold of your door myself, and watch every stir and motion about the house till you wake."

"I thank you very much," said the old man, a little touched by the earnestness of her apology, "but there is no occasion for so much care. I am used to hard beds and rough usage enough, so that I can promise myself a very sound sleep if I were sure of hearing no more such music as that."

"They shall tear my heart out before you hear a murmur," said the poor woman. "Do—take your rest—sleep—and see this—see!" plucking a huge cloak from the back of Mr. Shine, dragging it impatiently through the hands of the latter, without seeming to bestow a thought on him as he made a slight effort to retain his property—"See! I will spread this over you when you lie down, and I'll draw the little dimity curtain between you and the window, to keep the light from your eyes—and I'll watch by your bed-side if you wish, and I'll not cry out again if my heart was on fire."

"Nay, nay, my good woman, you are perfectly welcome to act as you please, if you should be used so hardly as that; but give Mr. Shine his coat again, for I don't want it."

"Let him stand in his fat garment of flesh," said the woman, with a tone of bitter contempt; "let him sit there in the midst of his own mountain of gross substance, built on his bones out of lean fools. The raw wind that pierces the marrow of the old man might bluster and chafe upon that heated lump of earth without doing any more harm than warming and quickening the red currents within it, while yours were frozen and driven back upon your old heart."

"I desire, woman," said Segur, greatly offended, "that you will do as you are directed; and it would become you, unfortunate creature, to obtain the forgiveness of that worthy man for the profane insolence of which you have been guilty."

In the instant, and before the last word had passed the lip of the speaker, the cloak was replaced on the shoulder of the bewildered Shine, while the woman, with a trembling and officious eagerness, fastened it about his neck, clasped her hands, and, sinking at his feet, solicited his pardon with so rapid and affecting a change of tone and manner, and such a repentant vehemence of action, that the great cheeks of the doctor (who, like most fat men, had his proportion of good nature) shook with emotion, and his eyes glistened with moisture as he was about to pat her on the head with a word of encouragement and forgiveness. The intention, however, was as much as the penitent seemed to require, for she instantly sprang to her feet again, turned her back on the doctor, as if no such person were in existence, and, laying her hand on the arm of the old man, hurried him into the parlour.

The preacher turned round, while his eyes were still directed in amazement towards the parlour, to the thin-faced lad. He found the latter, however, had been much more profitably occupied than in attending to the preceding scene. He had slipped quietly into the preacher's chair, and busied himself with the utmost eagerness in completing the task which the other had left unfinished.

"Eat, friend," said the preacher, after pausing and staring on the lad for a few moments, "eat and be filled. Let no respect of persons abash or trouble you in the performance of a needful duty."

There was little occasion for the advice. The lad did not even suspend his operations to say a word of acknowledgment, but merely nodded, steadily returned the stare of the honest divine, and made a kind of soldier-like salute with the knife, as he was about to plunge it once more into the nut-brown surface of the roti, in the side of which he had speedily effected an excavation that attracted the admiration even of Shine himself.

Both remained gazing on one another in silence for a few minutes, when a third mute made his appearance on the scene. Mr. Shine's attention was first attracted to him by the action of the young guide. The latter suddenly suspended his operations at the board, started from his seat, looked full on the stranger, nodded his head towards Shine, slapped his pocket, tossed his hands high above his head, and darted by the man towards the back door, the same by which Kumba and Spellacy had departed, and by which this newcomer and Spellacy had entered. As he stood on the threshold, half out, half in, he said, in jeering tone:

"Well! you'll not part the 'gits'?"

"Aih?"

"Aih, yourself! Won't you part the ingits?"

"Och!—Noa!"

The door was instantly slapped to by the departing guide, with a burst of contemptuous laughter.

Shine now gazed on the stranger. He was an exceedingly tall, awkwardly-constructed fellow—presenting, as he stood bolt-upright near the door, returning Shine's open stare with an air of perfectly stupid sheepishness, his long gaunt arms hanging before him, and his bony, coarse, and huge-knuckled fingers employed in beating time upon the front of a patched and glossy pair of corduroy "smallclothes"—presenting, we say, a picture of helpless and anxious stupidity, which perhaps could not approach a shade nearer to the verge of positive idiocy than it did; and which, by the very lingering hue of reason which formed the distinction, was more striking and pitiable in its effect than the absolute consummation of imbecility would have been.

"Who was that left us, friend?" said Mr. Shine, after having perfectly satisfied his curiosity by a perusal of the strange figure and features of the vision that was thus unexpectedly conjured up before him. "Do you know that youth?"

"Is it Awney Farrel, you mane? To be sure I do. H's a kind o' sarvint and commerade o' mine." And, peering on the preacher through his beetling eyebrows with that air of low cunning which becomes the countenance of a fool as gracefully as rouge would the cheek of a corpse, he sauntered in a shambling, awkward gait toward the chimney corner, where he took his seat on the hob, spread his great skeleton hands before the blaze, and clattered them together occasionally, in the vain effort to bring back the blood into their rigid and obstructed channels.

Presently, the preacher being still occupied in a wondering perusal of the person and action of the stranger, he drew from the breast of his gray frieze coat a small piece of yellow shining metal, which the active mind of the former, assisted by many wavering recollections of the regal evidences frequently discovered in the wildest bogs and quarries of the country of its former wealth and splendour, instantly stamped with the authority of gold. He was not induced to change his opinion by what followed.

"I'm a poor man," said the stranger, "and in want o' mains to carry me to my own people, down near Dublin; an' I'm told I have more than the worth o' my expenses in this. I think it's nothing but brass, but more tells me it's rill gold. May be you'd look at it, sir?"

Shine examined the metal, and satisfied himself, to his great astonishment, that it was an ingot of pure gold.

"It's brass, is't it, sir?" repeated the stranger, who had been anxiously glancing from the ingot to the preacher's eyes, while the latter was estimating the value of the metal.

"What is your name, friend?" asked Shine, eluding the query.

"My name?" echoed the man, distrustfully—"Oh, what has that to say to the ingot?"

"Why are you unwilling to tell me?"

"If I thought," said the stranger, pausing for some time in a mood of stolid deliberation—"that I'd be safe to tell you—and, indeed, by the looks o' you, I think I would."

"You may depend upon me," said his companion.

"May I? Oh, well sure that's enough to satisfy anybody. My name is Mac O'Neill, An' if I thought it safe—but sure you say it is—I'd tell you where a great deal more o' the same kind might be had."

The person accosted felt, at the same time, a deep emotion of pity for the simplicity of the owner of the treasure, and a strong temptation to render him an object of still greater compassion, by making his own use of the intelligence he should convey. He encouraged him, therefore, to proceed, and Maney Mac O'Neil, after sundry misgivings, ventured to make the confidence he asked.

"There's some years since I was a 'prentice wid a mason by trade, —and one time at Easter, when my master left myself an' anoder 'prentice, to make a pair o' piers for a gate there, just hard by the ould buildings, an went somewhere else wid himself—I was sarchen among the ould ruins, to see would I get some good stones for the piers, when I seen one place just about the big of a door, an it filled up with the sort o' stones I wanted, so to work I went, striven to get 'em out, an' taken 'em along 'id me to my commerade; but before I got passen the half o' them out, what should I see only steps in before me, an' they goen down like stairs! Well an' good, af I did, I went in to see what sort of a place was it that was there, an' where should the steps be after carrying me to, but into the mildde of a dark room (I b'lieve it's a vault you call it, where the gentlemen puts their friends when they die)—and what should I find there, but a great parcel of chests, or coffins, as I thought they were at first, which they wor not, being made of iron, as I found out when I struck my crow again 'em. Well, when I found that, I went out an' stopt up the hole again, 'for fear any one would find it out upon me,' says I to myself, 'until I come to-night, and know more about it.' Well an' good, when it was dark, I came back myself, an' my commerade along id me, and we went into the same place wid a candle and a dark lantern, an' we broke the chests wid the crowbar, and what should we find in them (that's in one of 'em), but little bars like this I showed you, piled a top o' one another, a yard high—an' I declare it I think it's goold, eh? though I wouldn't give into it before strangers. There was another o' the chests full o' candlesticks—and more of 'em wid crosses, an' cups, an' rings, an' fine shinen stones, so we took 'em all out o' that, an' buried 'em in another place, in dread the landlord, if he come to hear of it, would come on us wid the royalty o' the place, an' take every whole tote to himself. So you won't tell anybody—only af you had a friend, that would give us a little monies we'd give him a bargain—for I'm afeard to speak to the goldsmiths in Dublin or any where, in dread he'd challenge us openly wid 'em, an' maybe all we'd get for 'em is nothing, an' to go to jail besides."

"Are you willing, then, to part with this bar which I hold in my hand?" said Shine, after some hesitation, during which he began to jingle a few old pistoles (a coin then current among others in the country) in the flapped pocket of his waistcoat—the remnant of his dividend from a late field collection.

"O, af I got anything for it that would be worth mentioning—or as much as would carry me to—"

The speaker interrupted himself in the midst of the sentence, to gaze with dilated and wondering eyes on the expanded hand of Shine, which exposed three shining pieces—at the same time that the ingot was elevated in the other in a manner which seemed to propose a choice between both to him who owned the latter. The other, fool as he was, understood the action, but appeared to dislike the bargain, for he snatched his ingot, and thrust it into his breast—shutting his eyes—and waving his head in token of refusal. Shine placed another piece in his hand—Maney again produced an ingot, and tossed it to the preacher, while he gathered with his long, knobbed fingers, the four pieces from the fat hand in which they were placed.

"It's brass, though, mind, It would ruin me av you said otherwise—an' sure 'twouldn't be the case neither."

Shine laughed, although a slight qualm troubled his conscience when he considered the great difference between the value of the article and the price which the fool had consented to take for it.

"I'll see you another time, an' I'll tell you all about the ould Abbey an uvery thing!" said Maney, as he turned to depart.

"You say you have more of these, friend Maney?" said Shine. The fool nodded an assent. "You'll find me liberal," concluded the preacher.

Shine did not at all like the expression of Maney's eyes when he said this. There was an ugly light about them which made the preacher's heart sink within him. Before he had time to digest the half-awakened inquietude, however, the back-door again opened, and Spellacy entered alone.

He took off his hat and bowed to the doctor—spoke to Maney as to one well known to him—and bade him go relieve Switzer from the care of the horses—adding something in a whisper, which did not reach the preacher's ears. Maney departed, laying his finger on his lips, in token of secrecy, as he looked at the preacher. Spellacy went into the inner room, and Shine remained in the chimney-corner, his heart fluctuating between compunction for the knavery he had been guilty of, gratification at his gain, and alarm at the recollection of Maney's parting glance; though an indifferent person could see no further inference to be deduced from it than a testimony of the great feebleness of conscious wrong, which it was in the power of natural stupidity to abash so easily.

A DAISY TYPE.

WHEN Amy died, the daisy she held,
In the tender clasp of her fingers,
Was blanched as the cloudy light that round
The star of the morning lingers.

When Amy slept in the holy kirk,
Where the fronds of the yew tree blossom,
The daisies rose from her virgin mould,
And flourished above her bosom.

So the flower was a type of our double life,
Our hearts to the earth are given
That our souls may rise from its dusty coil,
And blossom in endless Heaven.

A CHAPTER IN DISCOVERY

THE simplest facts of ordinary and familiar knowledge are the growth of ages of scientific labour and close research. Through a thousand errors the truth has made its way in the human mind, and now occupies the pathway of all our steps towards art, towards philosophy, towards instruction. In the old time men groped in their ignorance in the direction of natural truths and accurate knowledge, and just as often went wrong as they went right. They pursued theory rather than investigated phenomena. Now, all this is changed. Theory has no influence in the guidance of the human mind in matters which are deducible from facts. The efforts of discovery have not only facilitated the progress of knowledge on particular points, but they have given it method to facilitate it upon all possible subjects. It may be a question worthy philosophic examination, how much inaccuracy in quickness of perception, and in manner of evolution in modern discovery the human mind owes to the success of previous efforts of discovery, in branches of knowledge apparently remote from the tracks in which they pass to-day? We do not as yet know how much the mechanical arts have derived from the solution of purely scientific problems; but we do know, that the addition to any of the facts in any department of human knowledge has been an addition to the facts of all, and has made the evolution of the undiscovered easier, by narrowing the circle which it comprehends.

The most interesting chapter in the history of merely human knowledge will be written in that which records the history of our progress, from the unknown and mysterious, to the known and familiar. It will be the most instructive, for it will reveal the foundations of the wondrous structure of actual science as they grew in the labour of the great genius, which contributed layer by layer to their erection. In comparing their development with their present proportions, we will find how much we owe to the souls of the great toilers who first inducted the labour of making us wise, and who have left us an imperishable legacy of profit in the result of their lives. Perhaps no subject could more aptly illustrate this view than that which has been the basis of the present condition of the most useful of modern sciences to humanity. The discovery of the circulation of the blood by Harvey, gave the first impulse to medical knowledge; which made it effective as a boon and blessing to mankind, and the progress of the human mind towards truth, by slow and toilsome steps, is nowhere better exemplified.

We know now that the blood is the great source of preservation of the animal organism. It supplies the muscles with the particles of corporal matter which are necessary to the wear and tear of everyday existence. It performs the same office for each other of the parts of which the frame is composed. The bones, the nerves, the brain, the skin, the eyes, the nails, the hair, all receive their constituent substance from the blood, which has the supply for all. The manner by which it is conveyed to those parts is the phenomenon of the circulation. First, it is traced in the heart, which is divided into four chambers, two on the right side, and two on the left. The chambers on each side are situated one above the other. The two superior chambers are termed right and left auricles, the two inferior chambers are termed right and left ventricles. The right auricle opens downwards into the right ventricle, the left auricle opens downwards into the left ventricle. The blood having returned, by all the veins, which open by two great tubes into the right auricle of the heart, descends into the right ventricle, which, as it grows full, floats a valve which closes the passage of any more blood into the ventricle, until that which it contains is ejected by a tube which opens from the right ventricle into the lungs, and there subdivides into innumerable minute branches lying under a thin tissue permeable to air. Here, being supplied with oxygen, the blood becomes a bright red in colour, and passes into another set of vessels, by which it is conveyed to the left auricle, from whence it is propelled into the left ventricle, and thence it is thrown into the arteries, which carry it through all their subdivisions until their branches become invisible to the naked eye, so minute are they. Having traced it into those very small vessels, it passes into others still smaller, and is found in what are termed the capillary vessels, which unite with the minute divisions of the veins, wherein the blood is poured to proceed to the right side of the heart again, and undergo the same process as before. From this it may be understood that arteries bring the blood from the heart, and by the veins it returns to the heart, which is the great fact of the circulation.

Seventeen centuries elapsed in the study of the animal economy until this fact was discovered. The arteries being always found empty after death and the veins being always filled with blood, it was believed that the veins alone carried the blood, and the arteries carried air only, which Galen, the father of medicine, stated to be for the purpose of cooling the blood. Besides this error, there was another taught by the Greek physician which was, that the two divisions, right and left, of the heart communicated through holes in the intervening partition. After Galen, up to the time of the Italian anatomist Vesalius, every one with any pretensions to knowledge of the animal construction, saw those openings of communication. Bereyer de Carpi indeed naively acknowledged that it was certainly very difficult to discern them, but with care they could be made out. Vesalius denied their existence at all, and after his demonstration they were no more believed to exist. However, this gave no elucidation to the manner of the circulation. Michael Servetus wrote a book on theology, in which, before the time of Harvey, he put down the following remarkable words, referring to the heart sending the blood into the lungs: "where it is agitated, prepared, changes colour, and is poured from the pulmonary artery into the pulmonary vein." From this it has been stated that Michael Servetus discovered the circulation of the blood even before the time of Harvey. However, this passage leaves serious doubts even as to whether he knew the shorter circulation which takes place in the course of the blood through the lungs. At all events, by command of John Calvin, he was burned for the theological views contained in the very book upon which his fame as an anatomical discoverer alone must rest.

For many years after the burning of Servetus there was no approach towards the development of the subject which it was said he had discovered, until the days of Realdo Colombo, who gave publication to somewhat similar views to those held by Servetus. However this may be, those views were by no means full or founded upon facts. Cesalpinus, the great botanist, is certainly the first who made use of the term "circulation of the blood," and before his time no one imagined that the veins carried blood to the tissues. He demonstrated it by the analogy of the circulation of the sap in plants. Prior to his observations it was believed that the veins had origin in the liver, as the arteries arose in the heart. Cesalpinus observed, that if a vein be tied it will swell, not between the heart and the ligature, but between the ligature and the end of the extremity. From this fact he reasoned that the blood is brought from the extremities to the heart, and thus made the nearest approach to the discovery up to his time. Still, the great fact of the circulation by the arteries, and its course into the veins, remained to be discovered. Not only that, but even the manner of the circulation between the heart and lungs, and then between the lungs and heart again, was entirely unknown. In 1574 Fabricius Acquapendente first discovered that veins had valves opening upwards, or towards the heart only, and thus perfectly demonstrated that blood could only flow towards it, and by no means flow from it through them. This was the final proof required for the course taken by the blood in the veins, but the old delusion prevailed that air only circulated in the arteries.

In forty-five years after this Harvey made the discovery of the general circulation, and in nine years afterwards taught it publicly. This was about 1628. The assertions of Harvey were instantly and ferociously attacked, and the whole of the scientific men of Europe scouted his doctrine. Not daunted by this opposition, Harvey taught his theory publicly, and, more than that, demonstrated it clearly. Crowds gathered to his school and became convinced. Factious opposition still continued, but Harvey had truth with him, and he beheld his own ideas spread until at last they were everywhere accepted, and he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had, beyond all doubt, made the greatest discovery in anatomy up to that time. Still, there were facts relating to the circulation which Harvey could not demonstrate. He traced the arteries to their most minute branch; he followed the veins from their most tiny development, but he was entirely ignorant of the vessels which, lying between, connected both, bringing the blood from the arteries to the veins, and which are now known by the name of capillaries. This was another step of science, left for future demonstration and discovery, and it was effected at last, when the use of the microscope aided the anatomist. Malpighi added this to the work of those who had gone before him, and perfected the labour of Harvey by proving from indubitable facts and certain evidence, that for which the great anatomist had to rely upon the force of analogy.

In this way was made the discovery of the circulation of the blood. By such slow and hesitating steps did human science approach a great fact, co-existent and capable of demonstration from the hour of the origin of man himself. Thousands of years had passed over the world ere man, with all his pride of knowledge, grasped the evidence which God had laid before his darkened vision, and nearly two of the thousands of centuries went by from the first moment human intellect sought its revelation until it stood in the full radiance of its consciousness, enlightened and intelligent! Could there be a greater lesson taught for the reproof of our vanity of science and our arrogance of reason than this one, learned from the records of anatomy?

MADAME DE GENLIS.

"Being a woman, I will not be slack,
To play my part in fortune's pageant."

SHAKESPEARE.

ELICITE STEPHANA DUIREST DE SAINT AUBIN was born in the year 1746, near Autun, in the department of Saone et Loire, France. Though without fortune, she was distinguished on her entrance into life for her personal attractions, joined to a singular talent for music, and she soon gained introductions to several families of rank, though rather in quality of an artist than as a young lady of condition. Her situation afforded her the means of observing society before fortune enabled her to fill that rank in fashionable life to which her acquirements so justly entitled her; thus, a perfect knowledge of the forms and etiquettes of the upper classes is discernible even in her earliest productions. Her accomplishments and personal graces soon attracted the notice of several exalted individuals; but, as it frequently happens, chance was the disposer of her hand. The Count de Genlis, afterwards Marquis de Sillery, though he had never seen her, being struck with the style of a letter which accidentally fell in his way, conceived so high a sentiment of admiration for the writer, that he immediately made her an offer of marriage, and Mademoiselle de Saint Aubin became the Countess de Genlis before she had completed her fifteenth year.

Whilst her superior talent commanded the admiration of the distinguished circles in which she moved, her ardent love of study induced her to shun the court and the frivolous society connected with it, and to devote herself wholly to the cultivation of science and the arts. She was too well aware of the advantages of a cultivated understanding to neglect the education of her children. At an age when most young women of fashion think only of shining in the world, Madame de Genlis retired to the convent of Bellechasse, and devoted herself entirely to the education of her two daughters. In the year 1775, the eldest, who was then scarcely fourteen years of age, was united to the Count de Valence, but, shortly after her marriage, the young lady was attacked with a dangerous fit of illness. Madame de Genlis was thus plunged into the deepest distress and anxiety of mind, joined to the fatigue occasioned by affectionate attendance on her child, produced a change in her health, the effects of which she experienced long after her daughter's convalescence. As she suffered considerably from a pulmonary affection, her physicians prescribed the use of the Bristol waters; and, having consigned her eldest daughter to the care of her mother-in-law, she departed for England, accompanied by her second daughter, Natalie, who was then in her thirteenth year. During her residence at Bristol Madame de Genlis adopted her interesting protégée "Pamela," of whom frequent mention is made in her writings, and who was afterwards married to Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

On her return from her first visit to England, the Duke d'Orleans, then Duke de Chartres, eagerly embraced the opportunity of placing his children under the superintendence of the accomplished and beautiful Countess de Genlis. During her retirement in the convent of Bellechasse she had written several moral and entertaining dramatic pieces, which her children performed successfully in the presence of the Duchess de Chartres. She published the three first volumes of her plays in 1779, and the three last volumes appeared in January, 1780. Among the most esteemed of these little dramas we may mention "La Bonne Mere," "La Marchande de Mode," and "La Colombe." The latter contains images worthy the graceful touch of a Guido, or an Albano. Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, after having perused it, addressed the following letter to the authoress, which has been quoted as highly complimentary, but which is, nevertheless, somewhat hyperbolic:—

"I am no longer a lover of nature, I leave her for you, madame, who have done more, and are worthy of higher admiration. Nature only forms bodies, but you create souls. Were mine of your happy creation I should possess the powers of pleasing, which I now want, and you would be pleased with my infidelity. Pardon, madame, this moment of transport and love. I will now speak reasonably. Your charming 'Theatre' has afforded me as much pleasure as though I were of the age to which it is dedicated. Old and young, high and low, all must study those delightful pictures in which the virtues acquired by education triumph over vice and folly. Every line bears the stamp of your heavenly mind. It appears in every scene under a different emblem, and clothed in the purest morality. Your pen is guided by a perfect knowledge of human nature, by all the charms of wit and the graces of style; and, though you have not spoken of God, yet you nevertheless make me believe in angels. You are one whom heaven has most highly endowed. In that quality, I beg you will receive my adoration; and no mortal can offer it with more sincerity."

In the same year (1780) Madame de Genlis quitted the convent of Bellechasse, and retired to a charming country house at Berey, accompanied by Mademoiselles d'Orleans and de Chartres, where she continued her literary labours with the greatest success.

Notwithstanding her numerous literary occupations and the important functions of a duty of which she acquitted herself with the most scrupulous fidelity, Madame de Genlis neglected no opportunity of serving those who stood in need of her assistance. She rescued from indigence the two grand-nephews of Racine, and procured for them a pension from the Duke d'Orleans; and the Marquis de Ducrest, her brother, having had the misfortune to lose his wife in the year 1781, she undertook the education of his son, who was then only five years of age. This is the young man whose premature death she laments in her preface to the "Tales of the Castle."

Such were the occupations of Madame de Genlis until the commencement of a revolution, the horrors of which plunged her country in ruin, and which spread its evils to the remotest corner of the civilized world. Forseeing the misfortunes that awaited France, as soon as the States General were convoked, in 1789, Madame de Genlis anxiously wished to retire with her pupils to Nice. This step met with the approval of her family; but she subsequently abandoned the design on consideration that her departure might weaken the credit of the house of Orleans, and she was too fondly attached to her pupils to be induced to separate from them on any consideration of personal safety or advantage.

Meanwhile, it was proposed that she should proceed to England; but, from time to time, various causes occasioned the journey to be postponed. At length, it was fixed in the year 1790, but on the eve of her departure, M. de Valence, her son-in-law, brought her the unexpected intelligence that the Duke of Orleans had himself set out for England during the night. Thus, Madame de Genlis was once more compelled to renounce the design, for the departure of the father would, undoubtedly, have occasioned the arrest of the children, had they attempted to quit France at that time.

The duke was absent nearly a year. A few months after his return, Madame de Genlis resigned the situation of governess to his children, and made a tour through several of the French provinces which she had not before visited. She soon, however, received letters informing her that Mademoiselle d'Orleans was dangerously ill, and entreated that she would return to Paris without loss of time. Madame de Genlis yielded to her solicitations, and the state in which she found the young princess induced her to resume her situation, but on the express stipulation that she should immediately depart for England with her pupil.

She accordingly left Paris, in October, 1791, accompanied by Mademoiselle d'Orleans and two other young ladies, and soon reached England in safety. She first spent three months at Bath, and next fixed her abode at Bury St. Edmunds, where she remained nine months, at the expiration of which she visited several parts of Great Britain. During one of her excursions, in 1792, she visited the delightful cottage of Llangollen, in Wales, the residence of Lady Elinor Butler and Miss Ponsonby.

On her return to London, Madame de Genlis received a letter from the Duke of Orleans, enjoining her to return to Paris without delay, on account of the decrees issued against the emigrants by the National Convention. She had no sooner reached Paris and restored Mademoiselle d'Orleans to the care of her father than she and her pupil were placed on the list of emigrants, and received orders to quit Paris in forty-eight hours, and to retire from the French territory. She then resolved to return to England in quest of that repose which her own country denied her; but the Duke of Orleans could not be prevailed on to permit his daughter to accompany her. However, no waiting-maid could be procured to follow Mademoiselle d'Orleans in her exile, through the fear of being placed on the list of emigrants, and the duke conjured Madame de Genlis to accompany the young princess to Flanders, and to remain with her three or four weeks at Tournay, until he could engage a proper person to supply her place. Three weeks after her arrival at Tournay, Pamela, her adopted daughter, was married to Lord Edward Fitzgerald; but as the person promised by the duke had not arrived, Madame de Genlis was unable to accompany the newly-married pair as she had at first proposed.

About a month after their departure, her husband, who at the commencement of the revolution had taken the title of Marquis of Sillery, communicated to her, from Paris, the dreadful catastrophe which terminated the life of the unfortunate Louis XVI. She immediately despatched a messenger entreating him to quit France; but he declared, in answer, that he would never abandon his native country, adding, that the events to which he was then a witness augmented his indifference for an existence which the crimes of his fellow-citizens rendered odious. He accordingly remained in Paris, though he had every means of escaping; but, so far from thinking of concealment, when he learned that he was proscribed by the sanguinary Robespierre, he voluntarily surrendered himself, and shortly after perished on the scaffold. His last instructions to his unfortunate wife were, that she should retire either to Ireland or Switzerland, but a serious indisposition, by which Mademoiselle d'Orleans was seized, prevented Madame de Genlis from observing the prudent counsel of her ill-fated husband.

The princess had no attendant except Madame de Genlis and her niece. Her convalescence was extremely slow, and, at the expiration of four weeks, she experienced a relapse. In this situation Madame de Genlis could not think of leaving her. Meanwhile Flanders was united to France; General Dumouriez arrived at Tournay, and, though he had no knowledge either of Madame de Genlis or Mademoiselle d'Orleans, yet he felt interested for their unfortunate situation. To have remained at Tournay, where the Austrians were momentarily expected, would have been in the last degree imprudent; and their return to France must have exposed them to certain death. Dumouriez offered them an asylum in his camp. They followed the army, but after the defection of Dumouriez, dreading the consequences, and fearing lest they should be included in the general list of fugitives, Madame de Genlis determined to depart, without loss of time, for Mons, representing herself as an Englishwoman.

After encountering many dangers, they arrived, by cross-roads, at the Austrian posts, where they passed for two English ladies, and by that means obtained passports and an escort to conduct them to Mons. Madame de Genlis was now assailed by a new misfortune. The day after her arrival at Mons she discovered that Mademoiselle d'Orleans and her niece had both caught the measles; and, being unable immediately to procure a nurse, she was obliged to attend on them herself, day and night. However, in the midst of this disaster, she enjoyed the consolation of having saved the life of Mademoiselle d'Orleans, who would infallibly have suffered for her brother's desertion, had she fallen into the hands of the French.

The delay occasioned by the indisposition of the young ladies afforded the Austrians time to discover that they were natives of France, but they, nevertheless, experienced the most generous treatment. Through the courtesy of General Mack, they obtained passports which enabled them to proceed in safety through Germany. When they arrived at Schaffhausen, in Switzerland, they were joined by the Duke de Chartres, and then proceeded together to Zug, where they hired a house on the banks of the lake, at a short distance from the town.

Here, under assumed names, they enjoyed tranquillity but for a short time; for M. de Chartres was soon recognised by the French emigrants passing through the town. The magistrates, fearing lest they might incur the displeasure of the French government, politely urged the necessity of their seeking an asylum elsewhere. This unexpected occurrence convinced M. de Chartres that his presence must unavoidably prove fatal to his sister's safety, and he took leave of her to travel through Switzerland on foot. M. de Montesquieu generously procured Madame de Genlis and her two protégées a safe retreat at Bremgarten, where they all three passed for Irish ladies returning from Havre, compelled, by the troubled state of that country and the dangers of war, to return to their homes as soon as an opportunity occurred.

Madame de Genlis passed a year at Bremgarten in profound seclusion, devoting her whole attention to her pupil, and concealing from her the knowledge of her father's tragic death. Their days passed away in sadness, but not without occupation, until their repose was once more interrupted by the intrigues of their enemies, who at length forced them to quit Switzerland. She accordingly began to think on the means of procuring some other place of refuge for Mademoiselle d'Orleans, and ascertaining that the Princess de Conti, her pupil's aunt, was residing at Friburgh, she advised the princess to claim her protection, which was readily accorded. After this separation from her pupil, to whom she was most sincerely attached, her residence at Bremgarten became irksome to Madame de Genlis; and, having placed her niece under the protection of a respectable family in Holland, she thence proceeded alone to Altona. There she remained upwards of nine months, and having met her son-in-law, M. de Valence, at Hamburg, she went to reside with him at a village about fifteen miles from that city. There she at length enjoyed repose and resumed her literary occupations, which had been so long suspended. In the year 1800, the French government called Madame de Genlis from her retreat, and granted her permission to return to her country. She thankfully embraced the opportunity of being restored to her daughter, her grand-children, and such of her friends who still survived. She ever after until her death resided at Paris, where, having been deprived of her fortune by the events of the revolution, she principally supported herself by the honourable exertion of those talents which she successfully cultivated in happier days, when they formed merely the amusement of her leisure hours.

Such are a few of the most notable incidents in the career of Madame de Genlis, than whom no example could be better cited in illustration of womanly mental capabilities and moral self-possession.

LUCIFER MATCHES.—A recent writer on this subject gives some astonishing statistics respecting this branch of manufacture. One English firm employ 400 workmen, and generally have on hand £8,000 or £10,000 worth of timber. Each week they consume 1 ton of sulphur and make 43,000,000 matches, or 2,160,000,000 in the year. Reckoning the length of a match at 2½ inches, the total length of these would exceed the circumference of the earth. Another calculation has been made, that the whole length of wax cotton wicks consumed every year by one London manufacturer in the production of "vestas," would be sufficient to reach from England to America and back again. Two makers, alone, in Bohemia, produce the amazing number of 44,800,000 matches yearly consuming 20 tons of phosphorus and giving employment to 600 persons. The low price at which these necessities of life are produced is equally astonishing. The cheapest boxes are sold at one penny per dozen, each containing 80 matches. Some sell the plain boxes at twopence per hundred, and 1,400 matches for one farthing; whilst a third maker sells a case of 50 boxes, each containing 100 lucifers, for fourpence.

POL-A-PHUCA WATERFALL.

POL-A-PHUCA, or Poul-a-Phonka, situated near Rushborough, county of Wicklow, is a remarkable waterfall formed by the ponderous and rapid descent of the whole body of the river Liffey. The name signifies "The Devil's, or Dæmon's Hole," it being an immense whirlpool whose depth has never yet been ascertained. The water is drawn by a suction, the power of which nothing can resist, to the edge of a craggy precipice, where the rocks are divided into several distinct falls, in the manner of a stair-case. The breadth of the opening through which the water falls is but forty feet, and the height of the entire, from the upper stage beyond the bridge to the lower level, about one hundred and eighty. The quantity of water is not generally sufficient to confer grandeur on the scene, but after rainy weather it presents a noble picture; the mass of water is then considerable, and the fall of such a quantity over a declivity of this kind is a magnificent object; the roaring of the cataract may be heard at a distance of some miles. The abyss into which the water is precipitated from such a height exhibits the appearance of a frightful vortex, into which all bodies that come down the stream are attracted with astonishing force and velocity. The perpetual agitation of the water in this whirlpool, which is circular, forms an eddy which has been compared to the celebrated Maelstrom, or "Navei of the Sea," off the coast of Norway—a phenomenon which it was once supposed no vessel dare approach, lest the indraught should bury the unfortunate navigators in the abyss.

Pol-a-Phuca bridge consists of one Gothic or pointed arch, springing from rock to rock across the chasm through which the water rushes. The span of the arch is sixty-five feet, and the key-stone is one hundred and eighty feet above the level of the river; there is a natural basin beneath the arch, in which it is said an unhappy tourist once met his fate, having fallen from the rock above.

Mr. Brewer, in reference to this waterfall, says: "this cataract is unquestionably the most picturesque and pleasing of any with which we are acquainted in the county of Wicklow. The single burst of the fall at Powerscourt produces astonishment in an unusual degree, and many adjacent circumstances are truly attractive. But Pol-a-phuca does not depend on a first impression for its influence over the feelings; its charms give greater exercise to the imagination, and afford a variety of pictures, independent of the general display."

IRISH MANUFACTURES.

THE Woollen Manufacture of Ireland was very early celebrated. In the time of Edward III., in 1327, Irish friezes were freely imported into England from Dublin, duty free. Even in Italy, in the year 1357, at a time when the woollens of that country had attained a high degree of perfection, and sumptuary laws were enacted to restrain luxury in dress, Irish serges were in demand, and imported. In the year 1673, Sir W. Temple, at the request of Lord Essex, then Viceroy of Ireland, published a formal overture for relinquishing the woollen trade, except in the lower branches, that it might not interfere with that of England, urging the superior fitness of this country for the linen trade.

Immediately after the cessation of the disturbances in Ireland, in 1688, the woollen manufacture was established to a considerable extent in the Liberties of Dublin. The Coombe, Fimlino, Spitalfields, and the Weavers'-square were then built, and soon became the residence of all that was opulent and respectable in the city. What a contrast the Liberty now presents! The Silk Manufacture is generally supposed to have been introduced by the French refugees, and established in the Liberty of Dublin, shortly after their arrival in this city. In the year 1764, an act was passed, placing it under the direction of the Dublin Society. To encourage the manufacture, the Society immediately established an Irish Silk Warehouse in Parliament street, and the management of it was placed under the superintendence of persons annually returned by the corporation of weavers, to examine the quality of the goods sent in by manufacturers, to whom the Dublin Society paid a premium, or discount of five per cent. on all sales made in the house. But this source of encouragement was done away by an act of Parliament, by which the Dublin Society was prohibited from maintaining any house in which Irish silk goods were sold by wholesale or retail. From that time the Irish Silk Warehouse declined.

ARMOY ROUND TOWER.

Firm was their faith, the ancient bands,
The wise in heart, in wood and stone,
Who rear'd with stern and trusting hands
The dark grey towers of days unknown.

IN the Antrim coast, within about four miles of Ballycastle and one of Kenbane Head, stands the remains of the Round Tower of Armo. About thirty-four feet of this ancient structure is still in a tolerable good state of preservation. It differs in some respects from the three other towers to be met with in the same county, Antrim, Trummery, and Ram's Island.

The Round Towers were a prodigious puzzle to antiquarians. Quires of paper tall as a tower, have been covered with as much ink as might form a Liffey, in accounting for their origin and use. They have been assigned to the dark rites of Paganism—to the mystic arcana of Druidism—said to be temples of the fire worshippers—standings of the pillar worshippers—Christian belfries—military towers of the Danish invaders—defensive retreats for the clergy, from the sudden inroads of the ruthless Norman. But all these clever and recondite conjectures were completely overthrown, and the real nature of these Round Towers clearly explained, in a Prize Essay, presented to the Royal Irish Academy, by Dr. Petrie. Sixty-five of these extraordinary constructions have been discovered and described in Ireland. There are generally the marks of five or six stories in each tower; the doors are from thirteen to twenty feet from the ground, and so low, that none can enter except by stooping.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XIII.

"OU'RE very fond of tea; have another cup; here's a capital brew." Mr. John Ashby was a dull man. Mr. Namby had laid it down as a rule that no man can understand how any friend should be in love with his sister. Mr. Faversham was not talkative over the breakfast-table at any time, but on the morrow of his visit to Jamaica Lodge he was even less inclined than usual to have what Mr. Jack called "a jaw."

"Now, pray, don't be as clever as you can, Jack, Namby is bad enough; but Namby and water is unendurable. Besides, I want to read."

Mr. Jack had a great respect for Mr. Faversham, and was not inclined to laugh when this splendid individual put on a magnificent doctor's robe, tapped his clouded brow, and appeared to be tortured by speculations too deep for words. The advantages of a reputation, which has been won by hard fighting, are full of honest, fascinating enjoyment. The table-land at the top of the mountain is fresh, the fresher and more delectable when from its even brightness the climber looks down the mountain side, because his eye can follow the dangerous points of the winding path by which he has ascended. An intellectual Alpine club would be a gathering of very merry gentlemen; indeed, have we not such clubs, and among the wisest and wittiest London, Dublin, or Edinburgh can boast? The profoundest doctors have here met as British lions, with a great lion's head above the chairman's seat, singing and disporting themselves like undergraduates. The naturalist has laid aside his fossil bones, and given his "lip full of song," the comic words by himself. No merrier company than another club I have in my mind, where every member has a banner of some kind behind his chair. Here have I heard a certain happy song sung about the Rev. Dr. Blank, by a voice thousands would give their ears to hear; and here, again, have been heard how

"That very wise head, old Æsop, said,
The bow must be sometimes loose."

From the long, anxious hours in the laboratory; from the desk, over which the midnight oil has burned lighting on an aching head; from the easel, with six hundred guineas' worth of art upon it; from the unfinished marble that seemed to warm into life under the chisel of a great and generous hand; from sick beds, or wealthy museums, from the judgment-seat, doffing the coif or the doctor's cap, enter, to range about a comfortable table, a troop of gallant boys, aye, Mr. Secretary, genial and apt for any wise fun that may be in store. Bold-fronted twenty-five is permitted a passage of arms with a prince of science. Have at it, youngster; the professor is no higher placed than you are to-night. These loosenings of the bow owe their charm to the fact that the bow has been tightly strung, and has done great things. They are as unlike the coarse and tame jovialities of habitual, and aimless, and empty-pated roysterers as wit is unlike buffoonery. There is a dangerous medium between the two extremes, in which hundreds of cultivated students are lost. When the young spirits of men, who have the power lying in them that might make their memory sweet to far-off generations, carry them prematurely from the study to the club, there is danger in the charms of social intercourse. Hours are given to the laugh and song that belong to duty. Holidays that have not been earned are taken. Mornings of repentance spoil even the little work that might be still done. The mind loses its moral force; the brain its strength. It was against this tendency that Mr. Faversham was battling. He had resolved to be of some account in the history of his time. He would win and wear the crown. He! Alas! how many men have made the resolve; spent long hours over the plan of the fight; wearied themselves over the disposition of the ground; and, then, have not shown when the field might have been theirs.

It was natural that, on the morrow of his visit to Jamaica Lodge, Mr. Faversham should feel that he had given no hostages to Fortune. He had had a fair education; he had parts; he had a good position; and his father had strong friends. The profession in which he was embarked was an honourable one, and had great prizes in it. The parental advice he had received was sound. He had been assured that, without study, the more brilliant capacity would avail little. He had held to a hope that he might achieve literary distinction; and that, by this distinction, he might override the barriers which lie between the man who is eating his terms and the Q.C. in highly lucrative practice. Great names had dazzled him. On the morrow of his visit to Jamaica Lodge he understood how he had been dazzled. There was something fluttering under his waistcoat; and that seemed to pipe small sweet notes in his ear. He might not listen to the music. The years he had wasted in sad unrest, planning and re-planning, disposing his weapons, and marshalling his forces, should have been given to downright work. And, after all his craft and cunning, there he sat, with only "Book the First, Chapter I." upon his page. Had he been able to bear himself with the "certain step of man," having something on his banner, he could have listened to the sweet, faint notes that vibrated in his ear. "But, the idle dandelion!" he cried, "the weak and wavering one, unstable as sand, moved by a wind that doesn't bend an ear of corn; dispirited, when I should be determined; I shall never excel." It would not have appeared to a passing and disinterested observer that, in the evening Mr. Faversham had spent with the Ashbys, anything had happened that justified this unpleasant self-inspection. How little a stranger, dropped by accident into an intimate social circle, knows about that which passes under his eyes! A stale courtesy is paid that he heeds not, yet it implies a quarrel made up, or an assent that shapes the course of two lives. The wife addresses a kind word to the husband; it is the first warmth after a month's enmity and silence. A tragedy may lie under the smiles and compliments. The stranger may be enjoying the comfort of which he is partaking, and there may be creditors barking in every street around about. Jack Ashby in his father's house remarked no sign or hint that should arouse his curiosity; nor did the parent Ashbys; yet Mr. Faversham had been greatly agitated. A question he had been putting to himself many days, and which he had not been able to answer, had returned to him and demanded an answer in a much more authoritative manner. Hence his self-questioning, and his melancholy conclusions. He had experienced many little heart-aches. The rapid dreams of boyhood had dwelt on many a flower destined for other keeping and nurture than his. His pinafore-loves had vanished, and it was no pain to him that they worshipped at other shrines and had forgotten the days when they worked purses for him, and preferred his company to that of any other of the boys at pic-nics. His pocket-money had paid for valentines to fairies who had been won by other princes; and who would have wondered at his impudence and vanity had he reminded them that time was when they deigned to blush at his worst words. Those were the days when the goddess of the heart perpetually tripped it in the woods; plucked flowers by purling streams, and, when there was to be music, light and happy maiden's laughter always. There were to be two enchanted beings in the world, and nought beside, save that which was to minister to their perpetual bliss. Housekeeping, butcher's bills, drabs of servants who would not be civil, requests for money that was not at hand, children, measles, hooping-coughs, frowning mothers-in-law, and angry fathers had no place in these boy's and girl's visions.

I have a bouncing boy, ripening in his fifth year, with an open face where laughter eddies in fifty dimples. It may be that these are precocious days. All I can answer for is, that he has his little penchant, his inamorata, in her mittens and trousers, who is never out of her nurse's sight. She wears her hair thrown in a golden stream over her tiny shoulders, and bound with a blue riband. Yesterday my young lord would not eat his dinner until his hair had, in like manner, been bound with blue. He talks of giving all his lead soldiers (which I bought him last year) to her. I cannot tell whether the extravagance of his passion may lead him. I don't believe his rocking-horse is safe. Should he elope with her in his perambulator! I must bid nurse keep a sharp eye on the young reprobate. If he get over this—he will (I have made up my mind to it) pass through stages of schoolboy and schoolgirl love. I shall find some of the rascal's love letters written in round-hand. Then he will have a grande passion—long before he wears his first coat. Well, what will scolding do? Flirtations at balls, by the sea-side, at the table d'hôte when he goes to Germany with me, while I am discussing with his mamma what he is fit for.

THE OLD VIOLIN.

Old violin, sweet friend and love,
The world is dark; we're growing old;
The light is vanishing above,
No more I see your strings of gold.
The love-knots which our Ellen tied Around your carved neck long ago,
Have faded in the friendless tide
Of summer heat and winter snow.
Old violin,
Dear violin,
Companion of my wanderings,
Your golden moans,
Your plaintive tones,
Plume memory with radiant wings.

The sunny fields thro' which we've strayed,
The woods we've sought from sun and rain,
The pebbled brook and chestnut glade,
Like blessed phantoms fill my brain.
Our welcomes as, at set of sun,
From purple heaths and hills forlorn,

The villagers with labour done
 Came dancing thro' the yellow corn.
 Old violin,
 Dear violin,
 Once more like laughter touch my ears,
 Once more arise
 And fill my eyes
 With floods of unavailing tears.

How often, in those olden times,
 When shadows folded all the east,
 And the white chapel's pious chimes
 Told sweetly for the rural feast,
 Have you and I, in happy trance,
 One green field from the dusty road,
 Seen the brown groups of harvest dance
 Till brows were red and ringlets flowed !
 Old violin,
 Dear violin,
 Even now, with blinded eyes, I see
 The roses red
 That twined your head,
 The brown ale foaming at my knee.

Solace of my declining life,
 Heaven blessed us with tranquillity,
 In all the moods of peace and strife,
 No pair could more contented be.
 We left the monarchs, crowned above,
 To act their wise or foolish parts,
 And, with our strains inspired by love,
 Ruled the great universe of hearts.
 Old violin,
 Dear violin,
 Tho' fame and fortune could not last,
 We have no fears
 For coming years,
 And no repentings for the past !

AN IRISH BARD.

THE ancient Irish possessed ample stores in their native language, capable of captivating the fancy, enlarging the understanding, and improving the heart. Our country, from an early period, was famous for the cultivation of the kindred arts of poetry and music. Lugad, the son of Ith, is called in old writings, "the first poet of Ireland," and there still remains, after a lapse of three thousand years, fragments of his poetry. After him, but before the Christian era, flourished Royne File, or the poetic, and Ferceirte, a bard and herald. Lugar and Congal lived about the time of our Redeemer, and many of their works are extant. The "Dinn Seanchas," or history of noted places in Ireland, compiled by Amergin Mac Amalgaid, in the year 544, relates that in the time of Geide, monarch of Ireland, "the people deemed each other's voices sweeter than the warblings of a melodious harp, such peace and concord reigned among them that no music could delight them more than the sound of each other's voice." There is an ancient Gaelic poem which used to be sung in the Highlands of Scotland, in which the poet addresses a very old harp, and asks what has become of its former lustre ? The harp replies, that it had belonged to a king of Ireland, and had been present at many a royal banquet ; and had afterwards been in the possession of Dargo, son of the druid of Baal—of Gaul—of Filan, etc., etc. Such are a few facts regarding the Bards of Ireland before the inhabitants were converted to the profession of the Christian faith.

The introduction of Christianity gave a new and more exalted direction to the powers of poetry. Among the numerous bards who dedicated their talents to the praises of the Deity, the most distinguished are Feich, the bishop ; Amergin, Cinfaela, the learned, who revised the "Uraicept," or "Primer of the Bards," preserved in the "Book of Ballimote," and in the library of Trinity College, Dublin ; and many others, the mention of whose names might be tedious. Passing by many illustrious bards whose poetic fragments are still preserved, we may mention Mac Liag, secretary and biographer of the famous monarch, Brian Borumha, and whose poems on the death of his royal master are given in Mr. Hardiman's "Irish Minstreley."

For two centuries after the invasion of Henry II. the voice of the muse was but feebly heard in Ireland. The bards fell with their country, and like the captive Israelites hung their untuned harps on the willows. They might exclaim, with the royal psalmist,

"Now while our harps were hanged soe,
 The men, whose captives then we lay,
 Did on our griefs insulting goe,
 And more to grieve us thus did say :
 You that of music make such show,
 Come, sing us now a Sion lay ;
 Oh no, we have nor voice nor hand,
 For such a song in such a land !"

But the spirit of patriotism at length aroused the bards from their slumbers, and many men of genius started up throughout Ireland. A splendid list of names could be given, but mere names would not interest the reader. In fact, the language itself is so adapted for poetry that it may almost be said to make poets. Its pathetic powers have been long celebrated. "If you plead for your life, plead in Irish," is a well-known adage. But we proceed to give a more detailed account of Carolan, a bard whose name is familiar to every Irishman.

Turlough O'Carolan was born about the year 1670, at a place called Newton, near Nobber, in the county of Meath. Though gifted with a natural genius for music and poetry, he evinced no precocious disposition for either. He became a minstrel by accident, and continued it more through choice than necessity. Respectably descended, possessing no small share of Milesian pride, and entertaining a due sense of his additional claims as a man of genius, he was above playing for hire and always expected, and invariably received, that attention which he deserved. His visits were regarded as favours conferred, and his departure never failed to occasion regret. In his eighteenth year he was deprived of sight by the small-pox, and this apparently severe calamity was the beginning of his career as one of the principal bards of Ireland.

Near his father's house was a moat or rath, in the interior of which one of the fairy queens, or "good people," was believed by the country folks to hold her court. This moat was the scene of many a boyish pastime with his youthful companions ; and after he became blind, he used to prevail on some of his family or neighbours to lead him to it, where he would remain for hours together stretched listlessly before the sun. He was often observed to start up suddenly, as if in a fit of ecstasy, occasioned, as it was firmly believed, by the preternatural sights which he witnessed. In one of these raptures he called hastily on his companions to lead him home, and when he reached it he sat down immediately to his harp, and in a little time played and sung the air and words of a sweet song addressed to Bridget Cruise, the object of his earliest and tenderest attachment. So sudden and so captivating was it, that it was confidently attributed to fairy inspiration, and to this day the place is pointed out from which he desired to be led home. From that hour he became a poet and a musician.

A singular anecdote, highly illustrative of the romantic tendency of his first love may be here mentioned. He once went on a pilgrimage to a cave located on an island situated on Lough Dearg, in the county Donegal. On returning to shore he found several persons waiting for the boat in which he had been conveyed to the spot. In his kind assistance to help some of these pilgrims into the boat, he happened to take the hand of a female, and suddenly exclaimed, "Dar lama mo chardais Crist" (This is the hand of Bridget Cruise). He was not deceived : it was the hand of her who had engaged his youthful affections, and whose image had been so deeply engraved in his heart.

Though Carolan passed a wandering and restless life, there is nothing on which we can lay our finger as very extraordinary or singular. He seldom stirred out of the province of Connaught, where he was such a universal favourite that messengers were continually after him inviting him to one or other of the houses of the principal inhabitants, his presence being regarded as an honour and a compliment. The number of his musical pieces, to almost all of which he composed verses, is said to have exceeded two hundred. But though he was such a master of his native language, he was but indifferently acquainted with the English, of which we will give the reader a specimen, reminding him, however, that though it may appear ludicrous to him, it is the composition of a man not unworthy of ranking with some of the first poets of the past or present age. A young lady of the name of Featherstone, who did not understand Irish, being anxious to have some verses to his own fine air, the "Devotion," he gave her the following:—

"On a fine Sunday morning devoted to be Attentive to a sermon that was ordered for me,
I met a fresh rose on the road by decree.
And though prayer was my notion, my devotion was she.
Welcome, fair lily, white and red,
Welcome was every word we said.
Welcome, bright angel of noble degree,
I wish you would love, and that I were with thee;
I pray don't frown at me with mouth or with eye,—
So I told the fair maiden, with heart full of glee, Tho' prayer was my notion, my devotion was she."

Carolan died in 1738, at Alderford, the house of his old and never-failing patroness, Mrs. McDermott. Feeling his end approaching, he called for his harp and played his well-known "Farewell to Music," in a strain of tenderness which drew tears from the eyes of his auditory. His last moments were spent in prayer, until he calmly breathed his last, at the age of about sixty-seven years. Upwards of sixty clergymen of different denominations, a number of gentlemen from the neighbouring counties, and a vast concourse of country people assembled to pay the last mark of respect to their favourite bard, one whose death caused such a chasm in the bardic annals of Ireland. But he lives in his own deathless strains; and while the charms of melody hold their sway over the human heart, the name of Carolan will be revered.

Thomas Furlong, the translator of Carolan's "Remains," and other ancient relics, was born in the county of Wexford. His father was a respectable farmer. Our poet was born in the year 1794, at a place called Scarawalsh, a romantic part of the country, midway between Ferns and Enniscorthy. His education qualified him for a counting-house, and, at fourteen, he was apprenticed to a respectable trader in the Irish metropolis. The ledger, however, had less attraction for him than the muses; yet, though he "lapsed in numbers," he did not let his passion for poetry interfere with his more important duties. This is a feature in his character which should not be overlooked. Through life he retained the friendship of his employer; and when that gentleman died, Furlong vented his feelings in a poem.

Furlong certainly escaped much of the miseries of a poet's life. He either had more common sense, or Providence better guided him, for his career, though short, does not exhibit any of those wild and wayward vagaries, which, at one and the same time, interest and pain us in reading the lives of some of the children of song. During the most valuable part of his life he was in the employment of Mr. Jameson, an eminent distiller in Dublin—a man of enlarged and liberal views—and it reflects great credit both on the poet and his employer, that Mr. Jameson wept like a child on the day of Furlong's funeral. Furlong was a large contributor to the "New Monthly Magazine," and he projected, in 1822, the "New Irish Magazine," which was printed in Dublin. During the years 1825 and 1826, he was employed occasionally in writing the "Doom of Derezze," a descriptive poem, which was published after his death by Robins, of London. The poem was warmly eulogised by his friend, the Rev. Charles Maturin, with whom he had long been on habits of the closest intimacy. When his aid was first solicited (as Mr. Hardiman tells us in his "Irish Minstrelsy") to undertake the translation of Carolan, he at first smiled at the idea of finding anything of merit extant in the Irish language. But inspection convinced him that he was labouring under the common prejudice of the day, and his fine taste soon appreciated the worth of those old relics.

Furlong died in the year 1827, in the thirty-third year of his age. He thus did not live long enough for the expansion of his powers or the maturing of his intellect; but he has left behind him proof sufficient that he was a poet of no mean order. He was interred in the church-yard of Drumcondra, near Dublin, and over his grave, which lies near that of the celebrated antiquarian Grose, his friends have erected a handsome monument.

MacCabe, a contemporary and friend of Carolan, composed an elegy on the occasion of his decease, which has thus been translated by Furlong:

"Woe is my lot—unremitting woe;
Idly and wildly in my grief I rave;
Thy song, my Turlough, shall be sung no more;
Through festive halls no more thy strains shall flow;
The thrilling music of thy harp is o'er;
The hand that waked it moulders in the grave.

I start at dawn, I mark the country's gloom;
O'er the green hills a heavy cloud appears;
Aid me, kind Heaven, to bear my bitter doom,
To check my murmurs, and restrain my tears.

How desolate, how lonely are my days!
At night sleep comes not to these wearied eyes;
Nor beams one hope, my sinking heart to raise,
In Turlough's grave each hope that cheer'd me lies.

Oh! ye blest spirits, dwelling with your God,
Hymning his praise as ages roll along,
Receive my Turlough in your bright abode,
And bid him aid you in your sacred song."

ARCHITECTURE

ARCHITECTURE is divisible into a number of different branches, according to the styles adopted by the various nations practising it, and according to the several eras in which it has been practised. An intelligent French writer on architecture, of the present day, gives us the following enumeration:—Egyptian, Indian, Persian, Phœnician, Hebrew, Chinese, Greek, Roman, and Gothic, to which list may be added the Etruscan, the Moorish, or Saracenic, the Saxon, and the English. With regard to epochs, the characteristics arising from these may be ranged under four great heads, namely, ancient architecture, that of the lower empire, that of the middle ages, and modern architecture.

By the means of architecture we are furnished with a test from which may be inferred the comparative cultivation and progress of intellect between man arrived at a high state of civilization and his ruder forefathers; and the opinion of Plato should not be forgotten, that even the study of politics and legislation began with the building of cities. The lofty and stupendous pyramids, obelisks, and temples of Egypt, bear witness to the truth of history and tradition which represent the grandeur and numerical strength of the ancient dwellers on the banks of the Nile. The relics of ancient Athens attest the veracity of those authors who attributed to its population a refined and elegant taste, and an unsurpassable perception of beauty and harmony.

Great caution must be observed in speculating on the state of this art among the nations of antediluvian celebrity. It may, we think, safely be conceded that they did possess a system of architecture, but it was probably of a very rude and unelaborated description.

Anciently, men lived in woods and inhabited caves, but in time, taking example, perhaps from birds, who with great industry built their nests, they made themselves huts. At first they made these huts, very probably, of a conic figure; because that is a figure of the simplest structure; and, like the birds whom they imitated, composed them of branches of trees, spreading them wide at the bottom, and joining them in a point at the top; covering the whole with reeds, leaves, and clay, to screen them from tempests and rain. But, finding the conic figure inconvenient on account of its inclined sides, they changed both the form and construction of their huts, giving them a cubical figure, and building them in the following manner: having marked out the space to be occupied by the hut, they fixed in the ground several upright trunks of trees, to form the sides, filling the intervals between them with branches closely interwoven and covered with clay. The sides being thus completed, four large beams were placed on the upright trunks, which, being well joined at the angles, kept the sides firm, and likewise served to support the covering or roof of the building, composed of many joists, on which were laid several beds of reed, leaves, and clay.

Insensibly mankind improved in the art of building and invented methods to make their huts lasting and handsome, as well as convenient. They took off the bark and other unevennesses from the trunks of trees that formed the sides; raised them, probably, above the dirt and humidity, on stone; and covered each of them with a flat slab or slate to keep off the rain. The spaces between the end of the joists were closed with clay, wax, or some other substance; and the end of the joists covered with thin boards cut in the manner of triglyphs. The position of the roof was likewise altered; for being, on account of its flatness, unfit to throw off the rains that fell in great abundance during the winter season, they raised it in the middle, giving it the form of a gable roof, by placing rafters on the joists, to support the earth and other materials that composed the covering.

From this simple construction the orders of architecture took their rise. For, when buildings of wood were set aside, and men began to erect solid and stately edifices of stone, they imitated the parts which necessity had introduced into the primitive huts; inasmuch that the upright trees, with the stones at each end of them, were the origin of columns, bases, and capitals; and the beams, joists, rafters, and strata of materials that formed the covering, gave birth to architraves, friezes, triglyphs, and cornices, with the corona, the mutules, the modillions, and the dentails.

The first buildings were, in all likelihood, rough and uncouth, as the men of those times had neither experience nor tools; but when, by long experience and reasoning upon it, the artists had established certain rules, had invented many instruments, and, by great practice, had acquired a facility in executing their ideas, they made quick advances towards perfection, and at length discovered certain manners of building which succeeding ages have regarded with the highest veneration.

Perhaps the earliest cultivators of architecture, as a fine art, were the Assyrians, whose empire was founded by Nimrod, the builder of far-famed Nineveh. From Assyria the arts passed into Egypt, one of the most ancient nations in the world, and to which, it is probable, we may fairly attribute the rise of the habits and pursuits of cultivated life into a tangible and definite form. The Egyptians were ignorant of the construction of the arch, and were consequently compelled to provide for its absence by an accumulation of clumsy pillars and heavy architraves, extremely offensive to the eye of a just taste.

The different kinds of edifices peculiar to the Egyptians are the subterranean grotto, the pyramid, the obelisk, the labyrinth, that immense collection of halls of which Herodotus, Pliny, and Strabo, have left us descriptions; the monolithic chamber (constructed of a single stone), and their stupendous temples covered with hieroglyphics, paintings, and sculptures, and preceded by ranges of carved animals, of sphinxes, or of obelisks.

It is in the country of its origin that these colossal wonders, the pyramids are situated. The largest of the three, which is some leagues distant from Cairo, forms a square, each side of whose base is 660 feet, its external circuit being, therefore, 2,640 feet, and is nearly 500 in height.

The monuments of ancient Indian architecture which remain to gratify the ardent spirit of inquiry awake at the present period, consist chiefly of excavations from the rock. Of this description we meet with spacious halls and lofty columns, and solemn temples, constructed in such a manner as to excite in the beholder the strongest emotions of admiration and surprise. One of the most remarkable specimens of these Indian excavations is to be found in the little island of Elephanta; perhaps so called from the circumstance of an elephant of black stone, of the size of life, being encountered near the landing-place. The elevated situation of this temple, wrought in a hill of stone, and approached through a quiet and solemn valley, is very striking and impressive. It forms nearly a square of from 130 to 135 feet, and is about fourteen feet and a half in its interior height. The roof is supported by ranges of columns, disposed with sufficient regularity; and upon the walls gigantic figures are sculptured in relief.

The ruins of ancient Persian architecture, although they do not indicate any great superiority as products of art, are yet remarkable when we consider the former greatness and splendour of the empire in which they were erected. The most distinguished are those of Persepolis, once famous for containing a magnificent palace, the relics of which for a long while comprised forty pillars or columns, and were thence denominated by the inhabitants of the country "chehul minar," or "tachil minar," i. e. the palace of forty columns. They are constructed of a species of deep gray marble, very hard, which is susceptible of a beautiful polish, and thence becomes almost black. These noble ruins are now the shelter of birds and beasts of prey.

Our next inquiry into the earlier stages of architecture leads us to take a glance at the productions of the Phœnicians. This primitive people, who possessed the arts of civilization at an extremely remote epoch, had several large cities, famous for their riches, manufactures, and extended commerce. There is reason for supposing that the Phœnician architects were much in the habit of employing timber instead of stone, Mount Lebanon, among other places, furnishing them with an abundant supply of the former material; and hence we are led to a consideration of Hebraic architecture, inasmuch as Phœnician artists were, doubtless, engaged in the building of Solomon's temple, a great portion of which was, in all probability, constructed of wood.

The Hebrews, or Israelites, acquired a considerable degree of civilization during their residence in Egypt. After their deliverance from captivity, it was suggested to them to construct a place which they might dedicate to the worship of God. Owing to the necessity prescribed by their wandering kind of life, this assumed the shape of a spacious tent, and was denominated the tabernacle. The whole structure, according to the best authorities, covered a space of 100 biblical cubits, by 50 cubits wide; and the enclosure, five cubits high, was formed of wooden columns with brass bases, and silver capitals, having curtains of tapestry suspended between them. These columns were sixty in number; twenty on each side, which lay north and south, and ten on each end, which faced the east and west. The Jews used this moveable temple for a length of time after the conquest of Palestine.

Under the reign of Solomon the grand temple was erected, preparations for which had been made by David, that monarch's father.

The summit of Mount Moriah formed a plain of 36,310 square feet. He began by levelling the top and sides of the mountain, against which was afterwards built a wall of freestone 400 cubits high. The circumference of the mountain at the foot was 3,000 cubits. Upon the plain was built the temple, divided like the tabernacle, into two divisions, by a partition of cedar. Under the second, or the sanctuary, it appears they preserved the treasures of the temple. The exterior walls of the temple were of stone, squared at right angles, and ornamented with the figures of cherubims, palm-leaves, flowers, etc., sculptured probably in the stone, like the Egyptian hieroglyphics. The roof was covered with plates of gold, and in the interior decorated in the richest manner; the Hebrews following the custom at that time of all civilized people in ornamenting their temples, used a great quantity of gold and precious stones. Besides this temple, Solomon erected many other works, as the walls of Jerusalem, several public granaries, stables, etc.

Of Chinese architecture, the original types and models appear to have been pavilions or tents, and evidences of this derivation are constantly visible in almost all their buildings. The materials chiefly employed by them are various kinds of wood, together with bricks and tiles, burnt or dried in the sun. But the most gigantic work of Chinese architecture is their celebrated wall, compared with which those of the Persians, the Romans, etc., sink into great inferiority. This stupendous fabric exceeded 2,000 miles in length, and comprised 45,000 towers. We must not omit noticing, likewise, the science and mechanical skill displayed in the laying out of their canals, as well as in the construction of their bridges. But, taken altogether, there is little to recommend this light and weak style to the eye of the enlightened connoisseur.

Cadmus, who flourished about 1,500 years before the Christian era, is reported to have introduced the arts and sciences into Greece, between 500 and 600 years after the building of the walls of Babylon. He built a city called, after the celebrated one in Egypt, Thebes, and it is not at all probable that he was satisfied with borrowing merely the name. The kingdoms of Athens, Argos, Sparta, and Thebes, were successively founded by Cecrops, Cadmus, Inach, etc.

Art having begun to shed its beams steadily over these distinguished, though at first unimportant, colonies, their radiance was soon diffused throughout the whole country, and a taste gradually sprung up, the correctness and loveliness of which has been subscribed to by all subsequent ages; and which, not seeking to astonish by gigantic and useless productions, selected the choicest materials of preceding styles, and founded thereon that exact proportion, that perfect harmony of parts, which soon rendered the disciples of the Egyptians as completely their masters as ours.

The principal orders in the Grecian architecture are the Doric, the Ionic, and the Corinthian; each of which shall be considered in course. To these may be added the use of the arch.

The first material used by the Greeks in their sacred buildings was timber; next brick, the art of making which they learned from the Egyptians; subsequently stone was employed, as in the temple of Apollo, built by Amphiction; and, ultimately, the most enduring as well as the most beautiful of all substances applied to the purpose was abundantly introduced, namely marble.

Almost coeval with the rise and progress of architecture in Greece is the formation of the Etruscan school. The Etruscans are by some antiquarians said to have been originally a Grecian colony; and to have received, as a matter of course, the arts and sciences from the parent state.

In the most ancient specimens of this school we find abundant use made of the arch, the construction of which was evidently well known to their architects. Their columns differed in shape and proportion from those of any other nation; and Vitruvius has awarded to them the honour of having formed a new order, which, however, is only a variation, and by no means an improvement on the Grecian Doric.

In noticing the best examples of Roman architecture, produced at its most flourishing period, we observe, in addition to the square plans of the Greeks, circular temples crowned with domes. The Corinthian order was evidently the favourite one, and was practised with great skill and success, particularly when not tortured into their own modification of it—the Composite.

The most prominent features of the pure Grecian style are invention, elegance, and a severe beauty, at the same time not destitute of richness, which have left to succeeding ages the finest models for imitation. If we turn to the Roman school which succeeded it, we are struck by the display of splendour, vastness of extent, carelessness of expense, and redundancy of ornament. The triumphal arches of the Romans constitute a leading feature in their architecture. In the designing of these nothing was overlooked which might tend to perpetuate the fame of the conquerors.

The Saracens, in their buildings in Egypt, appeared to have availed themselves, in a very small degree only, of the style of the aboriginal inhabitants. Their style may be justly regarded as the immediate precursor of the Gothic, and is distinguished by the lofty boldness of its vaultings; the slenderness of its columns; the peculiar mixed form of its curves; the variety of its capitals and the immense profusion of its ornaments. The greatest peculiarity, however, lies in the small clustered pillars and pointed arches, formed by the segments of two intersecting circles. The genuine style of Gothic architecture is grand, characteristic, and impressive. What it wants in chasteness and simplicity is made up by solemnity, and a grace peculiarly its own. The elements of this style are spires, pinnacles, lofty-pointed windows, and elevation, as opposed to the horizontal line of the Greeks.

Of the progress of the science of architecture in Ireland, we shall have occasion to speak more at length in an early number.

The Doric order obtained its name from the Dorians, a nation of ancient Achaia, from whom it unquestionably received those parts and proportions, by means of which it has been distinguished from subsequent orders. The character of the Doric is robust and masculine, and it has hence been termed the Herculean order. From its peculiar character, this order is well calculated for town-halls, gates of cities, and other public buildings destined for purposes of utility rather than ornament. Among the ancients it was almost uniformly executed without a base. However this be, persons of good taste will grant, that a base gives a graceful turn to the column, but is likewise of real use, serving to keep it firm on its plane; and that if columns without bases are now set aside, it is a mark of the wisdom of our architects, rather than an indication of their being governed by prejudice, as some adorers of antiquity would insinuate.

The following are the proportions of the principal parts of this order. The whole height of the entire order is divided into five equal parts, one of which is the height of the pedestal; and the remaining four, which are assigned to the column and entablature, are likewise to be divided into five. One of these belongs to the entablature, and the remaining four being divided into eight equal parts, one of them will be the inferior diameter of the column.

The Ionic order is said to have been first used in the temple of Diana at Ephesus. This column is more slender and graceful than the Doric. Its ornaments are in a style of composition partaking at once of the plainness of the latter and the richness of the Corinthian. Its general effect is that of simple elegance.

The proportions of the principal parts of the Ionic columns are as follow: the height of the entire order is divided into five equal parts. One of these parts is assigned to the height of the pedestal; and the remaining four are divided into five, for the column and entablature. One of these is appropriated to the entablature, and the remaining four are for the column, including its capital and base. These four being divided into equal parts, one is assigned for the inferior diameter. The cornice is fifty-four minutes in height, and its projection the same. The drip in the under side of the corona is channelled out one minute deep, and two minutes from the front; and before the cyma reversa one minute.

The shaft of the column is sometimes fluted, and sometimes plain. Twenty, or twenty-four are the number of flutes allotted, not only to this, but to every other order. In general, however, twenty-four are preferable. The plan of the flutes may be rather more than a semicircle, as they will then appear more distinct. The fillets, or intervals between them, must not be broader than one-third of the flutes, nor less than one-fourth; and it should further be observed, that in the capital of rich compositions, over each flute is placed an ove or egg.

The Corinthian order is evidently derivable from the architecture of Egypt, adapted, refined, and nationalized. Cecrops, the founder of Athens, was an Egyptian; and Dædalus, the earliest Athenian artist, visited the shores of the Nile to study the principles of the fine arts. Added to these facts, it is likewise well known that the Greeks borrowed their laws, manners, and customs, from the Egyptians, and purified them in the alembics of their own brighter genius. The following are the general proportions of this order: the whole height of the entire order is divided into five equal parts, and one is given for the height of the pedestal. The remaining four are divided into five equal parts; one is assigned for the entablature, and the remaining four are assigned to the height of the column, including its base and capital; which are again divided into ten equal parts, one of which is for the inferior diameter. The base is thirty minutes and the capital seventy in height. The cornice is sixty minutes in height and fifty-eight in projection. Of the Tuscan order little historical can be said, neither is there any regular example of it among the remnants of antiquity. The Composite order is obviously derived from the Ionic and Corinthian, but it cannot, we think, in any case, be applied with superior effect to the latter. It was first employed by the Romans in the triumphal arches erected by them to exhibit to posterity their dominion over their conquered provinces.

The Composite unquestionably derives its origin from that constant solicitude after novelty which always renders the mind of man restless in enlightened and highly cultivated ages. The desire of variety and novelty, stretched to a point beyond the judicious, engaged the Roman architects to combine with the proportions and enrichments of the Corinthian order the angular volute of the Ionic, and thus to compose a new order.

The general proportions of this order are: the height of the entire order is divided into five equal parts, one of which is appropriated for the height of the pedestal, and the remaining four for the column and entablature. These four parts being again divided into five, one is for the entablature, and the remaining four for the height of the column, including its base and capital. The height of the column is divided into ten equal parts, one of which is given to the inferior diameter. The base is thirty minutes, the capital seventy in height, adorned with acanthus leaves, and volutes, drawn by the same method as those of the Ionic; and the plan of the capital is similar to that of the Corinthian order.

SNOW AND FAMINE.

WHAT are you weaving, silent Snow?
To and fro, sad and slow,
While the winds are keening low,
Weird and low, thick with woe;
Hoarse and sudden, sobbing loud,
Shrill with woe. Ah! I know,
Well I know, you weave a shroud,
Mournful Snow!

What are you hiding, eerie Snow?
Pallid so, crouching low,
With your trailing garments flow,
Spread beneath the moon's pale glow.
What do you hide, so cold and dread,
Down below? Ah! I know
You swathe the lone unburied dead,
Ghastly Snow!

Where do you drift, mysterious Snow?
To and fro, sad and slow,
While the rough winds gasp with woe,
Through the cabin door you go,
Treading over the hearth and floor,
Lying low. Yes, I know,
The home-blaze leaps there never more,
Chilly Snow!

Is it Christmas, wandering Snow?
To and fro, roaming so;
We in the mountains cannot know,
Sunk in woe, dying slow.
Is the Saviour born on earth?
Ah! 'tis so, yes, I know,
We'll warm us at His heavenly hearth,
Kindly Snow!

ORANGES.—Oranges are imported in boxes containing from 250 and more, and in chests holding 500 to 1,000. The quantity of this fruit imported has been steadily increasing for some years past. In the three years ending with 1842 the average imports were 334,070 boxes; in the five years ending, 1850, they had increased to 380,000 boxes. Since then the quantity has been computed in bushels. The average annual imports in the five years ending with 1860 were 377,440 bushels. The quantity taken for consumption has now reached upwards of 1,000,000 bushels, and, assuming each bushel to contain 650, this would give 650 millions of oranges, or about 22 for each soul of the population in the kingdom. The Azores, or Western Islands, from whence the finest St. Michael oranges come, furnish us with the largest supply. The imports from thence have doubled in the last five years. The expense of walling and planting an acre of orange garden is stated to be £15 for the wall, £8 for 65 trees, and £2 for labour. It yields half a crop of beans or Indian corn during seven years, but no oranges; from eight to eleven years half a crop of oranges is obtained. Then a full crop, which is sold for £10 or £15. Each tree on arriving at maturity will produce annually, on an average, 12,000 to 16,000 oranges; one grower is said to have picked 26,000 from a single tree. The trees bloom in March and April, and oranges are gathered for the British markets as early as November. The Portuguese never eat them before the end of January, at which time they possess their full flavour.

A STROLL ROUND MALTA.

THE history of Malta under the different rulers into whose possession the "hot jewel of the Mediterranean" fell at consecutive periods, reminds one of the fable of Jupiter and the frogs. The government of the country, up to a comparatively recent date, might be said to be in a state of unhealthy transition, and the voice of the people to be perpetually crying for change. In truth, the population at all times furnished an excellent prototype of the hopeful "Micawber", who, whatever calamities affected his life never dismissed the hope that "something would turn up." Its first great historical epoch began in the sixteenth century, when Charles V. presented the island to the Knights of Jerusalem, or as they were more commonly called, the Knights of Rhodes. It would be too great a stretch of fancy to give the Emperor credit for foreseeing the services which his endowment subsequently rendered to the cause of European civilization, when the gigantic power of the East overshadowed the whole continent, and the voice of the Mezzuin was heard at the gates of Vienna. European society, at that turbulent period, did not present the compact mass which it does to-day; it was a parcel of fragments, attracted together by no special, consolidating interest, and, therefore, presented an easy prey to despoilers inspired by the hope of plunder and the worst instincts of fanaticism. It was a terrible hour for the world when the tide of Moslem invasion rolled westwards, and the Cross went down in repeated conflicts before the Crescent. The eyes of the world, (and the phrase conveys more fact than metaphor,) were fixed upon Malta, whence the valiant Knights of St. John were repelling, year after year, the bigots who threatened to have the Koran preached in every church of the continent. Then came another day, when peace smiled on Europe, and the men who had conserved its liberties were deprived of the island by the strong hand of a soldier, flushed with success and eager for new aggrandizements; to that succeeded the English occupation, which would appear, if the faith of guarantees be relied on, to be pretty well established.

Lying almost in a central position between Sicily and Africa, Malta, from a very remote date, formed, as it were, the "half-way-house" of the Mediterranean. The commerce of that sea, which even then was ploughed from one extremity to the other, by the black keels of the mercantile navies of the coast cities, found it a convenient harbour of ease. Thither the venturesome galleys of the Phœnicians touched and watered, as they sailed far westward to Cornwall for tin, through the Pillars of Hercules; thither, in later days, came the wretched Hebrew, seeking, like the dove of the patriarch, a resting place for the sole of his foot; its harbours were also visited by the Greek as he drifted up from the sunny archipelagoes of the east; and by the fleets of Carthage thirsting for the treasures of Italy.

It would be impossible that the civilization of an island, subjected to so many diverse influences, should not be affected by them to its very root. The old population, in course of time, received adulterating elements from the swarm of cosmopolitan life with which it came in contact. A mixture of races produced a mixture of breeds, half-breeds, and castes, which subsequently moulded themselves into one composite race, or family, when, from the failure of commerce, the island society became conservative. According to the old proverb, "many good things make a dainty dish," the race which holds Malta at this moment ought to be the most civilized, aggressive, imaginative, and intellectual on the face of the earth. Within the last century it has been crossed by Celtic and Saxon blood, and should inherit some of their qualities. Nevertheless, your Maltese, for all that, is mediocre enough. He may be fairly described as a mixture of bad Arabic and Italian patois, and, when not incited to exertion by extraordinary stimulants, is systematically given to laziness and sunshine.

To the inhabitants of the frigid and cloudy skies of these kingdoms, Malta, on which a fiery sun looks down day after day from a heaven of the deepest blue, seems a paradise of flowers and ashes. A waif of mist, about the bigness of a man's hand, is now and then sucked up from the Mediterranean and drifted across the island; but for the Maltese there are none of these gorgeous cloud-lands, and wonderful sunsets to which our eyes are accustomed. Wherever one turns there is nothing but sun and dust, the latter lying thick on street, and roof, and garden, and reflecting back the brilliant light of the climate with tenfold power. There is no cooling wind to fan the scorched cheek of the spectator; scarcely a blade of green in the open country to gladden and refresh his sight. Near the sea-coast, where the desolate crags are washed by the tides, some wild flora are found in abundance. There flourishes the stone-crop, a long trailing plant which winds around the rocks like a garland of the reddest coral, with clusters of crimson flowers and leaves, treasures for the artist's portfolio; deep in the fissures of the sandstone grows a plant resembling our scarlet pea, which is invariably found in companionship with a species of golden ragwort. Viewed from a little distance, the colours of the plants mingle into one superb flush of orange; and this is dashed with a tinge of emerald if a clump of the dark green velvety vetch happen to be near.

Amongst the sandy beaches which run inland, frequently many miles from the sea-shore the botanist may gather the desert plant, the leaves of which crumble into a pungent-smelling powder, when touched by the hand; the asphodel, the old floral type of death, which rises, with a milky blossom on its top, to the height of several feet; and the fever-few and marigold, whose yellow-rayed flowers remind one of the sun flowers of the west. The soil in which these flowers take root is thickly scattered with an endless variety of land-shells. Amongst them may be noticed the helix vermiculata, which, as its name implies, is of a dull vermilion colour, inclining at the edges to a faint pink; the blue and saffron-banded rugosula, and the prettily blotched clausilia papillaris. One shell, the macrostoma, the surface of which is covered with spiral ridges, is remarkable from the fact that it is always found with a portion of the valvular extremity broken off. The helix candidissima, a white, sickly-coloured shell, exists in large quantities on fort Manuel. Its occupant is a fat, juicy creature, which dies on being exposed to the sunlight, leaving its habitat clean and dry for the purposes of the conchologist. The inlets, with which the shore round the entire coast-line is thickly indented, swarm with a wondrous variety of weeds. When the sun shines on them the effect produced by their curious colours and constantly shifting forms is indescribably beautiful. In shallow water they present a surface of delicate, intermixed red and white buds, or huge confectionary-like pyramids of sea moss and purple sponge, that palpitate with a spiral motion, which makes the sea around dance in concentric rings; ledges of submarine rock are seen draped with undulating festoons of an orchis-coloured weed stretching to an interminable length. To sail in those waters, leaning lazily over the edge of the boat, and gazing into the illuminated deeps beneath, is to enjoy a combination of form and colour only equalled by those of the kaleidoscope. The bottom of the sea shines like a vast floor, encrusted with jewels; here a weed glows like a rainbow through its immense arc; there a pyramid of golden sea fungus shoots up like a pillar of fire, from the dense underwood of coral forests that stretch around its base. At each moment the translucent amber is agitated by the rapid movements of dazzling fish, or the tortuous progress of gorgeously-stained crustacea. It would take the genius of Ruskin to do justice to this wonderful spectacle; and even that genius, we apprehend, would be unequal to the task.

Escaping from the crags and dust, and suffocating heat, the resident in Malta will find admittance into a garden, full of verdurous gloom and silence, a little Eden, fashioned by some one longing for a glimpse of home, and cut off from the desert outside. Within the grey walls that form the barrier which protects it from the incursions of the baked sand and grit of the open country, he hears the liquid plash of fountains, hewn in the rock, a musical murmur that reminds him of the dell and glade voices of the west. Familiar flowers and shrubs delight his eyes wherever he turns, gillyflowers, pinks, carnations, stocks, asphodel, jasmine, and the luxurious rose, of the British islands. In this happy retreat the poor palm finds a refuge, and lifts its head with a vigour it seldom displays in a more congenial climate. In the Boschetto (a little wood) a picturesque glen at the back of the island, so much frequented by the residents, the hill sides are cut into terraces which are planted with olives, lemons, and oranges. In the basin of the glen flourishes an orchard, in the midst of which flows a stream of clear water. The delightful shade and coolness of the place combine to make it one of the most attractive spots on the island. A pool at its southern end is supplied with gold-fish which are daily fed with bread-crumbs by the attendants. Even in mid-winter the orange trees of the Boschetto are loaded with fruit and blossom.

We are indebted for the materials of this sketch, to the talent and industry of Mr. Tullack, author of "Friendly Sketches in America."

THE CATHOLIC ART UNION,

ESTABLISHED FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF SUPERIOR ALTAR PIECES AND RELIGIOUS ENGRAVINGS.

MANAGER—JAMES DUFFY, 7, WELLINGTON QUAY, DUBLIN.

TICKETS ONE SHILLING EACH.

The main object of the Catholic Art Union is to supersede the vulgar and grotesque prints, mis-named religious engravings, which have so long enjoyed an unhealthy popularity in this country, by diffusing amongst the people engravings in which the highest genius shall be made subservient to the interests of Sacred Art.

The following splendid works of Art are the prizes for the year 1862:—

THE CRUCIFIXION. | THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. | ST. JOSEPH AND THE REDEEMER.

Size of each Painting, five feet by three feet six inches, in magnificent Gilt Frames.

The Drawing of Prizes will take place in Dublin on the 26th December, 1862.

VALUE TWO HUNDRED GUINEAS.

In addition to the chance of obtaining one of the above prizes, each subscriber, when taking a Ticket, will receive the following three splendidly executed high class Engravings—THE CRUCIFIXION—IMMACULATE CONCEPTION—ST. JOSEPH.

Size of each Engraving, 16 + 12 inches.

VALUE SEVEN SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE!!!

The Engravings are now ready for delivery, with the tickets.

Agents wanted in every parish in Ireland, and in all the principal cities and towns in England and Scotland.

All communications on the business of the Catholic Art Union to be addressed to the Secretary, PATRICK O'BYRNE, Esq., 7, Wellington-quay, Dublin. A Ticket and a set of the engravings will be sent free by post for 14 penny stamps.

SUIL DRUV, THE COINER.

CHAPTER VI.

HE evening hung heavily on Kumba's hands. Notwithstanding the repeated disappointments which he had met with in the schemes devised by Spellacy, the alternative which he proposed to himself in case of rejecting his final one, was so little in accordance with his inclinations that he had almost determined on acceding to the latter, long before the hour of appointment came, and before he was even acquainted with its nature. He hurried over his solitary evening meal, but when that was despatched, he found that it in no wise accelerated the hour of meeting, which was yet distant. He read over the letter of his mistress's parent, which stipulated a term of probation that his impatient temper could never have endured—flung it aside—took down his violin—and accompanied it with some words which seemed melancholy enough to suit his own fortunes.

The hour of appointment at length drew nigh, and he repaired to the rath indicated by his companion, which was made remarkable by one of those table stones, or crom-leachs—enormous tabular masses of rock supported on five or six pedestals of the same material, great numbers of which are to be met with in various parts of Ireland, of Great Britain, and even on the continent; and which are supposed by some antiquaries to have served the purpose of altars in the celebration of the mystic rights of Odin, while the vulgar traditions of the country represent them as the rural dining tables of the ancient gigantic colonists of the island.

He had not arrived many minutes before he was joined by Spellacy, who appeared to labour under some perplexity of mind as to the course which he should pursue.

"Mr. Kumba," he at length said, after much hesitation, "to be plain with you, if you should not choose to come into my plan, it will put my life into your power, and that puzzles me a little."

Kumba stared at him in some surprise. "I am totally unable to conceive your meaning," said he, "but, on that head, you may be assured that I am not base enough to avail myself of any information by which you may commit yourself."

"It is enough, sir," said Spellacy. "Follow me, if you please." They proceeded down the hillock, over a little rocky rivulet, into a small dark copse of stunted elms and hazels, through which an almost imperceptible pathway over-grown with brambles,

"HA! WAS THAT A SHOT?"

prishocweed, and underwood, conducted them to the door of a small thatched building, having the appearance of a stable, and connected with a ruined smithy. Spellacy hastily pulled the string of the latch and admitted his friend into a stable, which was occupied by four stout rough-coated horses, whose furniture hung against an uncast wall of mud and stone on the opposite side. The condition of the animals and the comfortable air of the place in which they were accommodated, might, at a moment of lesser interest, have excited the surprise of Kumba, but he was now too completely overwhelmed even to exercise a distinct judgment on the very circumstance which absorbed all his attention. A small ladder, leading through a narrow opening in the boarded ceiling to a loft overhead, was next disclosed by his companion, who now relinquished his hold and motioned Kumba to ascend.

"Stay!" cried the latter, at length, "whither are we going?"

"Hush! no words here—at last, talk smaller than that, if you value our lives. Up, and ask no questions!"

"But——"

"Hush! up, I say again!" Kumba yielded, and they ascended.

"Now, Mr. Robert!" said Spellacy, in a low tone, "only act like a man for one half hour, and you're made. Do you know where you are?"

Kumba stared wildly around him. They stood in a space about four feet square, the rest of the loft being to all appearance blocked up with hay and straw, except on one side near the wall, where a fissure in the mass had been formed, apparently by the gradual use made of the article for consumption in the lower apartment. To this narrow opening, Spellacy beckoned his friend, and seizing his hand, as he hung back in wondering hesitation, drew him into a long passage, dark, and becoming somewhat wider as they advanced. The first intimation the young farmer received of the nature of the place to which he was about to be introduced, was conveyed in a sound resembling the clink of small hammers faintly heard, and an occasional murmur of human voices, alternated by the creaking of some great machine, the working of which caused a degree of tremulous insecurity in the floor beneath them. All, however, was hushed into a perfect stillness the moment Spellacy applied his fingers to the latch of a small door, which yielded to the effort, and disclosed the interior of the apartment.

"Chaisin a moch?" was grumbled by a hoarse voice from within.

"Suil Dhuv!" exclaimed the companion of Kumba.

"Gudhain ella?" asked the same voice.

Spellacy made no answer, but motioned Kumba with his hand to remain in the darkness, where he was, and passed into the room. This, with its inmates, was fully visible to the latter, whose already excited brain was filled with a thousand new visions of terror, as his eye wandered over the details of a scene, with which were associated even the horrors of his infant life, when the name of the blood-stained gang, on the threshold of whose lair he now stood, was used to quell the peevish querulousness of his childish heart—and made him cling with murmurs of dependent anxiety to the bosom of his fosterer.

A large fire, formed with a mixture of culm and heavy turf, supplied the principal portion of the light by which the inmates of the place were enabled to carry on their secret toil. Near the centre of the room, the farther end of which was almost completely enveloped in the evolutions of a black and sulphurous smoke, was an engine at work, the whitish and wavering light of the furnace revealing, in fitful alternations of brilliancy and gloom, the aged countenance of the artificer, a white-haired man, whose large glistening eyes and hoary, straight locks presented a ghastly contrast to his smutted and wasted features. The effect of this figure on Kumba's heart was such as might be occasioned by a sudden indication of life on the features of a mummy. Around this person a number of figures were constantly sitting through the uncertain light, some young, some advanced in years—the countenances of all marked with a degree of sternness which could not but be considered as the result of a habitual ferocity of temper, and which was rendered double forcible and repugnant in its effect by the murk and dusky hue which the features had acquired from the thickened atmosphere around them. Kumba shrank back involuntarily whenever any of their eyes happened to glance in his direction, although a moment's consideration might have satisfied him that he was perfectedly sheltered from observation by the darkness in which he stood. The men were, for the most part, uncoated, the sleeves of their coarse and blackened bande-linen shirts being tucked up, after the fashion of blacksmiths, about their shoulders—their harsh, brown chests half exposed, and their hands employed with various tools, of the immediate use of which the unseen spectator was ignorant. Notwithstanding the anxiety, even approaching to terror, which made the heart of the latter knock fiercely against his ribs as he gazed upon the scene, and although he deemed an introduction to this fearful circle of desperadoes as little less than a death warrant, he could not resist the emotions of that violent and unaccountable curiosity which compels a man so strongly to neglect all other considerations when weighed against the opportunity of its gratification, and which seems to increase precisely in proportion to the extent of the danger which it involves. Hearing Spellacy engaged in conversation with a number of persons at a little distance inside, and anxious, he thought not wherefore, to learn the purport of their conversation, he began to meditate a nearer approach. A heap of turf gradually ascending to the very roof, and extending several feet into the room, appeared to afford the best means he could desire of accomplishing this purpose. He crept cautiously up, trembling in all his limbs, as the action of his person seemed to menace the unstable pile of peat sods with a general downfall. In a few seconds he lay lengthwise, within a foot of the thatched roof, while the knot of confabulators was visible immediately beneath his eye. His friend Spellacy, whom he now surveyed with a new and fearful interest, since he became invested, by his own avowal, with all the terrible associations connected with the name of Suil Dhuv, the Chainer, was standing in the centre of the group, one of whom was in the act of concluding a detail, which appeared to excite a feeling of displeasure and perplexity in the mind of their leader.

"And that's the way of it, just," the fellow continued, throwing up his hands in a hopeless way, "all at a stand for the wash to give 'em a colour. I rise out of it for a business entirely. I'll take a spade, like Jerry O'Gilvy, and work a drass, av I don't want to be starved, all out."

"Whist! you innocent!" said a fair-faced youth, who stood near, and saw the black eyes of their leader kindle on the speaker.

"Och 'iss—av I could wash over a guinea be tellen a fable or an ould story, I needn't go past you I know."

"Where's Maney O'Neil's ingot?" asked Spellacy.

"O! what's that Suil Dhuv is talken of?" exclaimed a strange voice from a far corner. "Let Maney and his 'git alone, do ye. What could ye make of it in a wash, in comparison of what I make of it the way ye know ye'selves? 'Tis Awney Farrel put that in ye'r heads, but he had best change his tone, the Dublin clea'-boy that he is, av he has a mind to stay in my service."

"Was Awney out to-day?" asked the old man near the engine.

"He was; and I heard a party coming to the door as I left the house, with Awney by their side," said Spellacy.

"Well, that's somethen any way. What road do they take? and how many of us is to be on their track? And how much o' the money do they look to have? Eh? That Awney is a smart lad. With his scrap o' Latin and his off-hand free-an'-easy way, he'd desave the airth."

"I'll arrange all those particulars, when I return to the inn," said Spellacy.

"Do, then—and do somethen for uz at last—as you get uz to do uvury thing for you. What gain had we by blowing out the brains of the ould dark Segur, only pleasing you, bekays his relation in Garmany kicked—"

The sound of a heavy blow and a deep groan cut short this speech, to which Kumba was lending a terrified attention.

"Now, ruffian!" exclaimed Spellacy, "have you gained nothing? I have the use of my old hand yet, eh? Take him to the far end o' the room, one o' ye!"

The stunned and speechless wretch was instantly conveyed from the circle, and a deep silence followed. Kumba listened with renewed anxiety, although the quickness and boldness of this assertion of his authority by Spellacy conveyed an immediate sense of security to himself, which was only qualified by his awakened doubts as to the real character and intentions of the man.

"There's no occasion for ye to be looking at one another that way," said Spellacy, determinedly. "As I served him, so I'll serve every one of ye that dares to question the command you yourselves gave me, while there's a drop o' blood in this arm"—and he extended one, the rigid muscles of which worked like small cables, as he slowly clenched his fist while he spoke. "Ye'll mind my orders, and 'twill be better for ye. Isn't that calf done bleating yet?"

"He axes yer pardon for forgotten himself," said the fair-faced lad, in a soft and conciliating tone. The wounded man dissented, with a noise similar to that short thick bark which a mastiff gives in its sleep.

"I never make words with Suil Dhuv," said the old white-haired man near the engine, rising from his place, his limbs all shaking with the palsied impotence of age—and a horrible hyena convulsion, too frightful for laughter, mingling its hoarse and sudden peals with a fit of heavy coughing and wheezing, which seemed as though it would shatter him momentarily to pieces—"I never quarrel wit him for clinchen a bizniz well—'tis—O—hugh—hugh!—this chest o' mine!—'tis the safest and the surest course by half. That was our word—hugh—hugh—among the Rapparees of ould times—in my young—O this back o' mine!—hugh—hugh!—young days—when they used to be laughen at strong John Macpharson for never passen a good squeeze—and he coom to the gallows by that same, too. I seen—hugh—I seen him myself playen up Macpharson's tune, and he goen to the tree. Ah, ha, John, thought I wit myself (but I said nothen) av you tuk the advice o' Redmond's lads, you'd be sporten on the highway still, instead o' bein' playen at your own funeral—hugh—hugh! O Misthur darlen Suil Dhuv! gi' me somethen for this cough o' mine! Nothen—nothen—we used all to say to Shawn, like a taste o' blood for salen a matter up. I'm sixty-eight years now in this world, an' I never seen a dead man mount a witness table yit. Ah! never trust one of 'em, Suil darlen, an' you'll laugh at the law all your days—an' the comfort ov it, too, whin you're used to it—and—" (here a fit of coughing seized the speaker, so violent and suffocating, that Kumba, whose whole attention had been fascinated and concentrated by this display of perfect depravity, imagined that the ruffian had consummated his impieties in the patient ear of Heaven, and was about to be summoned to an instant and awful judgment.)

"This culm-smoke that's killen me intirely," the fellow continued, taking his seat at the bottom of the very heap of turf on which Kumba lay, and causing it to shake under him. "No! Suil Dhuv—folly my ways. As long as ever I live, I'll kill. Kill first, and rob after, is my word—and I'll stick to it—aye—always—O my poor back—intirely!"

"Poor deceived wretch," thought Kumba, an emotion of great pity mingling itself with all his horror. "Does this hoary villain, with the red guilt of a life of blood upon his soul—the arm of an angry God made bare above his head—this miserable creature, the strings of whose life appeared to be all let down—with a frame whose least motion is almost sufficient to shake its structure to pieces—who sits there shaking and laughing and ready to fall bone after bone, already mouldering, into the grave—does this idiot demon plan future scenes of murder for himself? Poor, deceived, unhappy wretch! This is horrible!" And in an emotion of deep feeling, such as people of an enthusiastic temper and susceptible mind are liable to experience at witnessing any extraordinary novelty, either in the moral or physical world, he clasped his hands together, and felt his eyes fill, and his whole frame tremble with a wholesome and softening agitation.

Immediately, and by one of those startling bounds which reason makes, when accidentally freed from the restraint that was imposed upon her by passion and convenience, she springs into her own, free dominion and mounts, to her real station in the soul—ascending, not by the slow steps of inference and deduction, but piercing, with one glance, the mists which worldly interests have gathered around the naked brightness of truth—dashing aside at a single effort the cobweb snares of her false sister sophistry, and trampling and hurling downward in her flight the loose and crumbling obstacles, among which she has been long imprisoned by selfish motive and human respect—in an instant—and by a transition as rapid—a perfect and illuminating change was worked in the soul of Kumba. While he gazed on the old man the fearful and terrifying suggestion darted through the brain, that his was the close of a career commencing like his own.

"With prosperous wing full summed,"

His heart froze within his bosom—and then burned—and grew cold again, while a sudden damp stood on his brow and limbs, and his eyes became rivetted and fixed in spite of himself on the hoary and palsied murderer—whom he began now to look on as a future self of himself—the double-goer of his age!—a spectre conjured back from the days to come, for the purpose of startling him, like another Hazael, with a reflection of his future soul. He clasped his hands once more fearfully—and lost, in the intensity of his agitation, a part of the conversation which ensued. The first sound from beneath that again fixed his attention was the mention of his own name, pronounced in a heated and passionate tone by Spellacy. The old man was replying, when Kumba's attention was aroused—

"O don't mind that, Suil Dhuv, 'tis like the dhrams o' whiskey. Let him get the taste of it wanst, an' sez av he won't long fur it again. 'Twas the same way wit meself jest. The first blood I iver tuk was that of a 'ittle mouseen that bit me finger in a mail-tub. Ah ha, fait my lad, siz I, an' I not four year ould the same time, I'll ha' my rivinge o' you any way; an' I caught him be the tail an' I hung him over the blaze of a slip of bog-dale—and he screechen an' I laughen' an' grinden' my teeth as it might be this way—till he died, burnt in the blaze—and my father laughen' an' houlden me mother, that was for runnen' and tairnen' the 'ittle cratur from betune me fingira." Here a renewed convulsion of coughing and laughter seized the wretch—"Then I used to slit the throats o' the chickens to save the maids the trouble—this way wit the scissor—and after I'd get one o' the pigs to give 'um a knock o' the hatchet whin the butcher would come to the house at Aisther or Christmas—an' sometimes, may be I'd haugh the stout cow fur him when she wouldn't stand steady—I wish I could stand steady, now I know—O millia murther! and 'tis I that ought to say that! How the butcher an' all of 'em laughen the fusht time when I tuk the sharp edge, instid o' the broad back o' the hatchet—ha! ha! 'Twas that fusht made 'em put the name o' Red Roddy upon me—though it's White Roddy wit me now, any way," he concluded, raising his long silver hair with a smile which had so much of melancholy in it, as to astonish Kumba with the conviction that the hard and ungentle nature even of such a being as this, was not incapable of retaining amid the petrification of all its benevolent susceptibilities—a selfish softness and tenderness of feeling in its own regard.

"Paugh! What has all this to do wit the robben' o' Lilly Byrne and her—"

"Hush-sh-sh!" Spellacy hastily interrupted the speaker.

"For what? Eh? Who's there? Are we betrayed? Ay—do! strike me agin an' agin after that, if you have a mind, but I'll do my duty. Have you any body lissen' to us?"

The name of his mistress, pronounced in such ruffian fashion, occasioned such an agitation of rage and horror in Kumba's soul, that it was with difficulty he restrained himself from rushing into the midst of the group and hazarding every thing for an instant elucidation of the designs which were under debate. Chance did for him what prudence, however, forbade him attempting. The old man, Roddy, quickly rising from his seat at the base of the turfen heap, disturbed materially the already frail structure that sustained the listener. A few sods fell; in the effort to prevent a further peril, Kumba shook the whole fabric and came tumbling headlong, amid the clatter of the falling fuel and the savage yells of the outrageous gang, who started back from the circle with exclamations of rage and terror.

"Therom a-shkien! Mauriga Spy!" shouted one, in a rapture of vengeance.

"Rosth erdhai fier dhen thinna," cried another, springing on the youth, with a yell of ferocious anger.

"Fauscai—hugh! hugh—fauscai mock a nihin leshai press!" wheezed out Red Roddy; all clamouring together, in their venacular idiom, in their sudden excitement of the moment.

"Connidh-a-law! Esaun-dha succur a bherom kath!" Spellacy suddenly shouted out, in accents that made the floor shake beneath them, while he placed himself in an attitude of determined resistance between the gang and his prostrate friend, over whom Red Roddy had uplifted a short bar of iron, with a degree of strength which nothing less stimulating than the prospect of an immediate gratification of his ruling passion could have struck into his palsied arm.

There was a pause—while the eyes of all were directed on their leader.

"Fools, dolts!" at length he exclaimed, his round black eyes sparkling with a light which might have readily accounted to a stranger for the cognomen which had been conferred upon him—"a brass pin would make me lave him to ye, to let ye see what ye'd get by ye'r mane suspicion of one that's a better friend than ye'r selves to ye! An' you, you graat baste, that nothing 'll ever tache," addressing the wounded man, "it's the dint o' the bare compassion that prevents me maken' a smash o' your head upon the floor. Get up, Mr. Kumba, an' tell 'em who you are."

Kumba arose and gazed around him. The men slowly relaxed their attitudes of rigid passion, and old Rody, lowering his weapon, tottered, with many discontented mutterings, towards his ancient place, near the stamping press.

"We meant no harm," said the wounded man; "but there's little admiration we shouldn't know a friend that coom that way, so droll, tumbling down o' a hape o' turf into the middle of us, all at wanst, out."

"May be," said Jerry, with a very soft sneer, "that's the way of interducshins among the gintlemin, that we knows nothen about?"

It was some moments before the young man fully recollected himself. When he did so, all the consequences and difficulties of his situation came rushing swiftly upon his mind; and as he had already, in one rapid glance at the approaching possibilities, determined upon his course, the peril which they involved made his heart beat and tremble within him. He felt himself, nevertheless, amid all the gathering anxiety that began to creep within his bosom, more at liberty to debate and decide them, while he was yet in comparative safety—for there are doubtless many natures, while yet unformed and undecided, in which the elements of vigour and energy are loosely scattered, and which require the impulse of extremity itself to call them into confident action; as a vane, that flaps from point to point of the compass, while it is visited by feeble currents of air, will firmly fix and settle when the black tempest is poured about it.

While Kumba thus remained, gazing upon the circle—and charged (to use a chemical metaphor) with an intense and uncompromising purpose—his frame covered with the dew of anxiety, and trembling for itself, while the mind maintained that fearful and clear-sighted serenity which governed the tottering steps of the martyrs of the early faith, or that feeling which, to use a more familiar though less noble illustration, throws a degree of grace and dignity into the movements of the hopeless wretch who journeys to his fate at the summons of the injured spirit of justice—while he remained buoyed up, amid a tumult of agitating reflections, by this sudden firmness of resolution, the men with whom he was preparing his heart to endure a keen encounter of moral or physical strength, as the case might be (the latter evidently hopeless), recommenced their deliberation of the mysterious design of which Kumba had already received so terrifying a glimpse.

"'Tis almost time for us to be starten, I'm thinkin'," said Jerry, withdrawing a heavy cloth, and exposing a small pane, through which the dark red, level light of a sullen evening sun darted across the room, forming a singular contrast to the whitish, ghastly lustre of the furnace, as it struck in succession on the outlines of stern and smutted features, and fragments of scattered tools, tinging the white and eddying volumes of vapour with deep crimson, and losing itself in the dense gloom long before it could have struck the further wall of the apartment.

Spellacy glanced at Kumba before he replied. The look with which he was encountered by the latter, as fixed and resolute as his own, did not appear to please him.

"Mr. Kumba has no means o' goen," said he doubtfully.

"An' there four able bastes under uz, and only three of uz goen wit him?"

"I forgot that. Go and saddle them, Jerry. Did you bring your arms, Mr. Kumba?"

"Just Providence! no——," the young man exclaimed, suddenly thrusting one hand into his bosom, and claspings his brow with the other, while a pang of disappointment shot into his heart. The real cause of his regret was, fortunately, not understood by the hearers.

"Pho! don't mind that. I'll lend you a pair of the best feather-springs that ever said 'pop!' for touch 'em. Put these in your houlther." Kumba eagerly reached at the weapons, but almost gasped his renewed disappointment, when the wounded man who had been narrowly watching his eyes, put the pistols down with his hand and waved Kumba back.

"Easy!" he exclaimed; "fair an' easy goes far in a day. We'll know your maning first, a' you please."

"Hold!" said Kumba, manning himself by a strong effort—"We must clearly understand each other. What are your designs, and what do you expect from me? Speak for I must know them!" The firmness with which he spoke the last sentence, commanded for the first time an involuntary sentiment of respect among the ruffians, over whom the spectacle of aroused-up virtue had not ceased to exercise an influence akin to that which, as we are taught, the demons fell in the contemplation of divinity.

"Let me explain all to Mr. Kumba," said Spellacy, moving towards him, and about to lay his hand on the arm of the latter, who shrunk back as if he thought the touch would have blistered him.

"No colloquen!" said a voice from behind.

Spellacy darted a rapid glance in the direction of the voice, but no lips moved there.

"No cott'nen' in corners!" said another.

Again the black eyes of the Coiner endeavoured to penetrate the darkness, but with no greater success. His blood seethed in its channels.

"Let uvery thing be abo' board!" muttered a third voice. Suil Dhuv, who at once felt the danger of any compromise of dignity, made no further effort to discover the disaffected, but assuming a perfect indifference of manner, proceeded towards Kumba.

"Let it be as he says," said the latter, whose spirit fainted as the anxiety of a hope stole upon it. "Come, Spellacy, come to your own house and we'll speak of it there, and depend upon it, if the plan appears reasonable to me, I'll not be backward in——" He stopped the sentence and compressed his lips, as in turning his head aside he beheld Red Rody slipping the door-bolt into its place, and regarding him with a horrid side-long leer.

"A' then—hugh!—a' then wasn't it the little chicken he was? 'Coom to ye'r own house, Spellacy,' siz he—O thin the knowen' boy he was!—hugh—hugh! 'If your plans be raiz'nubble' wishe!—

'If ifs an ans

Wor kittles an pans

Ther'd be small use for the tinkers'—

Shasthane if! You had your liberty wit the ifs before you coom here, masther, you'll have to dale wit the musts now, I'm thinkin'.

Kumba's heart once more sunk within him, but his despair was perfectly accomplished when he beheld Spellacy endeavouring to repress a smile at the incident. The hollowness of the ruffian's friendship at once rushed upon his understanding, and showed him that he stood in this peril, solitary and unfriended, and even unfelt for.

"Coom, coom!" exclaimed the wounded man—"let the jintleman know what's wanten.' Sur, av you please, we're in want o' money, an' we're goen to look fur it at Drumcanlon. Bekays you know the ways o' the place, in regard o' being coorten' the young lady there, of ould—we want you to try it wit us, and take Miss Lilly Byrne (an a lily she is—an' a darlen lily, all over, sure)—fur your share o' the plunder."

The gradually increasing passion which nerved and expanded the figure of Kumba as he listened to this speech, and at length boiled within his heart, now burst forth with a degree of violence which made even the ruffian start and change colour. "Villain!" the young man broke out, but the torrent was checked in the very bound. The instinct of nature and habit suggested his course almost involuntarily to the man. He levelled a pistol at the head of the youth, and looked coldly and wonderingly in his eye. The latter remained in the attitude of the interrupted passion, gaping on his opponent, his limbs shaking audibly beneath him, his arms still extended, and his fists clenched, until a sudden change came over his person. The hot anger that filled him exuded in a cold and chilling sweat—a sickening sensation crept through his breast—a hard throbbing struck painfully through his brain—and mists floated before his eyes, through which the form of the Coiner, who still kept the weapon steadily presented, seemed by degrees to acquire a satanic grandeur and indistinctness of outline. The youth relaxed his closed hands, and endeavoured, while he still stared like one spell-bound into the bore of the pistol, to catch at some support.

"Let us lose no time," said the man, making Kumba start, with a sudden gasp of fear, at the first sound of his voice. "Coom, sir! Are you for us or against us?"

"Spellacy!.....Spellacy!".....muttered Kumba, in a low and listless tone. But Suil Dhuv did not answer him.

"Wance for all, I say, will you be wit uz?"

"I am alone! I am unarmed! I am betrayed!" Kumba again murmured, in a tone so expressive of utter agony, that it touched the heart of Jerry.

"Murther, murther in Irish! O the poor lad!" he exclaimed, "let him think a little."

Again the query was repeated, and again Kumba neglected to answer. The man vented an oath, and cocked the weapon. "Is it game you're maken?" he asked fiercely.

"No.....n.....no! I do not insult you.....I.....no.....Spellacy, hurry!.....stay!.....One moment!.....Ah! Spellacy, is it all come to this?"

"Spellacy can't help you, sir!" said Suil Dhuv, "but you can help yourself."

"Choose between a 'Yes' and a 'No,' for that's all the arguing we'll hear from you."

A long silence ensued, while Kumba made an effort to take the election. He endeavoured to set his frame, and stand more erect—a short panting terror—a swift glance at his past life—a sudden and gloomy fear—a doubtful prayer—and an instant and cheering resolution to make a last compensation by dying for the right—all glanced in rapid succession through his mind. When the question was repeated he set his teeth hard—and said through them, hoarsely but firmly, "Never!"

At the same instant a tall, ungainly, straggling figure darted between both, struck up the pistol—and fled into the darkness near the door. Kumba heard it open and shut.

"Why thin, had com to you, Maney," exclaimed the coiner—"wait till——." Before the sentence was finished Kumba seeing his advantage, sprung upon the speaker, levelled him upon the earth with a despairing blow, and planting one foot upon his breast, wrenched the pistol from the unconscious fingers of his victim. He was in a posture of vigorous and vigilant resistance before one of his enemies had recovered from their astonishment. Setting one shoulder against the press, and bending his frame so as to concentrate all its strength and elasticity, he remained glancing from face to face, and watching the motions of all with that exquisite instinct of vigilance to which extremity awakens the senses. A vigorous struggle ensued. The coiners began to hem him closely round—and a few missiles—sods of turf—pieces of loose iron, or timber, were flung at him from the darkness. The more dangerous missiles, however, fortunately, were not numerous—the peat-sod he scarcely felt, and the few blows he received from the heavier weapons were not immediately or deeply injurious; and, as none of the gang appeared inclined to tempt the first fire of his single weapon, he began almost to entertain hopes of being able to capitulate, when he heard somebody scrambling on the press over him, and saw Suil Dhuv's eyes glisten with approbation as he looked in that direction. In an instant he received a blow on the crown of the head which made the room appear all wrapt in one red flame, and then as instantly enveloped in total gloom. His skull felt as if it were about to dissolve upon his shoulders. His arms dropped—his heart swung and fluttered in his bosom, and all was—darkness.

"Ha! ha! ha!" chuckled the white-haired ruffian, as he endeavoured to descend from his hold—"I thought I hadn't lost the knack of it yet. Quiet and aisy, he is now, isn't he, why! He'll tell nobody now, only two sorts of people—thin that axis him, and thin that doesn't. Gi' me a hand, Jerry—O this cough of mine!—hugh!—hugh! A cough—a coffin they say. Wipe the blood from his forehead, do ye, boys—and go about ye'r biznis, file I stay an' watch my lad!"

HISTORY.—If men could learn from history, what lessons it might teach us! But passion and party blind our eyes; and the light which experience gives is a lantern on the stern, which shines only on the waves behind us.

THE SIBYLS AND THEIR BOOKS.

ONE of the great results of Christianity has been the destruction of superstition, and all the evils which used to flow from it. The prevalence of its influence in ancient times was general. It was confined to no rank, to no degree of education, or ignorance. Society was subject to its most degrading forms, and ruled by its power. Men lived in an atmosphere of dread which continually surrounded their actions, and they sought in some way or other to find a balance for their dominated reason. It was this which gave to the Sibyls of heathen countries and pagan people the authority which they exercised. They were consulted in the belief that their answers would guide the consultant in the future. The etymology of their name has been derived from two Greek words, signifying that their counsel was divine, because it was believed that those women were inspired by some divinity, in whose name they gave response in the oracles. Other etymologists assert that the first Pythoness known, lived many ages before the Trojan war, and was called Sibylla. Hence, they say, all women who afterwards exercised the art of divination bore the name of Sibyls.

The most celebrated were Sibylla, Manto, daughter of Tiresias; Demophile Athenais, Nyas, Malenchreus, Delphobe, and Tiburtine. The answers which they gave were generally tortuous, obscure, and not only could be interpreted in many ways, but even adapted themselves to events the most opposite. Those ambiguous forms were of prime necessity, in order that the oracle should not be subject to error, as it had almost always reason to avoid it. To understand this, we need but recapitulate a few of those Sibylline responses.

The Medes desiring to know the result of the war which they waged upon the Babylonians, consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, and were answered that "the victory should belong to those who most honoured the gods." The Babylonians, consulting the same oracle, on the same occasion, received assurance of victory on the same conditions, however, they lost the battle. In consequence they attributed the cause of it to some faults committed towards the gods.

Philip of Macedon, seized by a desire to consult the oracle, enquired of the Sybil of the oracle of Trifonius, what time he had of his life remaining; the oracle answered him: "My child, if thou wouldst live long, beware of chariots." From the hour of that warning Philip never afterwards sat in a chariot. When he was eventually assassinated by the traitor Pausanias it was proclaimed over all Greece that the oracle was fulfilled, because the figure of a chariot was sculptured on the point of the sword which had traversed his bosom. Another of those ambiguous answers is found in the story related of a rich merchant of Corinth, in love with a young Eupatrid who disdaind his sighs. The lover, "sighing like a furnace," went to consult the oracle at Delphos, to ascertain if the young girl should ever return his affection, or in the contrary case if he should try a leap from the rock of Leucadia. The oracle, which he had largely endowed, replied to him: "The chameleon changes, woman resembles it. The wise man should never despair."

Making such answers it is very clear that the oracle and its Sybil could never be found deceptive. A remark of Voltaire, in observing on the predictions of the Sibyls, was very judicious. He said that they resembled the prophecies of the Almanack of Liege, when that compilation foretold that "a great mar; shall die this year; there will be shipwrecks." Indeed it is rare that in the course of a year there should be no death amongst the great, or no vessel cast away; and the Sibyls were as prophetic in this view as the compiler of Liege Almanacks, the antiquated Mathew Lansberg.

It is well to observe that the Sibyls answered always according to the desire of any powerful person who consulted them. The priests of Delphos, fearing that Philip of Macedonia should pillage their temple, caused their oracle always to speak in favour of that king. It was on this account that Demosthenes, when the announcement of the oracular response was made to the people as an argument against war with the Macedonian prince, made answer: "The Sibyl philipises." Alexander the Great, after his father's death, rendered vain by victory, desiring to be considered the son of Jupiter Ammon, forewarned the officials of the oracle that he would soon consult it. However, when he arrived, it was at a period of the year when the oracle was silent and he could obtain no answer. Entering into the temple he seized the Sibyl by the arm, forcing her to be seated on the tripod. At this act of violence, knowing with whom she had to deal, the Sibyl cried aloud: "No one can resist thee, O my son!" This exclamation Alexander took as the oracular response, which presaged a career of conquest for him.

With such weight given to their merest ravings, or most cunning sentences, the oracles and prophecies of all the Sibyls were collected into a number of volumes, and were held in the greatest veneration. They were reduced into verse and preciously guarded in the temples, with all the respect due to sacred things. Under the reign of the elder Tarquin, an old unknown woman brought to Rome the Sibylline books, and proposed that the king should purchase them, but, being asked the price, she named one so exorbitant that he only laughed at her. Then the old woman, who was afterwards recognised as the Sibyl Demo, cast the three first books into the fire, and required the same sum she previously asked for the six others she had left. As Tarquin hesitated still, Demo gave three of the remaining books to the flames, and offered the three last, demanding the price she first required for them, or else she would destroy what remained of the precious collection. Astonished at this tenacity, the king convoked the council of augurs, who decided in common accord that it was necessary to yield to the conditions of the Sibyl, and withdraw from her hands the precious volumes.

In consequence of this the Sibylline books were immediately purchased, and enclosed in a coffer of cedar wood. The augurs carried them thus in great pomp to the Capitol, and a college of priests was created in order to care them duly, for an oracle had predicted that the salvation of Rome depended on their preservation. At the time of the burning of the Capitol, under the dictatorship of Sylla, the Sibylline books became the prey of the flames. This was a great calamity; the republic gave itself up for lost. They hastened to name deputies who went to Erythrea, to Delphos, to Cumæ, and to all the places wherein oracles existed, in order to collect all the Sibylline verses which either the priest had preserved, or tradition had perpetuated there. When they had been collected Augustus deposited them in a urn of gold, and concealed them under the statue of Apollo, in the temple on the Palatine Hill. There they remained until the year 400 of the Christian era, at which time a violent fire broke out which destroyed the temple, and the Sibylline books were burned and lost for ever.

GENIUS AND COMMON SENSE.

A PLAIN BIOGRAPHY.

ABOUT twenty years ago, when sensation literature was in its cradle, the proprietor of a New York magazine offered, we forget, but think it was, five hundred dollars for a prize poem. The proposition, emanating from a source not over-remarkable for liberality or appreciation, caused some surprise, and ever y one in the city capable of rhyming "dove" to "love" (those everyones form a very populous community) had a dash at the promised reward. The day appointed for the examination of the poems came, and the prize was adjudged to a composition called "The Raven." The reading of the poem filled the room with a strange delight for which they could not give a rational apology. The piece, as Dick Steele would say, appealed but little to their humanities, disporting itself in realms where "foot never trod," and finally merging to a conclusion which was as vague and indefinite as its beginning. The author was summoned before the constituted tribunal to receive the laurel, or what he prized more dearly, the cash of it. A young man, dressed in tatters, of a dissipated appearance presented himself as judges.

"What is the gentleman's name?" asked the president, in a low whisper; to the registrar of the court,

The latter smiled and bowed. "Edgar Allan Poe!"

Thenceforth, that name became famous in America and Europe.

The literature of our cousins in the West (pity they don't pass an honest act for the protection of copyright), is fast becoming a familiar guest in homes and circles at this side the Atlantic. Washington Irving's "History of New York," first drew attention to the breed of authors who were turning up amongst our kinsmen, and the "Sketch Book" confirmed the very favourable impression produced by his first essay. Cooper had long enchanted us with his gentlemanly, chivalrous Red-men, and sentimental squaws, in novels which gave us the picturesque side of Indian life, leaving its gross, and coarse, and filthy features untouched. The delusion was exceedingly pleasant, and we continued to accept it heartily long after the gorgeous panorama of the artist had proved to be nothing more than a miserable Fata Morgana. Bryant astonished us with the marvels which the poetic genius of the West was capable of accomplishing. His poetry appeared to have derived much of its inspiration from the Elizabethan school, but to it was superadded a freshness that breathed of forest and savannah, of mountain peak and deep valley. The tender, religious poetry of Longfellow increased still more our reverence for the new school. "Evangeline" drove Scott and Byron out of many households, supplanting them with a purer form of metrical fiction than had ever before been conceived or attempted in either country. Then came Poe, about whose life and genius there hangs a mystery, rivalled in opacity only by that which encompasses the name of Shakespeare. Who he was we have certain data to explain—whence he derived the peculiar stores of fancy and information which render his works the delight of millions in every land where the English language has penetrated, we are at a loss to conjecture. He belongs to no sect, has adopted the maxims of no clique, shares no pedestal with any other statue, preferring to stand on the basis formed by the too few works he has given to posterity. The wonder of the man is his severe individuality. In Shakespeare you detect traces of Marlowe; in Coleridge the mystic influences of the German thinkers; Byron reminds one of Scott, and Moore of Suckling; but this man reminds one only of himself. He sits on the highest rung of a ladder, radiant as Jacob's; the steps by which he ascended have fallen away—the puzzle lies in his isolated elevation.

He was born in Baltimore, Virginia, in 1811, a state by the way rather remarkable for the many brilliant men it has contributed to the constellation of American genius. The usual biography of great characters opens somewhat in this way: "Mr. Smith was born of humble but honest parents." Poe enjoyed exemption from this category of talent, for we are given to understand that he was of honourable descent—come of a long line; and no research has discovered that it ended in a loop. A namesake of his felt the pulse of and prescribed for Elizabeth, during the latter days of her life, "when troubles thickened sore upon the most wise sovereign." A namesake of the doctor is the head of a highly respectable Irish family who bear his coat-of-arms. No connection between them and the American Poes has been established by the researches of biography, and to admit the truth, the failure of proving the identity but slightly concerns us. Edgar's great-grandfather married a daughter of Admiral M'Bride; his son was a quarter-master in the American line, and his grandson, our author's father, was an actor. He married in early life a fascinating and talented actress with whom he lived poor but happy, rich in her affections and graces. Both tried the stage for a short time, and—failed. It is a horrible word to register, but how are we to get rid of history? Both died young leaving three children to shift for themselves on the chances or the benevolence of the world. Edgar began the experiment of living on nothing at a very early stage of his career, and we regret to think that the essay proved short of successful. He was "as naked as a cherub" and as airy, busily employed in the construction of Chateaux en Espagne, without once considering the embarrassments of ground rent. How he fished in the troubled waters of those wretched days no records remain to show. But a bright gleam steals across the picture of his life in the person of a Mr. Allan, a childless gentleman of property, who adopted the lad, brought him to England, and placed him at school at Stoke Newington. His English experience does not appear to have much improved Master Edgar's character. He was a wild, passionate boy, deficient in self-control, and given to ingenious plans for provoking the temper of his masters. He was very handsome—which is more than many of the poets can boast of—and became a spoiled pet of the few women he met in society. Not remarkable for conversational powers or humour of the humblest description, no one took him for a genius, and he was too young to set up for a character. We believe we do his memory no injustice when we say, that he quarrelled with his patron, fell into disgrace, and finally returned to America at the age of twelve. Shortly after his arrival, he entered the academy at Richmond, where a few brilliant eccentricities procured his expulsion. He tried the university of Charlottesville with the same result. Driven by circumstances to adopt the habits of an Ishmaelite, he made a slight experiment in the way of bills (the cumulative curses of early life), and as he had not the ability to meet them, applied for assistance to his old friend Mr. Allan. That generous person readily relieved his embarrassments, and Edgar having succeeded so far returned to the bills again and again. Mr. Allan grew disgusted and refused further aid, whereupon Master Edgar, undutiful boy, wrote the old gentleman a sarcastic letter, and, packing up a few shirts, set out to fight for the Greeks in the war of Independence.

He never reached the scene of warfare. It appears he vagabondised about the Mediterranean for a considerable time, and finally turned up in St. Petersburg. He had begged his way across the continent, and came to throw himself on the bounty of the American consul. That functionary, touched by the story of the youth's distresses, relieved him and sent him back to the States. Poor Mr. Allan welcomed the prodigal with open arms and sent him to the New York Military Academy. The prodigal went to the Academy and returned—cashiered!

Was there no hope left for so abandoned a vagrant? Yes. Literature, that grand refugium peccatorum of brain-topped destitution, became his friend, and Master Edgar published (of course) a volume of poems. First attempts are ordinarily unfortunate, they are rejected by the public to be devoured by the critics, and, thus digested, to serve the purpose of the snuff-seller. Curiously enough and in defiance of all laws, Poe, abandoned outcast, who had begged and been beggared, who drank like a fish and swore like a trooper, was an exception to the general run of beginners. Fancy this man, with all his faults and misfortunes, wrapping him up like a cloud, writing verses of such tender purity as those we quote:—

"TO HELEN.

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore,
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, way-worn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam
Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece
And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche
How statue-like I see thee stand,
The agate lamp within thy hand!
Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy Land!"

A recent writer says, in a brief critique on this poem, that "nothing could be more dainty, airy, amber-bright—in point of finish it is Horatian." We are told that it was written when Poe was only fourteen, but we must either reject the statement or reconcile ourselves to a miracle. In delicacy, exquisiteness, and singularity of pathos, it is unmatched by any of his later compositions. You may smile over that "hyacinth hair" if you will, but remember that none but a poet of the highest order could have invented the epithet. Master Poe's poems were, as the Bookseller says, "eminently successful." They ran through several editions with surprising nimbleness—were quoted and bepraised, till the writer was intoxicated with the vanity of his triumph. In truth, they presaged an era which has not yet passed by, the era of natural truth as opposed to the didactic abortions of that which preceded it. With the old school, meads were as always flowery, trees green, roses red, and rivers purled or meandered. With the new and, thank God, the healthier school, meads, and trees, and roses, and rivers have assigned to them their proper functions. The light of the foliage wrinkling into pleasant shadows, the odour, as well as the hue of the flower, the flash, the tinkle, the transparency of water, are caught up and embalmed for ever in the amber of the poet's imagination. Poe sounded the cuckoo note of the spring that was approaching. Can anything be finer than this noble passage from "Al Aaraaf"?

"Upreared upon a height arose a pile
Of gorgeous columns on the unburthened air,
Flashing from Parian marble that twin smile
Far down upon the wave that sparkled there,
And nursed the young mountain in its layer
Of molten stars their pavement, such as fall
Thro' ebon air, besilvering the pall
Of their own dissolution."

We mistake grievously if we detect not, in those early poems, faint echos of the music which pervades Shelly, and Tennyson, and poor John Keats. Indeed, Poe himself, in an apology for their publication, long after his fame was universal, says—"Private reasons, some of which have reference to the sin of plagiarism, and others to the date of Tennyson's first poems, have induced me, after some hesitation, to republish these, the crude compositions of my earliest boyhood." Posterity will insist on declining so modest an excuse for so wholesome an indiscretion.

In the fervour of his great success, Master Edgar, in order we presume, to render this epoch of life somehow remarkable, entered a foot regiment as a private, and disappeared for several years. He returned, got employment, made a hundred a year and, thus fortified against all mischances, married. His wife, we are told, was a lovely and amiable girl, and, debauchee as he was, he adored her. Unfortunately, we know too little of the domestic life of the young couple, but whenever the reverent hand of the husband lifts the veil, the wife appears invested in a spiritual beauty, an atmosphere of purity, and patience, and trustfulness. When Virginia died he poured out his soul in a little melody which is destined to live for ever. Perhaps, Poe had but little human sympathy; we fear he had not much; yet, surely, no one can read these lines and know their origin, without being deeply affected by their pathos and melancholy. Their music is the vibration of the strings of that rash man's heart: listen:—

"It was many and many a year ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden their lived, whom you may know
By the name of ANNABEL LEE;
And this maiden there lived with no other thought,
Than to love and be loved by me.

I was a child and she was a child,
In this kingdom by the sea;
But we loved with a love that was more than love
(and my ANNABEL LEE;
With a love that the winged seraphs of Heaven
Coveted her and me.

And this was the reason that long ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
A wind blew out of a cloud, chilling
My beautiful ANNABEL LEE,
So that her high-born kinsmen came
And bore her away from me,
To shut her up in a sepulchre
In this kingdom by the sea.

The angels not half so happy in heaven,
Went envying her and me—
Yes!—that was the reason (as all men know,
In this kingdom by the sea)
That the wind came out of the cloud by night,
Chilling and killing my ANNABEL LEE.

But our love it was stronger by far than the love
Of those who were older than we—
Of many far wiser than we;

* The angels.

And neither the angels in heaven above,
Nor the demons down under the sea,
Can ever dissever my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful ANNABEL LEE.

For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful ANNABEL LEE.
And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful ANNABEL LEE;
And so all the night tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling—my darling—my life and my bride,
In the sepulchre there by the sea—
In her tomb by the sounding sea."

He clung through all the vicissitudes of fortune firmly to his pen, notwithstanding; edited a couple of magazines, and whilst thus engaged published "The Golden Beetle," "The Purloined Letter," "The Fall of the House of Usher," and several other sketches in which profound analytical powers of the rarest quality were manifested. But no genius could preserve him from the results of the constant intemperance in which he indulged. Let us be just to society and confess that, to none more than to men of letters, are its indulgences extended, its goodnesses shown. To write a fine poem is a creditable feat; but to live a temperate life is a deed far worthier and nobler. It may be argued that "men of mind" must have stimulants to goad the lagging brain. If such incentives are required, Balzac, the hardest worker that ever lit a garret fire, found coffee wholesome and effective. The conclusion is to hand. If his talents be urged in apology, we reply that the possession of them but adds to the degradation of his vices.

We cannot afford to criticise the "Raven" in the short space allotted to us. Perhaps a more ingeniously constructed poem was never given to the public. It is wrong in a few details—the position of the bird and lamp, for instance—on the whole, it is gorgeous, original, and weird, but darkened by the shadow of a morbid imagination, half strangled by the spectres to which it gave birth.

On the 6th of October, 1849, Poe died, like one of our own gifted and unfortunate countrymen, in an hospital. To delirium tremens is attributed his hurried and awful death; but, on the whole, it was a fitting termination to a mispent life. Some charitable hand dropped flowers on the tomb of Nero. Let us, in the light of a nobler benevolence, cast no stone on the urn that holds the ashes of Edgar Allan Poe, leaving him to that higher Wisdom which shall judge him and us.

KILCLIEF CASTLE.

AMONGST the numerous architectural remains of antiquity which adorn the shores of the fertile county of Down, some of which we have already noticed, the Castle of Kilclief claims attention, as well on account of its early antiquity as of its fine preservation, and of some curious circumstances connected with its history, which have been collected by

Harris, the industrious historian of the county.

This fine example of the Anglo-Irish military keep is situated at the entrance of Strangford harbour, and is still entire, with the exception of the roof. It is of considerable size and height, and in its general form nearly a square, with the addition of two quadrangular wings in front, in one of which is a stair-case, and in the other a stack of closets. The first floor is vaulted, and the second has a stone chimney-piece, on which is carved the figure of a bird, resembling a hawk, and also a shield bearing a cross Pattee.

The name of the founder and period of the erection of this Castle are unknown; but its style of architecture sufficiently proves it to be of the early part of the fourteenth century. It, with the lands adjoining, which constituted a fine demesne of most of the finest quality in the barony, were an ancient see-house and manor of the Bishop of Down; and it is not unlikely that it was erected for their use, as we find from history, that it was inhabited by one of them early in the fifteenth century. A strong castle was not an inappropriate or unnecessary description of episcopal residence in those days.

There is a chamber in the Castle of Kilclief called the Hawk's Chamber, which Harris states, was, by the tradition of the old natives, the place where a Falconer and Hawks were kept; this tradition, however, might, as he adds, have arisen from the representation of the bird already noticed, as being sculptured on the chimney-piece in the castle. Kilclief owes its origin to the times of St. Patrick, who placed over a church here, which is now the parish church, two of his disciples who were brothers, named Eugenius and Neill. In a subsequent age, a hospital for Lepers was founded at Kilclief.

TEMPLECORAN CHURCH.

NEAR the little village of Ballycarry, on the Antrim coast, are situated the ruins of Templecoran Church. This spot has been rendered memorable by several interesting particulars. Here, in the year 1611, the first Presbyterian congregation in Ireland was established; in the adjoining cemetery is the grave of the Rev. Edward Brice, its first minister. The living of Kilroot, in which parish the ruins are situated, was the first to which the celebrated Dean Swift was appointed, but which he is said to have resigned from a natural aversion to retirement or solitude, for his life at Kilroot, so different from that which he had led with Sir William Temple, where he shared the society of all that were ennobled, either by genius or birth, soon became insipid. Temple, who had learned, by the loss of Swift, his real value, became solicitous that he should return to Moorpark. While Swift hesitated between relinquishing the mode of life which he had chosen, and returning to that which he had relinquished, his resolution appears to have been determined by a circumstance highly characteristic of his exalted benevolence. In an excursion from his habitation, he met a clergyman, with whom he formed an acquaintance, which proved him to be learned, modest, well-principled, the father of eight children, and a curate "passing rich on forty pounds a year." Without explaining his purpose, Swift borrowed this gentleman's black mare, having no horse of his own, rode to Dublin, resigned the prebendary of Kilroot, and obtained a grant of it for his new friend, whose joy assumed so touching an expression of surprise and gratitude, that Swift, himself deeply affected, declared he had never experienced so much pleasure as at that moment.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XIV.

OUR friend Faversham has passed through all these infantile fevers without a scar. The rose-leaves of his youth are gathered, and have lost their perfume. He is a man who has seen somewhat of the world. He has been at the giving in marriage of intimate friends. He has heard the squabbles over settlements, and seen Cupid with a housewife's apron tied about his wings, chalking figures upon a black board, and rubbing his curly locks wistfully over the balance. He has no thought of waking a princess after a thousand years' sleep, who shall straightway cry to him "my beloved," and live with him ever afterwards in perfect happiness. All he knows is that he is very uncomfortable about a certain young lady (he will not yet allow that he is in love with her), who would be very irate, indeed, were anybody to tell her that she had been awake or asleep twenty years. She has a father, who never had a poetic dream in his life, and never travelled beyond Ramsgate—a papa who smores after dinner with an amber bandanna over his head, and wakes to eat bread and cheese. Mr. Faversham is a prudent gentleman, and is setting himself very prosaic questions; and arguing with himself, and persisting in condemning himself as a fool and a dolt. He really thinks that his best course would be not to go to Jamaica Lodge again. He then affects to believe that it is not possible, nay, not probable, Miss Ashby can care about him. He contemplates her allied to a middle-aged city man, who will be able to maintain her in a substantial manner; to enable her to receive all the aristocracy of Peckham, and be a conspicuous donor to local charities; or she would be happy with a quiet clergyman. She is too pious and good for Mr. Faversham.

Mr. Faversham has too high an opinion of his own merits to hold all this in his heart. To wonder, doubt, and speculate is natural to this strange position in which he has suddenly found himself. He is struggling to convince himself that the symptoms which he saw were really to be interpreted as his vanity had interpreted them. He had been admonished once. He had already shaped one palace of ineffable delight, and it had vanished into the air. He could not be too cautious the second time. He had begun his reflections by pondering his own utter unworthiness; and now he was on his guard. It is he who is to be careful; he is the peerless prince who will brook no second reproof! He is putting on his armour, and mustering some firm resolves. The princess must have a care, since the prince is not to be trifled with. She must be on her best behaviour, and fall upon her knees betimes, or his mightiness will turn his lofty eyes in another direction.

Book I. Chapter the First! He could not get beyond—a most puzzling, and painful predicament. By his pen he hoped to climb, and it would not write a monosyllable. The result of his long morning, was the following. A trifle light as air.

A REASON WHY.

I've led you hither just to dream,
To note some strange, fantastic ties,
Between the flashes of your eyes,
And the bright ripples of this stream.

I've led you hither, just to show
A strange connection that I trace,
Between the curls that shade your face,
And yon trees bathed in sunset glow.

I've led you hither just to mark
The quaint suggestion of my dream,
As yonder willow meets the stream
To take a parting kiss at dark.

Mr. Faversham never enjoyed jokes made at the expense of the state of matrimony. He held that they were in bad taste. "He who ridicules marriage, seeks to cast damaging reflections on the honourable state in which his father and mother lived; where he was born." But now, in the warmth of the passion that was entering his heart, he became furious, when his friend Namby cracked his little jokes about Hymen. Faversham quoted Dr. Brown on the immediate emotions.

"The female character," said he, "may have its just influence; it is necessary that the female character should be respected."

"The female mind is decidedly irrational," Mr. Namby constantly exclaimed, and Mr. Faversham answered in the words of Rousseau, "Miserable must be the age in which this empire is lost, and in which the judgments of women are counted as nothing by man. Every people in the ancient world that can be said to have had morals has respected the sex—Sparta, Germany, Rome."

Topley's marriage gave rise to a conversation among his friends, in which opinions were freely expressed, not only on the prudence of the match, but on the family, manners, and appearance of the bride. Namby, who had been present at the wedding, described it in his own way, while Mr. Faversham, disgusted with the levity of the conversation, sat apart and read, or pretended to read the evening paper.

"It was the richest affair you ever saw," said Mr. Namby, "the very richest. The father of the bride was simply enormous. A get up, sir, that has not been equalled, since poor Wright deserted the boards of the Adelphi. A blue coat, and brass buttons of the finest Islington cut, a waistcoat so voluminous that I could get a shooting suit cut out of it, a collar that nearly cut his mulberry ears off, and, prepare yourselves for the final touch, his hair in long tunnels of curls that ran from the cross of his head far over his manly brow. Then there was the mamma, in a beauteous temper, of course. I could hear her in the morning giving strict injunctions to a drab of a girl hired for the auspicious day, to put down the turkey while we were gone to the church."

HOLLY AND IVY.

VIEWING the many strange and apparently unmeaning customs which characterize a people, the superficial observer will see only what may be laughed at, as ridiculous and absurd; whilst the antiquarian or philosopher, diving beneath the surface, and comparing the present with the past, is frequently enabled to separate, in wisdom's crucible, the dross from the finer metal, and thus to trace these customs to their true origin.

Ireland is a spot peculiarly marked by such customs; some derived from the earliest annals of Druidism, others coeval with Christianity, all richly deserving the inquiry of the critic, or the ingenious conjecture and research of the antiquary. The antique mummeries of a rude, unpolished peasantry, the boisterous and hearty mirth that at certain periods of the year bursts forth through every impediment, levelling the barriers that modern refinement would interpose, and giving full scope to the strong ebullition of natural feeling, show, that in sunshine or storm, in times of dearth or plenty, in the calm and sluggish stillness of debasing servitude, or the hurricane of political agitation, under every vicissitude of clime, the Irish peasant is the Irish peasant still, the light-hearted, generous, enthusiastic lover of his fatherland, the ardent panegyrist of the olden time, and the scrupulous observer of the various fetes of fun and superstition handed down through a long series of years; no matter how inconsistent with reason or common sense they may be, whether the cause of their institute be remembered or forgotten.

From the fire of Baal, at Summer's dawn, to the Bridegroom of Bridget's night—from the startling rites of All-Hallows' eve to the pancake-tossing of Shrovetide, we have seen comments and discussions, from Vallancey, as to why, in the festivals of Christmas, the Holly and Ivy should, in preference to all other shrubs, adorn the house or embower the dresser.

It appears a very reasonable supposition that, in a season of universal gladness, sensible and mercurial people, who knew the value of the senses as conduits of information, would avail themselves of the opportunity of blending instruction with amusement, and thus point out to the people of that day, whilst they rolled and gambolled round the object of their delight, its grand and mysterious associations.

Like the Jews and Egyptians, the Irish were extremely fond of figure and hieroglyphic, and like the old Fire-worshippers of Persia, in their May-eve fire, (Baal-teine is the name of May) worshipped Baal, or the Sun, who was considered the supreme dispenser of life and light to this nether world. On the introduction of Christianity, as may be well conjectured, they naturally looked around for suitable emblems to represent the objects of their new faith. As an illustration of the Trinity, the Shamrock (as we shall notice next week) was immediately adopted; whilst the Wren, embedded in Holly and Ivy, might not be considered an inappropriate type of the Incarnation. Indeed, they could scarcely have chosen a more expressive symbol of the wondrous humility of the Deity in taking the helpless form of infancy than the wren, the smallest and most despicable of the feathered race in our island.

The chilling wind and piercing cold of winter, with the various circumstances of poverty and humiliation which attended the Saviour's birth, are not inaptly denoted by the prickly roughness of the Holly, which circles the poor persecuted wren, hunted down, as was its Creator, by the unreflecting votaries of false, misguided zeal. But, whilst the Holly reminds us of the stings and crosses of a wicked and cantankerous world, the smooth, unruffled surface of the Ivy must also bring to our recollection the peace and goodness announced in the mild tenets of the Gospel to man, and the value of a good conscience, which, though bound up too often through life's journey with the Holly of turmoil and disappointment, yet strengthens and supports its possessor, like the Ivy that clasps and shelters some aged oak or venerable pile, adding lustre to its beauty, and protecting it from ruin.

WHO WAS JUNIUS ?

"Call Junius!"

"The shadow came—a tall, thin, grey-haired figure,
That looked as it had been a shade on earth;
Quick in its motions, with an air of vigour,
But nought to mark its breeding or its birth:
Now it waxed little, then again grew bigger,
With now an air of gloom, or savage mirth;
But as you gazed upon its features, they Changed every instant—to what, none could say.

I've an hypothesis—'tis quite my own;
I never let it out till now, for fear
Of doing people harm about the throne,
And injuring some minister or peer,
On whom the stigma might perhaps be blown:
It is—my gentle public, lend thine ear!—
'Tis that what Junius we were wont to call
Was really, truly, nobody at all!"

BYRON.

HERE is a disposition in most men to be extremely inquisitive about things over which art has cunningly contrived to throw a veil of obscurity. Were the objects of this curiosity completely and satisfactorily developed, they would cease to attract notice, and, in all probability, the interest which they at first occasion, would sink into utter contempt. What is mysterious generates wonder, and hence, a consequence is attached to questions in themselves trifling, and not worth the labour of inquiry. If the riddle remains long unsolved, the lapse of years serves but to increase its importance, and the ill-fortune of former conjecturers only acts as a stimulant to spur other adventurers into the field. Then, at length, the commonwealth of learning is disturbed by clamorous disputants, each claiming the merit of having, through his perseverance and sagacity alone, found out a secret that had hitherto eluded all research. To men of this spirit it matters little whether the subject which engages their thoughts be good or bad; they enter upon the pursuit only to have the glory of succeeding where others have failed, and if their own vanity be gratified, which is generally the case, the objections raised against their opinions shrink into nothing. All this, however, would be harmless enough, were it not that these busy triflers generally become partisans, and betray, in their anxiousness for discovery, the zeal of apologists. Of the truth of this assertion a stronger instance cannot be adduced, than what has occurred even since the question was first started, "who was Junius?"

This inquiry has lasted, with more or less eagerness and impatience, for the space of nearly a century; nor is it likely to be suspended for a considerable time to come, unless some more lucky knight than any that has yet pricked forth in the chase, "shall hunt down the boar of the forest," to use the language of Lord North, "and carry off his head as a proof of his victory." Instead of losing its interest, the subject seems to freshen with time, and almost every week brings forth a disquisition, in which either old claims are reviewed, with additional arguments, or some new candidate is brought forward with strong pretensions, and, if we are to believe the writers, with such indubitable documents of evidence as must put the point at issue for ever at rest. And yet, after all that has been hitherto adduced, it is plain the question remains undecided, and that the public mind is still unsatisfied as to the real author of the far famed letters, which, for a considerable period, disturbed the government and insulted the throne. That among the numerous persons whose names have been mentioned to identify Junius, there are some whose talents qualified them for the composition of the letters, and who had ample means for gaining all the information necessary to the carrying on such an extensive system of hostility against public men, cannot be doubted. But this will apply equally to many persons, and, even if one alone possessed the powers and opportunities requisite for the purpose, the conclusion would not be decisive, that he must, therefore, have been Junius, when it can be shown that no other man at that time had similar advantages. Neither is it difficult to produce, in addition to these points, a comparison of handwriting and style, since in regard to the former there cannot possibly be any certainty: and, as to the latter, there is no such distinctive peculiarity in Junius as to warrant the peremptory ascription of his letters to any one writer of that period more than another. These tests, therefore, are merely fallacious when taken by themselves, though, no doubt, they may have their subordinate weight of authority when other criteria of a more determinate character are tried and found to answer. Among the various persons to whom the letters of Junius—that "epistolary 'Iron Mask,'" as Byron has called him—have been attributed, we may notice the Duke of Portland, Lord George Sackville, Sir Philip Francis, Burke, Dunning, the Rev. Horne Tooke, Hugh Boyd, Dr. Wilmot, etc.

The first thing that strikes the dispassionate reader of Junius is the virulent malignity which runs through the whole of his correspondence. His attacks are conducted without the slightest regard to moral feeling, and, when convicted of falsehood, he shelters himself under a sophism, and renews the assault with taunt and irony. Hence it is plain that he was not a novice in popular writing, but one who had profited by the experience which he possessed, as a witness of the "great Walpolean wars," to use his own remarkable phraseology. This fact will so far ascertain his age, as to set aside many of those who have been set up for the real Junius; since to have had a remembrance of the political controversies of the Walpole administration, the writer must have been then considerably more than forty years of age. In alluding to those wars, Junius could have had no design of adding to his own obscurity, or of eluding suspicion, the observation being merely casual, and intended only to show his intimacy with times and parties. This assumption of credit for much previous knowledge in politics was natural, and there can be no doubt of its being perfectly just, which, of course, proves that the author of these letters was a shrewd observer of things, and especially of public men and measures, between the years 1730 and 1740, when the great Walpole was assailed by hosts of formidable enemies.

It is also evident, that Junius was not only conversant with the political contentions of those days, but that he had either borne a part in them, or was habituated to writing upon public affairs in periodical papers. Nothing can be a more striking proof of this than the minute acquaintance with the forms and routine of a printing-office which appears in the correspondence of Junius with his publisher, Woodfall. The "pen of the ready writer" is not more obvious throughout the elaborate compositions of Junius, than his mechanical habits are in the private letters which he wrote to his printer; whence, it is but fair to conclude that no nobleman, or person in a high public situation, could have entered into such a familiarity. But whoever Junius was, he certainly must have been a person in perfectly independent circumstances, and the complete master of his own time. The activity of his mind is apparent, his fondness for political discussion is equally clear, and his means of information were, beyond all question, most minute, exact, and abundant. He must have had a very large acquaintance, even among the first circles of society: yet, upon the most scrutinizing examination of all his published and private correspondence, it does not seem that he had any particular connexions.

Like the Turkish spy, who is said to have lived in Paris unknown, and yet seeing everything, for the space of forty years, this writer appears to have moved about the court and in the city, hearing himself daily praised or abused, without being at all suspected by those with whom he conversed, and who made his productions the subjects of their general discourse. He that could so govern his temper and command his actions, under such circumstances, must have been a man of no ordinary philosophy, taking that term in the sense in which it would have been applied by the ancient Stoics. But, even allowing that many men might have possessed sufficient art and firmness to avoid suspicion in mixed companies, few could have managed so as to keep all vestiges of the scent from their families. This might, indeed, have been done in one or two cases, but hardly in so lengthened a course of writing; which, though it be no direct argument, is, at least, a fair presumption that Junius was an isolated individual, or a kind of recluse, as far as related to his mode of living, at the time when those letters made their appearance.

Another point, still more remarkable, in the character of this incendiary, for such, undoubtedly, he must be considered, is the address with which he contrived, even when meddling with the minor politics of the city, to wear the appearance of lofty independence, and to avoid every symptom of being attached to any particular set of men. Yet, nothing is more palpable throughout the letters, than that the author was a disappointed man; of which his rancorous abuse of the Duke of Grafton is a glaring instance. The inveterate enmity shown towards that nobleman is, indeed, so extremely personal and distinct from mere political dislike, that it will be vain to point out any individual as Junius, unless it can be at the same time clearly shown that he had a private quarrel with the Duke of Grafton.

But what is to be thought of this virulent libeller's scurrilous attack upon his sovereign, in which not only decorum but truth was set at utter defiance? Perhaps this is the main touchstone, after all, by which the pretensions to the letters of Junius are to be tried, because the instance being unique in the history of English libel, must have had some extraordinary motive. That Junius was both a republican and a sceptic is too obvious to be denied, for he has let no opportunity escape him of bringing monarchy into contempt, and of throwing a sneer upon religion. Now, the man who had the interests of some party to promote, or who aimed at personal advancement in the state, would never have taken this course, since he must know that a discovery would be fatal to his object. But Junius, as we have already hinted, was leagued with no party, and, though soured by disappointment, his own prospects of preferment were terminated, otherwise he would not have taken the desperate resolution of insulting his king. Yet, he must have had an object when he began this career, and that object certainly continued to animate him through the whole course of it, for his conduct was uniform, and his enmity remained unabated to the last. Still no one could divine what the ultimate design of this energetic writer was, nor, indeed, was it possible at that time to form any other idea of him than that he was one of those turbulent spirits who rise up in unquiet times to distract the measures of government by inflaming the public mind against them.

Junius is better known by his enmities than by his attachments; in the former he is open, bold, and unappeasable; in the latter he is cold, equivocal, and fluctuating. His supreme delight appears to have been in creating confusion, weakening the bonds of society, and making the people dissatisfied, not merely with this or that administration, but with the entire regimen under which they lived. The object of Junius, therefore, was a revolution, and upon no other principle can his conduct be accounted for; consequently, all the distinguished writers who have been impertinently mentioned as the authors of these letters, must be exonerated from the charge; and, as to the inferior fry, with whom folly and pedantry have associated the name of Junius, it would be a waste of time to bestow one word upon their respective merits or demerits. It is plain that Junius was a man of experience, hackneyed in the ways of the world, and past the meridian of life; that he was skilled in political controversy; habituated to the periodical press; living at his ease without any professional occupation; possessing great self-command; unconnected with party, yet disappointed in some particular object which produced a deadly enmity to individuals; a staunch republican; and one who was evidently no friend to revealed religion.

The first letter of Junius, and the correspondence which resulted from it between that writer and Sir William Draper, will, upon close investigation, be found to exhibit some very material elements by which we may be led to a determination of the perplexing question, "Who was the author?" Junius began his famous operations against ministers at the commencement of the year 1769, when he opened his attack with a most dismal picture of the state of the nation, in regard to its finances, the colonies, and the army, which led him, very naturally, into a severe denunciation of the heads of these departments. His first attention is directed to the Duke of Grafton, the prime-minister, and who is represented as a broken gamester and an apostate, of whose "talents or resolution for business the world knew nothing, unless a wayward, wavering inconsistency be a mark of genius, and caprice a demonstration of spirit."

Having thus despatched the principal of the treasury, Junius directs his artillery upon Lord North, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a vein of sarcastic irony that forcibly reminds the reader of the biting satire of Swift. "His lordship," says Junius, "is yet to give us the first fruits of his abilities. It may be candid to suppose, that he has hitherto voluntarily concealed his talents; intending, perhaps, to astonish the world, when we least expect it, with a knowledge of trade, a choice of expedients, and a depth of resources equal to the necessities, and far beyond the hopes, of his country."

It will be observed that Junius treats Lord North with much more levity than he does the Duke of Grafton; but when he comes to the Earl of Hillsborough, who was at the head of the colonial department, the effervescence of his personal resentment broke forth with a violence that knew no bounds. This is a most important part of the letter, and evidently shows that, though America was only incidentally mentioned, its grievances, real or supposed, were uppermost in the writer's mind. "Under one administration," he says, the "stamp-act is made; under the second it is repealed; under the third, in spite of all experience, a new mode of taxing the colonies is invented, and a question revived which ought to have been buried in oblivion. In these circumstances, a new office is established for the business of the plantations, and the Earl of Hillsborough called forth, at a most critical season, to govern America. The choice at least announced to us a man of superior capacity and knowledge. Whether he be so or not, let his despatches, as far as they have appeared, let his measures, as far as they have operated, determine for him. In the former, we have some strong assertions without proof, declamation without argument, and violent censures without dignity or moderation; but neither correctness in the composition, nor judgment in the design. As for his measures, let it be remembered, that he was called upon to conciliate and unite; and that, when he entered into office, the most refractory of the colonies were still disposed to proceed by the constitutional methods of petition and remonstrance. Since that period they have been driven into excesses little short of rebellion. Petitions have been hindered from reaching the throne; and the continuance of one of the principal assemblies rested upon an arbitrary condition, (that they should retract one of their resolutions, and erase the entry of it,) which, considering the temper they were in, it was impossible they should comply with; and which would have availed nothing as to the general question, if it had been complied with. So violent, and I believe I may call it, so unconstitutional an exertion of the prerogative, to say nothing of the weak, injudicious terms in which it was conveyed, gives us as humble an opinion of his lordship's capacity, as it does of his temper and moderation. While we are at peace with other nations, our military force may, perhaps, be spared to support the Earl of Hillsborough's measures in America. Whenever that force shall be necessarily withdrawn or diminished, dismissal of such a minister will neither console us for his imprudence, nor remove the settled resentment of a people, who, complaining of an act of the legislature, are outraged by an unwarrantable stretch of prerogative, and supporting their claims by argument, are insulted with declamation." The length of this quotation must be excused, on account of its immediate bearing on the question—"Who was Junius?" There is in this passage not only a remarkable feeling for the American interests, but a minute acquaintance with the colonial assemblies, and the spirit of the people in general. This is, therefore, evidently the language of an experienced man, one conversant in practical politics, and possessing much local knowledge of the concerns of the plantations. Whoever Junius was, he certainly had a thorough insight into Lord Hillsborough's character; and it is obvious that he had not contemplated it at a distance, or through the medium of public reports. While he inveighs in general terms of reproach against the other ministers, he comes to specific and even minute points of accusation in denouncing the secretary of the plantations.

But what is to be said of the writer's enmity to the Marquis of Granby, upon whom scurrility is poured out without the least regard to common decorum? This has induced some to conclude that Junius must have been, if not a military man, yet, one intimately acquainted with the department of the army, and the system on which it was then conducted by the commander-in-chief. One thing observable, in the attempt of Junius to justify his abuse of Lord Granby, is the indirect, but severe condemnation passed on the German war, and English interference in it. The reason of this may, perhaps, have its own weight in ultimately ascertaining the solution of one of the questiones vexatæ of the past century—"Who was Junius?"

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

III.—WOODSTOCK CASTLE, COUNTY KILDARE.

Woodstock, famed in Irish story,
Raising high its tow'ring head,
Still proclaims its former glory,
Near old Barrow's crystal bed.

O'er its walls where, ivy creeping,
Loves to wave its sombre green;
Forth, beneath the foliage peeping,
Many a sculptured stone is seen.

Where the silken standard flying,
Once its waving folds display'd;
Now the breeze, in murmurs sighing,
Mourns the havoc time has made.

can be collected from the remains, we are struck with the curious arrangements of ancient architecture. A fine arched gateway, and part of the outer court-wall yet remain. Some years since a stone, of which the following cut is a representation, was discovered in the ruins, and is the only piece of sculpture of interest that has, even in a mutilated state, survived.

The ford which the Castle commanded, and from which Athly derives its name, was called Athelchac, or anciently Athlegar, the ford towards the west; also, Ath-trodan, or the cattle ford. It was here the great battle was fought, in the third century, between the people of Munster and those of Leix, under Laviseagh Cean Mordha.

In 1642, the Marquis of Ormond took Woodstock from the rebels; and subsequently, in 1647, Owen Roe O'Neal surprised it, and put the garrison to the sword; his victory, however, was but of short duration, for Lord Inchiquin compelled him, in a little time after, to surrender it and Athly.

O have the recollection of the days that are long gone over stirred up in our minds, and to dwell upon them with affectionate interest, may appear weak in the eyes of true philosophy. Yet, to dwell fondly on the history of scenes that are for ever fled, if it be a weakness, seems to be one of the most pardonable weaknesses of our nature—a frailty as universal as it is interesting. It is a sobering reflection which we are naturally affected with, and by it the best sympathies of our nature are often awakened. When contemplating the mouldering remains of the edifices of our forefathers, associations press on the mind, linked as they are with the present and the past, that often convey instruction of no ordinary kind. Perhaps the Castle of Woodstock, the subject of our present notice, may be classed amongst others as affording evidence of the justness of this remark.

From its vicinity, Woodstock Castle has partaken of nearly all the changes that befel Athly. Standing on the western bank of the river Barrow, it was designed to command the principal ford on this part of the river, in conjunction with White's Castle, situate on the opposite bank, a little lower down—the ford lying between. The time this castle was built is unknown. Tradition assigns it to about the year 1290, and that a descendant of the earl of Pembroke was its first master; whilst some antiquaries, with more reason, seem inclined to attribute the erection of the present structure to Thomas Fitzgerald, lord of Offaly, and afterwards seventh earl of Kildare, who, on marrying Dorothea, the daughter of Anthony O'Moore, of Leix, received in dower the manors of Woodstock and Rhetan, in which family it still remains. The plan of the building was originally a regular square tower, joining the south side, and built in uniformity with the front facing the river. The walls are of great thickness, and, considering the attacks they have been exposed to, in good preservation. The mullioned windows were much admired, being very elegantly executed. A VIOLET RUBRIC.

I PAGED about the garden girths,
When Spring was misting faint and lo, π ,
On briared hedge and dial plate
Thick sparkled the crisped snow.

In one bright nook, where looked the sun,
Across a level cloud of jet,
Beneath a laurel's yellow bloom,
There gleamed a violet.

Blue as the little rift that shone,
In the dusk skies that overspread,
Yet radiant as the day that fell
In beams around its head.

So, moralising, forth I went,
'Thro' the dank pastures, and I thought
Here was the emblem and the type
Of all the world had sought.

When hearts are broken or betrayed,
And pine, from Winter, for release,
God often in their ruins sows
The violet of peace.

And when the Spring has crossed the earth,
And violets faint beneath the skies,
They die, that in their place may wake
Diviner flowers of Paradise.

AMONGST THE MUSICIANS.

IN consequence of music and painting having been so persistently associated as sister-arts, and the connexion sustained by a parcel of ill-concerted theories, we must get a great critic, the subtle Hoffman, to help us to distinguish them. "Music," he says, in his Phantasie Stücke, "never makes men think; it is the purest Sanscrit of the feelings." Painting, it will be confessed on all sides, is not so innocuous; for we have a hundred examples to show that the exhibition of pictures, after the manner employed by Rienzi to rouse the Roman population, has made men think and write, and fight when it was necessary. In strict truth, music teaches us nothing. It appeals to an intelligence so keenly subtle, so impalpable, that it manifests itself only by pure emotion. The higher and nobler the order of mind, the more it is likely to be fascinated by the charms of sweet sounds. Shakspeare loved music, and has left numerous testimonies to its divine influences in his plays and poems. Haters of music, he tells us, are "fit for treasons, plots, and stratagems;" and his exquisite appreciation of melody is finely expressed in "Lucrece," thus:—

"Come, Philomel, that singest of ravishment,
Make thy sad grove in my dishevelled hair,
As the dank earth weeps at thy languishment,
So I at each sad strain will strain a tear,
And with deep groans the diapason bear.
For burthenwise I'll turn."

John Milton had a sublime conception of the power of music, and was given, as we are told, to "psaltery and organ playing;" and his stern contemporary, Oliver Cromwell, when his days had fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, was wont to assuage his melancholy by sitting alone in a retired chamber to which the sounds of a distant organ penetrated. Voltaire, if we are to believe one set of writers, hated music with that fierce intensity which characterized all his hatreds. Grétry asserts that he always listened to it with a soured and discontented face. French music, at the period in which he lived, had little pretensions to greatness; and, after all, the philosopher may have despised it on the score of good taste. His friend and patron, Frederick of Prussia, possessed musical sympathies in no mean degree. Pope, it is said, had none; but John Dryden's appreciation of music was powerful and rich. Charles Lamb, who has left us a piece of magnificent prose, which reads like an apotheosis of the organ, had no capacity for musical pleasure; neither had the illustrious Dr. Chalmers—except a sneaking liking for a Scotch air, a curious partiality, which all Scotchmen, by some merciful provision of Providence, are found to exhibit. His friends relate of Horace Walpole that "he knew nothing of music;" and Dr. Johnson did not know one tune from another. Rousseau, with all his affected sentiment and shallow philosophy to the contrary, was a profound and accomplished musician, and was accustomed to wile away the loneliness of his solitude by violin playing. Curiously enough, whilst Luther named music "the prodigy of Heaven," Calvin and Knox denounced it as a bait held out by the devil to lure the souls of the unwary, and condemned it to perpetual banishment from the ritual. History informs us that Alfred, Nero, Cœur de Lion, Charles IX. and Henry VIII. were lovers of the glorious art. Wellington was a musician; and Napoleon, when not better employed, would walk from room to room humming opera airs. All the poets, with some miserable exceptions, were passionate admirers of the "Heaven descended muse." Thus, Shakspeare again, in the "Tempest"—

"The isle is full of noises, Sounds and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not."

Cowley quaintly asks:—

"Tell me, O muse, for thou or none canst tell,
The mystic powers that in blessed numbers dwell?"

His poetical "Cosmos," which had at least the merit of originality to recommend it, contains a curious passage in which he says that chaos

"To numbers and fixed rules was brought,
By the Eternal mind's poetic thought;
Water and air he for the tenor chose,
Earth made the bass."

Shall it not amaze us to hear that the subtle and inquisitive Goethe, whose intellect like the chords of a great harp, responded to every breath of passion which swept them, knew nothing and cared nothing for music, German in heart and soul as he was. Poor Byron was in music, what Scott was in Gothic architecture—"a sentimentalist," and liked the sounds that came to him "o'er the waters." Scott himself, well and nobly as he describes the influence of melody on the heart, had a fondness for the droning of the bagpipe, and we have records of musical evenings at Abbotsford when the poet would rise from the table to roar out some barbarous jargon of Scotch discords, under the impression that he was delighting his guests. Artificial and narrow-headed as he was, Moore was a fine musician, and sang his own melodies with unrivalled sweetness and pathos, frequently drawing tears from his listeners. Wordsworth was too much of a metaphysician, too keen and analytical to be affected by the claims of an art which failed to reward his inquisitiveness. Can anything be less sympathetic than his description of the singing of the Ranze de Vaches, in the Swiss valleys, at sunset:—

"I listen, but no faculty of mine
Avals those modulations to detect,
Which, heard in foreign lands, the Swiss affect
With tenderest passion."

This is the quintessence of musical inappreciation.

Where shall we look for the origin of this invisible beauty, glorified by Miriam, and David, and Solomon—heard in the world from the hour when the clash of rejoicing cymbals sounded by the shores of the Red Sea to our own time, which listens to Rossini and Wallace? The Hebrews cannot help us, and we turn to the Greeks. From what we know of the extent to which they cultivated music, it would appear that they knew nothing of time and harmony. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to define the art as it existed, independent of conditions which we are accustomed to regard as inseparable from the art itself. Evidently, the Greeks treated it as a science, reduced the few elements they possessed to theoretical restrictions, surrounded them with elaborate complexities of form, and lost sight, if it was ever beheld, of the free spirit which they sought to fetter. Are we not justified in thinking that with them music was not, as it happily is with us, a living delight, a mysterious key to a host of undiscovered emotions hoarded in the secretaries of the soul; but rather a vehicle for the systematic delivery of words—a string on which tales and recitations might be arranged with some regard to order. We have spent time and agony in deciphering the few fragments of Lydian measures that have reached us; either we have wrongly interpreted them, or they are destitute of every pretension to the name of music. Yet the Greeks must not be supposed to have suffered much from the absence of genuine music, for their language would have sufficed, in a great measure, to supply its place. A recent critic has made an ingenious attempt to define what the music of the Greeks really was. "Taking into consideration," he says, "the total disparity between the effect of the ancient specimens of melody, when transferred into our modes of recitation and performance, and that so enthusiastically commented on by contemporary writers, I sought for an explanation of the riddle in a manner of execution dependent entirely on the rules of rhythm and quantity. I found the choruses of Æschylus and Sophocles to be divisible, on examination, into lines of seven syllables each. Comparing this with the fact of there being seven notes in the Greek diatonic scale, and seven alternate singers of strophe and antistrophe, I arrived at the conclusion that the music of the Greek chorus, like that of the Russian horn-band of the present day, might probably be performed on the principle of a note to each person: thus producing an effect of which, under any other circumstances, the meagre skeletons of melody that have been handed down would give no idea." As might have been anticipated by its professor, this simple and very probable theory no sooner saw the light than it was assailed by those who cleaved to the old hypotheses, and who did not hesitate to pronounce it improbable and irrational. But, to disprove it, one of two things is obviously necessary. It must be shown that the system practised by the Russian horn-band is of Russian invention, or that it was borrowed from a quarter effectually excluded from Greek inspiration. Russian nationality is scarcely a thousand years old, and in it every thing indigenous to the people took root. Get rid of the nationality and you are suddenly transported back to an era in which Russia was a mere copyist of her neighbours in every department of progress. The horn music was cultivated in the reign of Catherine the Great—whence did it come? Is it too wild a conjecture to suppose that it may have been introduced into the country by some wandering Greek, centuries earlier? It would be a singular coincidence, indeed, if it could be shown that the boorish Russian and polished Greek had hit upon the same plan independently of each other!

It was a misfortune for the Greek mind that it relied too much on the infallibility of systems, and too little on the goodness of natural scope and freedom. Greece's architectural genius had developed itself in a splendid maturity, and her strictly artistic powers were in the glory of manhood before the schools could meddle with either. Both became perfect, growing outward from their internal strength, whilst music became, by adoption, the child of the college, and was obliged to conform to its laws and observances. The Greek sought a reputation for profundity, and, to attain his desire, disguised the meanest truth in a wardrobe of complexities. He had some appreciation, indeed, of the deepest instincts of music; but, as it never would do to have the truant art abandoned to her own exquisite caprices, he placed her in the stocks and surrounded her with all the barriers of a blind conventionality. When people write of the revival of music in the middle ages, and express our indebtedness to the Greeks on that score, they err woefully. The music of the West was an independent inspiration, and, although it was obliged to borrow somewhat from the Hellenic doctrines, it advanced, in proportion to the distance which it separated itself from them. We know very little of it. The music of the primitive Christian Church, to which Ambrose and Constantine listened, may have been borrowed from idolaters or the Jews, or been independent of either. No remnant of the first, chants which rolled through the glooms of the Catacombs have reached us; but with the sixth century there is a stir in the awful silence of the Christian world, and the grand volume of the Gregorian music fills the basilicas from east to west. It is not an admixture of rich chords and harmonies one hears, but the stern voice of a faith, that dared at last to breathe and praise God aloud in words of inartistic thankfulness. To be critically just, that music is instinctively impressionless, and should only be heard in the church, where it finds corresponding solemnities of form and expression. In this state the art remained until the troubadours made her the vehicle of passion, and devoted her to the service of love and gallantry. Compared with the intense character of later music, the troubadours' is painfully meagre and barren of feeling; but what an improvement on that which it had succeeded! It came, at least, fresh and impulsive from the heart and beat itself into pathetic cadences and sweet involutions which the world had never heard before. "The Complaint of the Chatelain de Coureys" has three or four passages of extraordinary merit, and one of melting tenderness.

It was about the beginning of the fourteenth century, when secular music was ranging the world fugitive, that the Church availed herself of the accidental discoveries of harmony and counterpoint. Once more the art was taken in hands by pedantic theorists, this time to rest till her constitution was sufficiently braced for the hard work which she had to encounter. With this era originated the fugue and the Credos, Kyries, and Te Deums, which even to this day are regarded as miracles of imperfect and austere beauty. So music struggled along, scarcely seeking to emancipate herself from her new bondage, patiently biding her time, with eyes fervently fixed upon the future. At last, Charles V. studied her, and Henry VIII. composed a sacred hymn. The Elizabethan period beheld a great change in the style of composition and management. The pealing organ and full-voiced choirs, were heard in unison, in loud contrapuntal harmonies; psalm singing was encouraged in France, and the madrigal assumed its present form in Italy. Thence came the round, the catch, and the glee, each domestic in character, and tending, therefore, to bring music within doors, and make her familiar with our fire-sides. To this period we owe the "hey downs," and the "fal la, la's" which play no unimportant part in popular ballad choruses. Perhaps madrigals have no claims to a high order of merit, but we must remember that they are admirably adapted to the special purpose for which they were composed, abounding as they do, in a variety of free graces and pleasantries, that mean little but go for much. They afforded, it is true, but little scope for the exercise of a single voice. This fault was remedied by a new class of productions—solos, such as Chatelard and Rizzio were wont to sing in the stately apartments of their patrons. Probably, those were for the most part improvised to suit the occasion; but, that such was the fact, we have no positive evidence.

Hitherto the voice had held a position subordinate to the instruments by which it was accompanied. The lute and viol were the favourites because of their qualities of assimilation with the human organ, but they were destined soon to hide their diminished heads before a new rival—the incomparable violin. Louis XIV. had patronised it. It was just the thing that was wanted, combining, as the organ, a host of instruments in itself, from the bass of the great drum upward, through a chain of a thousand modulations to the shrill chirrup of the piccolo. Charles II. had come to the throne; and, amongst one of his first acts, was the bringing over to England of a band of twenty-four fiddlers, each a prodigy in his way, but immeasurably inferior to the leader, Baltzar, a Lubecker. This man performed such marvels on the four slender strings of the violin that an honest gentleman of the period suggested his identity with Satan, and seriously examined his feet, in the hope of finding them hooved. Charles, gay, light, and frivolous as he was, had a good musical taste, which was not at all flattered by the Church compositions that had been bequeathed to him by the Protectorate. He set about reforming them, had symphonies and instrumental accompaniments added to the anthems, and had those executed by his private band. Whilst in exile, and looking out wearisomely for the promised assistance of Monck, he used to beguile his time with the tender music of Lulli, and the taste he acquired for it, led to an important change in music. In fact, Charles was sick of the monotonous, heavily-spun compositions which were in vogue; he wanted a tune, and he got it. Locke and Purcell met the royal desire. The former has rendered his name immortal by the music to Macbeth, which, for finish and purity, shames that of Verdi's Macbeth; and the latter stands at the head of the composers of English sacred music. If the Merry Monarch had no other claim, and we fear he has not, to the gratitude of posterity the service thus rendered to the progress of music may, at least, gloss over a dozen of the venial faults which history ascribes to him. The idea of a simple song, with instrumental accompaniments, is attributed to Vincenzo Galileo, the father of the astronomer. He was accustomed, with many of the literati of Florence, to assemble at the house of the Count of Verona, and there discuss the probability of reviving the dramatic effect of the Greek music. Being an accomplished musician, he set a passage from the Inferno, for the compass of his own voice, with lute accompaniment. The experiment, when tried, was received with delight; and its adoption became almost universal. Ten years after, (1600,) Exulio di Cavaliere, wrote his oratorio, Body and Soul, which was performed with great eclat at Rome; and the first opera, Euridici, by Peri and Caccini, was represented the same year at Florence. In one day the eyes of Europe were opened to the real mission of music, and every one was wondering why he had not perceived it before. Italy was the first to profit by the idea. Her soul was full of imprisoned melody panting for an outlet, and here it was vouchsafed her. Some notion of the avidity with which the new "order" was caught up may be inferred from the well-attested fact that in Venice alone, between 1637 and 1700, seven theatres were built, and three hundred and fifty-seven different operas produced. It is well that we should not take the crude, almost shapeless operas of the day for the sparkling and polished ones we are in the habit of hearing. The airs were scanty and separated by lengthy intervals, filled up by violins and basses, the whole ending with a chorus! The music itself was passionless and meagre, the dramatic effect scarcely noticeable. Even so late as the last century, English and foreign artistes, on the same stage, used to sing their respective parts in their respective languages; and the audience generally assisted in the choruses.

Great as this change was, a deeper and subtler revolution was working below the surface. The more enthusiastic disciple of the new opera school never dreamt of making sound its own interpreter. That feat was reserved for men like Monteverde, Barissimi, and Stradelli, in whose music every phase of thought and feeling finds an echo or an expression. Alessandro, Scarlatti, and Lulli still further enriched the treasures of dramatic art; Marcello chastened whilst he elevated the Church music, whilst Lulli and Grètry caught the French imagination in their gay and picturesque compositions. In the words of a recent writer: "Domenico and Sebastian Bach, with their stern gymnastic exercises, strengthened every muscle of musical invention. The German Hasse was adopted by the Italians; the German Gluck was adored by the Parisians; in England Purcell entered through the door which the Restoration had opened, and Handel's mighty tread took up where his lighter steps left off; while, for the whole musical world at large, the coming of Haydn announced that of Mozart, as the song of the redstart shows that the nightingale is near." England prides herself, and fairly, it must be owned, on the fact that, if since Purcell she has produced but few great composers, she has sunk much of her national pride and prejudice in extending a welcome hand to those of every other country. Mr. Rogers says that the English have been brought up in the religion of Handel; but with whom does the credit of it rest? A defeated candidate for popular favour in England, he was glad to take refuge in Dublin; and it redounds to the lasting glory of the Irish people that they were the first to appreciate the grandeur of that colossal genius, whose shadow shall stretch across all the generations till the crack of doom. In his hands music, like the war-horse of the prophet, was clothed with thunder, and arrayed with the lightning. It is not the voice of earth but of heaven, heard amongst the rattling of chariots and the shock of contending hosts, as Milton describes the battle of the angels—now a peaceful Hosannah which rises before them a pillar of fire from the winged ministers that kneel around the throne. All ecstasies of thought, all terrors of passion, all intensities of adoration struggle, and commingle, and rejoice in that illimitable volume, "The heavens are telling," but the awful revelation penetrates the profoundest gulfs of hell. Put those words in the mouths of angels—they are too much for the weakness of man. As a writer of oratorios, we rank Haydn next to Handel. Pious, reverent, and diffident, he wrote at the commencement of all his scores: "In the name of God," and ended with, "Praise be to God!" "The Creation," his great master-piece, is a good example of his greatness and weaknesses. It may be described as a divine pastoral overflowing with airy inspirations that ascend and wreath themselves into the loveliest forms, like the smoke of a sacrifice blown by a south wind towards a sunny sky. The magnificent play on the words "And there was light," enters the ear like a flood of brilliancy, and leaves a lasting impression on the mind's retina, long after the singers are silent and the organ has ceased. How spiritual is that melody beginning, "Most beautiful arise," so crisp, fresh, and endearingly lovely? It is a pity he was so commonly addicted to "puns," as when describing the word deep, the phrase is accompanied by a tremendous organ note, that seems to plumb the very abysses of the instrument; or in his interpal thunders, whose sharp staccatos dance zig-zag through the heavy artillery of the skies.

Poor Haydn, if compared, however, with some of his predecessors in the punning line, may be pronounced immaculate. Many of those aspired to imitate nothing better than the cackling of hens and the mewling of cats; Marcello went further, by composing two complex choruses, one for sopranis, the other for contraltis, in which the baaing of sheep and lowing of oxen are interpreted with misdirected ability. In "Preciosa" Haydn gave proofs of a highly symmetrical judgment; witness the description of the morning, with the huge cloud-bulk breaking slowly before the daylight, and then the blaze of the sun as he tops the vapour. This work is but a hair's breadth from the sublime. Between Handel and Haydn we may rank Mozart; tender, pathetic, almost despondent, as is his music, it well expresses the imploring heart of helpless humanity prostrate before its God. A wail runs through its very jubilation, as if "There was even in happiness

To make the heart afraid."

His great opera, "Don Giovanni," is still the gem of the lyrical drama, and is likely to continue so, despite the cumulating rivalries with which it is daily placed in competition. Perhaps, next to Handel, no composer has vaster claims to our reverence than Beethoven. He is a dreamer in sounds, a builder of phantasies with no defineable end. In one composition, "The Mount of Olives," he is prayerful and human. All else is vague, misty, and wonderful. We fear we have trespassed too much already on the patience of our readers to attempt any criticism of contemporary composers. It would be hard to do justice to Rossini, whom even an emperor honours with his familiarity; or with Vincent Wallace, who divides with Balfe—both our countrymen—the empire of the English stage. Of this, however, we may be assured, that music has reached its turning point as an art, and was never cultivated and honoured so universally as it is to-day.

CHAPTER VII.

REJOICED, at length, to breathe a purer atmosphere than that which has been suffocating us through the last chapter, we request the reader to return, for the last time, with us to the sleeper and his blue-eyed sentinel, in the parlour of the inn. The interest which she had evinced for the old man, and which had excited so much astonishment in his mind, did not appear to subside after she had accomplished the object which she desired, and beheld him once more locked in the unconsciousness of a profound repose. She remained pacing softly and anxiously through the room, sometimes pressing her brow with her expanded palm, at others clasping and wringing her hands hard, but with a perfectly noiseless action—now starting and biting her thin lip, as the voice of Maney and the preacher in the kitchen made her dread the waking of her guest—now gazing fondly toward the old man's bed, while her large soft eyes became watery, and her wasted and yellow countenance changed and saddened under the influence of some melancholy associations, until she stretched her arms forth to their furthest limit, and her bosom heaved and panted with a longing tenderness—and then, by a sudden transition, shuddering with horror, gathering her hands fearfully to her bosom, and endeavouring by an impatient gesture to shake off the startling recollection, whatever it was, that had checked the flowing kindness. At another time, as she crept across the room, the valise of the Palatine caught her eye, and made her start and tremble so violently, that it seemed to require a powerful effort of self-command to prevent her renewing the wild cry of agony with which she had before startled the household. She then, with a light, tiptoe movement, crept to the bedside, seemed about to lift the dimity curtain, paused, clasped her hands, looked upward, and finally withdrew it, and gazed upon the sleeper.

"His!" she exclaimed, muttering, in a soft whisper, a link from the chain of her silent conference with her own heart—"his!"—Oh, if I could only by tears, and kneeling and moistening the very dust about his feet, obtain his that I wronged more cruelly than by saying a word of truth in his ear! Oh, how softly, and kindly, and warmly his word of anger and command fell upon my heart! I thought I was a child again, and that my own father stood before me.

Where is my father now? Ay, have you a father, you miserable dupe?—You robber's wife! you worse robber than the worst, you plunderer of the old man's peace! you thief of his rest and happiness!—and for what! For——" here an uneasy motion of the sleeper alarmed her. She let the curtain fall, and taking her seat on a low chair near the bed, commenced, in that low and murmuring melody of tone which Irish nurses use to lull the ear of infancy, and which scarcely exceeds in the extent of its compass or the variety of its intonation the drowsy rise and fall of the hum of summer bees, a simple and plaintive air, the words of which, rude as they were, we will venture to transcribe:—

The mie-na-mallah* now is past,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
And I must leave my home at last,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
I look into my father's eyes—
I hear my mother's parting sighs—
A fool, to pine for other ties—
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!

This evening they must sit alone,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
They'll talk of me when I am gone,
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
Who now will cheer my weary sire,
When toil and care his heart shall tire?
My chair is empty by the fire!
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!

How sunny looks my pleasant home!
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
Those flowers for me shall never bloom—
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
I seek new friends, and I am told,
That they are rich in lands and gold;
Ah! will they love me like the old?
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!

Farewell, dear friends, we meet no more—
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
My husband's horse is at the door!
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!
Ah, love! ah, love! be kind to me;
For by this breaking heart you see
How dearly I have purchased thee!
O wirra-sthru! O wirra-sthru!

As the singer paused on the last cadence of the air, the pathos and simplicity of which she rendered infinitely touching by the delicate management of a voice of great softness and tenderness of tone, a short-breathed sigh proceeding from some person near her, mingled with and checked it in the close. Raising her eyes, she beheld Suil Dhuv bending over her, his arms folded, and an expression on his features which might be indicative of mingled kindness and deliberation. Her thoughts instantly recurred to her guest, and with a movement of swift alarm, she rose from her seat, and endeavoured to lead him from the place.

"Stay, Sally!" he exclaimed, "I want to know about the——" but the woman stopped his speech, putting her finger on her lip, and pointing to the bed. The Coiner followed her.

"What are they?—where are they going?—and by what road?" were the first questions which he asked, when they had passed through the kitchen, where Shino was now slumbering by the fire, and gained the apartment in the further end of the house.

"My love!—my own love!" said the woman, laying her hand on his arm, and pressing it affectionately—"we have been now four years married, living together, true to one another, in sickness, in want, in joy,—(and we had our share of that too, Mark)—and in guilt)—and of that too, Mark, hadn't we?)—and——"

"Come! come!" said Spellacy, impatiently, "what preachment are we to have now?"

"I was only saying, Mark, that we had been so long married, and I never—never once made you a request since the first day we wedded."

"And whose fault do you want to say that was?"

"My own, darling!" she said, laying her hands caressingly on his shoulders—"sure I know 'twas my own! But it won't be my fault any longer, for I have something to ask you for now, at last."

"Well, what's that to be?" the husband muttered distrustfully.

"First, tell me, darling, what you intend?"

"Poh! the old plan always. To make sure o' the horses and the arms you know, and then the four of us to ride off to Drumsconlon, and do our business there—be back so as to take these here upon their way. 'Twill be a brisk night's work," he added, looking into the air.

"You will not use violence?" she said, falteringly, while she watched his eyes.

"Poh—no—no—no—to be sure," the fellow replied carelessly.

The negative was not satisfactory.

"Mark," said the woman, twining her arms close about his neck, and looking with an agony of entreaty in his face, "my request—my first and only one—is that—that you will spend this evening with me, and let those men depart in peace."

Suil Dhuv stared upon her.

"I charge you," she continued, raising her voice and assuming a more solemn tone, "harm them not! Lay not your finger on a hair of that old man's head, as you value your life! Do not brush the dust from his path! If you give him one evil eye—one bad wish—one ruffian thought—it were better for you, your nurse had strangled you upon her lap! Let the morning dawn see you as innocent of harm, thought or done, towards him, as the child unborn!"

"Why—Sally——?"

"Keep off your hand! You know me not!—I tell you, man, you know but little of me yet. Observe my words, or I'll curse you! Fear for your soul! or if that will not startle you, fear for your neck! for as sure as that man's way is troubled—aye, if only by a petticoat cast in it by your hand, you shall die the death of a dog!"

She was about to leave the room, as if conscious of her inability to sustain the commanding and energetic tone she had assumed, in her fit of enthusiasm, when Suil Dhuv, at length recovered from his astonishment, though not at all touched either by tenderness or her menaces, seized her firmly by the arm—shut the door fast, and, looking fixedly into her eyes, asked:—

"Who is this man?"

"No matter," said the woman, avoiding his gaze and clearing the perspiration from her brow, "that is my request, grant or refuse it as you will."

The Coiner slowly relaxed his hold, while he remained gazing with exertion of intense scrutiny on her changing and agitated features. She seemed to understand the action, though she dared not look at him, and this consciousness served only to increase her anxiety. A creeping, cold, malignant smile at length parted his hard lips, and glistened with a triumphant light in his eye. He let her hand fall, and walked in silence toward the door.

It was now her turn to interpose. "Hold! stay!" she exclaimed,

"is my request granted? O tell me what you intend?"

"You can be secret, Sally—so can I."

"He is a friend of mine, Mark, isn't that enough?"

"Enough of what? Don't you know, there are some friends of yours that are worse than enemies to me."

The poor woman did know it very well, and so she told him by a mournful shake of the head.

"Well! well!" she said, suddenly, "I will tell you something presently. But leave me to think a while."

"I am going to say a word to Awney Farrel—remain here until I come. So you can talk, you can?" he added, in soliloquy, as he left the house. "We'll see if Lilly Byrne won't fill your place a little more softly. Not a better sport I'd wish, than to see you take up with the mudhaun that's lying brained abroad in the loft. And sure ye can do it, the two o' and welcome, can't ye?"

"There is one other chance," the woman said, after meditating alone for a moment on the course which she ought now to pursue. "One chance to save all! What, if it fail? Hate is as black and deadly in the old as in the young, and sometimes more so. He may refuse—What, then? Avow all? Ruin, death, and horror! Stay! let me think, let me pause a moment, O, for some friend! some kind adviser, some—Heaven!" she clasped her hands and uplifted them, but again repressed the feeling. "No, no, it is my human agony that speaks, and Heaven, that calls for penitence, will not hear me for my own selfish interests. My hands are bloody, too; had I forgotten that?" and, compressing her lips with a shocking stare of desolation, she walked to the door of the room, and beckoned the old Palatine, whose voice she heard in the next apartment, to enter.

"Do not hurt the poor child," he said, as the woman fiercely repelled the little boy who attempted to force his way in with the old man. "I don't know why it is," he added, patting the little fellow on the head, and looking pensively in its open face, "but I like the boy. Here, my man, is a tester for you! That's a hero! I've seen an eye like that child's somewhere, certainly."

The woman fell on her knees, and clasped the child to her bosom, with a burst of hysterical passion, kissing his neck, and suffering her hair to fall in long, abandoned tresses over its back and shoulders.

"Strange creature!" thought the Palatine, "what a mixture of affection and unkindness! what a changeful suddenness of motive and feeling appear to be in all her actions!"

While he again caressed the boy, the woman rushed into the other room, dashed the tears from her eyes, and, glancing quickly round, snatched from the extended hand of Shine a vessel of raw spirits, from which he was just about to replenish his tumbler of punch, and placing it to her lips, drained it to the very last; then, tossing the vessel on the table, she re-entered the apartment, fortified with that dreadful energy, with which the royal murderess of Scotland, on another occasion, sought to invigorate the natural febleness of her sex—and utterly regardless of the impression which she left on the mind of the gaping and astounded Shine, both with respect to her morality and her good breeding.

"Your name is Segur?" she said, after pausing a moment to collect herself. "Don't start, she added, "it was that informed me," pointing to the valise which he held in his hand.

"That is my name, certainly," said the old man in some surprise.

"You are travelling to your native village—your cottage, near Court Mattress?"

"I am."

"By the Crag road?"

"Yes."

"Return the way you came, or take any road but that, there's danger in it!"

The Palatine gave her a sharp, and very suspicious glance.

"I am well armed," said he.

The woman smiled. "If no road but that will serve your purpose, remain here to-night. The heaven itself is bent against you," and she pointed through the window to a small black cloud that hung above the dilated disk of the parting sun.

"I am well provided in that respect also," said the old man; "but what dangers do you speak of?"

"The road is infested. Every body fears it in those times."

"Oh!" said the Palatine, "if your counsel is only grounded on such a general suspicion, we won't say any more about it." And he turned away.

"Stay!" said the woman, detaining him, and casting her eyes on the earth. "You had——" a long pause——"there was——"

"You are ill my good woman."

"Sir!"

"Shall I give you a chair? Sit down. What would you say to me?"

"This ague plagues me so. One moment, sir. You had a friend, in care of your farm, an old blind man—Adam Segur? You are aware of his fate?"

"I am. He was murdered?" said the old man eagerly.

The woman shivered in all her limbs. "He was——"

"My daughter! I see you know my family? What of her my good woman?"

"Oh! your daughter—your daughter is well—merry and well—I'll engage—very well and happy indeed, thanks be to Heaven."

"Thanks! humble, heartfelt thanks be to Heaven, indeed!" the old man repeated, with a devout emphasis, uncovering his head, and turning his moistened eyes upward. He was again painfully interrupted by a renewed passion of convulsive laughter from the woman.

"The night and the coming storm bring on my ague fit. You must not mind it. I suppose you are astonished at my acquaintance with your affairs, but I was an old neighbour, and a dear friend of your daughter's; but marriage severs fonder ties than ours. We are but poor friends now."

The old man hesitated one moment before he asked doubtingly.—
"Were you at all in her confidence, then?"

"Oh!—a little. She was taken with a young man—so she was—at the same time."

"A villain! a low ruffian!" said the Palatine, clenching his fist and using a passionate gesture.

"Never truer word you said in your life—so much I can tell you—and more than that, may be."

"My Sarah," the old man continued, in tremulous hesitation—"was always a good and dutiful child, and——"

"Don't be so sure o' that. Heaven bless your simple soul and body, I knew her better than you did, a great deal—a great deal."

"She knew my wishes with respect to that young villain, and I'm sure she obeyed them."

"Are you, indeed? and why should you now? Had she no will of her own, do you think?" the woman said, with a rapid and angry petulance of tone, like that which sometimes precedes an access of delirium in sickness—"Was she only to be a little bit of a puppet in your hands, to pull her this way and that, and lock her up, or let her dance, just as you liked? Eh!—Sarah, do this—Sarah do that. And Sarah was to do it all! Ha! She was no such fool, she thanks you."

"You do not mean——"

"Or if she did—was she to be the only saint upon earth? Others disobeyed their parents—and was she to be the only good little slave in the world—Oh, oh! Because she was your daughter, I suppose, she was to be as white as the snow! Pride, my dear sir—pride made the angels fall! Think more humbly of your own. I had a father as well as she—aye, a good, kind father—and I disobeyed him. I left him in his age—and destroyed his quiet—and I knew I was doing it when I did it, and I did it for all that. But don't be frightened," she added hastily, observing the paleness of a sudden alarm whitening on the brow of the old man—"She was less guilty than I. She was not such an abandoned, unhappy wretch as I am. Few are, indeed," she added, mournfully, tapping with her feet on the floor, like one in pain.

"I have been so long absent," said the Palatine—"that I have forgotten many things which perhaps some persons will say I ought to remember. You say you are an old neighbour, yet, I cannot by any exertion recall your person or your name to my recollection."

"Can you remember a family of the name of Sparling, who lived within a few perches of the high road near your village?"

"Phil Sparling? I do, very well. His wife died in giving birth to an only daughter——"

"That's it, just!" said the woman, laying her hand quickly on his arm—"I'm that daughter—that's just it, now. I am indeed. I'm that girl."

"And your father——"

"Listen, and I'll tell you every thing. When Mark—no, no—when your daughter's sweetheart, Dinny, I think she called him, used to be coming about the cottage, Mark Spellacy here, my husband, used to be along with him, and while Sarah took his arm, and walked with him in the moonlight, I walked with Mark—leaving my old father that loved me, lonely in his house. Mark was poor and wanted money—and when we had agreed to go off together, unknown to the old man, I robbed him and gave it to Mark—so I did. I did, indeed. And I left my old father without so much as one—just one word for all his love, in the dead of night—and no one to care for him, without so much as a 'this' or 'that,' or 'by your leave, father,' or 'God be with you, for your kindness.' Not a word indeed—no more than if he was a stone—or I. And I robbing him, too, think o' that! Did you ever hear o' such a lady? did you, now? Oh! my heart! My brain! Oh God, vengeful, terrible God! Oh, hell! hell! 'tis with me, sir, I have it." And suffering her voice to fall suddenly from its shrilly and painful height to a low and hoarsely muttered sound of horror, as she repeated the last exclamation, she paused a moment, gazing with hot, dry and distended eyeballs on the earth. The Palatine regarded her with great anxiety and commiseration.

"Poor creature!" he said, with tenderness, "so much feeling cannot be without some beneficial influence. Why don't you return to your father?"

"Me! me go near him! Ah! no, I am not quite so bad ~~as that~~, yet. 'Tis terrible enough to think of him, and think of him I do, enough. Many a long year it is now since I left him, and yet his voice sounds as plainly in my ears as if he were constantly about me. When I wake in the morning I hear him call my name, and when we sit down to our meals, I see his old hand closed, and hear his holy, contented prayer, and think of all his fondness and his love, saying a thing from his heart and seeming to make a joke of it. No bragging love like a young man's. And sometimes, too, in the dead of the winter night, when I lie alone in my bed, and the rain beats on the thatch, and the wind blows, and my first frightful dreams come on, I see him then with his white, bony cheek and his red and angry eyes, and his long gray hairs hanging down about his face, standing on the floor, and looking down towards me, upbraiding me with everything. 'Sally, look at your father, how you have served him. You have left his arms for a common robber's. Ah, Sally, when I held you in my arms, a little child, when I kissed your cheek, and taught you to know the right from the wrong, I little thought you would make me such a return as this one day!' And sometimes I see him in rags and poverty, and he bends over me with his cold blue lips, and presses his hands down upon my throat till I gasp for breath, and screech out o' my sleep, and wake in the midst o' the darkness, the black, thick, darkness, all about, about me, and I wave my hands through it, and that horrible pale face is there before me still." And with a chilly shuddering, she placed both hands on her face, and sunk back in her chair.

"Yet I would advise you to lose no time in returning to your father. You will, at all events, have done your duty by making the effort at reconciliation, and don't think so hardly of him as to suppose he will reject you, woman. If I judge by myself, he—no—" the old man paused, and shook his head.

"Well? well? Eh? what are you going to say?" asked the woman eagerly, "if you judged by yourself—what?"

"Nothing. I'm afraid I miscalculated."

The poor woman gave a deep sigh, and cast a disappointed look around her.

"But I have no cause to judge of others by myself. I have discovered many symptoms of hardness and inveteracy about my own character, which I am sure belong not to all men."

"No matter. Tell me how you would act yourself—for that only could give me satisfaction."

The Palatine stared hard upon her.

"Ay—speak!" she continued, place yourself in poor Sparling's situation. Suppose your daughter had served you, as I served my father—and suppose she was as sorry for it as the Almighty, that sees my heart, knows I am—and suppose she was to come to your door again, and stretch her hands out to you, and cry to you for forgiveness would you slap the door, with a curse, in her face—or would you think of the dead mother that bore her and that loved you dearly—and of the God that forgave, and commanded all to forgive—and take the poor, weeping, broken-hearted creature to your heart again? Would you forgive her? Would you bless her? Oh, you would, sir—your heart would soften—would soften—your eyes would fill—you would think of old times—you would feel for her—you would weep with her—you would pardon her!" And, flinging herself in a convulsion of tears and agitation at the old man's feet, she remained with her hair mingled with the very dust around them.

It would be difficult to give the reader a just idea of the change which this speech occasioned in the person and features of the old Palatine. Far from appearing affected by the grief of the wretched woman, an expression, first, of strong surprise, then of sickening terror, and lastly, of great dislike passed over them. He paused for a moment, like one who is struggling against the conviction of a dreadful truth—set his teeth—and fetched a hard breath before he raised her from the earth, then putting back her hair from her face with one hand, while he grasped her arm with the other, he looked long and amazedly into her eyes, both remaining fixed in the attitude, and affording for several minutes no further indication of life than could be discovered in an exquisitely fashioned group from the pale marble. At length, after suffering his eyes to wander over the whole person of the female, he drew a free breath, as if relieved from a dreadful apprehension, and, letting her arm go, he said:

"I have looked over all your person and am satisfied that you are not my daughter—but I'm afraid I'll find it hard to forgive you the shock you caused me. Go along, you wicked woman, it was a shame for you!"

The poor woman could but sigh and weep, and cling entreatingly about him. Her perseverance appeared to increase his anger even to rage.

"Go along!" he repeated, shaking her off rudely, "Heaven forgive me! I never felt that it could be in my nature to use a woman ill since I was the height o' that—but—go along! I could almost strike you for the horrible fright you gave me! Poh! poh! I won't do it, for all that," he added, softly, as the woman flung her arms wide as if to court the outrage, "but you're a shocking creature!" And he hurried out of the room, disengaging himself ungently enough, from the imploring grasp of the miserable wretch, who tottered, muttering deliriously and casting around her glances of utter desolation of spirit, towards the chair.

"Come along, Mr. Shine!" said the old man, impatiently, "I could not look in that woman's face again if it were to save my life!" And he hurried in his preparation to depart.

In a few minutes, the trampling of horses' feet outside the door announced to her the approaching departure of her guests. Looking through the window she beheld Maney O'Neill standing in his usual foolish attitude tapping his thighs with his long bony fingers, and gazing loosely about him. As soon as he caught her eyes, he winked, nodded, and elevated a coarse smith's file, at the same time tapping his foot knowingly with his finger. She beckoned him quietly toward her.

"I done it, I'll be bail, mistress," he said, in a whisper. "If they go past the Craggs, any way, call me an honest man, I give you free leave."

"Where's Suil Dhuv?" she asked, anxiously.

"Aih? Suil Dhuv? Oh! he's gone—himself and the rest o' the lads."

"Gone!" she almost shrieked the word—"Impossible!"

"Aih?"

"He's not gone, he cannot be."

"Oh!—iss, dear, he is, ma'am."

"He has deceived me!" she said, retiring in great distress of soul from the window, "his blood be on his head! Mr. Segur!" The Palatine did not answer, but seemed to quicken his departure still more.

"You need not fear, sir," she said, bitterly smiling as she opened the door and looked on him. "You have no more bad news to hear from me. You said you were armed, sir!" she added, as he sullenly entered the apartment.

"I am, thank Heaven," he said, carelessly, still avoiding her eyes.

"Look to your pistols, sir!" she said. The old man now stared openly again upon her.

On flinging back the pans he stared in real alarm to see both empty. He hastily dashed the ramrod into the barrels. The charges had been drawn!

"Now, examine your horse's feet," the woman added. "The shoes were good enough, perhaps, but on these roads t'is clenching of the sprigs is apt to wear faster than elsewhere."

The Palatine was affected even to trembling.

"You can get both these little mischiefs remedied at the other side of the hill," continued Mrs. Spellacy, "there is a forge there. And here is your ammunition," she added, handing him powder and ball from a corner cupboard. "This affair may, and most probably will, cost me my life," she said, mournfully, "but I do not care for that. All that I entreat is that you will not fire—oh, do not! until you are compelled, I have my reasons for this request."

Segur held out his hand in silence, and wrung hers with kindness and gratitude.

"Bless you! Oh! God, God bless you for that act!" she exclaimed, kissing the hand with a burst of the first generous heart-easing tears she had shed for many a long day. "But go—hurry—hurry—" she added, checking herself and rising hastily. "My blessings are not ominous of much good. Ride hard and fast—the night will be lost. Farewell, sir! Since you will not stay, even to save blood."

The Palatine departed in silence.

PENCILINGS IN IRISH ANTIQUITIES.

II.—CORONATION CHAIR OF THE O'NEILS.

THE curious piece of antiquity represented in the above engraving was for a long time the chair on which the O'Neils, of Castlereagh, were inaugurated, and originally stood on the hill of that name, near Belfast. After the ruin of Con O'Neil, the last chief of Castlereagh, and the downfall of the family, in the reign of the First James, the chair, which is very rudely constructed, and made of common whin stone, was thrown down. It is now, we believe, in the possession of a gentleman in the county of Sligo.

Respecting its antiquity, we have nothing to offer beyond conjecture. The branch of the O'Neils to whom it appertained, shot off from the parent stem in the tenth century, but this inaugural chair may have belonged to the ancient chiefs of the district, which they subsequently ruled. Such chairs, or sometimes mere large stones, on which the impression of two feet were sculptured, were placed in some elevated spot in every lordship or territory, and an allusion to them, as well as to the mode of electing the chiefs and tanists, occurs in the following excerpt from Spenser's quaint "View of the State of Ireland:" "It is a custom amongst all the Irish, that, presently after the death of one of their chief lords or captains, they doe presently assemble themselves to a place generally appointed and known unto them, to choose another in his stead, where they doe nominate and elect, for the most part, not the eldest son, nor any of the children of the lord deceased, but the next to him in blood, that is the eldest and worthiest, as commonly the next brother unto him, if he have any, or the next cousin, or so forth, or any is elder in that kindred; and next to him doe they choose the next of the blood to be tanist, who shall next succeed him in the said captaincy, if he live thereunto.

"They use to place him that shall be their captain upon a stone, always reserved to that purpose, and placed commonly upon a hill. In some of which I have seen formed and engraven a foot, which they say was the measure of their first captain's foot, whereon he, standing, receives an oath to preserve all the ancient former customs of the country inviolable, and to deliver up the succession peaceably to his tanist, and then hath a wand delivered unto him by some whose proper office that is; after which, descending from the stone, he turneth himself thrice forwards and thrice backwards." This curious mode of inauguration is of very remote antiquity in Ireland, and is said to have been introduced even before the arrival of the Milesians by the Tuatha-de-Danaan colony. One of the noblest historical ballads in any language is that descriptive of the inauguration of an Irish monarch, by Thomas Davis, a few verses from which we subjoin:—

"Come, look on the pomp when they 'make an O'Neil';
The muster of dynasts—O'h Again, O'Shiadhail, O'Catháin, O'h-Anluain, O'Bhreisléin, and all,
From gentle Airl Uladh to rude Dón na n-gall;
'St. Patrick's comhartha,' with bishops thirteen,
And ollamhs and breitheamhs, and minstrels, are seen,
Round Tulach-Og Rath, like bees in the spring,
All swarming to honour a true Irish king!

Unsandalled he stands on the foot-dinted rock;
Like a pillar-stone fixed against every shock.
Round, round is the Rath on a far-seeing hill;
Like his blemishless honour and vigilant will.
The gray-beards are telling how chiefs by the score
Have been crowned on 'The Rath of the Kings' heretofore,
While, crowded, yet ordered, within its green ring,
Are the dynasts and priests round the true Irish king!

The chronicler read him the laws of the clan,
And pledged him to bide by their blessing and ban;
His steen and his sword are unbuckled, to show
That they only were meant for a foreigner foe;
A white willow wand has been put in his hand—
A type of pure, upright, and gentle command—
While hierarchs are blessing, the slipper they fling,
And O'Catháin proclaims him a true Irish king!

Thrice looked he to Heaven, with thanks and with prayer—
Thrice looked to his borders, with sentinel stare—
To the waves of Loch n-Eathach, the heights of Srathbháin;
And thrice on his allies, and thrice on his clan—
One clash on their bucklers!—one more!—they are still—
What means the deep pause on the crest of the hill?
Why gaze they above him?—a war-eagle's wing!
"Tis an omen!—Hurrah! for the true Irish king!"

There was, probably, another stone chair on which the O'Neils of Tyrone, the chief branch of the family, were inaugurated. It is marked in some of the old Irish maps under the name of "the stone wherethey make the O'Neils." The annexed engraving represents the arms of the illustrious family of the O'Neils—the Lamh dhearg Éirion, or "Red hand of Ireland"—from an impression from the silver signet ring of the celebrated Turlough Lynnoch. It was found about forty years since near Charlemont, in the county Armagh. According to tradition the ancestor of the family was one of three brothers, who in the voyage to Ireland agreed that he who would touch land first would be king. The vessel of the younger being last, he laid his hand on the side of the vessel, and, chopping it off with his battle-axe, flung it ashore, and claimed the crown. We are not aware, however, that the tradition has been ever authenticated.

The ceremony of crowning a stone, by the king standing or sitting on it, is said by many antiquaries to be of Scandinavian origin. The Saxon monarchs were crowned on a stone, and tradition points to the remains of one at Kingston, in Surrey, as having been used for that purpose in the early period of Saxon history.

Our readers have, no doubt, heard of the famous coronation stone now in Westminster Abbey, traditionally said to have been originally brought to Ireland by the Tuatha-de-Danaan. There is a curious tradition in connection with this interesting national relic, to the effect that when Jacob awoke after his wonderful dream in the plain of Luz, as related in Genesis, he "took the stone that he had put up for his pillow, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil on the top of it," vowing at the same time that he should ever regard it as a house of God. The legend goes on to state that this stone was taken away from Bethel by the tribe of Joseph, when they destroyed the city and its inhabitants, the current belief among the Jews being that whoever possessed that stone would be especially blessed, and be king or chief. On the first destruction of Jerusalem some of the royal family of Judah are supposed to have escaped, and to have gone in search of an asylum beyond the sea, taking this precious stone with them. Their resting place was Ireland, where they founded a kingdom. Many centuries afterwards, a brother of the king descended from these exiles, named Fergus, went, with his brother's permission, to found a kingdom in Scotland. He refused to go, however, without the sacred stone, and, on his brother's declining to part with it, he stole it, and established a kingdom in Scotland, of which his descendants became kings, and were crowned sitting on that stone. Several historians, as Mathew of Westminster, Hector Boethius, Robert of Gloucester, the poet Harding, etc., have noticed this singular legend, but we believe the Rabbinical writers have never been consulted respecting it. Sandford, in his valuable "History of the Coronation of James II.," referring to the Lia Fail, calls it "Jacob's Stone," and says that it was brought to Brigantia, in the kingdom of Gallacia, in Spain, in which place Gathal, King of the Scots, sat on it as his throne. Thence it was brought into Ireland by Simon Brech, first King of the Scots, about 700 years before Christ's time, and from thence into Scotland, by King Fergus, about 330 years before Christ. In the year 850 it was placed in the Abbey of Scone, in the Sheriffdom of Perth, by King Kenneth, who caused it to be inclosed in a wooden chair (now called St. Edward's chair,) and this prophetic distich engraven on it:

"Ni fallat Fatum, Scoti hunc quocunque locatum Inveniant lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem."

"If Fate deceives not, where this stone is found,
The Scots shall monarchs of that realm be crown'd."

It is noteworthy that this prophecy was fulfilled in the person of James I. of England. It was brought, in the year 1297, by King Edward I., from the Abbey of Scone, with the Scottish regalia, and deposited, as we have already mentioned, in Westminster Abbey. It is of reddish grey sandstone, twenty-six inches by sixteen-three-quarters, and ten inches thick. Calmet, however, states that the Mahometans pretend to have this relic in their custody. They say that "Jacob's Stone" was conveyed to the Temple of Jerusalem, and is still preserved in a mosque there, where the Temple formerly stood. In conclusion, we may observe that Dr. Petrie, in his erudite "Antiquities of Tara Hill," is of opinion that the genuine "Stone of Destiny" still stands on the summit of that historic eminence. The following lines occur in the "Book of Rights"—

"There shall not be a house at Teinbhair of Fal, Though great the reproach to Lia Fail"—

Tara being so called from the Lia Fail being preserved there.

THE PAINS OF MEMORY.—Go to the grave of buried love and meditate. There settle the account with thy conscience, for every past benefit unrequited—every past endearment unregarded—of that departed being who can never, never return to be soothed by thy contrition. If thou art a child, and hast ever added a sorrow to the soul, or a furrow to the silvered brow of an affectionate parent; if thou art a husband, and hast ever caused the fond bosom that ventured its whole happiness in thy arms to doubt one instant of thy kindness or truth; if thou art a friend, and hast ever wronged in thought, or word, or deed, the spirit that generously confided in thee; if thou art a lover, and hast ever given one unmerited pang to that pure heart which now lies cold and still beneath thy feet—then be sure that every unkind look, every ungracious word, every ungentle action, will come thronging back upon thy memory, and knocking dolefully at thy soul; and then be sure that thou wilt lie down sorrowing and repentant on the grave, and utter the unheard groan, and pour the unavailing tear—more deep, more bitter, because unavailing.

THE LORE OF THE CHALDEES.

THE magnificent spectacle which is offered by heaven, sparkling with stars, has been able, from furthest antiquity, to attract the admiration of mankind. As a consequence of this admiration, observation on the course of the stars followed—their rising and their setting became noted. From this, astronomy took its birth, a science vast as it is sublime, which increases human intelligence, and gives us an idea of infinity. The first observers of the stars were, it is said, shepherds and fishermen of India and of Chaldea; from the latter country astronomy passed into Egypt, and was specially cultivated by the priests of Saïs, of Thebes, and of Memphis.

Before going farther it is well to observe that the word astrology designates in principle the elementary study of the celestial mechanism; but when enthusiastic imaginations gave themselves to the application of this science to divination, orthograpists gave to it the name of astronomy. From this moment astrology became only a chimerical art, whose object was to investigate the future by inspection of the stars, by their position, their aspect, their influence. Thenceforward it served only to make dupes, and to plunge people into the gloom of superstition.

The Chaldeans became so celebrated in this art that the names of astrologers and Chaldeans became synonymous. The Egyptians and the Greeks equally practised astrology, to which they added the epithet judiciary, in order to distinguish it from primitive astrology. The movements of the stars subject to a wonderful regularity, their sensible influences on certain natural phenomena, created the belief that man was submitted to the astral influence, and that, by the power of research, those astrological laws which presided over his destiny could be discovered. Imagination exerted itself on this theme, and produced theories more or less ingenious, more or less absurd. The grounds upon which astrology was founded are worthy of record.

From the observations of the most celebrated astrologers there was said to exist an intimate relation between the stars, the constitution, and the duration of the existence of mankind. The planets to the number of seven, and the divinities or signs of the Zodiac, to the number of twelve, presided over both, and endowed the heart of each individual with analogous qualities to their special influences. Each planet had its favoured domicile in one of the twelve houses of the Zodiac, and in each of those houses elaborated good or evil, beauty or ugliness, joy or sorrow, fortune or its reverse.

In this way each of the planets gave a character to each individual. The Sun, for instance, is beneficent and favourable. Saturn cold, sad, and morose. Jupiter was of benign influence. Mars warm, ardent, full of vigour. Venus fruitful. Mercury changeable and inconstant. The moon cold, damp, and melancholy.

Individuals born under the sign of the Scorpion would be rich in mines, and would have a bold glance. Those born under the sign of Taurus would be possessed of rough humour, instant for quarrels and all inclinations of horned beasts. Births under the sign of the Lion would develop in voracious appetites and possess haughtiness of character. When the lion conjoined with the planet Mars the individual born at that moment would become either a hero or a brigand. Births under the sign of the Virgin gave folly, coquetry, and cowardice. The sign of the Scales furnished merchants, traders, and embroiderers. The sign of Capricorn gave perjurers, adulterers, and unhappy spouses. The conjunction of Mars and Venus is most fortunate for infants. The conjuncture of Saturn and Mars is, on the contrary, most unfortunate. The poet Manilius, in his work on astronomy, warns us that if a son is born when the sun is in the sign Aquarius, the child will have a passion for rivers, fountains, and waters. If he be born under the sign of the fishes, he shall love angling, nautical sports, and his instinct will direct him unceasingly towards rivers or seas.

Some of the planets are considered friendly, and some inimical to each other. Venus, for instance, is friendly towards Mars, but of sworn enmity to Saturn. Nevertheless, inimical stars were suffered to be reconciled under certain circumstances, and also friendly planets were conceived to be in antagonism under some aspects. The planetary aspects, as they were called, were six in number, allusions to them appearing in all the jargon of astrologers. We will explain the conditions of those aspects.

The Conjunction is when two planets are united under the same sign. Opposition occurs when they are found at opposite points. Trine was said to be when they were separated by a third of a circle. Quadrate indicates the separation of a fourth. Sextile is the separation of a sixth, and the last aspect is the Antistice, when two stars are found at parallel points equally removed from the equinox. Opposition and Antistice are both of bad augury. Quadrate is less unfortunate; however, its influence is not one to be easy about. Trine is always good. Sextile is very fair, but, still, is far from the value of Trine; those were the auguries of aspects.

It would seem that those fantastic meanings ought to be sufficient for the astrologers, but they were not. The Zodiac and its twelve houses, which we have before explained, furnished them with still more means to exercise imagination. Thus, they considered the first house to be the laboratory of life, of organization, and of animated beings. It is there the distinctions of the human race into blacks and whites, were influenced, giants and dwarfs, men of genius and mortal fools. The second was destined to social interests to acquired goods, to inheritances, to contentious affairs. The third to the household relations, to brothers and sisters, to uncles, aunts, and cousins. The fourth, to wills, to immoveable goods, estates, etc. The fifth was directed to the influence of pleasures, to joy, and youthful sports. The sixth went to valets and chamber maids, to maligning and deformed individuals, to subjects of insanity; it is the hospital of the Zodiac. The seventh house presided over jealousies, hatreds, inconstancies, and perjuries. The eighth relates to the dead, to funeral ceremonies, and to successions. The ninth to possessions and to voyages. The tenth to all dignities of state; it is the constellation of dukes, marquises, earls, barons, knights, and, in a word, of all nobility, masculine or feminine. The eleventh betokened fortune, material riches, and moral enjoyments. The twelfth was filled with evil, promising only misery, prisons, dungeons, treason, opprobrium, and reverse. Such are the interpretations of the influences of the twelve houses of heaven.

Zoroaster was, says Suidas, the founder of astrology amongst the Chaldeans. Hostanes transmitted it to the Egyptians, and they transferred it to the Greeks. Berosus, whose predictions were almost always accomplished, used astrology for divination. Diodorus of Sicily and Porphyry believed in astrology. They relate that the Egyptian priests had discovered the influence of the stars on the human generation, and upon all that which should occur of good or evil during existence. From those suppositions, they concluded that all which we believe depends upon our will, or upon our determination, is bound up with the movements of the stars, and that our destiny is written upon them.

Lycurgus and Xenophon never undertook anything without consulting the stars. The former forbade the Spartans to give battle when the moon was on its wane. Augustus struck a medal in honour of the sign, Capricorn, under which he was born. Ptolemy, the astronomer, and Paul of Alexandria, had the weakness to consider astrology as a fruitful mine in human results. But it was specially amongst the Arabs that the astrological seers found fortune, fame, and honour. The history of this people is filled with facts which prove its weakness for the marvellous. In Europe, it had also very learned and famous interpreters. Some of those names are so celebrated we could hardly pass them here. Reges Montanus, Bonatus de Forli, Fuld, Nicholas Flamel, Albert the Great, Agrippa, Melancthon and Camerarius, Cardan, Guaricus, Junctinus, Ratzan, the friend of Tycho Brahe; Michael Mayer, Van Helmont, the chemist; Beker, Antoine Mezan de Montlucon, Jean Carvin de Montauban, the learned Argoli, Jacques Pons, Father Kircher, and others of less note. The most of those gave themselves up to the perfect belief in astrology, and even wrote voluminous treatises on that chimerical art. In the presence of those historical facts, what are we to say, what are we to think only that the learned, as well as the most ignorant are equally constrained by the weakness of our nature to pay their tribute to the prejudices of their epoch?

During the middle ages, astrology particularly became a calling. A crowd of individuals of both sexes, and generally of mean condition, was anxious to predict the future to whomsoever desired, provided only they paid them for their prophecy. The society of the time offered only acuteness and fraudulence upon one side, and upon the other simplicity, ignorance, and credulity. When we open the annals of the epoch, we find a very considerable number of predictions which were undoubtedly accomplished, some of the most startling of those are worthy of record.

Louis the Eleventh of France was told by an astrologer, as he came forth from church, that even as he was addressed, his mortal enemy Charles the Rash was killed, at the same moment, by the Swiss, at the battle of Grawson. In some days after the news arrived of the battle, and the prophecy was found to be true. Henry the Third of France was told that he would be assassinated. He had every necessity to believe the prediction afterwards, for the blow of a dagger killed him. Two attempts at murder, committed against Henry the Fourth, were predicted by a gentleman named Villaudry, and by the astrologer and mathematician Rigacasa. Unfortunately, the King placed no faith upon this warning, and the poniard of Ravallac removed the best of French monarchs from this world. One of the astrologers attached to the service of Catherine de Medicis predicted to the Duke de Biron, that he would perish at the siege of Epemay. A bullet realised the prediction.

Perhaps a more curious fact is that told of the brother of this same duke who, desiring to consult the same astrologer, received this answer—

"You shall die under the axe!"

"What do you say?" asked Biron.

"Monsieur!" he replied, "if you like the term better, you shall have your head cut off."

Furious at those words, Biron fell on the poor astrologer with the blows of a cudgel, and striking him until he was exhausted, cast him for dead upon the ground. However, his violence had no influence on the prediction, which came to pass in six months afterwards.

Luke Guaric predicted to John Bentivoglio that he would lose the sovereignty of Bologna. He predicted also that Henry the Second would die of a wound in the eye. Both of those predictions came to pass.

A little dwarf who was a very skilful astrologer predicted to the young Francis Henry de Montmorenci, later Marshal de Luxembourg, that his deeds of arms would render him the rival of a great prince. Moreover, that by a strange fatality, he should be implicated in a proces and incarcerated. But, that more fortunate than his father, dead and decapitated, he should retrieve his fortunes, and by the renown of his victories would restore and sustain his high reputation.

Notwithstanding those strange and startling coincidences arising in the records of astrology, there is no doubt in our enlightened times that the believers in it, as a science, were the dupes of imagination. As knowledge spread, the credulity in its predictions retired into the breasts of those whom progress did not reach. Religion, too, enlightening the masses, banished the influence of the art from civilized nations until, at length, the science which once drew the sage and the great to its investigation, is left to the gipsy on the roadside and the charlatan, everywhere to impose upon the dupe, still to be had amongst the ignorant, the foolish, and the vain.

ST. MARY'S, NEW ROSS.

EW places in Ireland abound more in monastic ruins than New Ross, a beautiful town situated on the united streams of the Nore and Barrow, with their tributary waters, which, as it were, after inviting many fertile counties to pour their rich produce into their natural market, or emporium, meet like faithful guides, who had before parted to direct others to the gaol, and whose united testimony now affords confidence to the traveller.

The town rises an ascent on the eastern bank of the Barrow, whose waters here can float a ship of a thousand tons. A beautiful wooden bridge connects the town with the village of Rosbercon, in the county Kilkenny. There is scarcely a spot in the town where the antiquarian will not find various monuments of monastic ruins. There were several abbeys within the walls of the town, but they all shared the same fate, which the rude hand of the invaders, or the still ruder hand of time, have thought fit to bestow on many others.

in the country. One was situated at the northern, or St. John's gate, another at the southern, or Priory gate; the Abbey of St. Saviour's in Friars'-lane, and St. Mary's Abbey, which commands a view of the surrounding country, and overlooks the town from the eastern side, of which the above is an illustration. This building was so perfect as to admit of divine service being performed in it so late as the year 1811 or 1812, when the western aisle was injudiciously taken down to make room for the present church, which, compared to its ancient predecessor, is but a rude heap of stone and mortar. There is a cemetery under the pile, which extends, should we believe popular tradition, under the greater part of the town. However, certain it is, that archways have been discovered stretching in the direction of the Abbey and persons are somewhat deterred visiting the cemetery, from the story of a soldier who once entered the "Black-hole," as the entrance is called, provided with a lantern and accompanied by a dog. The dog returned, but his ill-fated master affords a lesson to the incautious antiquarian. Another story, equally believed, is told of some persons who attempted to take down the cross from the chancel wing, but whose brains were dashed out for their impious temerity.

DONAGHMORE.

DONAGHMORE church and Round Tower are situated a little more than a mile from Navan, on the road to Slane. This religious establishment, which was anciently called Domnach-mor muighe Echnach, owes its origin to St. Patrick. But though the existing ruins of the church of Donaghmore sufficiently indicate it to have been a structure "diminutive in size," its architectural features clearly prove that it is not the original church of St. Patrick's erection, but a re-edification of the thirteenth century, in the usual style of the parish churches erected by the Anglo-Norman settlers within the Pale. Neither can the Round Tower, though unquestionably a structure of much higher antiquity than the present church, be referred to the time of the Irish Apostle, or perhaps to an earlier age than the ninth or tenth century. At all events, its erection cannot be ascribed to an earlier date than that of the Tower of the church of Kells—a religious establishment founded by St. Columbkille in the sixth century—as these towers so perfectly agree in architectural style and mason work, that they appear to have been constructed by the same architects or builders.

This very beautiful tower is built entirely of lime-stone undressed, except around the doorway and other apertures, and is of admirable masonry. It has two projecting ledges or steps at its base, and six rests for storeys, with intermediate projecting stones, or brackets, in its interior. These storeys are each, as usual, lighted by a single aperture, with the exception of the upper one, which has two openings, one facing the east and the other the west.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERBOLD.

CHAPTER IV.

USING for a moment, Mr. Namby resumed: "Round of beef at one end, turkey at the other, mind," said the lady who was to be made a mother-in-law. "ridegroom Sam wasn't bad, I can assure you. He'd got an extraordinary notion into his head that it was the thing to be married in evening black—with a white choker. Fortunately, all the lodgers were off before the business of the day began in earnest. He was wonderful. I let them have my room for the melancholy occasion. Sam had his jokes as usual. While we were waiting for the bride to make her appearance, her father loftily suggested to his future son-in-law that "just a nip of something would set him up," a remark which Sam took in good part. We all set ourselves up accordingly: Sam remarking that he would like two or three pulls at a pipe.

"Out of the question, my dear Sam," said the host, adjusting his enormous collar under his mulberry ears. "Afterwards, I don't say no."

The bridesmaid's appeared in low-necked dresses and straw bonnets, displaying any number of yards of white ribbon. Such red elbows! Such giggling! The host begged to ask whether he might not press them just to take a little something to keep the cold out—it being, by the way, a remarkably close and warm day. Bastin has his own peculiar notion of a fête day. He holds, I presume from my observation, that a holiday must be a day devoted to the consumption of stimulants. The pride with which, on this marriage morn, he covered my sideboard with varieties of alcoholic drink, and with sherry, which he significantly begged us to observe was only for the ladies—was something to study. When the happy couple were about to leave on their honeymoon trip, Bastin held a decanter in each hand, and pursued his children into the passage.

"Not a drop more thank'ee," said Sam. But Sam was overborne. Mr. Bastin would not allow him to get into the cab until he had taken a last glass "for luck," as the father-in-law pleasantly said. Even the bride, although she declared that she had quite enough, was asked to remark that there was some sherry left, if she would like a final sip.

But the breakfast! There was Bastin hacking at a hot-turkey, while Mrs. B. officiated at the joint. Sam offered to relieve the lady from the carving, whereat, in a somewhat wrathful tone of voice, she observed, "that young men always spoil the look of the joint." Sam winked at me, and nodded furtively towards the head of the table as the heavy repast proceeded. I perceived that he was anxious to bring under my notice the very obvious fact that Bastin was fast getting drunk. His jokes, poked at the bridesmaid's, who blushed and ate—were not those of a fine fleur. Mrs. Grundy would have had a deal to say to him. The girls were unmanageable. When I spoke to one on my right, she giggled, and merely answered, "yes, sir," or "no, sir," so I soon gave up all hope of conversation, and restricted my attentions to that of plying her with an occasional potato.

Of course, Bastin made a speech, which Sam interrupted with ironical "hear, hears!" when the orator alluded to the honour the bridegroom had done the family by marrying into it. You know Bastin's style in the Fleet street Parliament; his bombastic claptags and round periods! I wish you fellows had been there. You would have killed yourselves with laughter. He began—"I cannot let an occasion like the present pass without making a few observations. The interesting young couple before me, (here Sam kicked me under the table,) are about to enter upon the thorny paths of life, flushed with hope in the happy days of youth, when the world lies like fairy-land before them. I can remember the time when I believed that life was a long holiday." ("Nonsense," from Mrs. B.) "I speak now in the serene and yellow leaf, when, as the late Mr. A'Becket said, 'the pepper-box of care has given my head a little sprinkling.' But it is not for the old to destroy the illusions of the young. I shall not play the Mentor." ("The what?" from Mrs. B. again.) "Ladies," Bastin continued, with his most superb manner, "are permitted to be ignorant of Telemachus. I shall content myself with wishing my son, for I may call him so now, and my daughter, his wife, all the happiness they can wish themselves. A good daughter makes a good wife, it has been said. If this be true, and I am disposed to think that it is true, the bridegroom of to-day is a fortunate man."

Here the bride gave signs of emotion that threatened a flood of tears. Mrs. Bastin again interposed, crying, "that will do, Bastin."

The orator disdainfully waved his extended arm over the ruins of the turkey, and continued, "We are about to lose a daughter, but it is in the natural course of things. Let her think kindly of us in her new home, and the oftener she returns to us the better we shall be pleased. This is not a time for oratory. My feelings get the better of me. Children, from the bottom of my heart, I wish you long life and happiness." That was about the sort of thing, Mr. Namby said, pursuing his narrative, "and the old bird" was really touched. The bride wept, while her mother soothed her by telling her not to be foolish. Then Sam got upon his legs. He was inimitable. With a wink at me he said, "All I can say is that I'm very much obliged to you; and here's to your jolly good health all round. I give long life to the governor."

Mr. Namby proceeded with his description. The trousseau formed a highly amusing, but cruel picture; which led Mr. Clifton to inquire how the young couple intended to live?

"Don't mention it," said Namby, "live! that's what puzzles me, Sam has got a little something to do, but what that little something is I don't know. He may be check-taker at a theatre, a brass-plate coal merchant, chairman to a free-and-easy, or chairman to a bank. I don't know; they went to Gravesend for the honeymoon; and the trip was to last a week. Even that humble arrangement cannot be accomplished without a little money. It strikes me that Sam and his father-in-law have done a bill together. Fancy discounting at sixty per cent for your honeymoon! accepting a woman and a bill at the same time!"

"This is a little too hard!" Clifton protested.

"Deuced funny, I think," said Mr. Stackington. "How people can stand the sort of thing, I cannot understand. Low life is certainly amusing."

"Just as amusing," Mr. Clifton retorted "as poor splendour, and not by half so despicable."

"Bravo, for the radical!" Mr. Stackington cried, with a voice not strong enough to call a canary bird to its sugar.

Faversham joined the party.

"Here's a subject that will just suit you," said Namby, to the new comer, "Stackington and Clifton are at it."

"About what?" Mr. Faversham asked.

"Marriage!" Stackington hoped for an ally in his elegant friend.

"A broad subject," Mr. Faversham replied, nervously. It was not the subject on which he could then talk with any comfort.

"Marriage!" Mr. Clifton observed. "He is a bold man who talks about marriage now-a-days—that is, if he intends to marry in his own rank. I don't know that Sam, at whose expense we have been amusing ourselves, is so far wrong after all. Society—that is, what we call society—will be out of the question; but then, she has no expensive wants. She'll not want a Bond-street milliner. They will live a little in the Indian's fashion: she will be his squaw. She will cook, and mend his linen, and nurse her own children, and make her own clothes. All awfully low, as Stackington says; but I don't know that, with a little philosophy, this is not the best poor man's match, even if the poor man has been at Oxford. Take the opposite side of this case. Where is the prudent Belgravian mother, I will not say the Bloomsbury mother, who would accept any of us for her daughter?"

This was not pleasant conversation to Faversham. Unfortunately, Clifton appealed to him pointedly for an answer.

"You're mistating the case, Clifton," said Faversham.

"Am I? Look at us. Do we think of marrying? For myself, I should as soon think of taking the largest mansion in Belgravia as taking a wife. To the girls we meet out at parties, life would be a blank without a grand piano by Broadwood, price one hundred and twenty guineas. Ladies change their condition as servants leave places—to better themselves."

"Yes," Namby thrust in. "And when men are old enough to earn the income that would satisfy a wife, they are too old to be caught."

"There are always the manufacturing districts," said Mr. Stackington. "Deuced glad there, to get hold of a fellow with good blood in his veins."

"They buy blood, like sugar merchants, for refining purposes." This was, of course, Mr. Namby's point; and he looked round to be certain that everybody had heard it. He was very proud of his bluntest points.

"The only way out of the difficulty, when a man falls desperately in love with a girl in society, is to run away with her." Mr. Clifton's solution.

Society finds its way out of every difficulty. We know, for we cannot but know it, how the decrease of marriages is compensated. The polluted streets show it; the evil, born of pride and vain pomp, and show, has ulcerated everywhere. The daughters who are not to wed, save when wooed by Cupid and Mammon together, find their purity assailed in the street, the park, at the races or the hunt, and at the favourite watering-place. The monster evil appears to them in every hotel. It elbows them at the table-d'hôte, and out-shines all their splendour at the Kursaal. The wild oats are sown broadcast throughout the land, and offend the nostrils of Diana in her deepest solitudes. The mammon-worshippers have sown the crop; and it is a heavy one.

"Heigho!" Mr. Faversham sighs, in his solitary chamber. "I must quench the spark that is spreading to a flame within me. There is music now only in the ring of a sovereign. When I have won my spurs—I have been soiled and wounded nearly to the death in the fight—I may enter an honourable man's house, and ask his virtuous daughter in marriage—and not till then. I must send my banker's book with my declaration. The spotless peaches are for the rich; and I am poor. Am I to turn to the damaged fruit? I will not; but, should I, the blame will not be with me alone."

BY THE TURNSTILE.

HERE'S light in the west, o'er the rims of the walnut,
 Low croons the stream, in the meadows below ;
 Shrill sings the robin, a-top of the briar,
 Black, through the golden dusk, darkens the crow.
 O love, from the hamlet, that gleam in the willows,
 Come up through the pastures—come upwards and smile,
 That your dear face may shine twenty roods through the twilight,
 And sprinkle with star-beams the stones of the stile.
 Come hither, come hither,
 'Tis Midsummer weather,
 Airy-paced, violet-eyed, dainty-lipped liaper,
 For into your pink ear, sweetheart, if you let me,
 If but for a moment, I'd hurriedly whisper.

O daisies that glitter in long tangled grasses,
 White wastes of delight that stream fair to the moon,
 Unprison your lids, though the dank dew is falling,
 And catch the sweet footsteps that hasten here soon.
 There's a candle a-gleam in the gray cottage lattice,
 There's a shadow that comes 'twixt the light and the pane,
 And a dear little head slyly peers thro' the casement,
 Turns backward, and leaves me the shadow again.
 Come hither, come hither,
 'Tis Midsummer weather,
 The windmill has stopped, dear, ah ! that is our token,
 For ere the night falls thro' yon great arch of planets,
 One quick little word in your ear must be spoken.

There's an echo that comes from the dusk of the paddock—
 The echoes of feet that are tripping and walking,
 There's a murmur that creeps thro' the heart of the pasture,
 O love, is it you, or the daisies, are talking ?
 'Tis she, for the wild mint, scarce crushed by her footstep,
 Gives out all its odour—that's all it can give her—
 And the stile that I've sat by since six in the evening,
 Turns round, aye it does, of itself to receive her.
 Come hither, come hither,
 'Tis Midsummer weather ;
 Now answer me this, by the round moon above me,
 Do you ?—well, after all, what's the use of being talking ?
 Sure you wouldn't come hither if you didn't love me !

THE LOCAL FISHERIES OF DUBLIN.

WE have already in previous numbers of this journal noticed some of the principal crustaceæ which minister to the gastronomical tastes of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, and are now induced to briefly return to the subject, for the purpose of giving our readers an outline of an admirable paper recently read before the Natural History Society of Ireland, by Professor Kinahan, F.L.S., inquiring into the causes of the present decay of the Dublin crab and lobster fisheries ; with a few suggestions as to the practicability of amendment of the market supply, either by substitution of species or otherwise. The subject is one in every respect deserving of attention, and has been very pertinently treated by Professor Kinahan.

On a comparison of the numbers of species of crustaceæ which are exposed for sale in the markets of Paris, London, and Dublin, it appears that the lowest consumption of these dainties is in the latter city. In Paris the species of crustaceæ exposed for sale in the public market is generally nine in number ; viz., the lobster, the common crab, the sea cray fishes, fresh water cray fish, common shrimp, two species of prawn, the common green crab, and the velvet cleanser crab. In the English markets the list is still larger—twelve in all. This includes the common crab, the lobster, sea and fresh water cray fish, the common shrimp, three species of prawn, the corwich, and the green crab. We find the list in the Dublin market limited to the following : lobster, common crab, sea and fresh water cray fishes, common shrimp, which, with the addition of the Norway lobster, called "prawns" in the Dublin markets, makes up but six, although most of the other species are found about Dublin, or in localities easily accessible for its markets. It will be interesting to examine the species in detail. The common crab is taken in large numbers around the Irish coast, but of late years the Dublin fisheries have been falling off. This arises from various causes, but, in Professor Kinahan's opinion, none have been so active as too close fishing of the ground, and the consequent destruction of the young, which, though unmarketable, are used as bait by the fishermen, in some cases foolishly, as for baiting whelk-pots. In the Summer hand-line fisheries, hardly any other bait is used, when crabs are procurable ; and this might be avoided, since it has been found that the velvet cleanser crab is equally efficacious as a substitute. The grounds in which these animals are found are rocky, weedy bottoms, hence the fisheries are confined to within a short distance of the shores. The chief places about Dublin are Skerries, Howth, Kingstown, Dalkey, and Bullock. The fisheries used to be carried on solely by wicker pots, made on the principle of the common wire mouse trap, but with the aperture at the top. Latterly, about Kingstown and Dalkey, the drum-net has superseded the pot. It is made of net stretched in the form of a drum on hoops, with openings at opposite ends, one opening being at the top, the other at the bottom. From the hoops the bait, consisting of bits of fish, is generally suspended by means of withes, frequently-made of the common briar. These are sunk and left down for a certain number of hours, when they are taken up, the crabs, etc., removed, and the pots or drum re-baited and sunk again. On the west coast of Ireland crabs are taken by another method. An open hoop having two lines set cross-wise on it, and below furnished with a bag net, is fastened to a strong line of sufficient length, the bait being attached to the cross-lines, and the apparatus then lowered into the sea ; after the lapse of ten or fifteen minutes it is drawn up, and the crabs, etc., are found in the bag. When pots are used the fishing is most precarious ; the pots are frequently lost through gales, or carrying away of the buoys by passing vessels, and, as the baits require to be frequently renewed, it often happens, when the crabs are scarce, the cost of the bait exceeds the value of the capture. The crabs taken at Skerries are generally of large size, but epicures prefer those captured about Bullock and Dalkey, which are moderate sized, plump, and heavier in proportion, though, singularly enough, those captured at the back of the East Pier are mostly inferior. The feeding grounds have probably something to do with this ; the Bullock grounds being free from the influence of the sewerage, which greatly affects the Kingstown grounds.

The only difference between the modes of capture of the lobster and the crab is, that the former prefers a stale bait. Heavy gales affect the supply of the two species in a remarkable manner. The last season, after the heavy gales of February, 1861, proved a very bad one ; probably the disturbance of the rocks near the shore had something to say to it, from the destruction of their feeding places. Ruddy, in his "Natural History of Dublin," has a curious statement about this species. He says : "This is native and good at Howth and Lambay ; but what they have good at Bullock they bring from Waterford, etc., and feed and send to Dublin market those of their own produce, small and bad."

The sea cray fish, or spiny or horny lobster, is extremely rare about Dublin. The markets are supplied from the southern and western coasts, but the consumption is small. The freshwater cray fish can scarcely be included among the edible crustaceæ as its great use in Dublin is as a garnish to fish. It is chiefly supplied from the streams in the county Kildare, as at Maynooth. The shrimp is only seen in the market in small numbers, and of them most are imported, although it is extremely common on the Dublin coasts, the sandy pools on its beaches everywhere containing it ; and in some places, such as about Rush, the species grows to a large size. They do not want for flavour, so that we can only account for its absence from our tables by a want of appreciation in the eating public.

The "Norway lobster," though called the prawn in the Dublin markets, differs much from the true prawn, being four or five times the velvet cleanser crab. In the English markets the list is still the size of that animal, and of a different shape. It is the most beautiful of all our crustaceans as regards sculpture, and is generally abundant and much appreciated in the Dublin markets. They are supplied by the trawlers from the deep waters which lie between Ireland and the Isle of Man. The "common prawn" occurs in the crab grounds about Dalkey Island, and formerly constituted an important fishery. Why this has fallen off it is impossible to say; the species still exists, but is rare. It is also taken at Bray Head. The "squill prawn" is one of the species which Professor Kinahan thinks might be profitably introduced for consumption, if a taste for shrimps were once acquired. It is found abundantly in every rock-pool about the Dublin coasts, and in the pools cut off from the sea by the railway; in the weedy portions of the slob, at Malahide, etc., where they can be captured in a common hand ring-net in abundance. This is the species mentioned by Rutty as having been destroyed by the frost of 1740, as a reference to Rondeletius will show. The species of prawn known as "Leach's prawn" is not met with about Dublin, but is very abundant at certain seasons in Galway, where they are sold indiscriminately with the "squill prawn" and the young of the common prawn. The species called the "Esop prawn" occurs in our rock-pools, but, being more properly a deep-water species, if fished for, it must be sought in the deeper waters. It occurs in myriads in the herring nets, and it is a great pity it has not been introduced into the Irish markets, seeing that it is common enough in those of London. Leach remarks of it: "It is used as an article of food at Yarmouth, and is at that place so much esteemed for the table, as to afford constant employment during the summer season to the fishermen, who take it in abundance at a considerable distance from the shore, and name it, from that circumstance, the 'sea shrimp.'" Off Dalkey it occurs abundantly in the pots, when crabs are used for bait; indeed, the supply seems inexhaustible.

First, amongst the crab species, may be noticed the "green crab," which swarms around the Irish coasts, and is easily captured, either by "bobbing" for it, as is done for eels, with a bundle of garbage; or by the hand, under stones, at low water. Although found in both the London and Paris markets, it bears only an inferior price. It might, however, with advantage, be substituted for the common crab as bait, and so diminish the destruction of the young of that species. It is used by the Malahide fishers as bait for their wheel-pots, and, immediately after exuviation, while still soft, is used as a bait for shore hand-lines about Dublin, being then called "soft crabs." The "velvet cleanser crab" is extremely abundant under stones at half tides, and a great pest in the crab pots. It has been successfully substituted for the common crab, but the great objection to it is the small amount of meat found in it; this, however, would not prevent its being used in the manufacture of sauces, a purpose for which the smaller crabs are used. The fishermen in the vicinity of Kingstown call it "the fiddler, and commonly destroy all they find in the pots, but it is frequently used for baiting the wheel-traps.

Around Dublin there are a number of other crustaceans which are taken abroad, and which, like the last-mentioned, might at least be used in sauces; the "scaly Spanish lobster," found abundantly in certain localities; two species of "cleanser" crabs, abundant in deep water, and easily procured by the dredge and other means.

The conclusion of Professor Kinahan's valuable paper was devoted to a few general remarks anent the local fisheries of Dublin. As he observed, there can be no doubt that formerly they were much more curative than at present, and that of late years the supplies have fallen off. A consideration of the causes may be necessary. The first of these, without doubt, is too close fishing. Unfortunately, the period of the year when those delicacies are in season, is also that at which hand-line fishing is in vogue, hence a ready market is obtained for individuals which ought rightly to be thrown back again into the sea to grow; unfortunately, also, those fish which carry the spawn, or coral, as it is called, are considered the greatest delicacies, and, hence, we are burning the candle at both ends—destroying the young and destroying the ova. Then, again, the number of competitors on the fishing ground is much increased; hence large individuals have become scarce, and the fisherman is obliged, in self-defence, to reimburse himself the cost of his bait, time, and tackle, by vending crabs which formerly were thrown back into the sea. Legislative interference with the fisheries has always defeated itself, partly through popular prejudice, and partly through arbitrary restrictions, which have, in too many cases, converted the natural active guardians of the fish into their destroyers, or at least, into passive witnesses of their destruction by others. Another cause, doubtless, has been the increased consumption, through the opening of new markets, etc., which has brought about the very thing we have noted before—too close fishing. A third cause which may be remarked in the Dublin fisheries, arises from the changes which the advances of civilization have caused in many of the feeding grounds. Numerous houses and terraces built in the vicinity of the sea pouring in gallons of filthy and deleterious sewage by the hour, cause the destruction of the food on which the animals feed, if not their own, and drives them from their haunts. As Professor Kinahan correctly remarks, while the denizens of the Irish metropolis keep up their present absurd system of sewage, in which, under the absurd idea that the foul matter will be dissipated in the tide, they carry the outlets of their sewers down into the sea. Under this system, the natural course of events is, the solid matters are carried out to sea in the first instance, and are either returned again in a minute state of division, but not the less hurtful on that account, and spread upon the Irish beaches; or else, meeting with a non-current, deposited as a bank of foetid, lifeless mud. Legislative enactment might meet this difficulty, but, with Professor Kinahan, we are not sanguine on the point. Another cause, doubtless, of the falling off arises from changes in the submarine banks, due to violent storms, which have destroyed many favourite feeding grounds—in fact, since a heavy gale, many years ago, the mollusca, etc., thrown up on many Irish beaches, have been totally altered as to numbers and species. Professor Kinahan is of opinion that there is one remedy which, supposing the sewage difficulty removed, might restore the Dublin feeding grounds—this is, the breeding of crabs and lobsters in stews, into which the sea has full access, and from which the young could escape, or be transferred at the proper season into localities more fitted for their adult growth. These remarks are intended to apply more particularly to the grounds about Kingstown, Dalkey, and Bullock, but they are generally applicable to any locality. From the introduction to White's excellent popular history of British crustaceans, proving that the subject of supply is, by no means, an unimportant one in an economic point of view, it appears that in London the consumption of some of the largest dealers amounts to 60,000 lobsters and 12,000 crabs per annum, while many of the ordinary fishmongers find sale for some 8,000 or 10,000; and the consumption of prawns and shrimps is almost incalculable. Hundreds of pounds weight of the former, averaging 200 prawns to the pound, and bushels of the latter, averaging from 100 to 150 in the pint, being something like 6,400 to 9,600 in each bushel, finding a ready market, and this takes no count of the other species consumed. Between May and June, 1855, upwards of 40,000 lobsters were sent from the Orkneys alone to London, their value being £5,000; and during the summer season 3,050 lobsters were exported from the Channel Islands per week, totally irrespective of the consumption in the islands themselves. From Norway, at least 600,000 lobsters are annually supplied to the London folk, so that the only wonder must be that the supplies have not long since run out. Of the numbers consumed in the Dublin markets, we have no accurate means of speaking, but judging by the displays in the shop windows, and the number of boats employed in the fisheries, it must be considerable enough to render the subject brought forward in Professor Kinahan's communication—which, we may add, was illustrated by specimens of most of the species of crustaceans mentioned—of considerable importance.

THE SEVENTEENTH OF MARCH.

GREEN land of sorrow,
Waiting the morrow,
With brows uplifted,
Through mournful years,
No bright beam driven
From the heights of heaven,
Has healed thy sorrows,
Or dried thy tears.

So sweet, so holy,
So melancholy,
Thy very mourning
Is half divine,

But the strains thou singest,
The light thou bringest,
Are as funeral wreaths
Around banquet wine.

Ah! what's the glory
Of antique story,
When the golden present
No fruit doth bear?
The world's derision
Doth mock the vision,
Thine eye beholdeth
In futures fair.

Even as I listen,
And broad stars glisten
O'er the gloom profound
Of thy miseries,
Low winds awaken,
Like sad chords shaken,
From harps that murmur
Great threnodies.

Arise—the morning,
With wind-blown warning,
Shakes on the hill-tops
Its flag of fire.
Where slaves go thronging,
Be thy long longing
Raised up and kindled
To proud desire.

The night is waning,
The light is gaining,
The clarions blare
To the mighty feast,
And, 'twixt clouds parted,
O Broken-hearted,
Thy sun arises
In yonder east!

WEARING THE SHAMROCK AND WEARING THE LEEK.

HAT a pity it is that the brilliant pedantry of the nineteenth century should succeed in making "airy nothings" of many a notable fact and quaint fancy which, from time immemorial, our ancestors learned to regard as part of their persuasion? For example, take our old friend Æsop. It is an indisputable fact that, if not altogether a myth, he is certainly not the author of the instructive fables which have been for so long attributed to him. The name of Babrius is one which, for the last hundred and eighty years, has been gradually becoming more and more significant to students of antiquity. That he was a fabulist of one or other of the Greek classical periods, who wrote in choliambic verse, was already evident from a few fragments preserved by lexicographers and grammarians. But the first to make him more than a name was the renowned Bentley, in a dissertation on the supposed fables of Æsop, appended to the first draught of the immortal work on Phalaris, and the researches of subsequent commentators have entirely reduced the so-called "father of fable" to a mere shadow, and shown that nearly all the substance which has invested him, really belonged to Babrius. We regret to have our confidence in Æsop thus rudely displaced, but what are we to say to the averments of some modern antiquaries, asserting that there is not a vestige of authority for the time-honoured tradition of the use made by St. Patrick of the Shamrock, in explaining the mystery of the Holy Trinity to King Laeghaire and his pagan subjects; and, moreover, that the employment of the trefoil, as a national emblem, is unwarranted by any authority whatever? Admitting the absence of any direct evidence on the subject, it is but fair to inquire why the tradition should be regarded as altogether untenable, seeing the natural intimate allusion of the Shamrock to the fundamental doctrine of Christianity. Nothing in our mind is more probable than that the evangeliser of Ireland proved the existence of the Trinity by referring to the Shamrock. At any rate, the tradition is a genial and a suggestive one, and it would be a pity that it should ever fall into disrepute, since it furnishes Irishmen with an emblem of fraternity, and is an oasis in that desert of polemical and political strife, in which the fortunes of Ireland are entombed.

The word Shamrock is derived from Seamhair, pronounced "shamuir," clover; Seamhair óg, or Seamróg, pronounced "shamrog," little clover. Such was the beauty and chasteness of this emblem, that it formed one of the earliest ornaments in the architecture of the twelfth or thirteenth century, and continued throughout the successive changes and beauties of all that is resplendent in the Gothic style. In the latter part of the last century the trefoil was selected to become a conspicuous ornament in the insignia of the Knights of the Order of St. Patrick, which was founded by George III., in 1783; in 1801 it was introduced as the emblem for Ireland, and with the Rose and Thistle, all springing from one stalk, composes the badge for the United Kingdom. Among the ancients, Hope was sometimes represented as a beautiful child, standing upon tip-toes, and a trefoil, or three-coloured grass, in her hand. In one of the "Melodies" Moore has introduced a very pretty conceit in allusion to the Shamrock, describing a friendly contest between Love and Valour, for its possession,

"But Wit perceives
The triple leaves,
And cries, "Oh! do not sever,
A type that blends
Three godlike friends—
Love, Valour, Wit, for ever!"

The seventeenth of the present month will be the anniversary of Saint Patrick, and long may the "green, immortal Shamrock" on that day be the chosen leaf by which Irishmen, of every creed and every party, will be reminded of the deliverance of their native land from the thralldom of Paganism, and the simple, but eloquent symbol from which they can realize the ennobling tenets of Christianity.

The opening day of this month, which Spenser describes as—

"Sturdy March, with brows full sternly bent,
And armed strongly,"

is a national anniversary with the Welsh, being the day of their patron saint, David, or in Welsh, Dewid, son of Xantus, prince of Cardiganshire, who preached with great fervour and success to the Britons, and died in 544. The origin of the Leek as the badge of Welshmen, on the first of March, is involved in much obscurity; there is no evidence concerning it, if we except that of an old "broadside," which declares that, on a certain first of March, the Welshmen, "joyined with their foes," and, in order not to confound friends with them—

"Into a garden they did go, Where each one pulled a leeke," which, wearing in their hats, they were thus enabled to recognise their countrymen, "all who had no Leekes being alaine." To this tradition Shakspeare refers, making Fluellensay, in "Henry V.," "The Welshmen did goot service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing Leeks in their Monmouth caps." The more plausible supposition, however, is that of Dr. Oliver Pughe, that it was derived from "the custom in the Cymmorths, still observed in Wales, in which the farmers assist each other in ploughing their land, on which occasion every one formerly contributed his Leek to the common repast."

Probably the custom once had some religious association to which we have long since lost the clue; for the Egyptians held the Leek as sacred, and it was worshipped by the ancient Syrians. From whatever source it arose, there can be no doubt as to the antiquity of the custom, and the Welsh

"Still remember David's Day,
In wearing of a leek."

It is spoken of by Shakspeare as an "ancient tradition, begun upon an honourable aspect, and worn as a memorable trophy of pre-deceased valour." In his play of "Henry V." the Leek is frequently mentioned. Fluellen, a gallant Welsh soldier, always wore it in his cap on St. David's Day, and being in consequence ridiculed by the braggart Pistol, on an occasion when he could not resent an insult, takes the first opportunity of doing so, by compelling Pistol to eat a Leek, remarking, "If you can mock a Leek, you can eat a Leek!" May everyone who would tamper with national traditions, and arouse national animosities, whether they wear the Shamrock or wear the Leek, ever want the wherewithal in which to "drown" the former on St. Patrick's Day, and be ignominiously necessitated to eat the latter on the anniversary of St. David.

MARYANNE'S SWEETHEART.

Y the kitchen window she stood, Maryanne did, and gazed long and earnestly through the dirty panes, set in the mouldy sashes, into the filthy street. The prospect was certainly limited; it consisted of a detached stable-house that had lain idle for a century, of a wheel-barrow that had resigned a leg and a handle, and of something between a mile-stone and pillar-box, the top of which the weather had garnished with a shirt-collar and a fore-lock of snow. The kitchen window, be it observed, looked into something that may be described as a compromise between a tenth rate hamlet and a bit of town commonage. It was "very dreary," as the lady in the moated grange, is reported to have said; and what induced a pretty girl like Maryanne to stand there, in the cold November weather, her feet resting on the damp flags and her nose flattened against the damp glass, would have been a puzzle to the most observant beholder. Dear lady reader, can you guess? Pretty Angelica, cosy in furs, and blushing in warm-coloured ribbon, will you pronounce Maryanne a riddle? Only a few years ago, rich little pet, who was it that used to steal out on the balcony at night, with a professed passion for astronomy, and who, scarcely deigning to look at the maiden moon, exchanged soft whispers and bits of cocked-hat billets with a pale young gentleman in the street? And, ma petite, may not love shoot arrows from, and nurse longings, as well behind a kitchen as a drawing-room window? The dear lad, you know, is cosmopolitan in taste. Half-an hour ago he was rolling on the peachy carpet of Madeline's boudoir; and now, if you step down stairs, you may find him mending his bow and tipping his arrows in Jane's coal-scuttle.

And, after all, this is the round about way of saying that Maryanne was in love and expected some one. The majority of people take years to get so far, but then they don't know the value of paragraphs.

The house in which our Maryanne lived was a pretty house in front, and an ugly house to the rear. It was occupied by a Mrs. Prudence, a widow lady, who had lost her husband in the Straits of Java. She and Maryanne, who ministered to her temporal wants, in the combined capacity of "butler, house-maid, cook, and alush," were its only occupants. To tell the truth of Mrs. Prudence, she wasn't a bad woman; she never rose before ten, she went to bed at twelve; she dyed her hair with a liquid which made it look purple, she painted her face with a composition which made it resemble faded wall-paper, she took snuff, she wore pattens in wet weather; she mended her own stockings, she quilled her own caps, she never went out without an umbrella, she took in the local paper, and she hated the "polis."

To poor Maryanne she was a fond and indulgent mistress. If our little heroine wanted a holiday, Mrs. Prudence would say, "Leave the things out, dear, and you may go." And when Maryanne had washed the potatoes and put the joint to roast, she would dress herself, rather "smart," I assure you, and take her way rejoicing. Only one thing troubled her, and that was a fatal grievance—Mrs. Prudence allowed no "followers." The idea of a thing in trousers coming into her house was not to be thought of. "For they smell dreadful of tobacco," said Mrs. Prudence; "and they do eat such lots, not to speak of the victuals they take away in those red handkerchiefs spotted all over with lozenges. I won't have them." Poor little Maryanne! she loved, and was beloved, and felt it was a cruel prohibition which prevented her on the cold winter evenings from inviting "poor, poor Tom" down stairs. She could make him so comfortable before the bright kitchen fire, with the clothes-horse at his back, to keep out the draughts! Besides, he would see how neatly she did her house-keeping; for Tom loved a clean hearth and a clean grate, and was rather an epicure in the way of creature comforts.

Bring Tom down stairs she would! On November Eve she would smuggle him in through the back kitchen window, and run the risk of detection. He should sit by her fire, with her clothes-horse at his back, and her ale-jug in his hand; and if Mrs. Prudence didn't like it, let her not like it, for no thanks would Maryanne give her! And it was November Eve, and Maryanne stood by the back kitchen window and looked out, and to all readers of this story, her motive is no longer a mystery!

Mrs. Prudence sat before the fire in a cheerful parlour. She was a middle-aged lady; her expression was mild and benevolent, her figure good, and her dress a gray lustre. Open, on the table beside her, was the last volume of the Delicate Distress—a novel which had obtained a popularity as brief as it was sudden. The page which the lady had just read described the last sorrowful interview of Amanda with her lover Adolphus; and Mrs. Prudence laid down the book and sighed. We said she hated the police; we should have said, she affected to hate that respectable body, for amongst them was one whom she ardently loved—one whom, as she described him in a letter to an old schoolfellow of hers, "who had risen like a fixed star over the sorrow of my widowhood—his name, dear, is James." Sighing and looking into the fire are idle occupations for an elderly lady not ordinarily disposed to be sentimental, but when one learns that the venerable sigher and looker is in love, sympathy suggests an excuse, and pity ratifies it. In order to shield herself from the suspicion of being partial to the police, Mrs. Prudence never omitted an opportunity of maligning the members of this force. She accused them of a variety of vices, including the incontinent abstraction of brass knockers and door-plates, anathematized them as a disgrace to the criminal administration; and vowed that if she herself were able to patrol the neighbourhood every night, with the green umbrella, she would render more public service than half the organized "polis" in the service. And yet she loved one. Oh, day and night! what hypocrisy will we not be guilty of that the right hand may play handily and keep the left in ignorance! She loved him, she abused him by implication. It was the tact of a woman enfeebled by age, female finesse grown coarse, lady-like caution becoming clutny. For, dear reader, the rarest instrument will crack, and the wind squeak through the rent; and Paganini's fiddle shall veneer cheap upholstery and the chords of Gerard's harp be boiled down to make glue, and Jullien's magic horn patch brass kettles. Sic. etc.

At the fire sat Mrs. Prudence. She had not lighted candles, for the twilight was favourable to her reflections; and the blaze from the coal enabled her to read with sufficient facility. Gazing into the glowing mass before her, imagination built up castles and terraces from the flaming mineral; and these, in their turn, were peopled by strange forms, amongst whom she recognised the handsome figure and ugly hat of James. "Poor fellow," she sighed, "I wonder what sort of November Eve must they keep in that wretched-looking dépôt. His heart must surely be broke amongst the rough fellows he lives with!" The chain of her thoughts was suddenly interrupted; for, at this link, Mrs. Prudence became conscious that the long shadow of a man was projected from the street across the carpet and up to the fire-place. She raised her eyes to the window, and perceived James standing before the rails. His hands were clasped tightly, his head was thrown back, his breast heaved visibly. As she watched him, he removed his hat from his head, pulled out a cotton handkerchief and applied it to his eyes. Mrs. Prudence's first impulse prompted her to retire; but the emotion manifested by the sensitive James pierced her to the heart, and she went to the window. Placing her finger on her lips, as an admonition to be silent, she motioned him to the door, and, slipping softly through the hall, raised the latch. Having admitted himself, James crossed the tarpaulin with a cat-like tread, slipped into the parlour, shoved his hat under a chair, and sat down.

"Nice evening, ma'am."

"Will you pardon me," said Mrs. Prudence, "but I think your name is Richard?" Mrs. Prudence knew that it wasn't, but, she relied strongly on a little hypocrisy.

"James, ma'am, is my name, James Bullseye. Hope it is not offensive?"

"Seeing you, by accident, standing in the street, I thought I'd call you in to ask for Mrs. Muggridge, who is very bad, I believe."

"Inspector Muggridge's wife, ma'am? Bad! Not she; strong as a stallion ma'am, was never sick in her life, lays in a pound of beef-steak for breakfast every morning. Good sign for a sickly lady, ma'am!"

"You astonish me," replied Mrs. Prudence, "them servants can never be depended upon. Only fancy Maryanne, our maid, coming in last night with the story that Mrs. Muggridge was laid up with inflammation of the throat. (Maryanne had brought no such story.) Ah! Mr. Bullseye, if you knew what a nuisance servants are."

"I knows they're bad, ma'am; but, my name is James. Only last November Eve I apprehended Mr. Cready's servant for a most audacious larceny; she actually melted down three pewter spoons through a key handle, into a tub of cold water, to try her fortune, and my name, ma'am, is James, if you please."

"Three pewter spoons!" exclaimed Mrs. Prudence, "only fancy that! Ah! Mr. Bullseye."

"If you don't object, ma'am, James."

"Your'e too kind, James," said the lady, with a half suppressed sigh.

"You're too kind, but, I often think that a gentleman of your standing, who has such a deep insight into the wrong doings of people, must be a—weary of the world; do you fret much?"

"It goes to my very heart, ma'am, I—"

"But why say ma'am, James, and my name Olivia?"

"It goes to my heart, Olivia, I was going to say, when I sees people running as it were to the gallows. I feel's for them—I pities them, and I frets terrible at times. From the latest criminal statistics, ma'am—Olivia—it appears that the number of servants who have—"

"Excuse me" interrupted Mrs. Prudence, "but my life has been so tormented by them persons, that memory is harrowed, when it recalls all the insults and injuries I have received at their hands. Here be you and I, talking as sensible people should talk, and suppose Maryanne should come up—"

"Psha! Olivia, I'd make for the table!"

"Suppose, as I was saying, she came up and saw us, don't you think the whole story would be belled about the town before morning?"

"Very true, Olivia. In fact if you only coughs aloud at O'Neil's ouncel it'll be heard in claps of thunder over the west gate; but I'll take care of her."

Mrs. Prudence sighed heavily. "My late husband was a model man," she said. "Ever dear to memory, I revere his goodness in my soul, and cherish his image in my brooch." And Mrs. Prudence wept.

James ran to her, knelt beside her chair, and conjured her, even for his sake, to stay her tears. "Your loss was great Olivia, but don't, don't despair."

"Who is to comfort the forlorn heart?" she blubbered, "who is to dry the widow's tears? Oh, James!"

"Let me dry them, little petty," said the sympathetic party, and he fetched the cotton handkerchief from his hat and sopped her eyes.

"You're too good—too generous!"

"Oh! Olivia, say not so. For days, for weeks, for months, on day beat or night beat your image has been always present to me. I love you, as I never loved no one before—I adore you. Hush! there's some one on the stairs," and James, suddenly checking his transports, glided beneath the table.

It was Maryanne, who came to light the candles and draw the curtains. Mrs. Prudence told her she would do both herself, and called for hot water. Her request was instantly complied with; but when the girl was setting down the jug on the table, she tilted it slightly over, causing the boiling liquid to trickle on Bullseye's legs. That gentleman instantly pursed his mouth and wrinkled his nose from a high sense of displeasure; and, when Maryanne had retired, he thought it extremely comfortable to hop lightly around the room and rub the afflicted parts, whilst he made a noise singularly like the cooing of a dove.

Tom sat by the kitchen-fire. A mug of ale and some thick wedges of bread and meat were laid on the range close to his elbow; and ever and anon he bent over them, that the smoke of his pipe might go up the chimney. Tom was in good humour with himself and with the world, for Maryanne had kissed him and called him a duck; and they had had a little chat over their marriage prospects, and had their eyes on a neat little parlour in a quiet part of the town, in which, if the rent were moderate, they intended to begin life together. "She's a regular brick," thought Tom, and he had scarcely arrived at that conclusion when Maryanne, white as sepulchral marble, bounded into the kitchen.

"Oh, Tom, Tom!"

"What's the matter now? Did you see a ghost?" And the young fellow put his arm round the girl's waist and drew her to his side.

"No, Tom, not a ghost, but something a deal worse—a policeman. Missus knows you're in the house, and she has brought him and hid him under the table."

Tom whistled and looked thoughtful. "Is he bigger than me?" he asked, with considerable anxiety.

"Twice as big as you, Tom. I only saw his legs, and they're awful. Oh! what'll you do, at all?"

"Only then to grin and go through it, dear. Couldn't you let me out quietly?"

"Nonsense! you can't stir in the house but she must know what it's about, she's so cantankerously curious." And, saying this, Maryanne bit her lips and clenched her hands determinedly.

"Can you hear her coming down stairs?" he asked.

"I took care of that; she won't steal a march on us, anyhow, for I put a chair in the middle of the dark flight and she can't get down without knocking against it. Look, Tom, look," and Maryanne pointed to the window-blind on which the shadow of a policeman was distinctly traced by the gaslight.

Tom was silent for a moment. "They're surrounning us," he said, with a great groan; and as he spoke the shadow moved out of the field of the blind. "Let them do their best," he continued; "we didn't come to rob, or steal, or make away with anything, so we didn't."

"Let us take it quietly," suggested Maryanne. "Don't you stir until the worst comes; and when all goes to all, you can make for the coal-hole, Tom."

He laughed. "You won't leave me long in jail, Maryanne, will you?"

"I'll be worse off than yourself whilst you're there," she answered. "When Missus goes to bed and the 'polis' falls asleep, I'll steal down and let you out. Won't that do?"

"Nicely, darling, nicely. Sit down. If I get that five shilling rise, and there's little doubt that I will, with the bit of money I've got together things'll be very nice. Of course I can't send you to buy the greens in a coach-and-four, you know—for, you know—"

"Ding-de-ring, ring."

"That's the bell," interrupted Maryanne, and she rose to answer it when the noise of a falling chair in the dark flight arrested her. "Tom," she whispered, as she pointed to the coal-cellar, "that's the way—hook it."

He had scarcely disappeared when Mrs. Prudence sailed into the kitchen. "Gracious goodness, girl, why did you leave that chair on the stairs?"

"To keep the cat from going up stairs and dirtying the carpets, ma'am," replied Maryanne, with a truly classic calmness.

Mrs. Prudence said, "H'm," and looked mysterious. "You should have been in bed an hour since. I can't stand this awful waste of fire and candle-light. Why, you might roast an ox at that grate. Slack it, and be off."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Is there much coal in the cellar, Maryanne?"

"There is a trifle, ma'am; enough for a few days, anyhow."

"Show the light," says Mrs. Prudence, advancing to the cellar.

"The man will be here with a fresh ton in the morning," and the lady peered into the dusky interior, fortunately without perceiving Tom, who, warned by the sound of approaching footsteps and several significant coughs from his sweetheart, had hidden himself behind a deep projection of masonry, and thus escaped her vigilant eyes. With a slight recommendation, to the effect that Maryanne should economise fuel for the future, Mrs. Prudence locked the door and ordered the girl to bed. She was, of course, obeyed. Maryanne went to her room, her mistress to the parlour, and Tom remained shut up in palpable darkness.

Where was James? We regret to relate that, after the imbibition of the sixth tumbler, that interesting young man laid down at full length on the carpet, and, in spite of all requests to the contrary from Mrs. Prudence, went to sleep. When the lady would say to him, "James, get up, like a dear," he would reply, "Yes, your worship. You're right, sergeant," and, attempting to rise, would fall helplessly to the floor. He persisted in taking her for a stipendiary, went through the form of oath several times, and gave sundry persons some singularly original characters. What could poor Mrs. Prudence do? If Maryanne discovered that she entertained a policeman, the story would be ventilated in every part of the town; and the lady would be made the laughing-stock of the inhabitants. Her hope was that James would "soon sober," and might then he get out without making a third party wiser for what had happened.

So the poor lady quieted her apprehensions, and, having made herself comfortable in a large chair, went to sleep.

The morning was far advanced before Mrs. Prudence awoke to the sense of her situation. On descending below, she found Mr. Bullseye wide awake, and attaching a codicil to the night's indulgences in the shape of a stiff 'un of brandy and water. As he could not conveniently leave the house without being observed by her neighbours, Mrs. Prudence suggested that he should keep quiet and remain where he was until evening, when he could go abroad without being noticed. Mr. Bullseye, to do him justice, offered no impediment to the plan. He contented himself by saying that, in the event of corned beef being served up for dinner, he should like an escort of carrots and a dash of red pepper. Preliminaries being arranged so far, Mrs. Prudence closed the door, and was about to retire in order to refresh her toilet, when a single knock at the entrance diverted her from that pleasant occupation. Mr. Diamond's man had fetched the coals, and wanted to know "as how he'd put them in." Mrs. P. put her hand in her pocket—the key of the cellar was lost! For a moment she felt stupefied and absent, but recovering herself, she suggested that Mr. Diamond's man should lift the iron and put the coals in.

Poor Tom saw the iron lifted, he heard the coals come down, another sackful and he should have been buried alive. To prevent such a catastrophe, he made at the door, knocked off the lock with a lump of the mineral, opened an escape, and rushed up stairs. In his hurry and fright he missed the hall and found himself, after several windings and turnings, in Maryanne's room. Her wardrobe was hanging around, and it immediately occurred to him that the best way to cover his retreat would be to don her attire, and slip from the house. He obeyed the happy impulse, examined himself in the glass, and descended the stairs. He had arrived at the middle of the last flight, and was preparing for a precipitate dash at the door, when Maryanne, who was washing the surbase of the hall, looked up, and beholding a woman trying to escape with a portion of her wardrobe, screamed out—"Robbers, robbers!" at the top of her voice. Mr. Bullseye heard the note of alarm, and, notwithstanding the delicacy of his position, he was unable to resist the temptation of the opportunity, and rushed out to secure the offender. He gripped Tom by the throat and succeeded in bringing him to the floor, but then, to his inexpressible astonishment, he found himself in the hands of an antagonist more than his match. They rolled several times across the mat in a desperate fight for mastery, and the advantages of each were so nicely balanced that they desisted, sat upright, and looked in each other's faces.

"What!" said the policeman, surveying his rival, "can I believe my eyes? Why, you aint no woman, but my nevvvy, Tom Brady!"

"And you," exclaimed the latter, "aint no policeman, but my uncle, Jem Bullseye."

"Let us embrace," said James; "bless you, bless you!"

"Who are those horrid men, Maryanne?" cried Mrs. Prudence, rushing to the scene in an agony of affected alarm. "Who are those men?"

"'Twon't wash, Oliviar—'twont wash," replied James. "This here lad is my nevvvy, and that ere girl's his sweetheart, and you—ah!" and Mr. Bullseye dropped his head and the sigh simultaneously.

"If it get's out," exclaimed Mrs. Prudence, "we're ruined!"

"Please, ma'am," suggested Maryanne, "if you let Tom come here now and then, to see me, no one will ever hear a word of it."

"Undutiful girl," said the lady, bursting into a fit of tears, "you compel me not to refuse you—be it so."

"It's all square," said Mr. Bullseye, with considerable dignity.

"It's perfectly square; there's no use a making too much of a trifle. What d'ye say, Mrs. Prudence?"

The lady frowned.

"What does Oliviar say?" repeated James.

A tranquil smile of satisfaction irradiated Mrs. Prudence's countenance.

She says, "Yes."

So they shook hands, and Mrs. Prudence was soon Mrs. Bullseye, and Tom engaged a wife and housekeeper in the person of our Maryanne.

CHAPTER VIII.

OW!" the woman exclaimed, after gazing with fixed and, staring eyes upon the old man, until he disappeared together with his company behind the hill on the rear of the inn. "Now, Sarah, your time is come! Which of 'em is it to be? Eh! whose throat have you cut? His or your husband's? The father of your child that loved—that trusted you—that tossed his life into your hands as freely as he would his money into a strong box. You have armed his worst enemy against him! Eh? you Dalilah! you! what have you done? O great Heaven, was I mad? Come back? Ho, ho! old man, come back! He's gone—he pretends he can't hear me, because he hates him deadly, and he wants to take his life with the two pistols that I loaded for him. Ho! ho! ho! bravely done, wife. You're a fine lady, aren't you? Indeed you are. O my boy, my child, my first and only darling!" she continued, clasping the terrified urchin wildly to her bosom—"O my heart's light! my treasure! Look at me! Do you know me? I'm your mother; and I sent that man, that gave you the tester, you know, I sent him to shoot your father! Wasn't I the fine mother to you? Don't curse me, you young villain, or I'll dash your brains out! He was going to take the life of my friend, and I took his, that's all. Don't tell any body, darling. O my love, my sweet love—here! put your little head into my heart, and comfort it, for it is breaking, and burning, and leaping within me! That's it, my dove," and gathering the pale-faced little creature with a trembling tenderness to her heart, she suffered the torrent of fierce passion to which she had abandoned herself, to die away in murmurs of mournful fondness and agitation.

Suddenly starting up, and throwing her long hair back from her ears, she remained in an attitude of intense attention. "Ha! Was that a shot? No, not yet—sure. Stay, Dinny, stand back, sir. What am I to do, now? Hide your black eyes, child, I can't look at them. The young suiteen dhuv. Look, the storm will soon begin now. Must I stay here all alone in the black night until one or either of them returns home? My head would rive and burst. Stop, stop a moment! What if the storm should come on dreadfully, and the thunder, and lightning, and rain, and hinder his passage? He can't go past the Crag road, if one shower more should moisten the earth, under the Carrigou-Dhiol. O send it—O Heaven, forgiving Heaven, look at me!" She flung herself on her knees, clasped and wrung her hands, as she looked upward in a rapture of despair. "Look at me on my knees, and that's where you didn't see me for five years and more, for I dared not to do it, but look at me now, praying to you to send down all your thunders, and your lightnings, and your floods of rain, and keep them two asunder this dreadful night! Do it for your own glory, if not in pity to them or me, for so sure as they meet, there will be blood spilt in your sight!—Red blood that will lie heavy on the shedder's soul! and leave, may be, an angel the less for your bright kingdom! Ha! is that my answer!" she exclaimed, starting from the earth, as a distant clattering of thunder sounded through the silent evening. "My heart does not tell me that my prayer is heard, as it used to do when I knelt in my father's house. My conscience is louder than the thunder, and it says, that I deserve no mercy! What am I to do? I can't stay here—to hear the clock tick, and the wind blow, while my brain is all one flame—I have it—I'll know all. Here Maney, take care o' the child!" she exclaimed, as the tall fellow presented his awkward frame at the door, and dashing fiercely past him, she hurried along the path leading to the Coiner's retreat.

In the mean time, Mr. Segur, Shine, and the trotting guide, Awney Farrel, proceeded on their way towards the forge, which Mrs. Spellacy had indicated, and where a new accident awaited them.

As they approached the building, from which the sound of clanking anvil and hammer proceeded, so as to give intimation of the premises being pre-occupied, Shine observed their guide start and use a gesture of alarm. The action instantly awakened the dormant suspicions of the preacher, who was not oblivious of the conversation on the brass coinage. Awney, however, did not suffer the emotion to remain visible in his countenance or manner longer than was absolutely necessary to establish its existence even for the moment, but carelessly turned his eyes from the door of the hovel.

It was a low, miserable-looking shed, the rafters broken, and the blackened thatch falling in in various places, so as to give free admission to the torrents of rain which were of frequent occurrence in this mountain district, and kept the little undulations of the earthen floor constantly supplied with an abundance of the fluid. As the travellers drew nearer to the place, an elderly-looking, dressy sort of man, equipped at all points, to an agony of elegance, and standing (a coarse, ill-fashioned block of clumsy vulgarity) in the midst of a blaze of finery, looking like a black ragged cloud in a sunny sky, or a draught of muddy inn-keeper's wine in a gold tankard (traveller's fare), presenting, as he crept out of the midst of a cloud of black smoke, which issued with him through the low battered door of the forge, the most apt illustration that could be desired of the hedge-school doggerel—

"A man without learning and wearing fine clothes, Is like a pig with a gold ring in his nose—"

such a being—leading after him a fine gelding, caparisoned in the finest style, and looking a great deal more worthy of those fine accoutrements than its master—such a being, attired in a full, snow-white wig, forming a frieze, of which a shining, jet-black, soft-furred hat of the best Limerick manufacture was the capital—a smart, flowered silk waist-coat, and fine green coat, with silver-hilted sword, and tight, plush breeches, the shaft—and a pair of bright, shining, clocked silk stockings, with shoes, and gigantic silver buckles, the pedestal—such a being, so fine, so vulgar—issued, like a meteor out of a bog, from the smoke and vapour of the miniature Etna of this Munster Vulcan.

"That is very odd what you tell me," he exclaimed, in a long county Cork drawl, "but I'm sure it isn't true for you. I don't mean to doubt your word, but you can't say you have told me the truth. I know the rogue is in this neighbourhood, and I'll find him too, you may be sure."

"Where did your honour see him?" asked the smith, suspending his sledge-hammer in the hollow of his sooty arm, while he directed his eyes to the newly-shod feet of the gelding. "Because, if it be long sence, there's but a Flemish account o' the two o' them by this time."

"Hang the fellow and his stupid eyes, they would have imposed upon a Jew, let alone a county Cork grazier. His 'gits,' as he called them! Wait till I get a vacancy at him, I'll git him, so I will.

Forty pounds, sir!" he continued, turning round, in the communicativeness of passion, to Shine, who had just ridden up, and was beginning to listen with a cruel anxiety and interest in his complaints—"forty pounds the fellow cheated me of, for such trash as this!" holding out several ingots, on one of which a quantity of verdigris had collected, which, combining instantly by a vivid association of ideas with Maney's memorable parting leer, showed like a horrid spectre in the eyes of the preacher.

"Have you tried them, sir?" he asked, in a faint and failing voice, while big drops of perspiration began to sparkle on his nose and forehead.

"Try 'em!" exclaimed the man of the white wig, "why, sir, look!" and with great agility he whipped a small bottle of aquafortis from his flapped pocket, uncorked it with his teeth, and poured a little on the metal. A sudden simmering, and then a dark steam arising, left no spell to raise the ghost of a doubt upon the quality of the ingot.

"It's not gold," said Mr. Shine, mournfully.

"Gold!" shouted he of the silver buckles; "sir, 'tis not only brass, but bad brass!"

"The same goold that's in the copper kettles," said the smith, grinning through his black lips.

"Who gave it—to you?" asked the preacher, hesitatingly, his hand wandering fearfully about the pocket in which he had deposited his own treasure.

"Poh! poh! I'm ashamed to tell you—but it was a long stupid fellow, with a story of an old abbey, and his landlord, and his royalty, and I can't know how much trash besides—one Maney O'Neill, the greatest rogue unhanged in Munster, and that's a bold word."

Mr. Shine groaned audibly. He need not have blushed, however, at finding himself fooled by a man, who had, with the same tale, imposed upon men of rank and learning far superior to him.

"A fellow that travels about in company with a Dublin clea'-boy named Awney Farrel," continued the complainant, "a sharp-faced young—ha!" he paused as his eyes fell on the guide, he stood close at his elbow.

Instead of appearing at all disconcerted, Awney blinked invitingly with his eye, tossed his head back, and beckoned the gentleman of the silver hilt to step aside with him. The latter followed in some brow knitting suspicion and hesitation, which, however, began to dissipate and brighten up under the influence of the information, whatever it was, that the guide was conveying to him with an infinite deal of gesture and grimace. They often looked and nodded their heads towards Shine, who remained fixed in an attitude of as much horror as so fat a man could assume—his globular hands clasped before him, his lips parted, and his eyes staring heavily on the distance. After a little time the man of the plush breeches laid his finger along the side of his nose, protruding his brow and lips, as much as to say, "I understand you;" and Awney, with one farewell wink, bounded over the ditch at the road-side and disappeared, both Shine and Segur being too much occupied with their own thoughts to observe his desertion.

While the unhappy purchaser of the single ingot remained in a state of suspense, which momentarily approached the verge of agony, the man of the clocked stockings beckoned to a pair of myrmidons in the forge, who presently made their appearance at the door, with red, sulky eyes, and coarse, trim-cut frieze body-coats, buttoned on their stout, squat frames with horn taches, and suffering a gleam of red to appear at the breast, like the ominous streak in the dawn of a gray morn at the equinox. He of the soft-furred hat pointed towards Shine and clapped his own elbow to his sides, signifying to them what course they should adopt, adding some farther hints concerning his amazing strength and agility, which were not lost upon the hearers.

The preacher was just in the act of heaving a profound sigh, when his arms were suddenly pinioned down, one man knocking off his hat, another throwing a small bag, or Johnny Doe, such as the carmen fed their horses in, over his head, and drawing the running-string about his neck, while a third ran with a piece of jack-line two or three swift circuits about him, as the hound does about a buffalo at bay, belying the tether finally in the angle (the only angle that could be found in the preacher's whole person) of his elbow. This done in less time than one might take in supposing it, the man of the wig, leisurely tripped up his heels, and laid the poor culprit, as they do a huge turtle, on "the broad of his back," on the road where he remained helpless and too utterly overwhelmed with astonishment to give vent to a remonstratory groan. In fact, the whole affair was over before one thought could have displaced another in his mind.

"Now for it! the fox is bagged!" shouted the buck (for such the grazier was allowed to be)—"Ah, ha! I thought so!" as he drew from the pocket of the prostrate, passive, vanquished hero, the ingot, the fatal ingot which was destined to be a still dearer purchase to the buyer than it had already proved.

"Is it brass?" exclaimed the latter, half-stifled by the bag in which his head was immersed, and yet anxiously alive to the investigation which was going forward.

"Indeed, then, it is brass, and you're brass, and bold brass that asks the question," returned he of the green coat. "No use in your talking, sir," he said in answer to the remonstrances of Segur, who made an effort at the liberation of his companion, not being aware that the fine grazier was one of those blockheads who think it mainly and becoming to be obtinate, and cling to a misconception with the same sort of fatherly kindness which would induce them to stand by an ugly son in a scrape—"No use in your talking, I have taken the man in flagrante delicto, with the goods upon him, and my prisoner he shall remain for this night at least. However, at your desire, as you profess a knowledge of his person, I will remove the blind from his eyes; and if you think you can be of service to him I am going to spend the night at the house of my niece Miss Lilly Byrne of Drumsanlon, on the Crag road."

"We are travelling the same way, at all events," said Segur, "so I will say no more on the subject until we arrive at the means of convincing you of this man's respectability. How he has chanced upon that ingot, I cannot conceive."

"We'll explain all at Lilly's table, at supper," said the man of the buckles, merrily, as they rode off (repaired at all points) together.

"At supper, inagh? An unaisy supper ye'll have of it, I'm thinkin'," said the smith, shaking his head, and slowly re-entering the forge. "That's a bad matter for Suil Dhuv, whoever told the travellers about the shoes, the odds are against him now, any way."

The dinging of hammers, the creaking of stamping-presses, the rasping of files, and the low murmuring of human voices were the first sounds that assailed the ears of poor Kumba on his recovery from the stupor into which he had been cast by the practised hand of Red Roddy. He opened his eyes and gazed, still in a state of unconsciousness, upon the involutions of the dense smoke of culm that floated above him, and which, partially illustrated as it was at intervals by the flickering blaze of the furnace, brought to his reviving imagination a thousand vague and wandering images that almost unconsciously referred themselves to his accident, a fatal termination, and an awakening in the centre of the new and fearful world to which his last terrified thoughts had been hurried, even in the agitation of the struggle itself. The illusion was not dissipated by the vision of the white-haired murderer, Roddy, who tottered towards him, and remained for a few seconds gazing down upon him with as much steadiness as his palsy would suffer him to assume, and smiling through his chipped and bloodless lips, as the young man, from an instinct of apprehension, checked the returning symptoms of animation, and suffered the half-raised lids once more to close over his eye-balls.

"What would you do if you had done for him, Roddy, eroo?" asked a soft voice at the farther end of the room, the tones of which brought a pleasing association into Kumba's mind, as they resembled those which had pleaded for him in the fray with the Coiners.

"O, hugh! Oh, there's many a bit and a sup between him and the undertaker yit," said the old coiner. "I don't know what I'll do here, watchen. Jerry, I wish you went to the cupboard an' brought us the makens of a jug o' poonch. Ah, Jerry, Jerry, ould times, ould times for ever! Get us the dhew till we drink Redmond O'Haulon in a big bumper. I saw him a week before he was shot in the barn, an' lashed o' keogh we had together, the two of us. As I was.....hugh! hugh! hugh! Eyeh! the voice is gone wit me now, Jerry, and yet I used to sing wanst of a time—only this cough, and my back, O!—"

'As I was sitting in my room,
All in the merry, merry month of June—

I heard a thrush sing in a bush,
An' the song she sung was the jug o' poonch.
Fal law raw li!
Tol di rum day!
Tol fal tiridum! Dum fileum tay!"

Hugh! hugh!—I'm afeerd o' waken the dacint lad here near me. How nate I could slip the windpipe now just where he lies, so quite an' easy. Aih, Jerry! look! jest as they does the sheep. I'd give you lave to hang me to that rafter, av he ever gave as mooch as a groan after it. Have yon the poonch ready yit? Give it here! Hould my arm! O this shake! Isn't it droll I usn't uvar to have this cough and shake whin I was in the Small County, and with the lads formerly?"

"How long is that ago now, Roddy?" asked Jerry.

"Why thin, as good as thirty years, or from that to forty, and better may be," the other answered, musingly.

"An inch in a man's nose is a great date for all, Roddy!" Jerry returned, drily; "but still, it is a droll thing that a man should have more ailments an' things at sixty-eight than he had forty years before."

"Noan o' your fuanen, you young collen, you!—We can't expect to live always, and though I am't seventy yet, I know I must die soon time or another. 'Tisn't age that always kills people, Jerry—and a man has no more a lease of his life at seventy than he has at a hoondred—'Ye jovial'—Gi' me the poonch—hugh! hugh!"

'Ye jovial fellows that pass by,
Av ye don't b'live it—step in an thry!
Step in an' thry, an' nuvar finch
To dip your nose in the jug o' poonch!
Fal la raw li!
Tol di rum day!
Tol fal ti ridum! Dum fileum tay!"

"No, Jerry," he continued, after elevating the fiery liquid to his lips and swallowing a prodigious draught; "I know I'm to have my day as well as another, and I mane to prepare for it too, and that's more than you thought, I b'lieve."

'When I am dead, an' in my grave,
No costly monument will I have—
But let my grave be short and sweet,
With a jug o' poonch at my head and feet!
Fal law raw li!
Tol di rum day!
Tol fal ti ridum! Dum fileum tay!"

I'll wait, Jerry, till I'm just seventy; an' thin I'll turn over a new lave, and be quit o' these doens. I'll go to my Christian duty, an' I'll do like the Christens for the rest o' my days; seeing would I do soomthen for the poor sow! agin she goes, be the dint o' pin-nince; that's what I'll do, an' I'll rise out o' ye, and ye'r coinen an' murderer, all out that's what I will."

"E' then, Roddy, since that's what you're after, what should ail you that you wouldn't take a short stick in your hand, and be off at once, slap, like cock-shot agin a barn door?"

"Poh! didn't I say whin I was seventy all out? 'Tisn't far from me now, and—"

The interlocutors were cut short in their conference by a tapping at the little door. The word passed, and was answered by a female voice.

"'Tis the missiz herself!" said Jerry, in amaze, as he opened the door.

The woman rushed into the room nearly in the same state of agitation as that in which she left the inn. Her hair, now perfectly dishevelled and dabbled in rain, hung loose upon her shoulders—her brow was torn by the briars and stained with blood—her limbs shaking, and her large eyes wandering in eager scrutiny over every object that was presented to them, as she rapidly hurried from place to place.

"Where's—ha! Jerry—No—not you! Who's this? Roddy—ha! blood-sucker! stand aside. Who's this?"

"Hush! hush!" both pointed to Kumba, and made signs to the woman to be silent.

"Who? Mr. Kumba? What! why is he not gone? Ha!"

blood, too; Oh! I see it; Up, up, sir, up; you are betrayed and laughed at. Up, and come with me."

"Jerry, darlen, shut the doore, lock it, an' gi' me the key," coughed out Red Rody.

"Jerry, leave the door open until Mr. Kumba and I have passed through, if you value your neck," said the woman, fiercely.

"Deed, ma'am, av I'm a blood-sucker I'll do my duty, I have an old knack that way," said Rody, sulkily hobbling towards the door.

"Blood-sucker, that you are (and it is a riddle to me that you should be stung by another giving you a name that is your own boast,) stand from the door. Do you know me?"

"I know your husband better," growled the ruffian.

"Then, mind me—if you fear his anger, obey me."

"I don't know what rilashun they have at all, wan to another, your commands and his anger," muttered the palsied wretch, placing his back to the door, and examining the lock of a large horse pistol.

"If you will not release this gentleman, Suil Dhuv shall never see my face again."

"Oh! thin, who knows whether that's what would bring his anger upon us?" the old fellow said, chuckling.

"Ha!" exclaimed the woman, "I thought it, I knew it," and she slapped her hands together like one who had solved an agonizing doubt. "I'm sold; and his friend is betrayed. Thank you husband, I've caught you, sir. Up, up, Mr. Kumba. Right yourself, sir, if you're a man! There's your enemy," and she clapped the startled youth upon the shoulder, and pointed to Red Rody, who maintained his defensive position.

Kumba, whose disgust had been at first strongly excited by the approach of his false friend's wife, was not sufficiently disabled by the effects of the blow he had received to prevent his gathering from the conversation a perfect knowledge of his situation, and of the motives of the Suil Dhuv. The one fired, the other strengthened him. He looked first at Jerry, who stood irresolute, and apparently disposed to neutrality, in the corner; and having satisfied himself that there was no determined opposition to be apprehended from that quarter, he waved his hand to Rody to stand aside: the other, influenced by his natural or acquired habits of violence, and stimulated more highly by the potations in which he had been indulging, refused to obey, and elevated the pistol with a menacing look.

Without bestowing a more serious thought on the chances of a struggle than he would have experienced before whipping a cur from his path, Kumba darted on the old man, caught him by the breast, and sent him spinning round against the press. There was a report of a pistol, a sudden hurrying together of several figures, a scream, a hoarse curse, a crashing of bolts and stamping of many feet, and the place was clear of all but the fair-faced Jerry and the old man, whom he upheld apparently with an effort from the floor.

"Twas Heaven did it, and not the gentleman," said Jerry;

"how do you feel yourself, Rody, aggra?"

"Aih? Oh! poorly, wisha, poorly enough, Jerry, thanky."

"It's late for pinnance now, I'm afeerd, Rody?"

"Wisha, I'm afeerd so, I abn't very well; I abn't meself at all, rightly."

"No wondher, sure. There's a hole in your neck here as big as a button. How coom you to handle the pistil so awkward, Rody?"

"Wisha, I dun know. It went off betune my fingers someway, very foolish. Hould me up a little. There's a great wakeness come upon me all of a hape, intirely."

"Don't say so, Rody, eroo. Will I run for the priest?"

"Aih? . . . priest? Oh! Eh, Jerry, eroo, what's that in the dark?"

"Where, eroo?"

"Look, aggra! Look at Tim Henessy! Look at him, shaken his head at me!"

"Tim Henessy, inagh? Erra, is it the man you murdered that would be there?" said Jerry, in a tone of remonstratory astonishment.

"Not Guilty, my lord and gintlemin, 'twasn't I did it. Was it, Jerry? Aih, Oh, stand betune uz, Jerry, alanuv! It's no use for here's Mickey Keys at the other side o' me, grinnen' down on me!"

"Well, that's the crackedest thing I ever heerd, Rody. Didn't you shoot him stone dead with your own hand, and now to be sayen' he's there grinnen'. He has soomthen' else to do besides maken' them faces."

"Would you have a loand o' the whiskey bottle you'd give us, Jerry? Stay! Aisy a while! Oh, the pain, the pain, entirely, you see, that's what's killen' me. I'm getting very could, Jerry. 'Tisn't freezeen' agin, I believe?"

"Freezen'!" shouted Jerry, "d'ye hear what he calls the finest, soft, moist evenen' that? Eh! why, Rody, Rody. I say, agin! what's the matter? Rody! stir up, man. He's dyen', I blieve, Oh! murder, intirely, he's goen', he's stiff'nen'."

He paused and gazed on the dying wretch, who remained in his arms gasping for breath, while he stared fearfully on the broad black darkness above him, which his memory, now for the first time startled from her sleep of indifference by the baying of the hell-hound Conscience, had peopled with the shadows of his many victims. He shrunk back, shivered, dropped his jaws, which clattered like a pair of castanets, his lips became dragged and livid, his teeth set, and he lay stark and cold in the arms of the terrified accomplice of his crimes and witness of his blasphemies, a horrible spectacle of the sudden vengeance of a long-suffering but wakeful Providence.

IN LEAFY DOONASS.

LACK sloped the wild arch through the morning—

The black arch of leafy Doonass,
Of memory-haunted Doonass;
And the winds of the north roared a warning,
And the echoes slid low through the grass,
With a weird and a sorrowful warning;
And a year out of Heaven did pass,
To the gulfs whence there comes no returning,
In the yellowing woods of Doonass.

We paused, looking up at the splendour,
And I whispered to white Madeline—
Earth-lost, heaven-wrapped Madeline—
"I heard the dead seasons surrender
Their souls to the Giver divine,
The Giver of all that's divine,
And their voices rose solemn and tender,
As the chaunts o'er funeral wine;
When the death lights flash red on the splendour,
Over urns of funeral wine.

When thou diest, oh dear one, remember
The love we created on earth—
Love having no likeness on earth,
(For the rest is but ashes and ember).
And whenever thou journeyest forth
To the land over head the blue north,
(When thy heart and thy sweet soul dismember,)
Return not to sit at my hearth,
Glide not through the glooms of my hearth,
But in wrathful Doonass, in September,
When the brown leaf is dashed to the earth."

Time loosened her soul's radiant pinion,
And she passed as a star that is not,
As a planet whose place is forgot,
In the limitless, fire-roofed dominion;
Or a white cloud that lies like a blot,
On the west like a crescented blot.
Until sucked down the gulfs of vermilion.
And an exile in Salaat I thought,
Till my brain reeled around with the thought,
Of our vow in the leafy pavilion;
When the woods of Doonass were distraught,
When the oaks of Doonass were distraught.

But she came not with Autumn or blossom,
(And fruitless that waiting of mine—Unrequited that waiting of mine.)
With the sign of the saints on her bosom;
She came not, half seen yet divine—
Half palpable phantom divine;
So the coral flower dropped from the loam,
And I cry for earth-lost Madeline,
From Doonass to the wilds of Ardossom,
I wander and shriek—Madeline!

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

IV.—KILCULLEN, COUNTY KILDARE.

KILCULLEN was anciently one of the boundaries of a district in Leinster, called Caelen, comprising parts of the present counties of Kildare, Wicklow, and Carlow; being bounded on the east by the Wicklow mountains, on the south and west by the river Barrow, and on the north by the Liffey and part of the Bog of Allen. In the early ages it was called Caelen, Galen, or Coalan, from its being almost one continued wood; and the name is still retained in Kilcullen, the subject of our present notice, corrupted from Kil-Coalan. It is from thence the noble family of Leinster take their motto, "Crom ill abh," or, "a district on the crooked water," in allusion to the river Liffey.

The hill on which those ruins are situated rises rather abruptly within about a mile of the south bank of the Liffey. This was also the site of the old town, which was very considerable; at the time Archdall wrote his "Monasticon" it had seven gates, one of which had an arch of ten feet span; nothing now remains but a few scattered cabins.

The above engraving gives a view of the hill of old Kilcullen, surmounted by the church-yard and ruins, which comprise one of our ancient round towers, part of the old monastery, and many curious sculptured stones; the whole is enclosed by a circular wall, covering the summit of the hill. That part of the round tower now standing is about thirty-five feet high; the door is six feet from the ground, and the walls appear to be so durable, that many centuries may pass over

"Ére hoary time, with ruthless hand,
Will raze them."

The monastery was founded a little after the introduction of Christianity, for we read that Saint Isernin was appointed the first bishop of it; he died in 469. In 936, and again in 944, the building was plundered and burned, along with the town; and afterwards, in 1460, it was repaired, or, more probably, a new one founded, by Sir Rowland Eustace, of Harristown, many years Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

In 1319, Maurice Jakes built a bridge over the Liffey, and many of the inhabitants left old Kilcullen and went to reside there. Towards the close of the year 1517, Lady Elizabeth Zouch, first wife of the unfortunate Gerald, ninth Earl of Kildare, was buried here near to Allison, mother to the Earl, her husband. Through all his persecutions she was constantly by his side, to cheer him in sorrow and to assist him in danger. She was followed to this, her last resting place, by the neighbouring chieftains and their clans; and yearly it was the custom to cover her tomb with flower-garlands.

In the church-yard is a piece of ancient sculpture, of which the following is a drawing.

It represents a knight in complete armour; it is stated that a female figure, similarly executed, was originally placed by its side, on a large table monument that stood in the chapel of the old building. The stone on which this image is cut is six feet six inches long, and two feet five inches broad; it is broken across below the knees of the figure. The work has the appearance of being well finished, and the relief is still strong. The knight has his head resting on a cushion; he wears a morion, with double cheek-plates, and on this there appears to have been a crest; the body, the thighs, and the arms, down to the elbows, are covered with mail armour; from the elbows to the hands are plate armlets, and his legs and feet are defended with pliable plate armour. He wears spurs, and under his feet is a dog, the emblem of fidelity. A little distance from the stone just described, stands another in an inclined position; it is four feet high by about eighteen inches square, and is curiously divided into compartments on each of the four sides. Some of the figures are shown in the representation beneath.

OSSIANIC POETRY.

IN the year 1760, James Macpherson published his "Fragments of Ancient Poetry," collected in the Highlands, and translated from the Gaelic, or Erse language—a work destined to exert a powerful and permanent influence upon British and European literature. The nature of this announcement implied, that the contents of the book were not to be found in any perfect state in an original form. They were merely fragments collected in the Highlands; the poems of "Fingal" and "Temora," which followed, were, however, given as proper epics, and other compositions were added with very suspicious regularity to the collection. The pretensions advanced on behalf of these poems were of the most ambitious kind. They were represented as the genuine compositions of a poet living in the third century of the Christian era, and narrating personal or contemporary events. The diversity of opinions which arose upon the publication is too well known to require notice here, and it would be tedious to go over its details. Dr. Hugh Blair, a rather credulous critic, wrote a dissertation, which, in the opinion of his friends, demonstrated "with the acuteness of Aristotle and the elegance of Longinus," that Macpherson's "Ossian" was as genuine as Homer, and as full of genius. Dr. Samuel Johnson, who was readily deceived by Lander's forgeries against Milton, but who would not have believed anything good of Scotland, though one had risen from the dead, denounced the publication of Macpherson as an impudent imposture. The controversy, as was natural, extended speedily to Ireland, where the same feelings of nationality which had in Scotland raised up defenders of the authenticity of the poems, were arrayed in a strong phalanx in opposition to them. Irish antiquarians maintained that Fionn, or Fin, and Ossian, and Oscar were historically known, and had always been traditionally treated as natives of Ireland; and they regarded the attempt to kidnap and settle them in Scotland as downright robbery, or man-stealing. Another foe of Macpherson's, of no ordinary abilities, arose in the historian Malcolm Laing, who, in Lord Cockburn's "Memorials" is rather ludicrously and unfortunately described as having "a hard, peremptory Celtic manner and accent." Mr. Laing was an Orkney proprietor, with strong antipathies to everything Celtic, and, as a Norseman, he had a natural jealousy of the attempt to represent the Celts as rivaling or excelling the ancient poets of Scandinavia. In the course of the discussion many volunteer communications of Highland poetry were furnished, some of them not more free from question than Macpherson's own; while assertions were made and affidavits sworn, more remarkable for their energy and confidence than for their accuracy and precision. The Highland Society then took up the inquiry. But their report, in 1805, did not throw much light on the matter, and was about as unsatisfactory as reports in general are found to be. Neither was the question settled by the posthumous publication of the Gaelic Ossian from Macpherson's repositories, no ancient MS. having yet been forthcoming, and his opponents alleging confidently that his Gaelic was translated from the English, whenever it was not stolen or borrowed from Irish poems. After much waste of ink, anger, and acrimony, the agitation gradually subsided. The out-and-out defenders of Macpherson became few in number, and, strange to say, were more easily found among the critics of the continent than among those at home. The claims of the Irish were not satisfactorily answered, and, by a general feeling, elsewhere, bystanders came to adopt a sort of compromise between the extreme views of the original disputants. In the course of the investigations which took place under the auspices of the Highland Society, reference was made to the several Gaelic manuscripts as existing in the Highlands, or in the possession of parties connected with Scotland. Is is very probable, if not quite certain, that such MSS. existed, though it is difficult to place implicit confidence in the loose accounts that are given of their contents. But the most important manuscript which was actually seen by impartial persons was that referred to in the report of the Highland Society, who obtained it from one of Macpherson's executors. It has since been carefully examined by gentlemen of high attainments as Celtic scholars, and it is now certain that the Ossianic poems, as they stand in this manuscript, show that they were composed at least after the time of St. Patrick, and that, according to them, Fingal and his associates were Irish, and not Scotch. The following extract will serve as a specimen of the poem in this MS. :—

"Ossian, the son of Fingal, said—
 'Tell me, Patrick, the honour which belongs to us,
 Do the Fingalians of Ireland enjoy the happy heaven?'
 'I tell thee, assuredly, Ossian, of bold deeds,
 That neither thy father, nor Gaul, nor Ossian are blessed!'
 'Sad is thy tale to me, O cleric,
 I worshipping God, and that the Fingalians should be excluded from heaven,' etc.

There can be no doubt that some such lines as those we have now quoted were traditionally current in the Highlands; yet here the lines are found in a manuscript—the only Scotch one that has any bearing on the question. This poem, or dialogue between St. Patrick and Ossian, and some similar one has been long known in Ireland. A translation, nearly corresponding to it, was given in the late Lady Morgan's "Wild Irish Girl," in 1806; and a similar poem is to be found in a volume published by the Ossianic Society of Dublin. Miss Brooke's collection also contains similar colloquies, and the subject seems to have been a favourite one. Several of the Ossianic poems in the Dean of Lismore's MS. relate to events considered historical, and of which the scene occurs in Ireland. It is a singular, but, we believe, undoubted fact, that poems on the battle of Gabhra Aichle, which must be considered of Irish origin, were current in the Highlands until a very late period. They have probably been handed down partly by oral tradition, but possibly, also, by occasional recurrence to written copies.

Reviewing the whole subject, we think that the following propositions may be considered to contain correct results in reference to the subject of the controversy respecting the authenticity of Macpherson's Ossian. The Celtic language of Ireland, and that of the Scottish Highlands, is one and the same; and there is the strongest probability that, with various degrees of Scandinavian, Teutonic, or other foreign admixture, the two races are identical. Whatever may have been the early state of the Scottish Highlands, it is certain that, at least from the introduction of Christianity, Ireland possessed a high degree of learning and civilization. The Irish language, from the same early period was carefully cultivated, and continued to be preserved in purity and elaborate forms of poetry or versification were invented and extensively practised by Irish writers. Mythical persons and legends as well as historical characters and events, became from time to time the subjects of Irish poems, which were widely diffused and preserved, partly by tradition and partly likewise in a written form. While it is probable that from the earliest times much intercommunication passed between the adjoining coasts of the two countries, it is certain that, at later periods within the range of history, migrations took place from Ireland to Scotland, by which the learning and enlightenment of the former were conveyed to the Scottish shores, and in process of time the poetry also of Ireland became current in Scotland, and was diffused in the Scottish Highlands by recitation, and latterly were also preserved in manuscript. At an early period within the records of history, whether from native character or from Irish instruction, the resident ecclesiastics of Scotland attained to eminence in learning and piety, and, in all probability, a considerable degree both of genius and of taste pervaded the Scottish Celts, though the evidence of any Scottish compositions of an ancient date is extremely defective, nor does any body of the Celtic manuscripts exist in Scotland, while those that have been preserved in Ireland are very numerous, and reach, at least, to the twelfth century.

The poems published by Macpherson as the compositions of Ossian, whether in their English or Gaelic garb, are not genuine compositions as they stand, and are not entitled to any weight or authority in themselves, being partly fictitious, but partly, at the same time, and to a considerable extent, copies or adaptations of Ossianic poetry current in the Highlands, and which also are, for the most part, well known in Ireland, and are preserved there in ancient manuscripts. Upon fairly weighing the evidence, therefore, we are bound to express it as our opinion, that the Ossianic poems, so far as original, must be considered generally as Irish compositions, relating to Irish personages, real or imaginary, and to Irish events, historical or legendary; but they indicate also a free communication between the two countries, and may be legitimately regarded by the Scottish Celts as a literature in which they likewise have a direct interest, written in their native tongue, recording the common traditions of the Gaelic tribes, and having been long preserved and diffused in the Scottish Highlands; while, if the date or first commencement of those compositions is of great antiquity, they belong as much to the ancestors of the Scottish as of the Irish Celts. There is still room for inquiring whether in the Scottish manuscript already adverted to, or in other trustworthy sources, Ossianic poetry cannot be pointed out which may be peculiar to Scotland, and of which no trace may be found either in Irish manuscripts or Irish tradition.

With Lord Neaves, to whose interesting paper on the Ossianic question, read before the Archaeological Institute of Edinburgh, some years since, we are indebted for much information on the subject, we think that, with all his errors, a large debt of national and literary gratitude is due to James Macpherson. It is difficult now to estimate precisely the degree of blame imputable to his conduct. Literary forgery, or to give it a milder name, literary embezzlement, was then so frequent as to be almost fashionable. A faithful editor was scarcely to be found. While Chatterton, fabricated literary antiquities wholesale, Percy brushed up his ballads that he might suit them to public taste, and even the excellent Lord Hailes was found clipping the coin which he should have issued in its integrity. Celtic antiquities were little understood, and antiquarian or historical criticism was only in its infancy. Macpherson obviously admired the compositions which he met with in the Highlands; he saw their capabilities, and he put them forward in a captivating dress.

If he varied, garbled, or interpolated them, so as to exalt the country in which he found them, and to which he himself belonged, some indulgence is due to a feeling of patriotism, and a desire to raise the Highlands from the depressed condition to which they had been reduced. Perhaps he believed that Ossian was a Scotch hero and bard; that the Irish people were a mere Scotch colony, and that anything to the contrary was a modern corruption; and if his subsequent conduct was more seriously culpable, it may be traced as much to pride and pertinacity, as to want of principle. Certain it is that Macpherson was the first who saw and appreciated the merits of Gaelic poetry. Assuming these poems, so far as genuine, to be Irish compositions, they had certainly been neglected by the Irish, and allowed to remain unpublished and unknown, until Macpherson brought them to light from Scottish sources. Miss Brooke, Walker, Hardiman, Drummond, O'Reilly, and other more recent writers, have done justice to Ossianic poetry and the genius of Ireland, but it must not be forgotten that the initiative in bringing these compositions to the light of day was taken by James Macpherson.

HAND AND DREAM DIVINATION.

DESIRE to interpret the future has caused some instances of the greatest folly in mankind. Amongst the ancients, from this desire arose the practice of the art of divination, extended so largely through all the nations, and forming so lucrative a portion of the trade of the heathen temples and their attendants. There is no doubt of the visionary nature of the custom, but still, there is no doubt also, that it has been able, under certain circumstances, to establish itself on probabilities. We can easily understand how an adept in the moral sciences can be able to foretell the alterations which may take place in the customs and social constitution of men, at periods of time, more or less distant. One of the capabilities of modern meteorologists is the power to predict the changes of the atmosphere. A very ordinary notice is to be seen in the advertising columns of the daily journals, warning of the coming storm, pointing where its force will be greatest, and indicating its direction. In the sick room, every day, the physician foretells the course and event of a malady, and so, in the more abstruse science of life, those who have given equal labour to its elucidation, and have arranged its facts in methodical order, can use the same power of prognostication for individual examples. In this way, perhaps, can be accounted for many of those extraordinary presages, which were afterwards fulfilled, but in this way cannot be explained the interest for deception which arose in the resort to sources of divination which are afforded, not in the subjects themselves, but in the power of imposition, possessed by those who availed themselves of their pretences.

In India and amongst the Orientals, the art of divination was always honoured. The Egyptians numbered in their people a host of expert magicians and diviners. The Jews also would appear to have been subject to impostors, for they make the distinction between prophets of the false and the true. There is no doubt that in the old world times, and amongst the early peoples, every species of thing was made amenable to the mania of divination. Each diviner, each magician, made use of his own particular means for prediction. In this way they questioned the four elements, the clouds, winds, and springs, whence came all those various modes of interpreting future and unknown things, such as Æromancy, or divination by air; Arithmomancy, or divination by numbers; Dactylomancy, or divination by the fingers; Oneiromancy; or divination by dreams; Chiromancy, or divination by the hands; and many other modes of this kind. The delirium of prophecy went on so far that prophecy could be found by the head of an ass or the tail of a dog. This rage for divination lasted during two thousand years.

Most of those systems of prophecy, as they were supposed to be, have long ceased to impose upon men. Lingering remnants of their superstition yet prevail. There may be found still persons who believe in the foresight of dreams and listen to the wise interpreter, as he or she expounds their meaning. But, in the world of far times, these ravings of an incoherent sleep held their greatest influence.

Amongst the men of other ages Oneiromancy was a fruitful mine of fortune used by the Oneiromantic diviners, Diascorides, Democritus, Apollodorus, Antiphon, Antipater, Chrisippus, and many others have collected the most extraordinary dreams and composed many treatises upon Oneiromancy. It is unfortunate that none of those have come down to us. However, some of the facts which are yet recorded concerning this subject are very striking.

It was Hecuba who dreamed that she gave birth to a torch, and the diviner consulted by her, answered that hers should be a child which would cause the burning of Troy. This was a strange dream and strangely verified, but there is another which we shall here relate. A wrestler who determined to dispute the prize of the race at the Olympic games, dreamed that the earth burned under the wheels of his chariot. Having consulted an Oneiromantist upon the interpretation of his dream, he received this answer, "Thou shalt be vanquished because the flames of thy chariot indicate coursers more skilful than thee." The athlete was vanquished as had been foretold.

Another extraordinary dream is that told of the mother of the tyrant, Phalaris, who, prior to the birth of that monster, beheld in a dream the statue of Mercury, which ornamented her apartment, shedding blood from a wound, and this blood had hardly touched the earth than it flowed in a stream. A diviner to whom she related this tale predicted to her that the infant of whom she was to be the mother, would inundate with blood the city of Aggrigentum. History has told that strangely coincident dream of Calphurnia, the wife of Cæsar, who, upon the eve of his death, dreamed that he was assassinated. The Ides of March saw its verification. Sylla, too, was the subject of a presage of this kind. He dreamed that he beheld the Fates calling him, and summoning a soothsayer, demanded of him what that meant. "Hasten! and make your will," he was answered. On the next day Sylla breathed his last sigh.

Besides those there were wonderful dreams to which we can only allude in passing. The dream of Brutus. The dream of that Arcadian, who thought that his fellow traveller was assassinated; the dream of Chrisippus—that of Catherine, who saw Henry the Second perish—that of Maria de Medicis, revealing the assassination of Henry the Fourth, and a crowd of others remarkable, strange, and prophetic as they are, we must pass by in order to give some of the details concerning the only other ancient system of divination which has not been lost in the shipwreck of time.

Chiromancy, the art of predicting the destiny of an individual by the inspection of the hand, was practised in the most remote antiquity, and particularly by the Chaldeans, the Assyrians, and the Egyptians. The Jewish populace possessed, it is said, thousands of Chiromantists. Job and Solomon even speak of the art as being brought to perfection amongst the Hebrews. The Greeks and Romans made a great use of it; the Emperor Augustus passed for a deserving Chiromantist.

Chiromancy has been written upon by numerous authors who have detailed the most fantastic and puerile things in relation to it, all believing, or feigning to believe, in this means of divination. Aristotle is amongst these, Albert the Great, Scott, Cardinal d'Ailly, Savonarola, Cornelius Agrippa, Avenenna, Father Niquet, and many others. These are names great enough for such a worthless study. Chiromancy affords some intimate relations with astrology. The hand is divided into many regions, and each region is submitted to the influence of a planet. The thumb, for instance, is placed under the influence of Venus; the index finger belongs to Jupiter; the middle is claimed by Saturn; the ring finger by the Sun; and the little one by Mercury; the eminence upon each side by the Moon; and the palm is the property of Mars.

that if the lines upon it are numerous, if they form ellipses and semicircles, the possessor shall be a perfect lady-killer. The cabalists name those lines the ring of Gyges.

Chiromancy has had its doctors and its illustrations. Since the Chaldeans, amongst whom they say this art took its rise, a host of individuals, up to our days, have pretended to foretell the future; but it is astonishing that a number of enlightened men have consecrated their pens to the teaching of such chimeras! Such is the case, however, and they have found materials for the most elaborate treatises. The learned and prolix Corvoeus has written a work wherein he shows that there exists one-hundred-and-seventy kinds of hands; Patrick Tricassus narrowed the subject by showing that there were four score; Isaac Kemker made out only seventy; Thimirus, forty; Inlague, thirty-seven; the wise John Cirus, twenty; the sage Compostus, eight; Peruchio, seven; Pamphilus, six; John Belot, only four. Now, all those make four hundred and forty-two different kinds of hands. If to those figures we add nine principal lines, twenty-seven secondary, and sixty-eight

In the palm of the hand we see the great triangle formed by the lines of life—the median and hepatic lines. Those three rule undeviatingly the physical and intellectual functions of the individual. The line of life, placed between the thumb and the index finger, if deeply furrowed and extending, without interruption, up to the metacarpal articulation, is a certain sign of longevity. When the furrow of that line is faintly marked, when it is interrupted in its course, then the shortness of existence is determined. The hepatic line, which forms one of the great sides of this triangle, according to its depth and regularity, announces an elevated soul and a frank and generous character; an interruption in its outline indicates a character which is impetuous; its slightness in depth is an indication of sadness and melancholy temper. The median line, which forms the base of the triangle, if it be distinct in outline, augurs a gay and pleasant character, but rather disposed to luxurious pleasures. The thumb is, according to the most skilful Chiromantists, the finger preferred by Venus. They do not tell us why, and so far keep the mystery to themselves, but still they say, tertiary, the whole figure comes to five hundred and forty-nine variations in the hand—a necessary study for a good Chiromantist.

However, there is little of reality in the science of Chiromancy; the true art of divining the proclivities of mankind is found in the physiognomy. It is in the form, the volume, the direction, and colour, that the truth is concealed.

SLIGO ABBEY.

SLIGO Abbey is an object well deserving of the notice of the antiquary. It was originally erected, according to Ware, by Maurice Fitzgerald, Lord Justice, about the year 1252. In 1414 it was destroyed by fire, but very shortly afterwards re-erected in the present style of architecture. It is a picturesque ruin of very large dimensions, divided into several apartments. The first has a beautiful window of carved stone, under which is the altar, likewise of cut stone. Here are two ancient monuments—one bearing date 1616, and the other belonging to one of the O'Connor kings; the latter is in good preservation.

INCHIUIN CASTLE.

THE lake of Inchiquin is situated in the parish of Kilnaboy, barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare, and is about two miles and a half in circumference. One solitary island alone appears on its surface, unless that be ranked as one on which the ancient castle is situated, and which may originally have been insulated, though no longer so. This castle, which is situated at the northern side of the lake, though greatly dilapidated, is still a picturesque and interesting ruin, consisting of the remains of a barbican tower, keep, and old mansion-house attached to it; and its situation on a rocky island or peninsula standing out in the smooth water, with its grey walls relieved by the dark masses of the wooded hills behind, is eminently striking and imposing.

It is from this island or peninsula that the barony takes its name; and from this also the chief of the O'Briens, the Marquis of Thomond, derived his more ancient title of Earl of Inchiquin. For a long period it was the principal residence of the chiefs of this great family, to one of whom it unquestionably owes its origin; but we have not been able to ascertain with certainty the name of its founder, or date of its erection. There is, however, every reason to ascribe its foundation to Tieghe O'Brien, king or lord of Thomond, who died, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," in 1466, as he is the first of his name on record who made it his residence, and as its architectural features are most strictly characteristic of the style of the age in which he flourished.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XVI.

SHBY suggested that Namby should be asked to accompany himself and Mr. Faversham to Jamaica Lodge, for the enjoyment of the suburban Sunday to which they had been invited.

Faversham strongly objected to the proposition, and he had reasons for his objection. He was not in pursuit of a lively day at the Lodge. He had no inclination, therefore, to provide himself with a comic companion.

"No, no, Jack, let us have a quiet day. We have enough of Namby and the rest of them in town."

Jack, not being bound on a sentimental journey, was in no haste to reach Jamaica Lodge before the dinner hour.

"Are you going to spend the day over that cravat?" Mr. Faversham asked; "a glorious day like this, and to be moping in these wretched rooms behind smoked glass."

"I like that," Mr. Jack answered, "nineteen times out of twenty you keep me waiting half an hour. Hang it! you might show me a little mercy. Besides, my hand shakes."

Faversham held from that time forward that Jack Ashby was the slowest dresser in Europe.

Considering the result, he held, moreover, that this was preposterous.

"And now for the execution," said Jack, when he had drawn on his gloves, and given his hat that divergence from the perpendicular, which, in his estimation, marked the mark of fashion.

The younger scion of the house of Ashby was not too well pleased to hear that Mr. Faversham was to spend the Sunday at Jamaica Lodge. "Oh! mamma," said he, "why didn't you ask Mr. Namby, he's so funny, and tells us all the tricks of the pantomimes."

"We have quite enough of such conversation from John." The reader has guessed that this was Miss Ashby's reply; Victoria laughed; but, then, Victoria was always laughing.

"Your papa invited Mr. Faversham, my dear," said Mrs. Ashby, hugging her youngest born while she mildly reproved him, "because he is a discreet, clever, and quiet gentleman."

"Box his ears, mamma," Victoria said, "or I will for you." Thus she and the young jackanapes had an uproarious struggle, during which they both laughed so loudly that Miss Ashby suggested they had forgotten themselves.

"Hush!" from Mrs. Ashby, then turning to her eldest born, "you are right my dear—but, then, the child has such spirits, and he is a mere baby after all."

A more puzzling person than Miss Ashby was never encountered. She had been gracious, for her very gracious, to Henry Faversham. But how, at this time did she write about him to her bosom friend, Miss Barnaculla?

We violate no secrecy now by printing the letter.

"MY DEAR MARTHA—You were wrong in your prediction: Mr. Shoborles gave two guineas, yes, my dear, actually two guineas to our little fund. I was very proud of my list of subscriptions I can assure you; I quite agree with you that nothing could be more unexpected than the liberality of the Shoborles. But, then, I must tell you Mrs. S— was out when I called; and I talked to Mr. Shoborles by myself. I begin to agree with you that men are more liberal than women. Perhaps it is because they are not so prudent, or, they have more money at their disposal than we have. This is not exactly what I feel, however, and you know how candid I am with you. At all events, their generosity is very unlike ours. A man will give his cheque, my dear, and forget it; but ask him to attend a meeting, or take any trouble, and you will soon find the difference. I know, with my little experience, I have found it. You may put their names on all kinds of committees, and when you do persuade them to attend, how bored they are! I am told that your little Swaddlinchloe society has progressed à merveille; and I am delighted to hear it, but I am sure that you have encountered the same experience which has sorely perplexed me. If it were not for my constant care my society would have disappeared long ago. We have trustees, and committees, and all kinds of grand officials, but they wince when they are asked to give an hour of their evening to business, as though they were having a tooth drawn. One might as well have so many crotchet needles to represent an institution. It is very good of them, I know, to give their money, but you recollect what we have often talked about—active charity. It is, my dear, the true charity after all; of that I am more convinced, day by day. Some people have no energy, but I find it very difficult, indeed, to respect such people. Then, again, some people mean very well, and have not the courage to act up to their meaning. Papa says that I am too severe in these things, and don't allow for what he calls idiosyncrasy of the individual. I say that people who are truly earnest, are never wanting in energy or perseverance. This he calls lecturing like a professor of philosophy, but I know that I am right. I think I have mentioned to you a Mr. Faversham who comes here occasionally, with my brother John. He appears to have excellent principles, and to be a very thoughtful young man. For a man who lives the life I fear he does, he talks very well. But, my dear, he has no settled principles. He can be as serious as you like for a little time, and lead one to suppose that he is a most Christian young man, leading the strictest life in the world. All the time John is laughing at him, and quizzing him. His life is, I expect, very like that of most young men of the world. He lives in the Temple, and that, I can answer for it, by what I gather from my brother John, is a very wicked sort of life. Papa and mamma seem to like him very much, and poor mamma is so good-natured, and is inclined to like everybody. I confess that I am a little more severe, not too severe, I devoutly hope and trust. He was at Hastings with us for a few days, and was very quiet and proper there. I remember saying to mamma that if he had fallen into good hands, he would have become a most estimable person. Of course, she told this to John, who laughed one of his loud laughs, and called him the Reverend Mr. Faversham. John, you must know, has fallen into the most dangerous set, who will have their little jest at everything. I cannot tell you how it pains me to hear him talk. Papa says it will do him no harm in the end. This, I need not say, is not my opinion.

"A very curious set of people have come to live a few doors off from us. Independents. We have just exchanged visits. They seem to be very good and quiet, but they have strange manners that, I am told, are peculiar to Newcastle or Sheffield—I don't know which. One thing I remarked, they play an organ in the drawing-room, a handsome one, but constructed on the principle of the street organ, only, they told me, it had a Sabbath barrel that could be fixed to it on Sunday mornings. I have very little new, as you see, to give you. We lead our usually quiet life, and one day is so like the other, that they flow into one another, and the sun sets and rises almost imperceptibly. I hear that John was pleased to say that we were so many eight-day clocks, this is what he calls a sarcasm. He brings his friend Mr. Faversham to dine here to-morrow; I wish papa and mamma would not invite these kind of young men on Sundays. I have remonstrated, but in vain. I confess it jars upon my ears to listen to discussions about this minister's speech in the House of Commons and that law-suit in Westminster Hall. Yet they talk about nothing else; as for a serious and improving conversation, it is entirely out of the question.

The Humdrums have got out of their difficulties, and appear to be as flourishing as ever. I hope they will be more provident for the future: but for all that these girls had new bonnets and mantles on when we saw them yesterday, as though nothing had happened. I was sorry to see this—for you know how people talk. Do write to me soon. You know how glad I always am to hear from you. Mamma unites with me in kind regards.

"Your affectionate friend,

"ARAMINTA ASHBY."

Mr. Faversham and Jack Ashby reached Jamaica Lodge as the family were about to take the walk after church and before dinner, which was taken every Sunday, weather permitting. Mrs. Ashby had just detected her husband committing the serious offence of mistaking his every-day hat for his Sunday hat.

"What does it matter?" said Mr. Ashby, speaking from the depths of his liberal nature.

"All I have to say is that I don't go out with you in that shabby thing."

This was enough for Mr. Ashby. Mrs. Ashby was in the habit of telling her friends that she had not the smallest voice in her own house; and while she made this humble declaration her husband smiled, and at the same time looked firm as a rock, intending to convey to the company that he was a tyrant, but a most amiable one. It is one of the arts of a dominating woman to feign abject submission; Mr. Ashby, who was better, was talked into the faith that he was adamant.

The two young men were cordially greeted.

"Did you bring him in chains," said Miss Victoria, taking her brother's arm as she spoke, lest he should at once escape back to town. Mr. Jack left no room for an answer. "Come, none of your nonsense, Miss Victoria," said he.

"Give the young gentlemen a glass of sherry, and then you will all follow on." Mr. Ashby, with this hospitable suggestion, offered his arm to his wife, and, in measured paces, strode away. Mr. Jack pronounced this proceeding to be "the ticket." Faversham followed into the house, where Miss Araminta was discovered reclining upon the sofa. Mr. Faversham was sorry to disturb her, and suggested an instantaneous retreat.

"Seedy?" said Mr. Jack to his sister.

"Are you unwell, Miss Ashby?" was Mr. Faversham's inquiry.

"I've a slight head-ache, nothing more."

"Wouldn't a gentle walk do you good?"

"That's right, Mr. Faversham," said Victoria, gaily, and coquetishly bowing, as she offered the gentleman whom she addressed a glass of wine. Mr. Faversham was very sorry to trouble her.

"It's a nervous head-ache," said Miss Araminta.

"Nervous head-ache, is it? then there's nothing like brandy, hot, and no sugar—take my word for it." Mr. Jack was quite serious.

"Nonsense, John."

"Really, it appears to me, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, Miss Ashby, that a gentle walk would relieve you."

This was Faversham's repeated advice.

"Nonsense, Faversham, brandy's the thing." And then, to Victoria, Mr. Jack added, "has the governor left they keys of the cellar? The key of the cellar is the corner-stone of the building."

Persuaded that he had said a very good thing, Jack winked at Faversham and at his sister Victoria, and was urbane enough to swallow his second glass of sherry.

Mr. Faversham preserved his gravity, and neglected his glass of wine. He appealed a third time to Miss Ashby; at last the interesting invalid said: "I'm afraid I should spoil your walk."

This idea appeared preposterous to the gallant Mr. Faversham.

"Fetch her bonnet, and what the women call 'their things,' and she'll come fast enough." Mr. Jack was incorrigible. Faversham was ready to strangle him.

The invalid was equipped by Victoria for her walk. She was pale and languid; and it was Mr. Faversham's privilege to find her, at his invitation, leaning upon his arm.

"Come on," said Mr. Jack, to his sister Victoria, "Let us catch up the governor. We shall meet you, slow coaches, on our return."

And so Faversham was left in possession of the little, pale, serious image that had penetrated the solitude of his chambers, and could not be driven away. If any female eyes have wandered with us thus far (and be it remarked that, if they have, I have not cheated their natural curiosity by the promise of startling incident nor complex tangle,) they brighten, I know, at this point. At last the two are about to come to an understanding. The swain will be nervous, and the maiden's eyelids will droop. He will lead her into the sweet garden of love and bid her mark how fair it is. She will drop

"The whispered 'no,' how little meant, Sweet falsehood that endears consent," and lips will touch softly. We have read Miss Araminta's letter. This is the young gentleman of unsteady principles, the sentimental worldling, who is with serious Miss Araminta. Moreover, the young lady has a head-ache, and, so far as we know, no heart-ache. The gallant, cultivated, easy-mannered Mr. Faversham is out of his element. Let us see how the two get on.

"Am I walking too fast?"

"Oh! dear, no."

A long and awkward pause.

"Dear me! how John and Victoria are tearing along!"

"Your sister has wonderful spirits; so, indeed, has John. I quite annoy them."

"I cannot say that I do. People who are so impulsive seldom act from conviction."

"That is true; but, then, natural impulses are almost always good."

"Do you think so?"

"I hope so. Human nature, at the bottom, is good, surely."

"Certain animals are kind and gentle by nature. We have something more than instinct."

"I fear we are getting into abstruse questions."

"I like them."

No doubt, Mr. Faversham thought that this was strange in a lady with a headache. She tripped on a stone. He clasped her arm to save her. This was opportune. He could not help looking earnestly in her face, and holding her hand fast within his arm.

"Are you hurt?"

"Oh! dear, no. These roads are so uneven."

"Delightful to me, I assure you, after the wear and tear of the smoke and noise of London."

"Yet they are not so very difficult to reach."

"That is very true. You ladies, living in these quiet places, must have a very poor opinion of the taste of us Londoners, who seldom lose sight of the chimney-pots."

"We only suppose that you prefer the chimney-pots."

"There, allow me to say that you hardly do us justice. The battle of life is not to be fought under branching elms, or where the violets grow."

"I suppose not. But your pleasure as well as your business does not appear to lie far from the Temple."

"I was saying you must have a very poor opinion of us. Indeed, I know you have."

The lady was silent; and Faversham was puzzled how to pursue the conversation. A few minutes later Mr. and Mrs. Ashby and party hove in sight. They were returning.

"I'm afraid you must be fatigued. Shall we turn back? I see your papa is returning." The lady allowed herself to be veered round.

"Here is our walk almost at an end." Faversham spoke in a tone of sadness; and Miss Ashby glanced at him.

There was not a touch of coquetry in her manner. Any warmth that was expressed in her eyes came naturally to them.

"It is flattering that you regret it."

"Regret it! But shall I never be understood?"

"Understood?"

The solution was left to Mr. Faversham; who has, I will be sworn, been pronounced an awkward and foolish fellow, by those feminine readers who have tracked the conversation. Where is the man who would not have been just a little awkward under the circumstances? The awkwardness was an unspoken compliment.

"I see that you do not understand me. In all the world there is nobody in whose good opinion I could wish to stand, so devoutly as I wish to stand in yours."

"Indeed!"

Faversham turned towards the partner of his walk, and gazed ardently, but she would not turn to him nor meet his eyes. He pressed her little hand within his arm, and still sought her look. It was something that the hand consented to the pressure.

"If you confound me with all the young men in my position I assure you that you do me a grievous wrong."

"You confuse me, Mr. Faversham. I assure you that you are mistaken. I have no reason to have a bad opinion of you. I——"

Mr. Faversham, enchanted, took the little glove upon his arm in his hand. It was gently withdrawn.

"May I be permitted to feel, to know, that there is some sympathy between us?"

There were two bright red spots upon Miss Ashby's cheeks.

"You might make of me a true, good, earnest man. I have longed, day and night, for this opportunity to speak unreservedly to you."

"We are friends." The little saint trembled as she spoke. Mr. Faversham had now grown bold as a lion.

"Friends!" he cried, "Must this cold word be all?"

"Remember, Mr. Faversham, I have not known you long!"

"Long! Do you think I have forgotten how your kindness cheered me when I was ill, in chambers? Long! But, it is true. And I am of no account in the world, I have done nothing, I am unknown."

Miss Ashby looked gravely into Faversham's face, it was he who did not meet the look now.

"Indeed, I have the greatest respect for you. You must know that I have no great opinion of what the world calls fame."

"And we are friends?"

"I hope so, and shall always be."

"I see you don't understand me now. Yes, it is friendship, cold friendship, and nothing more, or you would understand me."

Faversham was a dolt. It has been said by a woman that men never know how soon they may propose. We must not forget, however, that in this instance the lady was no ordinary woman. If most women have no character at all, she must be admitted as an exception. She belongs to the small minority.

"You puzzle me."

Did that noodle Faversham imagine that the lady would condescend to make love to him? Was she to speak the word? He had vanity enough to wait. But as they neared the gate of Jamacia Lodge, and she was still silent, he mustered all his courage for a last effort, and said:

"I know I am unworthy, but your friendship is not all I ask. I crave your love. Promise me that you will not say no, now?"

"Really, you must remember, how little we know of each other." The young lady trembled, and hesitated; she who had written that very strong-minded letter to her dear Martha. They had reached the gate; and the rest of the party were close upon their heels.

"But I may hope, give me a word."

"Another time."

The hand that Faversham clasped, ere he relinquished it, now returned the pressure, and two earnest, tender eyes met his.

A NOTABLE ACTOR.

THE times are sadly changed in Ireland, as regards the drama and the enjoyments of its lovers, since the days when Jack Johnstone used to delight his thousands of hearers, in old "Crow street," with his melodious warblings of Irish melodies, and his never-to-be-equalled touches of Irish humour and merriment. It can never be questioned that he was the truest painter of Irish character that ever lived. There was no trait to be found throughout its extensive range, from the accomplished gentleman to the unlettered peasant, that he was not equally master of, and which he did not depict with equal spirit and vividness; and this always in such a way as to make us pleased with the picture of ourselves, and acknowledge its truth, while we laughed at its strange and often ludicrous peculiarities. There was nothing in Jack Johnstone's personation that Irishmen would ever feel ashamed of, or that they would not willingly allow to go forth to the world at large as faithful delineations of their eccentricities and faults, as well as of their drolleries and virtues; and hence, not only is the memory of this genuine Irish comedian honoured by those of the last generation, who were his contemporaries, but his reputation as an actor has even descended with lustre to our own times.

John Henry Johnstone was born at Tipperary, in 1750, and was the son of a small but respectable farmer, having a large family. At the early age of eighteen he enlisted into a regiment of Irish dragoons, then stationed at Clonmel, commanded by Colonel Brown. Being smitten with the charms of a neighbouring farmer's daughter, Johnstone used to scale the barrack-wall, after his comrades had retired to their quarters, for the purpose of serenading his mistress, having a remarkably sweet and flexible voice. He always returned, however, and was ready at parade the following morning. He was much esteemed throughout the regiment for a native lively turn of mind, and peculiarly companionable qualities. Two of his comrades (who had found out the secret of his nocturnal visitations) scaled the wall after him, and discovered him on his knee singing a plaintive Irish ditty beneath the window of his innamorata. They instantly returned to quarters, and were quickly followed by Johnstone. The sergeant of the company to which he belonged eventually became acquainted with the circumstance, but never apprised the colonel of the fact. Shortly after Colonel Brown had a party of particular friends dining with him, whom he was most anxious to entertain; he inquired what soldier throughout the regiment had the best voice, and the palm of merit was awarded by the sergeant-major to Johnstone. The colonel sent for him and he attended the summons, overwhelmed with apprehension that his absence from quarters had reached his commander's ears. He was soon relieved, however, on this point, and attended the party at the time appointed. The first song he sang was a hunting one, which obtained much applause, although he laboured under great trepidation. The colonel said that he had heard he excelled in Irish melodies, and bade Johnstone sing one of his favourite love songs. His embarrassment increased at this order; but, after taking some refreshment, he sang the identical ditty with which he had so often serenaded his mistress, in such a style of pathos, feeling, and taste as perfectly enraptured his auditors. Having completely regained his self-possession he delighted the company with several other songs, which all received unqualified approbation.

The next day Colonel Brown sent for him and sounded his inclination for the stage. Johnstone expressed his wishes favourably on the point, but hinted the extreme improbability of his success from want of experience and musical knowledge. The colonel overcame his objections, and granted him his discharge, with a highly commendatory letter to his particular friend Mr. Ryder, then manager of the Dublin Theatre, who engaged Johnstone at two guineas a week for three years, which, after his first appearance in "Lionel," was immediately raised to four (a high salary at that time in Dublin). His fame as a vocalist gathered like a snow-ball, and he performed the whole range of young singing lovers with pre-eminent éclat.

Our hero next formed a matrimonial alliance with a Miss Poitier, daughter of Colonel Poitier, who had then the command of the military dépôt at Kilmmainham Gaol. This lady, being highly accomplished, and possessing a profound knowledge of music, imparted to her husband the secrets of the science, and made him a finished singer.

Macklin, having the highest opinion of Johnstone's talent, advised him to try the metropolitan boards, and wrote a letter to Mr. Thomas Harris, of Covent Garden, who, on the arrival of Johnstone and his wife, immediately engaged them for three years, at a weekly salary of £14, £16, and £18. Johnstone made his first appearance in London on the 3rd October, 1783, in his old character of Lionel, and made a complete hit, fully sustaining the ten years' reputation he had acquired on the Dublin stage. After remaining several years at Covent Garden, and finding his voice not improving with time, he formed the admirable policy of taking to Irish parts, which were then but very inadequately filled. His success was beyond example; his native humour, rich brogue, and a fine voice for Irish ditties, carried all before him. In fact, he was the only actor who could personate with the utmost effect both the patrician and plebeian Irishman. He next performed at the Haymarket, being one of those who remonstrated with the proprietors of Covent Garden, in 1801, against their new regulations. In 1803, he visited his friends in Dublin, where martial law being then in force, the company performed in the day-time. On his return to London his wife died, and he afterwards married Miss Boulton, the daughter of a wine merchant, by whom he had Mrs. Wallack, who, with her children, succeeded to the bulk of his large property. In the records of the stage no actor ever approached Johnstone in Irish characters. Sir Lucius O'Trigger, Callaghan O'Brallaghan, Major O'Flaherty, Teague, Tully (the Irish gardener), and Dennis Bulgruddery, were portrayed by him in the most exquisite colours. In fact, they stood alone for felicity of nature and original merit.

Johnstone died in his house in Tavistock street, Covent Garden, on the 26th December, 1829, at the advanced age of seventy-eight years, and his remains were interred in a vault under the church of St. Paul, Covent Garden, near the eastern angle of the building. His will was proved in Doctors' Commons, and probate granted under £12,000 personal property. Rumour gave Johnstone the credit of being worth £40,000 or £50,000. He left a gold snuff-box and a ring to each of his executors, Mr. George Robins and Mr. O'Reilly; a ring to his friend Mr. Jobling, of the Adelphi; and a ring to Mr. Dunn, the treasurer of Drury lane; and, as the latter gentleman was a staunch disciple of Isaac Walton, Johnstone left him all his fishing-tackle. To a female servant, who nursed him during the last eight or ten years of his life, he bequeathed an annuity of £50 a-year. The remainder, with the exception of a legacy of £500, to Mrs. Vining, was left to the children of his daughter, Mrs. Wallack.

A DIERGE.

FROM the woods and heathlands bring
Leaves and flowerets of the spring,
Chesnut tassels, quaint and flush,
Daisies, ripening to a blush,
Golden oxeyes, violets,
Pansies, crimped in purpled frets,
Cool fronds of the scented briar,
Primroses—each cup a-fire;
Wild thyme, brodered sweet with mint,
Snowdrops dusked with rainy rent,
All to strew the bed of sorrow,
Where she lieth till the morrow.

In the rushes of the mere
Half the lilies reappear,
And around the dark death-house,
The ascetic wall-flower blows;
Twist and lay them in her hand;
Turn the glass and turn the sand;
If they flourish till the even,
Her sweet soul is safe in Heaven;
Miserere, miserere,
Brain is sick and heart is weary,
Sitting by the bed of sorrow,
Where she lieth till the morrow.

WHAT MR. MAGUIRE SAW IN THE KITCHEN.

RS. MAGUIRE, wife to Denny Maguire, of the Kilshane Arms, had retired to rest. The church bell was tolling eleven when she took a last look at the room and quenched the candle. It was Saturday night, and Denis, according to immemorial custom, had remained in the parlour to contribute his wit and jocularly to the conversation of a few friends who had returned from a christening, and slipped into the Arms to spend an hour until midnight. The courtesy of her husband was but ill-approved by Mrs. Maguire, who entertained a vague suspicion that the house was haunted by the fairies, or descendants of fairies, who formerly occupied the rath on which the Kilshane Arms was built. Her fears, it is only just to admit, had some foundation. Night after night, when every one was in bed, and only Bill, the watch-dog, was up and abroad, supernatural noises proceeded from the kitchen. Now there came a sharp clatter, as if jugs, and plates, and delft tea-pots had come to grief in a simultaneous collision; and anon, a jangling which foreboded destruction to every wine glass, tumbler and decanter on the dresser. Denis had repeatedly listened with eyes a-star, and mouth open, to those supernatural manifestations, but, however alarmed he felt, he always contrived to allay his wife's apprehensions by such exclamations as—"Musha, the dickons take that cat!" or, "Will them mice never be aisy?" Consoled by the practical philosophy of such words Mrs. Maguire would draw a long sigh, insinuate, in her blandest tones, that "luck never came of meddling with the good people," and so commit herself to the heaven of sleep.

The church clock struck three, and Mrs. Maguire awoke. "Much she marvelled," as the old ballad has it, that Denis should have prolonged his carousals to so unseasonable an hour. Her astonishment was increased when, on listening attentively, till the silence tingled in her ears, she could not catch the sound of a single voice or the jingle of a solitary glass from the room in which she had left the revellers. To arise, to light a candle, and descend the stairs in search of Denis, was but the work of a few moments. On reaching the ground floor, what was her surprise to find that individual, with his back propped up against the kitchen door, his head sunken on his chest, and a broken pipe scattered in fragments by his side, seated fast asleep on the ground.

"Dinis," she exclaimed, "Dinis, get up iv ye've any shame left, yo flamin' drunkard!" and with these words she seized him by the collar, and gave him one of those shakes with which a mastiff sometimes honours a spaniel.

Denis lazily opened his eyes, and rapidly reclosed them. "I consint," he muttered, "I consint, though it goes hard against me, mind yez."

"Musha, alanna, do yez hear him? the unfortunat man that has no more business takin' a dhrop than an omadhaun! Consint, yerra! come, come, ye'll get yer death o' could, sittin' here, you foolish crathur."

Denis received a duplicate of the first shrug, and again unclosed his eyes. "Didn't I tell yez," he exclaimed, with no small show of bitterness, "didn't I tell yez that I consinted—and what more does yez want. Ai! ai! gour that, you desaver," he continued, addressing his wife, who was suddenly startled by his altered manner. "Be off wid yer, ould man—do; have yer choice, an' more luck to yez. Arrah, what kem across yez that yez didn't put it to the North Pole, ai?"

"Oh! then, what is he dhramin' of?" asked Mrs. Maguire, in a voice of tremulous expostulation, "who is the ould man, and what is he sayin'? Lord betune us an' harm iv the North Pole! He's crackt, crackt entirely, so he is," and she raised her hastily-donned gown to her eyes, and began crying.

"I'll bell it all over the parish," groaned Denis, who now sat more upright, and was, to all appearances, rational enough. "Show yer nose at the cross if yez dare, and there's not a girl from the post-office to the tay-shop, but'll pin a tin kittle to yer tail, da-a-r lint!"

"Oh! thin, Dinis, Dinis, alanna."

"None o' yer Dinises to me," screamed Mr. Maguire. "Hould yer tongue, yeh, yeh—gour that, I tell yez," and he shot his fist fiercely at his wife.

"Come out iv this, Dinis, dear, and don't be ravin' like a mad man—come."

"Yis, av coorse; cock yez up, ai! Arrah, then, may be I be bowld to ask yez where's the little lord, ai?—the nate little lord, with the hump betune his shoulders, and the hape of a pimple on his nose. Be the mortal frost, but yez was a purty pair, wasn't yez? Lave the house this minit, and be off wid 'im; lave the house, and never darken the doore again."

"Dinis, darlint, ah, thin, what's comin' over yez, to thrate me in this way," sobbed Mrs. Maguire, as she retreated from her husband who compelled her, with repeated threats, in the direction of the door.

"Will yez be off, or say yez won't; will yez?"

"I'll do anything, Dinis, to plaze yez."

"Thin, show us your back, and keep yer face to yerself 'till 'tis wanted. Out wid yez—out wid yez," and so saying, Mr. Maguire ejected his wife over the threshold into the village street.

"Ye'll be sorry for this, Dinis," exclaimed Mrs. Maguire, turning back for a moment.

"Will yez take yerself to the lordheen?" replied Dinis, "shure, he'll want some one to straighten his hump for him, and who'd do it better nor his wife, ai, my jewel?"

"The Lord forgive yez, Dinis."

"That's more than yez deserve yerself, at any rate. Top o' the mornin' to yez," and, with this polite wish, Mr. Maguire closed the door and disappeared.

Mrs. Maguire, completely mystified by her husband's conduct, and wondering what serious change could have deprived her in one night of the burthen of his affections, turned into the house of a neighbour, and seated herself dejectedly on a three-legged stool, or "creepeen," by the side of the turf fire. She was rocking herself to and fro uneasily, whilst her tears came thick and fast, and her sobs almost choked her, when the mistress of the house, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, returned from the bawn and discovered her.

"Why, thin, Mrs. Maguire, is it yourself's afore me. Oh! the poor woman cryin', I declare cryin'! Why, thin, is there anything gone wrong over the way?"

"Himself—'tis himself!" groaned Mrs. Maguire.

"Himself, jewel! Arrah, thin min are always crazy when they take a drop or two over night, and 'tis a fool ud mind 'em. My jintleman 'll miss you afore 'tis dark, believe me. He didn't bate yez; did he?"

"No, Mistress Shaghnessy, I'll be bowld, he didn't. He sez to me, says he, go off wid your lordheen, for a bite or sup ye'll never take agin wid me, sez he."

"A lordheen, inagh. Gondoutha, what put that in his head, I wondher?"

"Thim fairies, divil shoot thim," replied Mrs. Maguire. "Shure, I often said, if he had luck or grace he'd lave 'em alone, and not be meddlin' or makin' with thim that didn't consarn him."

Mrs. O'Shaughnessy looked mysterious, and shook her head in token of assent. "Thim ould places does't answer Christians, anyhow. I wouldnt sod a lark out iv 'em if there wasnt another green spot in the barony. Here, lave off now, for there's the min comin to breakfast and we'll have our tay when they shows their backs, so we will."

Somewhat cheered by the prospect of the non-inebriating cup, Mrs. Maguire hastened to indulge her sorrows in the privacy of an inner room. The labourers soon arrived, and she listened intently to their conversation in order to satisfy herself that the scandal of which she was the victim had not spread through the village. Nothing occurred to alarm her, however, until one of the men, whose mouth, judging from the thickness of his articulation, was embarrassed by the presence of a lump, exclaimed:

"Dick Boulster was done out of his sudden death,* this mornin, sure, and sorra the one could spake to him, he was so down in the mouth."

"Begor," remarked another voice, "he must be goin' to the wall entirely, when he'd pass by Dinny Maguire's without paying his respects to the native."

"Faith its toight enough wid him," observed a man with a north Tipperary accent. "Didnt we see him on Friday, standing on one fut at Mick Lalor's bulk, whilst he was gettin' a thieveent on the other."

"He has a great back in America, dough," said a man, with an exceedingly weak organ. "De girls send him home hapes o' money—I wish he was tirty pounds in my books dis morning."

"Musha, talk sinse," exclaimed the first speaker, "an don't be runnin away wed yourselves, like goms,† I tell yez that the raisin he hadnt his dhrop is, bekase he couldnt get it, and the raisin he couldnt get it is, bekase Dinny wouldnt open the doore, he's getting so holy, gondoutha!"

A roar of laughter succeeded the sarcastic comment implied in the last observation. The men soon afterwards rose and left the house, and Mrs. Maguire was preparing to emerge from her hiding place, when Mrs. O'Shaughnessy exclaimed, in a half whisper:

"Be as mute as a mouse, for himself is comin' up the paddock."

"For the love of God, don't say I'm here, or there'll be ructions till Michaelmas!"

"Aisy, now be aisy, till we nears what he sez for himself. Be quiet, alanna, and who knows but its all for the best."‡

So saying, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy threw herself into a posture of affected inattention, and was merrily humming a milking song, when Dennis Maguire entered the house, looking pale and haggard.

"God bless all here!" he said, with a slight quaver in his voice.

"And you too, Dinis. How's all at home wid yez?"

"Purty middlin', begor; we can't complain, ma'am."

"Won't yez sit down and rest yerself, Dinis?" said the lady,

* Glass of raw whiskey, † Patch of leather. ‡ Fools.

driving the cat from a hay-bottomed chair, and handing it to the visitor. "Is herself fine and strongly?"

Dennis groaned. "Consarnin' her, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I'm afeerd I've put my fut in it."

"Fut, agra! that's a quare thing!"

"Mortial quare, ma'am, intirely. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I'm the manest, ungratefulest baste in crayation."

"Is the man dhramin' wid his eyes open?" asked the good woman, suspending the operation of washing a butter tub, and looking at the speaker.

"Faith, they're open wide enough now, ma'am. If you saw this this mornin' airly, 'tisn't that ye'd say, I be bail."

"Cobwebs, after the night, yez mane?"

"Dust, ma'am—fairy dust that tuk away my five sinsis to the other world, and put me beyant meself, and made me turn Biddy out o' doore—inade a pote—a rale, live pote o' me intirely, ma'am!"

"The dickens take it, sure yez wasn't as bad as all that, Dinis! Pote, inagh. Shure thim niver has wives or houses, and yez has both, God bless 'em!"

"And I don't desave 'em, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, for I'm a baste, and no mistake, to turn out that kind-hearted crathur on the cowl world, without a bit o' breakfast, or a tester in her pocket, av a mornin' airly;" and so affected was the speaker by the pathos of his own discourse, that he buried his face between his hands and wept audibly. Mrs. Maguire who was a breathless listener to all that passed, in the next room, imitated his example with that rare facility for which the female eye-ducts are celebrated, but she took care to drown her sobs in the folds of her cloak, lest her grief should betray her.

"Tut, tut, man, come, don't be killen yerself that way," insisted Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, in a voice of the kindest sympathy. "The threest couple on the face iv the earth will have their thrials and fallin'-outs. But Dinis, I'm completely bothered to make out the raisin that came over yez, all of a hape, to malthreat poor Biddy. Was she throublesome?"

"Herself throublesome! An angel playin' on a harp o' goold isn't her aiquil for civility, ma'am. Oh, that dhrame, that dhrame!"

"What dhrame?" asked Mrs. O'Shaughnessy.

"Musha, sit down, and ye'll hear the whole of it."

Mrs. O'Shaughnessy followed the direction, and, after many introductory "bems" and "haws," and several apparently ineffectual efforts to clear his throat, Dennis began:

"You must know, ma'am, that last night, it bein' Sathurday, two o' the boys dropped in, betther nor an hour afore midnight, to have a weeny dhrop afore they should lave for home. My minory may disave me (that's an ould thrick wid it), but I'd be afeered to say that I tuk more nor six or seven glasses with a dash o' spring wather in each iv 'em, to cool them a bit, you know. Howsomever, the boys went, and I barred the doore, and I tuk the candle from the hob, and, just as I put my foot on the first step, what do you consave should I hear but the rattlin' and tearin' of spoons, the new spoons we bought at the pattern iv Bruff, and the greatest divarsion of cut glass in the kitchen! Well, my hair stood on an end like a shaft of bulrushes, and my knees knocked together for all the world like a pair o' dale clappers. "What does that mane, at all, at all?" sez I, to meself. Nobody answered, av course, but, instead o' that, the glasses, man alive, fell to rattlin' agin and agin, and the spoons fell to kicking up the most unmarciful ructions. As I was sayin', I cocked my ear like a hare, and hearkened to the fun that was goin' on inside, and all at wanst, I heard an ould man coughin' and crowin', and three or four more ould men, too, I be bail, laughin' as if they'd split their sides wid the divarsion. I tuk my fut off the stairs, and the kitchen door bein' a taste open, I clapped my eye to it and looked in. Holy jewel, if you saw thim! A lump of mate, with a double hedge of yellow fat—a lump you couldn't cram into a skiagh, was on the table; one ould man stood forinst me, dressed in blue knee-breeches, and whited darned stockings, and a rale swallow-tail wid goold buttons, shinen' like a clane candlestick, and a hat for all the world like Tom Lacy's caubogue, only it was turned up at the sides; his white hair was all rolled up in a ball with a skiver stuck behind in it; and he had a bottle of the best Jameson's (two shillings, and every farthen iv it, a pint) to his mouth, guffin' away, ma'am, as iv he'd swallow Poul-a-phonca, the Lord save us! Be-tune him and I there was a laddo upon one knee, decantin' a bottle iv somethin' or another, like the big bottle in Dr. Sloane's window; this laddo wore boots up to his knees, and such a cambric handkercher onderneath his ould chin! The fire was blazin' betune the hobs, as if they was bint on manufacterin' an anvil, and forinist it was sated an ould codger, wid a jug of hot punch in his hand, and anappin' away wid his fingers, like wildfire, to the chune o' the 'Limerick Lasses.' The flure was all a spread of rale chainey, and lashins o' feedin', ham, and pork, and beef, and cabbage, and mate o' that sort. But what opened my eyes, intirely, intirely, was a murtherin' queer thing betune a frog and a burthterfly, fluttherin' and flying around the room, and divartin' himself, wid his legs up to the ceilin', as if he was a rale fly. Some o' the min were cuttin' capers in the dancin' way, wid the wimen. Arrah, to see thim—such dandies as thim was, wid wings, moryagh, stuck out o' their shoulders, and castles iv cock's feathers growin' out iv the tops o' their heads. But 'twas the coortin' and *colloqueing that put me pipe out completely, for there was sated forinist me an ould buckeen wid a hump, as big as a churn on his back, and his ould arm, if yez plaze, around a young lady in a high-cauled cap, and a turkey-red handkercher. 'Faith,' sez I to myself, 'I'll have an eye to yez, my darlint,' and so I kept it on 'em, until the lady turned round her purty head, and, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, I'll take my book-oath on't, the lady—the lady, mind yez, was, (here the narrator spread out his legs, twirled his thumbs rapidly, and continued in a hoarse whisper,) the wife! When I saw her, sated on the barrel, colloqueing wid the ould Cromwellian of a villan, I tried to make a haul at the pair, and twist his head off iv him, but the dickons resave the step the legs would go, and I had to stand there in the cowlid like a piggarlie, seein' Biddy divartin' herself wid the good people. All at wanst the music caysed, and the laddo with the skiver in his head sez, sez he:

"That Maguire is the scum of a vagabond—he's the sworn inimy of the ould stock," sez he, "an', if I had my own way, I'd open his eye whilst yed be sayin' Jack Robinson."

"Thrus for yez, Harelip, avic," says the man that was bottlin' the medicine, "thrus for yez," sez he, "and the pookah take him an' his breed, an' every stick and stone belongin' to thim."

"The laddo that was dancin' wid the paycock lady, here opened his mouth and sez he, 'Teranages, but his wife's a gim, a rale gim, and its the dickons iv a shame that she should be livin' wid that monstherosity. Min,' sez he, 'to the fellows that might wear a tailor's thimble for a waist-band—' min,' sez he, 'I moves we whips her off and marry her to Lord Plumtop.'

"Right," sez Skiver, "right. I was pondherin' over that meself, and sorra' better way I sees," sez he, "of punishin' the spalpeen."

"Before the boy's tongue had time to get into his cheek, the humpy back, that was sittin' alongside Biddy, turns about, and immedgiately I got a sight of a pimple as red as a bantam's comb, perched atop of his nose. 'Have I always thrated yez dacently,' sez he.

"Iss, my lord," says the whole o' the pinkeens, bowin' and serapin' until they'd pick a pin iv the flure with their eye-lashers—"Iss, my lord," sez they.

"Thim," sez he, "by the honour and glory of the Plumtops, I swear on the top and bottom iv the griddle to have the gim for myself—I'm king o' the castle," sez he, "and the pimple grew reddher and reddher, 'and who dare rastle?'

"Be the hoky," says the Skiver, "my lord is gotten' as stiff as Bill Italy's dog, that swallowed a whole stone of starch, and a blue-bag, into the bargain. Yez may lead me if it plazes yez," sez Skiver, bouldly, "but I'd see the whole stock of yez hanged, dhrawn, and quarthered, before I'm dhruv."

"The ould man that was engravin' his shins afore the fire, here got up, and sez he, taken out his handkercher, 'I blush for yez, Skiver, I blush for yez. If yez have any rimnint of dacency in yez, go down on yer binded knees, and beg his lordship's parding.'

"Arrah, woman alive, to hear Skiver laughin' at that would do you good for a shrovetide. He cocked his head, he cocked his eye, 'One man is good as another,' sez he, 'barrin' he's a lord or a duke—begor, barrin' he's an earl, for all that. And if his lordship,' sez he, standin' on his toes, and looken down on Plumtop, 'sez to the conthrary, let him keep on his jacket and I'll dust it for him.'

"Plumtop, heerin' iv the discourse, tuk a pinch o' Cork snuff, and when the sneezin' was over, he sez, "Skiver, are yez bint (ash-thee, the sneezin' wasn't over), are yez bint on kickin' up a rucshin in my dominions? Yer pinance is,' sez he, 'to go down on yer (ash-thee, ash-thee),—that snuff is murtherin' strong—yer four ugly bones, and all the min and wimen in the rath walk over yer ugly carcass.'

"Up jumps Biddy, as live as a lark, my dear, and sez she, 'If the thrubble's about me, put an ind to it, for I'm promised to Lord Plumtop, here an' I wouldn't change my mind for the best grocery in Caherconlish,' and sayin' this, she turned up her mouth and kissed the pimple on the lord's nose, begor—may I niver see another Sunday, but she did.

"Stand out," sez Skiver, squarin his fists for the divarashin. "If I'm to be thrated like a baste, I'll be a baste," and wid that he up wid his fist and knocked down the lordheen. There was the hape of a pillu on the head of this, the scrawlin* became general, but faith, my bowld Skiver flaked them right and left, min, wimen, and childrin, as they was, until the physic man up wid a decanter and laid him as flat as a pancake. In the manetime I looked around for Biddy, and, shure enough, there she was, sittin' on the barrel, breakin' her heart cryin', and tlein' up the lordheen's head with a shally shawl I bought her the Sathurday night afore. The physic man kum up to feel his pulse.

"Only wan thing 'I cure him," sez he, takin' out a watch as big as a pot-lid, and cocken it to his ear. 'He'll be as stiff as a herrin' afore five minutes if its not administhered.' 'And what's that?' sez Biddy, in a heart-broken voice. 'Ai, what is it?' 'A weddin'-ring,' sez the docthor, 'boiled down in a pot of goat's milk. Haven't yez a ring yerself, my lady.'

"Begor, thim, I have," sez she, 'an' here its for him, if 'twas goold tin times over.'

"So she whipped off the ring, ma'am, and when Physic sez, 'What'll Dinis think o' this whin it kums to his ears?' sez he.

"Will you hould your jaw, and don't be bottherin' me about the spalpeen. I've somethin' else to consarn me?"

"Well, the milk was boiled, and no sooner did the lordheen swal-low it, then he got up and marched about the room as grand as a paycock.

"Does yez love me, Biddy?" sez he.

"I dotes on you," sez Biddy, 'shure,' sez she, 'a nater pimple was never seen than that on yer lordship's nose.'

"What'ud Maguire give for such a lump of grandher?" sez the lordheen.

"The two eyes out iv his head," sez Biddy.

"When will we be married, Biddy?" sez he.

"Faith, as soon as its convaynant," sez she.

"Where 'il we be married, jewel?" sez he.

"Why, thim, where but at the North Pole?" sez she.

"We must have Dinis's consint, Biddy," sez the old scoundrel.

"Will it be aisy to find him?"

"There he's behind the doore," says she. 'Hurrah, hurrah, sez the lordheen,' wheeling his stick around his head. 'Min,' sez he, 'drag in that quadruped and ask him if he consints to my marryin' Biddy?' and, sure enough, before I could lift a leg they had me off iv my pins and planted in the middle iv the flure.

"Biddy," sez I, 'Biddy, the Lord forgive yez!'

"Musha, hould your ugly mouth," sez she, 'and don't be cacklin like a gander.'

"Does yez consint?" sez the lordheen, with a scrame like a wild crane; 'does yez consint to separate from yer wife and give her to them that can support her dacently?'

"No," sez I.

"Pull off his hair, one-by-one, min," sez the lordheen, 'we'll taich him manners afore he's much ouldher.'

"So the pinkeens kem around me and they pulled away until I put my hand to the top of my head, roarin' all the time wid pain, and saw I had only three hairs remainin'. Begor I was frightened to think of wearin' a wig, and as all the hair was goin' I thought best to keep the seed of a new crop, so sez I, 'I consint,' and hardly were the words out o' my mouth when I sits up and sees Biddy afore me. 'Get out iv the house this minute, sez I,' and wid that I planted her in the middle iv the pavement, for I couk'nt consaive I had been dhramin'. Arrah is'nt that her cryin' away in the room there?' said Denis, suspending the story and listenin'."

"Tis herself, then, poor woman," said Mrs. O'Shaughnessy; here go in an' make friends with her."

Denis went, and returned in a few minutes, holding his wife by, the hand.

* Fighting.

" 'Twas all a dhrame, ma'am, an' she forgives me, an' I'm going to take the pledge to-morrow."

" An' when you do," said his wife, laughing, " I'll run off with the lordheen."

" Are yez at it again ?" said Denis, catching and kissing her, " the dickons take him for a lordheen, any how !"

THE SIMPLICITY OF SCIENCE.

NATURE presents us with numerous instances of minute subdivisions, which utterly baffle our powers of conception. Thus, human hair varies in thickness from the 250th to the 600th part of an inch, and yet, each one is a capillary tube. The fibre of the coarsest wool is about the 500th part of an inch in diameter, and the finest only the 1,500th part. The silk line, as spun by the worm, is about the 5,000th part of an inch thick ; but a spider's line is, perhaps, six times finer, or only the 30,000th part of an inch in diameter, inasmuch, that a single pound of this attenuated, yet perfect substance, would be sufficient to encompass our globe.

Animalculæ are so small, that many thousands together are smaller than the point of a needle. Leeuwenhoek says, there are more animals in the milt of a codfish, than men on the whole earth, and that a single grain of sand is larger than four thousand of these animals. Moreover, a particle of the blood of one of these animalculæ has been found, by a calculation, to be as much less than a globe of 1-10th of an inch in diameter, as that globe is less than the whole earth. He states, that a grain of sand, in diameter but the hundredth part of an inch, will cover 125,000 of the orifices through which we perspire ; and that of some animalculæ, 3,000 are not equal to a grain of sand.

It is ascertained by the microscope that the smallest insects with which we are acquainted, are themselves infested with other insects as much smaller than themselves, as those are smaller than the larger animals that they infest. How inconceivably small, then, must be the parts of such organised creatures ! But, by analogy, we may carry our reasoning still further, by conceiving that even these creatures may again be infested with others proportionally smaller, till we are as much lost in the scale of descent, as we are in that ascent through the regions of the universe.

Hence, this part of the creation, and the laws or organization confound the inquiries of men even more than the vastness of the universe ; for our most powerful microscope enables us to magnify with effect only 40 or 50 thousand times, whereas the atoms concerned in producing the phenomena of nature, are, doubtless, millions of times less than the smallest object which can be seen with the naked eye. Odours are capable of a much wider diffusion, if we are to ascribe their action to the radiation of atoms, and not, as many suppose, to any affection of the medium by which they are surrounded. A single grain of musk has been known to perfume a room for the space of twenty years.

A piece of wire, gilt with eight grains, or the sixtieth of an ounce of gold, may be drawn out to a length of 13,000 feet, the whole surface of it still remaining covered with gold. A grain of gold may be beaten to cover 50 square inches, which is then only the hundred-thousandth part of an inch thick ; and still maintains its qualities as gold. If a grain of gold be melted with a pound, or 5,760 grains of silver, and a single grain of the mass be dissolved in diluted nitric acid, the gold, though only the 5,761st part of a grain, will fall to the bottom and be visible ; while the silver remains dissolved in the acid. A grain of silver may be beaten till a microscope shows 1,000 distinct parts ; if one of these be then dissolved it will tinge 18,000 grains of water ; a grain is, therefore, divisible into 18,000,000 sensible parts ! A pound of cotton has been spun so fine, that it would extend 168,000 yards, or 25 miles. A quantity of vitriol being dissolved and mixed with 9,000 times as much water, will tinge the whole ; consequently it will be divided into as many parts as there are visible portions of matter in that water. If a candle be lighted, it will then be visible about two miles round ; and, consequently, were it placed two miles above the surface of the earth, it would fill with luminous particles a sphere whose diameter is four miles, and before it had lost any sensible part of its weight.

It is not, however, to be hence presumed that the space is filled with luminous rays, for rays of light travel 200,000 miles in a second, and 20 per second produce continuous vision. Hence, if we divide the circumference, 12 miles, or 7,200,000 tenths of an inch, there will, at one time, be but 1,440 rays emanating from the candle, so as to produce distinct vision two miles distant in every tenth of an inch. The effect of colours may be similar. Indeed, a candle fixes oxygen while it parts with light.

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER IX.

THE black speck which the Coiner's wife had indicated in the red evening sunlight, was now a broad mass of vapour, darkening the region of the tempests from one point of the horizon to the other, and presenting, in the swift gradations of its progress from insignificance to grandeur, a magnificent and terrific emblem of the spreading dominion of crime in the human soul, from the slight neglect of a wandering thought in devotion to the awful and tumultuous blackness of impenitent despair itself. The first thin sheeted flashes of a reddish lightning had begun to quiver and play on the gloomy expanse, revealing at fitful intervals the jagged and unevennesses of the otherwise undistinguishable fragments of vapour in a thousand fantastical images. Our travellers, who had advanced little more than a mile from the inn before these changes began to make themselves visible, looked upon them with no little anxiety, originating however in very different conditions of feeling and situation. The old Palatine, whose determination to proceed appeared to increase in proportion to the obstacles which amassed on his route, and the arguments which were employed to dissuade him, observed a profound silence; and, except by an impatient glance or gesture which he used on every trifling pause made by his companions, seemed almost unconscious of their presence. Mr. Shine, whose spirits had not yet recovered the shock which the discovery of Maney's cheat had occasioned him, remained pinioned on his pony, riding between both the "robineen redbreasts," as the gentleman of the wig and buckles termed his myrmidons — the little canvas bag, or John Doe, hanging down over his back in the fashion of a hood, and fully prepared, in case of any attempt to recover his liberty, of which the Cork grazier appeared singularly apprehensive, to be restored to its ancient use by a slight chuck of the string which was suspended from his neck. The fine gentleman was the only talkative person of the party. He rode on—hung back—trotted from side to side—made an unheeded observation in the ear of the pensive Segur on the state of the weather—intimated to Shine in a menacing way the utter fruitlessness of any corporeal resistance against his captors, whispered his men to be on their guard, for that big fat man was the strongest "warrant" at a hurley, and the best leaper in all Ireland—then, having exhausted every subject that might be suggested by the circumstances of each of his companions, without eliciting any considerable portion of information, he fell back as a last resource upon himself—arranged his wig—adjusted his sword belt, looked up at the heavens—loosened the string of a tightly-packed lody, or great-coat—and trembled for his head-gear—gave a history in detail of the lives, characters, fortunes, and fashions of all the master tailors in Cork—struck off by a bye road to the price of pigs and cattle—convinced the passive Shine by the most unexceptionable syllogisms that twenty geese would consume, to a blade, as much grass as any cow—that bony pigs were always the best to buy on a fattening speculation—that bog dust was a fine manure for red soil—that it was the greatest mistake to say the Limerick girls were the handsomest in Ireland—that the lightning was perfectly innocuous, as long as it maintained its reddish hue—that Puritanism, particularly as regarded certain holidays, was everything but a reasonable creed—[the only point on which he obtained the semblance of an answer from the preacher]—that Dean Swift would be hanged, as sure as there was a cottoner in Cork, and there were plenty, sure, and good ones too—that he himself was the most fashionable personage in the south of Ireland—and Lord Cartaret, the best Lord Lieutenant that ever lived before or after the Flood—and a thousand other thats with which the necessities of our tale will not permit us to encumber the reader's mind.

On a sudden a blue straggling light darted across the heavens, and a deep, rending crash of thunder seemed to tear the region from one extremity to the other. The unchecked and absolute blackness which ensued, left the party in so benighted a condition that all stood short, as if by a sympathy of intelligence. The horses, startled by the suddenness of the transition, chafed, demi-volted, and finally remained stock still under their riders, snorting and champing the bit in the impatience of strong terror. A moment after, as if the windows of heaven had been opened for a second deluge, a torrent of thunder drops was poured upon the travellers, so dense, so sudden, and so unflinchingly continued, that each particular individual in his own square foot of space received as much as would have served him for a bath.

The terrors of the storm now commenced in all their magnitude and grandeur. The thunder bellowed, howled, and clattered; the lightning flared, and darted in wheeling circles and angles of painful brilliancy, before and about them. Sometimes a strong bolt, launched from the black womb of the vapour in which it was generated, hissed fiercely through the sparkling rain, and breaking with a rapid violence into a thousand lines of blue and dazzling splendour lit up the vaulted vase of darkness into a momentary noon, which was as suddenly changed to a gloom as dense as that which was made palpable in the lands of the Egyptian spoilers. Then there was a silence of a second, deep and terrible, a hush of all nature, unbroken even by the breathing of the pale and anxious wanderers, and immediately after, a rattling close above their heads, at first, quick, harsh, and jarring, like the clatter of a musket volley, and gradually deepening and swelling as it receded, till its echoes boomed in the abyss of distance like the roar of a million parks of artillery.

"Whish! hoo!" the grazier exclaimed, placing his hand above his ear and endeavouring to check the plunging of his steed; "did any body hear a 'holloo' behind us? Ha, there it is again!"

"'Tis the wind that's splitting itself upon the Carrig-ou-Dhiol," said one of his retainers.

Another thunder clap drowned the reason of this conjecture, and, in the intervals of its expiring peals, the distant and long-protracted cry of a man's voice proved to be an erroneous one.

"I have my reasons," said the Palatine, with a gesture of alarm, laying his hand on the grazier's arm, "for not delaying an instant. Let us dash forward, in the name of Heaven!"

Again the imploring cry, renewed at a much more audible distance, seemed to appeal against this selfish counsel to the good feelings of the party. It was not altogether the influence of mere good feeling, however, which induced the obstinate gentleman of the sword and buckles to enter his rescusa against the old Palatine's proposition. The slighting taciturnity with which the latter had treated him during the journey had predisposed him to adopt the contrary course, whatever it might be, to any which should be recommended by the old man. He plucked his arm pettishly away from the grasp of the latter, and instantly reined up his steed. Either unwilling to persevere in what appeared an unkindly procedure, or acting under the guidance of that piercing sagacity which enables some men to discover in a glance, a tone, a gesture—nay, in the very manner of an affection itself, a tolerable indication of the whole machinery of the characters of those with whom they come in contact—acting, I say, under this influence, and perceiving the absolute hopelessness of any attempt to overway the dogged resolution of the blockhead with whom he travelled, the old Palatine made no further effort to carry his own wishes into effect, but suffered their pursuers to approach.

"They're at the top o' the hill already! I hear the tramping of the horse's feet—Whisht! Dash along! Naught was never in danger. Take care how you fall. Never welcome the thunder; will it never have done bellowing, and let us hear the people?"

"Hoo—hoo—ee—hoo—hoo—ee!"

"Hoo—hoo—ee! here, lad! Halt! ho! Will you never stop—ha! the fair sex—Fong a foil! Where are you—?"

The query was cut short by the sudden onset of a large, stout-limbed horse, which dashed furiously through the group covering the dandy grazier and his prisoner with a profusion of the mud struck by the concussion of the animal's broad hoofs from the well-worn ruts of the old and broken road. As they swept thus fiercely through the group, the horse chafing, snorting, and furiously contending against the restraint of the tightened rein, the rider by voice and action using every possible endeavour to restrain him, the gentleman of the wig and sword execrating both in the purest Gaelic, and the poor discomfited Shine patiently moaning within his compressed lips at this new misfortune; while these relative sounds, we say, proceeded, a sudden rent was made in the cloud immediately above them, and a volume of electric light was poured upon the spot, so intense and brilliant, as for a few seconds to enable each individual of the party to peruse in minute detail every portion of the person and accoutrements of the rest. For those few seconds the Palatine, whose eye was fixed in all the keenness of an acute curiosity upon the new comers, was enabled to discern the figure of a young man keeping a firm seat on the wild steed, which it seemed to require an exertion almost as much of strength as of skill to govern, and endeavouring at the same time to uphold from the earth the creaking form of a female who sat before him, whose low, hurried, and agitated moans, mingling in the pause of the thunder peal, produced a strange admixture of involuntary pity and terror on the mind of the hearer.

"Murther, murther alive! only see where he has the female!" ejaculated the Cork gentleman.

"'Tis he! 'tis they! Join them and hasten, sir, for heaven's sake," said the woman, clinging to her protector, and gathering her turned-up wrapper hood-wise about her face for the purpose, as it seemed, of keeping off the heavy rain which poured in torrents upon her, and shading its features at the same time from the strong light.

"A bad night, gentlemen," said the young man, wishing to assure himself of the identity of those whom he addressed.

"If you'd tell us news, we'd thank you," returned the buck. "And pray, what was your business with us, or who are you at all? We have the right of challengers, by all the rules of right tactics. Witness the catechumen's proverb—"

"Who goes there?"

"A grenadier!"

"What do you want?"

"A bottle o' beer!"

"Where's your money?"

"In my pocket."

"Where's your pocket?"

"I forgot it."

Answer speedily, sir, lest you become liable to the application of the catechist's concluding octo-syllabic—

"Gid-a-gone, you foolish blockhead!"

"You are the merriest man in a thunder-storm I ever saw," said the new comer; "but I think, if you are disposed to proceed, we may as well dash forward. Your merriment will do little to wring the drenching rain from my poor fellow-traveller's slight dress—"

"Oh—hush! hush!" whispered the woman, "do not speak of me. I feel nothing. I am used to this. But, for heaven's sake, spur on your horse! They will follow."

"I don't know what may be the customs of the ladies of Limerick," placidly returned the buck, "but in the county Cork it would be considered an instance of questionable taste to select such an evening as this for an excursion. Here, sir," tossing his loody to the young man, "the choice is between a female and my new wig, and, as I'm an Irishman, I'd rather have it hanging as lank as a cow's tail down my back in the morning, than that one curl of the humblest creature that ever wore bonnet should receive a section from a single drop of such a torrent as this."

"The buckeeny has a sparkle o' the gentleman in him, for all!" observed the taciturn Able Switzer, (the first, remark by the way, for which we have been enabled to afford him space during the entire day.)

"Do you travel on the Crag road?" inquired the stranger, after he wrapped the coat about his suffering protégée.

"As far as Drumsanlon, where I can make as many welcome as the house can accommodate—Ay, and more too, for poor old Byrne usn't—"

"We may as well, I think, be riding forward as we talk," said old Segur.

"If we stay this way," added Abie, "there'll one of us be roasted for the rest for supper."

"Whoever that woman is, sir," continued the Palatine, "it would be as well if she turned on the other side, for the wind blows on that."

"The blessings of a broken heart fall on you!" murmured the woman, as her protector took the old man's hint.

"Bless him, does she? Why, she did not so much as say 'thanky kindly,' to me for the loan o' my coat!" muttered the grazier, as he shrugged his shoulders, and felt the rain already penetrating his green broadcloth.

The whole party proceeded as rapidly as the starting, rearing, plunging, and shying of their steeds would permit. The lightning flashes, which still continued momentarily glancing at various degrees of brilliancy upon their path, forming a very sufficient apology for the contumacy of the animals.

"I was saying," said the Cork gentleman, "that poor Byrne usn't to limit his invitations to the dimensions of his house. Many and many a night; you don't hear me, sir?" he continued, pressing close to the young man, "many a pleasant night, after tiring down every girl in the hall at a slip-jig, I've stretched myself abroad in the hay-loft as comfortable as could be, and the Blaneys of the Hill in the cow-house under me, with such joking and laughing. The fowl-house was a great place for us too, I remember. Old Missiz Hasset (that was hardly young Mrs. Hasset then)—and by the way, talking of her, she's at Drumsanlon to-night, moreover, or ought to be—used to have the ticks and quilts brought out o' the cars, and made up snug and cosey among the turkeys, and the rest o' them, for the neighbours; and sometimes we'd have little Lilly herself—Hirrup, sir! keep your horse steady, if you please!—we'd have little Lilly Byrne herself, a fine little curly-headed rogue, 'little merry-eyes,' as I used to call her, coming out o' the door, and laughing. Poor Lilly! I recollect saying to her, one day, while I was tossing her on my toe, and she laughing, and crowing, and her hair flowing about her, and her cheeks as rosy as a rose itself, I remember saying to her, says I 'the day will come yet, when a lock o' that hair will be a prouder gift for a young man to wear, than a coat of Buckmaster; the day will come,' says I, and I looking at her this way, in the face, 'the day will come when that eye will make many a gallant heart ache, and many a young man's cheek grow pale,' says I, and I looking at her, thinking of it—'and when that lip that's there, so innocent, will have the word of life or death upon it—isn't that great?' and she laughing, not understanding a word of what I said, and sure 'twas all true for me."

The grazier did not know what a sincere and agonized assent his words received in the heart of the poor young man who rode by his side.

"I think," continued the talkative bore, who wished, indeed very pardonably, to divert his attention from the now perfectly piteous condition to which he felt himself reduced, by the exercise of a tongue

"As true as truest horse,
That yet would never t re,"

"I think," said he, "Lilly will verify my prophecy, if she has not done it yet. But, poh! what's the use of talking? I saw her when I came this way the other day, and 'twould puzzle the Danes to tell what was come over her. Her cheek, sir—her plump, ripe cheek—that you might play a hand of fives against, so worn down and pale-looking—and her little hand so damp and cold as she put it into mine; and such a death-like, religious smile about her sweet lips; and then, instead of meeting me with a jump, and a hop, and a laugh, and that little merry 'hoop!' that used to come from between her lips, as sweet as love itself, sir, and as fine as a gold thread, she met me as her mother might have done—standing upright on both her feet, putting one before the other when she walked—and having no more of the merry hoyden that I knew, left about her, but only all her sweetness. You'd wonder to look at her. I didn't take my eyes off her for as good and better than an hour. Her eyes were a little red, too. 'I would move you, sir, if you were to be looking at her,'"

"It does! it does!" replied his companion, in a tone of deep feeling.

"Sir, I'm sure you're a gentleman," said the grazier, warmly, at once attributing to the influence of his own pathos in the narration all the effect which the circumstances themselves had produced upon his auditor—"I'm sure you are, and I like you. The fact, however, may be naturally explained, as in honest truth, her mother did account for it to me in a confidential way. Talking of confidence, by the bye, I'll not tell you what she said, for these things, however trifling they may appear to men of sense, are not likely to be serviceable, when spoken of to the class of unmarried girls. And, after all, it is but a girlish fancy, which will go off with the next fine weather. In the affections, as in grazing, the autumnal produce is always the sweetest. A girl's first love is too sad len, too luxuriant, sir—it is parched and dried up in its own fire, there's no health about it, but now that away, with a few months' absence—let the heart be trampled a little, let the soft showers of disappointment fall upon it, and then you have it as fresh, and kind, and gentle as a field of upland clover."

"A thorough grazier's sentiment," said Kumba, almost involuntarily, within his own heart. "When was this, sir?" he asked, aloud.

"A few days since, I was at Drumsanlon. I made Lilly laugh at last, reminding her of the time when I used to bring her the barren brace and tell her the story of the 'wee-wee woman and her bunch o' black-berries.' By the way, they were expecting the priest there at that time; for you must know, Lilly is grown so pious, that they're beginning to think she'll make a fair run for a convent some fine morning. But we'll talk more o' this by an' bye. We'll be late for supper, I'm afraid."

The party quickened their pace.

There is a proverb current among the Irish peasantry, which, as we have not been in the habit of obtruding these aphorisms of vulgar wisdom upon him hitherto, the reader will excuse our transcribing. It runs, in English, something in this way—"Carry a goat to the chapel, and he never will stop until he mounts the altar." The truth of the axiom is more frequently exemplified in the annals of Irish crime, than, perhaps, in those of most other nations. The reason of this may be found in the simple fact, that Irish crime, like Irish virtue, is not the creature of the mind but of the heart. They are a people more frequently betrayed into guilt by the impulses of strong feelings than the cold suggestions of conventions; and in proportion to the violence of the stimulus applied, will be found the depth and atrocity of the outrage that is committed. For the same reason also, it appears that instances of a cold-hearted attachment to guilt, having no more immediate motive than habitude, are, proportionably to the extent of crime existing, very rare. The ruffian who has been lashed, through his course of blood and outrage, by the hand of circumstance, is liable, when the scourge is withdrawn, and a pause is left him for reflection, to sudden accessions of self-detestation and remorse, which would seldom be experienced by one whose guilt was determined before it was acted, and whose career had been the election, in any degree, of deliberate reason. By following in the steps of the unhappy wretch, whose alias has furnished us with a name of this tale, through the following pages, the reader may find an illustration of both of the idiosyncrasies we have attempted to account for, the capability of utter abandonment of all moral principle and liability to a sudden change of feeling in the very head and front of the criminal's offending:—a hue of national character which is only wanting in wretches so completely regenerated in depravity as the white-haired murderer—Red Roddy.

We should also have called the reader's attention to the fact which is perfectly observable at the present day, as we may suppose it to have been at the period of which we write—that when those Irishmen, who live by a mis-appropriation of the goods of others, meet together for the purpose of agitating an excursion in the way of their vocation they do not confine themselves to a solitary outrage, but calculate upon effecting all that may be accomplished within the period to which they limit their absence; insomuch, that robberies, and perhaps murders, sometimes take place on the same night at places so remote from each other, that it would almost appear sufficient to prove a man's identity as a partner in the one, to enable him to enter an alibi on the other offence.

Suil Dhuv and his three companions had more to accomplish on this evening than the reader has already been made aware of, and one, the first act of violence which they proposed committing, was of a peculiar and more startling nature than any in which the Coiner had yet been engaged.

He had accorded an instant and even eager assent when the proposition was first made by one of the gang, Mun Maher, the fellow whose insolence he had checked by so summary a procedure in the hold of the gang. He had then, however, only considered the advantage which was to be derived from it, namely, the acquisition of a sufficient quantity of silver for the purpose of carrying on their illegal toil. Upon the means he had not bestowed a single thought, after he had once satisfied himself of their practicability.

As he rode, however, along the country with his companions, a new train of circumstances conspired to shake him from the indifference in which he had fortified his spirit. The very agitation of the contemplated enterprise in which his personal wishes were chiefly interested, was calculated to prepare the way in his breast for the admission of a gentler tone of feeling than he usually carried about him on such expeditions. The district which they were approaching, and which speedily began to spread its well-cultivated and party-coloured surface before their eyes, was the soil in which his childhood had been passed; and memories of childhood hours—whether those hours have been spent in darkness or light—in showers or sunshine—are the truest key that can be found to draw forth from their rugged prison the yet surviving tenderness of the human heart.

As they wound along the side of a craggy hill, composed of a brittle, culmy soil, Suil Dhuv drew up his horse, as if for the purpose of making some observations, but in reality with the view of indulging himself in a musing contemplation of the quiet evening landscape, which, independently of any associations, presented a picture sufficiently alluring to account for the action, had that been its only motive. Immediately beneath them, on the right, and extending far into the distance, lay a well-nurtured and fertile champion, rich in all the glorious hues of ripening summer—the dark green potato-field; the already russet meadow—the golden rape—the bearded barley, billowing in the light wind and receiving from the reddish sunlight a variety of light and shade, such as that which charmed the bright eyes of the Dublin beauties, when first the master of the chain and filling conjured from his loom, in all its shadowy magnificence and chameleon-like insecurity of hue, the now forlorn and neglected tabinet—these, together with the glitter of cottage windows through the bowing and close mantled hedges of black briar—periwinkle, primrose, hawthorn, and red-blossomed snuff-weed, the virgin meadow-sweet, wild strawberries, wild heart's ease, and dog-roses; the wreathing of the light blue smoke through the humble chimney, which gave an involuntary feeling of comfort to the spectator—the flax garden, with its delicate stems and pale-blue flower—the ridges (drills were then unknown) of early white-eyes, already delighting the eye with their white, purple, and peach-coloured blossoms—all refreshing the organs of smell with a sweetness which (but, perhaps, that was the result of association)—we have vainly sought to mate among the exotics of Kensington—these, I say, presented a beautifully variegated and gigantic tablet, over which many a mountain stream unrolled its sparkling scroll, intersecting the superface at a thousand fantastic angles.

On the other side lay a bog on which many groups of peasantry were observed at work—some footing, or raising the sods of turf on end, for the purpose of drying more rapidly; some cutting the material fresh from the mass with their slanes, others shaping sods from the soft, pulpy soil with their hands, others again tossing the dry turf into a raib, a sort of vehicle fastened in a car (or cart), for the purpose of having it conveyed home, and built up into a snug reek as a provision against the winter—while the driver stood near the horse's head, lazily looking on, his cord-whip tied sash-wise across his shoulder, and whistling “the keen-the-cawn,” in a loud, full, and melodious tone, to the drooping and weary animal, who expressed his pleasure at the attention, by a gentle oscillating motion of the ears, as he mused over a handful of soil plucked from the nearest hedge, a kindness which, in all probability, he appreciated still more highly than the music.

The occasional shrill scream of a nesting snipe, startled from its rushy hiding-place by the too near approach of some hostile footsteps—the merry barking of the curs of the hamlet, as they gambolled; in feigning warfare, in the sunshine—the “thrup, thrup!” of the milk-maid, as with spancel and can in hand, she summoned the cows from their distant pasture, to deposit their evening tribute at the farmer's door—the kindly lowing of the docile animals, as they turned from their fodder, and with matronly and gentle pace, obeyed the well-known voice of the summoner—the occasional snatch of a wild and merry ballad from some pleasantly disposed individual of the laborious group in the bog—the loud though distant peal of laughter that cheered him in his exertions—the shrill and solitary cackling of some forlorn goose, that had lagged, like a micling urchin, behind the flock, and now lost sight of its companions—the droning sound of the little boy's reed cut from the green corn stems, and slit in the manner of a flageolet—the plaintive and monotonous cry of some wren's-man or yellow-hammer, that, compelled to forsake its nest, tainted by the touch of some prying school-boy, mourned its desolation on some lofty thorn—the occasional shrilly shouting of a group of sturdy boys at their game of evening goal or hurl—the sweet murmuring voice of the peasant girls on the side of the distant stream, some washing the skeogh (or boat-basket), full of potatoes for their evening meal, and sometimes, in a merry mood, shaking the crusheen with a gesture of menace at the lads on the other side; others beetling their linen on a smooth stone, and others, again, spreading the already whitened garments upon the yellow and blooming furze bushes—these formed the principal points of sight and of sounds which were scattered over the face of the landscape, while the whole was spanned by a soft blue sky chequered with flakes of white and crimson vapour, and rendered still more lovely by the loaded serenity that was in the air.

Touched by the tender beauty of the scene which lay before him, and still more by the recollections which it awakened within his soul, Suil Dhuv prolonged his pause to a degree which at length excited the impatience of his companions.

“They're not beginnen to light up the fires yit,” said one.

“What fires?” inquired Mun Maher.

“Why, the fires upon the mountains and places, in regard of St. John's Eve. Sure this is the twenty-third—the Eha-na-Shawn. 'Twill be a bad evenen for it, I'm afeerd. Do you see the swallows how low they're skimmen? and, fiach-e-shin!—look there, the dog eating the grass.”

“Come, sir! Suil Dhuv! Don't you hear uz? 'Twill be late with uz, I'm thinken, sir. The chapel is in the glin over, a good start from uz yit.”

“Have you the wrench and hammer?” inquired their leader, in a low tone.

“Safe enough, I'll be bail—Look at thim!”

“It is a fair evening for so foul a deed!” thought Suil Dhuv, but he only thought it, for he was too well aware of the temper of his men to hazard anything like an inclination of distaste for the enterprise they were engaged upon.

“There is no use in tiring all the horses,” he said, as they descended the hill, and approached a cross road. “Mun, you and I will do this first business together, and, my lads, ye may as well stop here for us, or ride round the road and meet us at the Hill o' Drumscanlon.”

Both the men touched their hats in token of assent.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

LIFE AMONGST THE FLAT-HEADS.

MOST noteworthy amongst the Indian tribes of North America, as they exist at the present day, is that distinguished as the "Flat-Heads." About five years since Paul Kane, an American artist of very considerable ability, in a spirit of professional ardour started on an expedition from Canada to Vancouver's Island and Oregon, through the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, and back again. The notes of his wanderings are full of adventure and interest, and afford us a full insight into the manners and customs of the various Indian tribes, or rather remnants of tribes, whom he encountered, and whom the progress of civilization—as the aggressive advance of the white man is termed—has for many and many a year been gradually but surely sweeping from the domains of their forefathers. But a short time longer, and their existence will be but a mere matter of history.

The Flat-Head Indians are met with on the banks of the Columbia river, from its mouth eastward to the Cascades, a distance of about 150 miles; they extend up the Walhamette river's mouth, about thirty or forty miles, and through the district between the Walhamette and Fort Astoria, now called Fort George. To the north they extend along the Cowlitz river, and the tract of land lying between that and Puget's Sound. About two-thirds of Vancouver's Island is also occupied by them, and they are found along the coasts of Puget's Sound and the Straits of Juan de Fuca. They are divided into numerous tribes, each having its own peculiar locality, and differing more or less from the others in language, customs, and manners. Those in the immediate vicinity of the Fort are principally "Chinooks" and "Klickataats," and are governed by a chief called Casanov. This name has no translation; the Indians on the west side of the Rocky Mountains differing from those on the east in having hereditary names, to which no particular meaning appears to be attached, and the origin of which is in many instances forgotten.

The chief of the "Chinooks" and "Klickataats" is a man of advanced age, and resides principally at Fort Vancouver. Previously to the year 1829, Casanov was considered a powerful chief, and could lead into the field a force of one thousand men, but in that year the Hudson's Bay Company and emigrants from the United States introduced the plough for the first time into Oregon; and the locality, hitherto considered one of the most healthy, was almost depopulated by fever and ague. His own immediate family, consisting of ten wives—for the Flat-Heads are no monogamists—four children, and eighteen slaves, were reduced in one year to one wife, one child, and two slaves. Casanov is a man of more than ordinary talent for an Indian, who has maintained his great influence over his tribe chiefly by means of the superstitious dread in which they hold him. For many years, in the early period of his life, he kept a hired assassin to remove any obnoxious individual against whom he entertained personal enmity. This bravo, whose occupation was no secret, went by the name of Casanov's scoocoom, or the "Evil Genius." He finally fell in love with one of Casanov's wives, who eloped with him. Casanov vowed vengeance, but the pair for a long time eluded his search. One day, however, he met his wife in a canoe near the mouth of the Cowlitz river, and shot her on the spot, and at last procured also the assassination of her lover.

A few years before the arrival of our artist at Fort Vancouver, the gentlemen who was then in charge heard from his office the report of a gun inside the gates. This being a breach of discipline, he hurried out to inquire the cause of so unusual a circumstance, and found one of Casanov's slaves standing over the body of an Indian whom he had just killed, and in the act of reloading his gun with apparent indifference, Casanov himself standing by. In explanation of the occurrence the latter said, with an apology, that the man deserved death according to the laws of the tribe, who, as well as the white man, inflicted punishment proportionate to the nature of the offence. In this case the crime was one of the greatest an Indian could be guilty of, namely, the robbing the sepulchre canoes,

Sacred as the Indians hold their burial-places, Casanov himself, a short time after this occurrence, had his only son buried in the cemetery of the fort. He died of consumption, a disease very common amongst all Indians, proceeding, no doubt, from their constant exposure to the sudden vicissitudes of the climate. The coffin was made sufficiently large to contain all the necessaries supposed to be required for his comfort and convenience in the other world. The chaplain at the Fort read the usual service at the grave, and, after the conclusion of the ceremony, Casanov returned to his lodge, and the same evening attempted the life of the bereaved mother, who was the daughter of the great chief generally known as King Comcomly, so beautifully alluded to in Washington Irving's "Astoria."

It is the prevailing opinion of the Indian Chiefs, that they and their sons are too important to die in a natural way, and whenever the event takes place, they attribute it to the malevolent influence of some other person, whom they fix upon, often in the most unaccountable manner, frequently selecting those the most dear to themselves and the deceased. The person so selected is sacrificed without hesitation. On the above occasion Casanov selected the afflicted mother, notwithstanding she had during the sickness of her son been one of the most assiduous and devoted of his attendants, and of his several wives she was the only one he most loved. It is, however, the general belief of the Indians on the west side of the mountains, that the greater the privations they inflict on themselves the greater would be the manifestation of their grief, and the more pleasing to the departed spirit. Casanov assigned as an additional motive for his wish to kill his wife, namely, that as he knew she had been so useful to her son, and so necessary to his happiness and comfort in this world, he wished to send her with him as his companion on his long journey. She, however, escaped into the woods, and next morning reached the Fort imploring protection; she was accordingly secreted for several days, until her relations conveyed her to a place of safety. The following painful occurrence may serve to illustrate this peculiar superstition of the Flat-Heads. A chief dying, his widow considered a sacrifice as indispensable, but having selected a victim of rather too much importance, she was unable for some time to accomplish her object; at length the nephew of the chief, no longer able to bear the continual taunt of cowardice which she unceasingly heaped upon him, seized his gun and started for the Company's Fort on the river, about twenty miles distant. On arriving he was courteously received by the gentleman in charge of the Fort, a Mr. Black, who expressed great regret at the death of his old friend the chief. After presenting the Indian with something to eat, and giving him some tobacco, Mr. Black turned to leave the room, and while opening the door was shot from behind by his treacherous guest, and immediately expired. The murderer succeeded in escaping from the Fort, but the tribe, who were warmly attached to Mr. Black, took revenge upon themselves, and hunted him down. This was done more to evince their high esteem for Mr. Black, than from any sense of impropriety in the customary sacrifice.

The Chinook Flat-Heads do not appear to have any traditions as to their former origin, although such are common amongst those on the east side of the Rocky Mountains. They do not believe in any future state of punishment, although in the world they suppose themselves exposed to the malicious designs of the scoocoom, or "Evil Genius," to whom they attribute all their misfortunes and ill-luck. The "Good Spirit" is called the Hias Socha li Ti-yah, that is, the "Great High Chief," from whom they obtain all that is good in this life, and to whose happy and peaceful hunting grounds they will all eventually go, to reside for ever in comfort and abundance.

The Chinooks and Cowlitz Indians carry the custom of flattening the head to a greater extent than any other of the Flat-Head tribes. The process is as follows:—The Indian mothers all carry their infants strapped to a piece of board covered with moss or loose fibres of cedar bark, and, in order to flatten the head, they place a pad on the infant's forehead, on the top of which is laid a piece of smooth bark, bound on by a leathern band, passing through holes in the board on either side, and kept tightly pressed against the front of the head, a sort of pillow of grass or cedar fibres being placed under the back of the neck to support it. This process commences with the birth of the infant, and is continued for a period of from eight to twelve months, by which time the head has lost its natural shape, and acquired that of a wedge. The front of the skull is flat and higher at the crown, giving it a most unnatural appearance.

It might be supposed, from the extent to which this is carried, that the operation would be attended with great suffering to the infant, but, strange to say, it seldom cries or moans, although frequently the eyes seemingly start out of their sockets from the great pressure. From the apparent dulness of the children, whilst under the pressure, it is to be presumed that a state of torpor or insensibility must be produced, and that the return to consciousness occasioned by its removal, must be naturally followed by the sense of pain. This unnatural operation does not, however, seem to injure the health, the mortality amongst the Flat-Head children not being perceptibly greater than amongst other Indian tribes, nor does it seem to injure their intelligence. On the contrary, the Flat-Heads are generally considered fully as intelligent as the surrounding tribes, who allow their heads to preserve their natural shape, and it is from among the Round Heads that the Flat-Heads take their slaves, looking with contempt even upon the whites for having round heads, the flat head being considered as the distinguishing mark of freedom.

The Chinooks, like all other Indians, pull out the beard at its first appearance. Slavery is carried on to a great extent among them, and, considering how much they have themselves been reduced, they still retain a large number of slaves. These are usually procured from the Chastay tribe, who live near the Umqua, a river south of the Columbia, emptying near the Pacific. They are sometimes seized by war parties, but children are often bought from their own people. They do not flatten the head, nor is a child of one of them (although by a Chinook father) allowed this privilege. Their slavery is of the most abject description. The Chinook men and women treat them with great severity, and exercise the power of life and death at pleasure.

No combination of our alphabet sounds could, by any possibility, convey an idea of the horrible, harsh, spluttering sounds, which, form the language of the Flat-Heads, and proceed from their throats, apparently unguided either by the tongue or lip. It is so difficult to obtain a mastery of their language, that none have been able to attain it, except those who have been born among them. They have, however, by their intercourse with the English and French traders, succeeded in amalgamating, after a fashion, some words of each of these tongues with their own, and forming a sort of patois, barbarous enough, certainly, but still sufficient to enable them to communicate with the traders. Their common salutation is "Clak-hoh-ah-yah," originating, according to some facetious individual, in their having heard in the early days of the free-trade, a gentleman named Clark frequently addressed by his friends, "Clark, how are you!" This salutation is now applied to every white man, their own language affording no appropriate expression. Their language is also peculiar in containing no oaths, or any words conveying gratitude or thanks.

The costume of the men consists of a musk-rat skin robe, the size of our ordinary blanket, thrown over the shoulders, without any moccasins, or leggings. Painting the face is not much practised amongst them, except on extraordinary occasions, such as the death of a relative, some solemn feast, or going on a war-party. The female dress consists of a girdle of cedar-bark round the waist with a dense mass of strings of the same material hanging from it all round, and reaching almost to the knees. This is the sole summer habiliment. They, however, in very severe weather, add the musk-rat blanket. They also make another blanket from the skin of the wild goose, which is here taken in great abundance. The skin is stripped from the bird with the feathers on, and cut in strips, which they twist so as to have the feathers outwards. This makes a feathered cord, and is then netted together, so as to form a blanket, the feathers filling up the meshes, rendering it a light and very warm covering.

The country which the Chinooks inhabit being almost destitute of furs, they have little to trade in with the whites. This, coupled with their laziness, induced by the ease with which they procure fish, which is their chief subsistence, prevents them obtaining ornaments of European manufacture, consequently anything of the kind is seldom seen amongst them. In comparison with some of the tribes on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains, the Chinooks evince very little taste in ornamenting either their persons or their warlike or domestic implements. The only utensils Mr. Kane saw at all creditable to their decorative skill were carved bowls and spoons of horn, and baskets made of roots and grass, woven so closely as to serve all the purposes of a pail, in holding and carrying water. In this they even boil their fish. This is done by immersing the fish in one of the baskets filled with water, into one of which they throw red-hot stones until the fish is cooked; fish are as expeditiously dressed this way as if done in a kettle over a fire. The only vegetables in use among them are the camas and wappatoo. The former is a bulbous root, much resembling the onion in outward appearance, but is more like the potato when cooked, and is very good eating. The wappatoo is somewhat similar, but larger and not so dry and delicate in flavour. They are found in immense quantities in the plains in the vicinity of Fort Vancouver, and in the spring of the year present a most curious and beautiful appearance, the whole surface exhibiting an uninterrupted sheet of bright ultramarine blue, from the innumerable blossoms of these plants. They are cooked by digging a hole in the ground, then putting down a layer of hot stones, covering them with dry grass, on which the roots are placed; they are then covered with a layer of grass, and on the top of this they place earth, with a small hole perforated through the earth and grass down to the vegetables. Into this the water is poured, which, reaching the hot stones, forms sufficient steam to completely cook the roots in a short time, the hole being immediately stopped up on the introduction of the water. They often adopt the same ingenious process for cooking their fish and game.

During the season the Chinooks are engaged in gathering camas and fishing, they live in lodges constructed by means of a few poles covered with mats made of rushes, which can be easily moved from place to place; but in the villages they build permanent huts of split cedar boards. Having selected a dry place for the hut, a hole is dug about three feet deep, and about twenty feet square. Round the sides square cedar boards are sunk and fastened together with cords and twisted roots, rising about four feet above the outer level; two posts are sunk at the middle of each end with a crotch at the top, on which the ridge pole is raised, and boards are laid from thence to the top of the upright boards fastened in the same manner. Round the interior are erected sleeping-places, one above another, something like the berths in a vessel, but larger. In the centre of this lodge the fire is made, and the smoke escapes through a hole left in the roof for that purpose. The fire is obtained by means of a small, flat piece of dry cedar, in which a small hollow is cut, with a channel for the ignited charcoal to run over; this piece the Indian sits on to hold it steady, while he rapidly twirls a round stick of the same wood between the palms of his hands, with the point pressed into the hollow of the flat piece. In a very short time sparks begin to fall through the channel upon finely frayed cedar bark placed underneath, which they soon ignite. There is a great deal of knack in doing this, but those who are used to it will light a fire in a very short time.

The only native warlike instruments amongst the Indians are bows and arrows; these they use with great precision. Their canoes are hollowed out of the cedar by fire, and smoothed off with stone axes. Some of these are very large, as the cedar grows to an enormous size in this neighbourhood. They are made extremely light, and, from their formation, are capable of withstanding very heavy seas.

The principal amusement of the Chinooks is gambling, which is carried to great excess amongst them. You never visit their camp but you hear the eternal gambling song of "He-hah-ha," accompanied by the beating of small sticks on some hollow substance. Their games are few. The one most generally played amongst them consists in holding in each hand a small stick, the thickness of a goose-quill, and about an inch and a half in length, one plain, and the other distinguished by a little thread wound round it, the opposite party being required to guess in which hand the marked stick is. A Chinook will play at this simple game for days and nights together, until he has gambled away every thing he possesses, even to his wife. They also take great delight in a game with a ball, which is played by them in the same manner as the Cree, Chippewa, and Sioux Indians. Two poles are erected about a mile apart, and the company is divided into two bands, armed with sticks, having a small hoop or ring at the end, with which the ball is picked up and thrown to a great distance; each party then strives to get the ball past their own goal. There are sometimes a hundred on each side, and the play is kept up with great noise and excitement. At this game they bet heavily, as it is generally played between villages or tribes. They have tolerably good horses, and are fond of racing, at which they also bet considerably. They are expert jockeys, and ride fearlessly.

Such are a few of the more striking features in the life of the Flat-Head Indians of Vancouver's Island, a locality which the discovery that its soil was a veritable treasury of auriferous deposits, has brought thither a vast mining population. Every material for civilization is now there but one—the scarcity of the fair sex. The miners have already expressed their eagerness to pay handsomely for them, and we would not be surprised to shortly hear of some enterprising speculator undertaking a venture with a cargo of the required matrimonial commodity. As it is, British Columbia has at present a white population of nearly 100,000, and affords many inducements to intending emigrants. The soil, both of the island and mainland, is rich and fertile; the climate is said to be superior to that of countries in the same latitude, (between the fifty-fifth and sixtieth parallels,) on the other side of the Rocky Mountains; its fisheries are most valuable; vast tracks of pasture land exist, available for breeding cattle on any scale; its timber is the finest in the world; coal is supposed to abound, and its mineral treasures, exclusive of gold, are undoubtedly very large. In many years to come, capital and muscle will find plenty of occupation in this new market of the Pacific.

FROM THE WINDOW.

REACH over reach of slated roof,
Moss-encrusted and broken tile,
A grey bell swinging from hour to hour,
Potted chimney-stacks, pile on pile;
Mighty splendours of faded brick,
Dripping eave stones, with blotch and flaw,
And gables rotten with yellow smoke,
Out from the window sill I saw.

Sometimes, 'twixt noon and three o'clock,
The sun would shine on the bricks and tiles,
Fill the old rooms and shattered panes
With dusty glories and wrinkled smiles;
Touch the belfry and, sliding down,
Slantwards fall on the slated flats,
Where, in the hush of the twilight time,
Fluttered the owls and wheeled the bats.

High up, high up! In the street below,
The children's chatters at night would rise.
Or the oysterman, with pipe in mouth,
Howl of his fish to the vacant skies.
Cocks that never had twacked a spear
Of wholesome grass in the country green
Would crow—such crows!—about twelve o' night,
Telling the people 'twas all serene.

Looking down thro' the patchy glass
Of our frowzy neighbours over the way,
At times we saw them deject and sad,
And sometimes boisterously gay.
They rose about noon, broke bread at four,
Dined, lord knows when, or where, or how,
Perhaps they lived on a meal a day—
This is conjecture, anyhow.

By Jove supreme, I had nigh forgot
The vagrant sparrows upon the eaves,
Sooty scoundrels that rose with the sun,
And got to bed with the folding leaves;
Afront, around the window sill,
They wheeled and whistled, the while there beat
Runging anvils and fluffly drums,
Underneath in the drowsy street.

MAN.—Man is a glorious poem; each life a canto, each day a line. The melody plays feebly at first upon the trembling chords of his little heart, but with time gains power and beauty as it sweeps onward, until at last the final notes die away far above the world, amidst the melodies of Heaven.

GLENDALOUGH.

THE valley of Glendalough, commonly called the Seven Churches, is situated in the barony of Balinacor, twenty-two Irish miles from Dublin. It is very spacious, being between one and two thousand yards in breadth, and about two miles and a half in extent, having lofty and precipitous mountains hanging over it upon every side, except on that by which it is entered between Derrybawn on the south, and Broccagh mountain on the north.

The visitor passes up the valley, through which a stream winds, for about half a mile, and ascending an eminence in the road, sees before him, at a quarter of a mile distance, the site of the Bishopric and Abbey of Glendalough. Nothing can be more grand and interesting than this view—interesting from the association of ideas connected with these ruins—interesting from the wild and sublime character of the scenery around. The principal ruins stand on a green eminence that slopes down gradually from the breast of a mountain ridge, separating two deep glens, and terminating in a rich verdant swell just above the churches; the vale to the left is that of Glendalough, that is, the glen of the two lakes; that to the right neither so extensive nor so deep, nor surrounded with such precipitous mountains, contains some rich lead mines, which are now in full work; at the foot of the eminence on which the ruins stand, the streams, flowing from the glens to the left and right, unite and form the river, which running down by Lara, falls into the Ovoca.

The ruins of Glendalough are more interesting from their grouping and position than from any grandeur in their separate parts. Here is a lofty and perfect round tower, and also one of the old stone-roofed buildings, similar to that on the Rock of Cashel and at St. Douglough's, near Dublin, which is called Kevin's kitchen. From the round tower there is a full view up the two glens and down the valley towards Lara. The churchyard surrounding these buildings was entered by an old ivied Saxon arch, which now only kept from falling by the ivy that surrounds it. The extraordinary position of these buildings, in the midst of the lonely mountains, placed at the entrance of a glen singularly deep and secluded, with its two dark lakes winding far in gloom and solitariness, and over which deep vale hang mountains of the most abrupt forms, in whose every fissure, linn, and gorge, there is a wild and romantic clothing of oak, and birch, and holly, is peculiarly interesting. On the southern side of the vale are the hills of Derrybawn and Lugduff, in the latter of which is St. Kevin's bed, a natural excavation in front of a perpendicular rock, thirty feet above the surface of the lake.

The Late Rev. Caesar Otway thus described his visit to it; and as more than one of the names which he mentions as having been recorded upon its sides have, since his time, been obliterated, we give the author's own words: "By this time we had rowed under St. Kevin's Bed, and landing adjoining to it, ascended an inland stratum of rock to a sort of ledge or resting-place, from whence I and some others prepared to enter the Bed. Here the guides make much ado about proposing their assistance; but to any one who has common sense and enterprise, there is no serious difficulty; for by the aid of certain holes in the rock, and points which you can easily grasp, you can turn into this little artificial cave, which, in fact, is not bigger than a small baker's oven. I, and two young men who followed me, found it a very tight fit when crouched together in it. At the further end there is a sort of pillow and peculiar excavation made for the saint's head, and the whole of the interior is tattooed with the initials of such as have ventured to come in. Amongst many I could observe those of Sir Walter Scott, Lord Combermere, etc., and we were shown the engravings of certain blue-stocking dames—as, for instance, Lady Morgan, who had made it her temporary 'boudoir.' The names of Thomas Moore, Maria Edgeworth, and of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, also occur. We were informed that not long ago an adventurous Scotch earl chose to spend the night in this singular bed with his son, a young child, and that his lordship did not get a wink of sleep, being kept awake, not by the interference of any visiter from the other world, not by the hardness of his couch, nor the breaking of the waves immediately below, but by the snoring of his over-tired companion."

The city, proper, of Glendalough was anciently surrounded by an immense wall or casbel, the chief gateway of which, until lately, remained perfect. It consisted of an outer and inner archway, truly Roman in character, and which in any other country would have been carefully preserved. The great archway for many years was in a tottering condition, and it was easy to see it must come down.

St. Kevin's Kitchen is now the most perfect of the Seven Churches. It is roofed with stone, and has a steeple at one end, a perfect miniature of the round towers. It was lighted by one window, the architrave of which was of freestone, richly sculptured, but want of good feeling and of good taste permitted this enriched moulding summit. The roof of the church, which is still perfect, and very curious, is comprised of thin stones or flags, neatly laid, and with a very high pitch; the ridge of the roof is thirty feet, while that of the double building at the east end is only twenty.

Beneath the dark, frowning cliff of Lugduff, on a little patch of arable land, almost inaccessible, except by water, are the ruins of a church, called Teampull-na-Skellig—i.e. the Temple of the Desert or Rock; it is also called the Priory of the Rock, and St. Kevin's cell. Here the saint used to seclude himself, and spend his time in penitence and prayer.

The most eastern church, perhaps the most important, and which is nearest to the entrance to the vale, is generally called the Abbey, and was dedicated, like the cathedral, to St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Kevin's well lies near the pathway leading from the Rhefart church to the Abbey. The Abbey appears to have been the most masterly specimen of architecture amongst this ex-to be carried away and triturated into powder for domestic purposes. The interior measures twenty-two feet nine inches in length by fifteen in breadth; its height is twenty feet, and the thickness of the walls three feet six inches. At the eastern end, an arch, the chord of which measures five feet three inches, opens a communication with a smaller chapel, ten feet six inches in length by nine feet three inches in width, having also a small eastern window. The several lower courses of the walls are of a coarse mountain granite; their thickness is three feet, and height about twelve; the door is six feet eight inches high, two feet four inches at the top, and four inches wider at the bottom, the stones running the entire thickness of the wall.

The belfry, which rises from the west end of the church, is a round tower, about fifty feet in height; it is accessible by a small aperture in the ceiling, over which, between the cove and the roof is a large dark void; it was lighted by a small loop-hole near the tensive collection of ecclesiastical remains. It originally consisted of two buildings parallel to each other, and of curious and beautiful workmanship; the eastern window was ornamented with rich sculpture. Several of the carved stones were removed and used as key-stones for the arches of the bridge at Derrybawn, but some very curious devices are still to be seen; on one is an engraved wolf, with his tail in his mouth, the whole figure within a triangle. The wolf was an old inhabitant of Glendalough, and not totally extirpated until 1710; the triangle may have some reference to the Trinity. On another stone two ravens are represented pecking at a skull, a mere emblem of mortality. Runic knots may be discovered on several stones; on one is seen a wolf, the tail of which is entwined in the hair of a man's head; and on others wolves, or rather wild beasts in general, are represented devouring human heads, all simple emblems of mortality. These specimens are quite unique in Ireland.

LOUGH BRAY.

It is beyond a question, that there is no city in the British empire exhibiting around it such a variety of picturesque beauties as Dublin. We have the villa-studded, pastoral plain—the spacious bay, with all its variety of coast, from the sandy beach to the bluff sea-promontory—the richly-wooded valley with its limped river—the lonely mountain glen with its cataracts and tiny trout-streams—the purple heath and the solitary tarn, or pool—the rural village and the gay watering-place; while in addition to all these, the interest imparted to natural scenery, by remains of ancient times, is everywhere present. In short, there is no class of scenery which the poet, the painter, the geologist, the botanist, or the mere man of pleasure, could desire, that may not be reached in a drive of an hour or two from any part of the city. Nature has showered on us, with a generous hand, her various riches—the riches derived from her and our Creator.

Lough Bray is situated near the head of the beautiful vale called Glencree, in the county of Wicklow, into which it sends a stream, which, subsequently uniting with the Glenisloireane river, is called the Dargle and Bray river, and falls into the sea to the north of Bray Head. Though the name is generally used in the singular number, Lough Bray properly consists of two lakes, called Upper and Lower; but the lower is the principal one, both in point of beauty and grandeur of scenery, as well as in extent of surface, its area occupying a space of thirty-seven acres. It is nearly surrounded by mountain precipices, in which eagles are wont to build, and has very much the character of the crater of an extinct volcano.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XVII.

Y DEAR MISS ASHBY—I am afraid that before you have read much of this letter you will be surprised—perhaps offended—by its audacity. I have been at a loss for words all day. I have made a beginning again and again; not that I might write a fine letter, full of what the world calls eloquence, but that I might reach something like a fair expression of that which I feel, and which will permit me no rest, until I have communicated it to you. These are not days when even friends indulge in long letters. We seldom take the trouble to write merely what we feel to our dearest relatives. We communicate facts, our incidents of travel, our good fortune or misfortune. But the interchange of emotions, the exchange of ideas, the communication of sentiments—all this is put aside as the cloudland of Germany. The usages of the world interpose when our human soul would speak frankly and fully to another. I confess that I have been so much in the world, and have become well accustomed to the harness of it; and feel wild and awkward when I endeavour to throw it off. I have been taught to run in this harness. My life has been spent in the society that looks upon its own customs as so many laws, which may not be broken without bringing condign punishment on the culprit. I have been often tempted to withdraw myself from this artificial world of mine. It has satisfied neither my heart nor my understanding. But I have remained weak. 'Firm resolve' has never taken the van with me. I am confessing, I fear, that which will tempt you to despise me.

"I began by saying that I feared you would condemn this letter for its audacity, perhaps, for its prolixity also, before you had read half of it. I cannot forbear. I must even dare your enmity, in my anxiety to place myself in a true light before you. I am not possessed by any phantom of yesterday. I am not inspired with a boy's romance, a romance natural to boyhood, but which has no deep seat in the heart. All this may surprise you; I can only hope that it will not. If I could satisfy myself that your feeling would be one of astonishment on reading this letter, I should tear it up, and you would never see it. The mortification and pain would be great, but I should save myself the pang of being ridiculous in your sight. I know that you are incapable of giving a cruel reply to a genuine expression of feeling; but you may be unconscious that the feeling exists, and, in your candour, you may write that which would hurt more than any deliberate cruelty. I tremble as I write. Over these last few words I have hesitated, walking up and down my room, thinking of every moment I have passed in your society; calling to mind every tone of your voice, every expression of your face. Your few letters lie before me. I have tortured their meaning. I have endeavoured to place myself in the position of a third person, asking this imaginary third person how he would interpret them. This has not helped me, it has rather added to my difficulty. Yours are letters that one person little interested in another might write. For a moment they inclined me to set myself down as a vain and presumptuous coxcomb, and not to offend you with what I had written. But I have again yielded to the insurmountable inclination that is in me, and I continue. I am, perhaps, wrong in making this full confession, since, as I have said, my weakness may lead you to despise me. Let the blow come whence it may—from your contempt or indifference—I must endure it. No sentence can be so severe as this suspense is.

"It is with the humblest spirit, I assure you, that I set my unworthy life before you. It has been a life of unredeemed promises. I have wasted whole years. I have set myself many tasks. I have not completed one. To you only, among your sex, would I make this humiliating and dangerous confession. Again, you see, I tempt you to despise me. I should not put myself in this perilous position if my faith in your generosity and charity were not without limit. I may fall a martyr to my faith, but I shall always rejoice in the recollection of the days when I held it. Our conversation has left an indelible impression on my heart. The hopes I gathered from the kindness with which you listened to me have given me new life. I have wasted years. I am now resolved not to waste another day; since the whole energy of my mind and body shall be devoted to the delightful task of making me worthy of your regard. I fear that I should best consult the dearest interests of my life by waiting and working in silence, until I could show some good object achieved—some way made in the world. But it is my delight to put unbounded trust in your charity. Waif as I am, I dare believe that one who has passed a life, good, and useful, and Christian as your's has been, may, in her infinite kindness, regard me with more feeling than is given to an ordinary guest. May I know that you do not rank me with the herd? If there be truth in the gentle intonations of a woman's voice, if there be a language in her eyes, I am certain that I did not misinterpret you during our walk. I am writing pages where a few words might suffice. It is a sweet circumlocution, and I trust it will not prove too tedious in the reading. I should like to convince you that there is a basis of earnestness and good resolve in me, worth cultivating. Your example would be a beacon-light for ever warning me that I must be up and doing. It is a courageous and devout soul like your's that has been wanting in my existence. I am prone to fall in with the habits and to accept the opinions of people about me—a dangerous weakness, that should urge him who possesses it to consort with the noble and the good. Such a creature cannot be too fastidious. Thrice happy shall I be if you, in your mercy, will let me turn to you as my example, my monitor, and my friend, that, in some day to come that shall not be so far hence, I may, elevated by your friendship and your kindness, ask for a nearer and dearer place in your pure and holy heart.

"I wonder whether you have read thus far? I am certain that you have.

"Yes, I know you have since you have felt that there was sincerity in my words. You see that I do not write a conventional letter to you. I write the truth that is in me without a thought of the world. I ask you to permit me to approach you; that I may be improved by the proximity; and that I may have opportunities of discovering to you the better qualities of my nature. I value you too highly to ask your love: I only ask you that you will permit me to learn how to deserve it some day. Some women are too won by compliments. Had I the temerity to pay you any, I knew that you would despise them, and me for paying them. I am reputed the slave of the forms of society; and I confess that I have a taste for social refinements, rather than for the bluntness and coarseness which often give a man a reputation for philosophy or deep thought, while they are only the natural expressions of an uncultivated mind. There are deeper and holier feelings than those which manifest themselves in drawing-rooms, or in the ordinary meetings of men, and these I hold to be beyond the reach or scope of conventional laws. Every heart that is true, should speak that which is in it without reserve: flowers may run wild upon the hedge-rows, but they will never offend the eye. I have often thought that a conventional love-letter was like the barbarism we see sometimes in gardening, trees cut into coves, or carved in the form of chessman. Art, not Nature, is apt to offend. Mine is the hope "that soverth from the dust:" and I must express it as it rises, freely and without reserve.

"I might enlarge on my worldly prospects. I know, however, that these, were they brilliant, would not commend me to your regard. It happens that they are very modest; and that any hope of holding a fair place in the world is based entirely on my resolve to be of some account, by my own exertions in it. This resolve you may strengthen until it shall become invincible; or you may destroy it. Should you elect to disregard it, I could not blame you, since what claim can I make on your sensibility? I ask everything, and can give nothing, save always promises for the future.

"I have wandered over this paper, impelled by the thoughts that have bubbled up one upon another; and now find that I have not expressed one half the meanings I intended to convey, when I set out. But I hope that I have conveyed some impressions that will lead you to think of me with kindness, and open for me the vestibule to your heart. I tremble like the neophyte who passes the threshold of the temple, craving permission to enter. I desire the smile that shall give me courage to ask admission, and to do the good works that shall assure the assent to my request. I am abashed by your goodness, and my soul is filled with the worship of it. The contemplation of you carries me out of this hackneyed world in which I live; and I feel as though I had travelled, by magic agency, to some land of great delight, where innocence, and beauty, and worship, kept an even holiday for the heart. Will you destroy this dream? Will you cast me back upon myself, and take from me this, the first strong incentive I have felt that is powerful enough to correct the follies of my nature, and endow me with a perseverance that shall accomplish a happy and successful career for me. Your image before me, my best friend, and gentlest, and holiest counselor, I shall labour to be worthy of its presence. Men have need of such elevating pictures. Did not the money-lender, when about to indulge in scandalous usury, turn the picture of his favourite saint to the wall? May I not plead in vain for an inspiring image that shall look down upon all my actions, and by the holy light of her eyes guide them aright? My dear Miss Ashby, your devoted friend,

"HENRY FAVERSHAM."

When the postman pulled the bell at Jamaica Lodge, and dropped the above fine letter from Mr. Henry Faversham in the box at the gate; and when "the hope of the family"—in other words the greatest nuisance in it—withdrawed the letter from the box, and flourished it round Miss Ashby's head; and when Miss Ashby, having looked at the envelope, quietly put it into her pocket, as something that would keep, the writer thereof was wandering about Hampstead Heath, watching the sun set over the broad and varied landscape. School-boys were frolicking in the gravel-pits, nurses were chattering as they walked, and holiday-makers were enjoying peace-worth of most uneasy locomotion upon the backs of asses. Faversham sought the most retired spot, as far as possible removed from the interruptions of nursery-raids and donkey-boys, where he might lie and ponder the situation in which he had placed himself. As he picked the pebbles at his elbow and cast them wistfully at the flowering furze, his hopes and fears tormented him. "Clifton is right," said he, "when in a state of doubt—walk."

But Faversham was a very poor pedestrian, who feared dusty boots and a limp collar. So he lay upon the grass tormenting himself. Espied by a gipsy from afar, he was soon asked whether he would give her a little sixpence to have his fortune told. By way of inducement, the old crone told him he had a wicked eye, and that he was destined to make great havoc with them among the ladies. Faversham smiled, and the gipsy, emboldened, approached him. Gipsies know how to please. Why men should be pleased, and women also, when told that they have wicked eyes, is a question that might lead us far. Innocent little girls accosted at pic-nics with this compliment giggle, and are mightily rejoiced. It suited Faversham's mood to banter about fortune. "Come, good gentleman, a bit of silver to cross my hand. You are destined to see many things. You will have a little trouble, but many years of happiness. You will cross the seas. There are two ladies who are interested in you, a fair lady and a dark lady. A large sum of money will be left to you unexpectedly."

"The old story," said Mr. Faversham.

"Let me iron your hand with a little bit of silver; there's a sweet gentleman. The lady you love will be very happy."

Mr. Faversham gave the woman a shilling, and held out his hand. The gipsy was examining it with her hypocritical attention, and was repeating the jargon with which she had dated a nurse-maid not half an hour ago, when the pair were startled by a loud burst of laughter. Faversham turned round and met Clifton.

"Well, what says Fortune to you, Faversham?"

Faversham was confused, and dismissed the gipsy, with a shrug.

"How came you here?"

Clifton had heard from Ashby that Faversham had gone for a walk to Hampstead, and, wanting a stretch himself, had followed. "I hope I am not in the way?" Clifton was in his pleasantest mood, and declared that he would see what the old harridan could do for him.

"How many lies for a shilling?" he asked. The old woman laughed—so well she might, and protested that she told only the truth. She informed her second customer that he was very unhappy about a certain lady. He was fickle in his love, and would not yet marry the lady who would marry him. This fortunate one was beyond the seas. She was a widow, but was still very young, and would bring him plenty of money.

Mr. Clifton concluded his interview with the seer by telling her, that if he did his duty, he should hand her over to the police.

"No, sweet gentleman, you couldn't be so cruel." The old woman put on her most engaging smile, dropped her knees, and hobbled away.

"This is all very wrong," quoth Mr. Clifton. "These are the women to get into areas, and rob houses, or make servants rob their mistresses."

"And make the mistresses play false to their husbands."

"It's wonderful how educated women believe in them. A guess made by a harridan, to some woman who is sensible enough on most points, comes true, she predicts an approaching misfortune, and a death happens. From that time forward the foolish woman is a fast believer in fortune-telling. Hundreds of people who have met such an easy coincidence, inoculate their friends with the silly faith, and so the harm spreads. An ignorant person, once in the clutches of a woman like that, might be led into a crime."

It was Mr. Clifton's habit to argue on any incident of his life.

"After all, Zadkiel is only a gipsy in a printing office," said Mr. Faversham. "A fellow who reads the stars for halfpence!"

This conversation carried on, along the pretty lane between Hampstead and Highgate, was a relief to Mr. Faversham's mind.

"How goes the book?" Mr. Clifton asked. Not an hour had elapsed since Jack Ashby had informed him that the quires of paper at Faversham's chambers were almost as clean as when they lay in the stationer's drawers.

"Don't ask. The beginning puzzles me. I'm afraid there's not so much in the subject as I thought there was."

"Ah, my boy, take my advice, and stick to your profession. What's to come out of a novel? You amuse the drawing-room, and are slyly read in the nursery. The master of the house frowns at your three volumes, and wonders how his wife can allow such trash to come into the house. In serious neighbourhoods, your favourite Peckham, for instance, you are voted a trifler, if not a fool. What do you think Jack's serious sister would say if he took her the three volumes, fresh from Great Marlborough-street?"

Faversham coloured. How could Clifton tell that he was hitting the nail full on the head?

"Look at the novelists!" Faversham protested. "Take a Bulwer, Disraeli, Scott, Lever, Warren; they have not done so badly. Government has smiled on them all. Theodore Hook had his brilliant chance, and it was his own fault that it was of no use to him."

"Your old mistake. These are exceptions, and I maintain that a novel is a very bad stepping-stone. If you are to be a barrister, you must study law. You want to escape the hard fight by a brilliant flank movement. I don't say that you'll not succeed, but it's too risky for me."

These were not palatable reflections to Faversham. He walked silently along, and was glad to bring his journey to a close. The reference to Jack's serious sister was a thorn that pricked in Faversham's side; and when he returned to his chambers he was so disgusted with himself that he tore the page upon which part I. chapter I. was written into twenty pieces.

FANCIES.

BLOW wind from the misty pastures,
That spread to the quiet skies,
Flocked with a hundred shadows,
Bordered by foggy meadows,
Stretched to the vast horizon
Where the mournful daylight dies.

I hear the wail of the brooklets—
Wandering brooks that run,
Where the marigold of the marshes,
And the stems of the phantom larches,
Beckon, like hands of darkness,
Farewells to the sinking sun.

Blow wind and bring me the quiet,
That breathes from a darkening west;
There's peace in an ended story,
Though grief may swallow its glory,
For the tongue of the teller is silenced,
And the wearied listeners rest.

CYSMOLOGY AND METEOROLOGY.

ONE of the arts upon which the ancients prided themselves was that of being able to foretell the coming of earthquakes, storms, inundations, and famines, and in such high reverence was the power held that its possession was alone to be found amongst the sacerdotal class, with some few exceptions. The studies on physical and natural history, which this class pursued incessantly, and in which they exercised their adepts, and chiefly the more intelligent of them, leave no doubt that they were the most learned body of men in ancient society. In this way it may be understood that they might from observation and rule have arrived at a considerable knowledge of those events, and the order which ruled them. The history of the Brahmins, the Magi, the Diviners, and Philosophers, is fruitful of those kinds of prognostics which were realized in the majority of cases. Thus Pherecydes, the first preceptor of the celebrated Pythagoras, after having examined attentively the water of a well, and having tasted it, told the Samians that the day should not pass without their experience of a cysm, or earthquake. On that evening many shocks were clearly perceived, and on many points of the island the earth opened and vomited forth sulphurous vapours.

At Lacædemonia, the philosopher Anaximander predicted an earthquake which should occasion the fall of a quantity of the rocks of Mount Taygetus. This prediction was based on the hoarse and formidable sound which preceded, by some hours always, the violent shocks and eruption of a crater. Those men who have wished to draw power from all natural circumstances, to terrify their species, have said that it was the voice of the divinity of the place who was incensed, and consequently they built temples upon the spot.

It is recorded that at Bologna, in the year 1695, the water of the wells and fountains was disturbed and became lukewarm precisely on the eve of an earthquake. The same phenomenon took place in Sicily, in February, 1818, in like manner, on the evening before a terrible eruption of Etna. Some similar phenomena have given occasion to many learned men, of a past age, to fix the day and even the hour of many earthquakes. M. Cadet, of Metz, announced publicly, five days before, the terrible earthquake which ravaged Calabria. In 1828, a French savan predicted, with equal fidelity, a fortnight in advance, the frightful convulsion of the earth which destroyed Lima, and spread its ravages as far as Martinique.

More easily accessible for study even than this, since they manifest themselves more frequently, are those meteorological phenomena, which were at all times a fruitful source, from whence Thaumaturgy sprung. Zoroaster, and the principal chiefs of the sacerdotal class of antiquity, cultivated with more or less success this important branch of science, and rendered it available, in order to give to the peoples a high idea of their mission. However, amongst all the heathen people who aspired to teach in the times of antiquity, we must say, to the praise of the Greeks, that their philosophers rejected those naughty pretensions, and used their meteorological knowledge only in a most laudable purpose. They seem to have made it available for the enlightening of the masses, and for learning every individual, gifted with reason, that all in creation follows a fixed and certain order, and that it is not given to any to have the power to alter the course of things. Thales, Pythagoras, Democritus, and many other great thinkers of those ages, announced to their compatriots, with the disinterestedness which characterises true philosophy, that it was necessary to fortify themselves against a year of famine always, and to prepare their caves and their granaries in order to receive an abundant supply.

It is in this way we notice the great difference which existed between the priesthood of heathendom and the philosophers; the former turned science to their personal profits, whilst the latter applied it to the instruction and happiness of the people.

The art of meteorological foresight runs naturally from the study of celestial phenomena; thus, that of which we speak, pursued with perseverance give a great importance and a certain precision to the meteorological art. The diviners, augurs, haruspices, and philosophers, often prognosticated truly from the inspection of the heavens. Empedocles, after his initiation in the mysteries, was taught secretly the means of trammelling the winds, of exciting or allaying tempests. The Druidesses of the British Isles claimed the power of unloosing hurricanes, and of being capable of re-establishing calm on the agitated sea. The Egyptian priests were very skilful in foreseeing events of this kind, the mariners coming to consult them before departing for the sea. Thales, who derived his knowledge from the Egyptians, composed a short treatise on the signs announcing atmospheric variations. Thus, for example, the appearance of a small, white cloud on the horizon, when the heavens are clear, announces a shower preceding a gale of wind. The traveller Brard, who sojourned a long time in Egypt, affirms, from his personal observations, that this prognostic is almost infallible. At the Cape of Good Hope, hurricanes are equally preceded by a little cloud in the horizon, which the sailors have called a bull's eye. It is likewise on the coast of Guinea, small, dusky clouds scattered over the sky like stains announce a tempest which shall burst ere a long time elapses from their appearance. Great sultriness and great frosts, storms and calms, have equally their signal precursors. Dioscorides predicted rain for the next day whenever he beheld on the evening firmament a dark cloud forming a curtain on the horizon. He was never deceived. He predicted also a storm, more or less violent, when amid great heats the sky was rayed with luminous bands. The historian Pausanias states that he saw some of the adepts of the Pagan temples turn away an enormous hail-storm which would very probably have ravaged the country upon which it should burst. Their mode of proceeding was, he states, to raise towards the clouds great poles ornamented with phylacteries. The same process against hail was put in practice anew in the seventeenth century. The physician Bertholon proposing hail stops somewhat like those of the ancients. Indeed, it is not many years since a memoir on hailstops was read in the most scientific assembly in Europe, the Institute of France; and a most interesting account upon this subject is to be found in the Transactions of that body.

There existed of old, just as there exists to-day, a popular species of meteorology practised by country folk. This meteorology, the fruit of many years of experience, rarely deceives the observing peasant. The story of Sir Isaac Newton and the herd-boy is one of the reminiscences of this fact. It can, of course, occur that the prediction of a peasant may not be strictly exact—that, in place of rain it might blow a gale of wind, and vice versa; but some change is certain. A great savan tells us that once being travelling along a country-road he met a labourer, who remarked to him that the sky, which was then of a pale blue flecked over with minute white clouds, which were stationary and presented an irregular and torn appearance, prognosticated a great storm, either in the evening of that or on the day following at furthest. On that evening his prediction was verified, and continued three days. The writer who tells this incident relates that he knew many of the peasantry who could foresee, by means of this weather lore, dry or damp seasons, thunder storms, frosts, and all the general variations of the atmosphere. This faculty arises from a spirit of observation and from its tried experience.

In the ancient times this knowledge of atmospheric and terrestrial changes was regarded as the gift of the gods, and those who possessed it took to themselves the credit of this belief, in order to gain honours and profit. Now, we can understand, in the spread of a better knowledge, and under the influence of a religion which aids and serves that spread by its wise revelations, that out over all creation there are visible signs and symbols by which the processes of nature are interpreted to us, if we only read them aright, and seek the profit which Providence has designed for us, when the great volume of his Handiwork was spread first before the wondering eyes of man.

THE POT OF MIGNONETTE.

HE asked for flowers, and we were poor,
She babbled of familiar nooks,
Of chesnut shadows, country brooks,
What time there surged apart our door
The storms of Dublin, vast and black.
Her mother wept, and shunned replying,
And I was dumb from grief, for she,
Our love, our only one, was dying.

She raised her fingers, white and wan,
And beckoned me beside her bed,
Thrice kissed my brows and faintly said:
"Dear heart, have all the daisies gone?"
"Poor love, they'd die amid the smoke,
And miserable Dublin shadows;
Where, in this wilderness of brick,
Would one find daisy-beds or meadows?"

But, from the window sill, I brought
A red-hued pot of Mignonette,
Which in the spring her hands had set
Upon the stone. Her dim eyes caught
The holy flowers which matted lay
Within the rim—a fragrant sadness;
She placed her thin hand mid the leaves,
And, dying, almost wept with gladness.

And, in my dreams at night, I saw
Our Ellen sitting in the skies,
Amid the angels, whose great eyes
Looked upwards in exceeding awe.
A bunch of shining Mignonette
Was folded in her saintly bosom;
The heavens themselves distilled the breath
Of Mignonette in leaf and blossom.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

V.—ROSCOMMON ABBEY AND CASTLE.

PERHAPS, in all Ireland, there is not a town so inconsiderable in itself, and yet possessing two such remarkable mementos of its former greatness, as Roscommon, the assize town of the county of the same name. On one side, towards the north, stretch the ruins of its magnificent castle; and, on the southern side, in the midst of rich green meadows, and embowered in large old ash trees, stand all that remains of the once beautiful abbey, founded here in the year 1257, by King Phelim, for ecclesiastics, with the tomb of its royal but ill-fated founder still to be seen on the right of the high altar; he died 1265. On comparing the above sketch with that taken by Grose, and published in his 'Antiquities,' it will be found that since his time much of the walls have crumbled away, though it must be confessed that the trees which have risen in the interim fully compensate the old building for whatever it may have lost otherwise. There are no remains of a southern transept visible, and the window in the north, which, in Grose's time, retained a good deal of its tracery, is now quite denuded of that ornament; in the great east window, however, enough remains to show that at one time the finishing must have been beautiful; the Gothic mullions of this window, as seen from the inside, present a strikingly handsome appearance, standing out in bold grey relief from the deep close background of ivy, with which the whole outside of that gable is richly and exuberantly clothed. The choir seems to have been lit also by a number of tall narrow windows, some of which are still visible under the coat of ivy.

Of the castle, of which the following is an illustration, there is nothing standing but a part of the outer shell, no portion remaining roofed except one of the round towers, that to the left of the view, in which there is still a spacious oval apartment, the height of the structure, and vaulted over head, said to have been a council chamber. At the earliest periods a castle stood on this site, which, being in ruins, in the year 1268, was then rebuilt, in its present shape, by John D'Ufford, Justiciary of Ireland. The walls surrounded a spacious area, now converted into a paddock, and were immensely thick, as may be seen from some massive fragments which lie scattered around. A large Norman tower stood at each angle, but the one alluded to is the only one in the building in anything like preservation. Tradition says that this once splendid structure was not utterly ruined until the period of the wars between James and William.

GOLD AND SILVER.

OLD seems to have been employed by the monarchs of antiquity in much greater quantity than any of the modern nations have been accustomed to. It appears that Solomon received twenty seven tons of gold in one year, and the same authority informs us that "all King Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold; and all the vessels of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold, none were of silver; and it was accounted as nothing in the days of Solomon." The lavish employment of gold by the nations of antiquity is recorded by Rollin and other early historians.

Gold forms alloys with almost all other metals, and is very seldom seen in a pure state. In jewellery it is mixed with a small portion of copper, which gives it an additional hardness and durability, and in guineas, sovereigns, etc., there are twenty-two parts of pure gold to two parts of copper. Such gold is called "gold of twenty-two carats fine." Such is the ductility of this metal that it has been calculated it would take fourteen millions of films of gold, such as is on some fine gilt wire, to make up the thickness of one inch, whereas fourteen million leaves of common printing paper would occupy three quarters of a mile; and that one ounce of gold is sufficient to gild a silver wire of more than thirteen hundred miles long.

Although gold possesses this superior ductility to all other metals, such is its tenacity, that a wire, one-tenth of an inch in diameter, will support a weight of five hundred pounds. As no acid can possibly dissolve gold it is often used to solder the joints of platinum stills for mineral acids. It was formerly used in medicine under the name of "potable gold." In those days of credibility it was generally prescribed to patients who could furnish the apothecary with gold enough to make as much of the medicine as he should pronounce sufficient to insure the cure. Fulminating gold is a precipitate of this metal, and when dried on a filter forms a powder which detonates by heat or friction. A shocking account is given by Maquer of a person losing both his eyes by the bursting of a phial containing fulminating gold, which exploded by the friction of a glass stopper against a minute quantity that adhered unobserved to the neck of the bottle. Another instance of its destructive power occurred in the London Post-office about thirty years since; a person thoughtlessly put a letter into the office containing a small quantity of the powder, which he wished to transmit to a friend; in placing the office stamp upon the letter the contents exploded, blowing away the hand and arm of the clerk stamping it. Unlike most other things in nature, gold is not diminished or evaporated by heat; Gustavus Clavius put one ounce of pure gold in an earthen vessel into that part of a glass-house furnace where glass is always kept melted, and continued it there in fusion for two months together; and Knuckle mentions a like experiment made in a glass furnace of the Duke of Holastia, in which the gold was exposed to the fire for thirty weeks; these continued and vehement degrees of heat it sustained without any sensible alteration or diminution of quantity. One of the principal advantages in the use of gold is that it does not oxidize, as iron and many other metals do. If iron be exposed to the air, and water, in the way of damp or rain, be allowed to touch it, it will decompose the water, and, combining with the oxygen contained in it, forms what is commonly called rust, and chemically, oxide of iron; but neither air nor damp will effect any change on gold, which still preserves its wonted lustre and brilliancy whether in a dry or humid atmosphere.

The Sonah Wallah (which signifies in Hindustanee, "the gold fellow,") or itinerant goldsmith of India, is famous for his ingenuity. Rude and simple as are his tools, he far exceeds European workmen in the production of delicate and intricately formed trinkets; his small, taper, and flexible fingers more than supplying the place of the numerous varieties of implements which the mechanic of Birmingham or Sheffield finds indispensably necessary. Indian chains of gold and silver have been ever celebrated for the beauty and complication of their structure; and although the Sonah Wallah may be considered to excel particularly in this branch of his art, yet he still must be admitted to surpass, or at least equal, the European even in the manufacture of finger rings, bracelets, and armlets. We may add that much of the superior ingenuity of the Indian goldsmith may be attributed to the divisions of the people into castes, or sections, by which fundamental law the same profession is carried on by the same people or family through countless generations; the Shashtra, or code of Hindú laws, forbidding the mixture of the castes, or interference with any business or profession not carried on by their progenitors.

There are four integral divisions of the people. The first caste, the Brahmins, are said by the Hindú scriptures to have issued at the creation from Brahma's mouth; they are set apart for the priesthood and legislative departments of the state. The second are the Chattriyas, who form the armies. The third, the Vaisyas, are merchants. The fourth, the Soodras, are considered the most ignoble, and to them are left the mechanical arts; amongst these are the goldsmiths.

Silver was in very early use amongst the ancients; the first notice of it we find in Genesis, where "Abraham weighed to Ephron, in the audience of the sons of Seth, four hundred shekels of silver." This was 1800 years before Christ, and eleven hundred before the foundation of Rome. Pliny says, such was the luxury of the Romans, that it was simply reckoned a piece of elegance (not extravagance) to consume in the ornaments of coaches and the trappings of horses, metals which their ancestors could not use, even in drinking vessels, without being astonished at their own prodigality. Nero and his wife adorned their favourite horses with gold and silver. Silver was formerly of more value, when compared with gold, than it is at present; Herodotus tells us that, in his time, the relative value of gold and silver in Greece and Persia was thirteen to one. Plato, who flourished fifty years after him, says the value of gold in Greece was to that of silver as twelve to one; and Meander, who wrote about three hundred years after Christ, estimates the value of gold to silver as ten to one. It is generally supposed, that when metal was first employed as an instrument of barter, those who wished to purchase goods carried a mass of it about with them from place to place, and provided themselves with instruments to cut off a sufficient quantity for their purpose; but they soon felt the necessity of having pieces ready cut and weighed; and as knowledge increased, men found a way of enriching themselves by amalgamating silver and gold with less precious metals; and it is probable that, to prevent frauds of this kind, the rulers of different states placed their stamps on these pieces of metal to attest their purity.

Silver is about ten times as heavy as water; and is found either in a native state, as ore, or combined with other metals; and is chiefly brought from Mexico and Peru, though it is found in every quarter of the globe. The silver mines of Mexico and Peru far exceed in value the whole of the European and Asiatic mines; for we are told by Humboldt, that in the space of three centuries they afforded 316,023,133 pounds troy of pure silver; and he remarks that this quantity would form a solid globe of silver 91,206 feet in diameter. Many are of opinion that the Andes, if properly examined, would afford silver enough to overturn our present commercial system, by making silver as common as copper. Notwithstanding the immense quantities which have already been extracted from these mines, they still continue to repay the miners' toll; but instead of sinning the ore near the surface, as formerly, the workmen are obliged to descend to prodigious depths to obtain it. So poisonous are the exhalations which arise from them, that the cattle grazing on the outside are affected by their pernicious fumes, and many thousands of Indians have perished in them; nevertheless, such is the effect of avarice, that prodigious numbers of them are still sacrificed year after year. Although the exhalations of the mines are so poisonous, silver is thought the most wholesome of all the metals, and therefore forks and spoons are made of it. Native silver is mostly found in the mines of Potosi. In the museum of the Academy of Science at Petersburg, there is a piece of native silver from China, of such fineness, that coins have been struck from it without its having been passed through the crucible. Silver has been found in many parts of the United Kingdom; in Aberistwith a mint was established, in the year 1637, for coining Welsh silver.

Silver is the most brilliant metal we have, nothing surpasses its splendour except steel when highly polished; it possesses more hardness than gold, tin, or lead, but it is softer than iron, platinum, or copper. In ductility it is next to gold, fifty square inches of silver leaf weighing not more than a grain; the silver wire used by astronomers being no more than half the thickness of a fine human hair. Gold thread is only silver wire gilt; an ingot of silver, usually about thirty pounds weight, is made into a roll an inch and a half in diameter, and about twenty-two inches long. From one to two ounces of gold leaf are sufficient to cover this cylinder: but this thin coat of gold must be yet vastly thinner; the ingot is repeatedly drawn through holes of the several irons, each smaller than the other, till it be finer than a hair, every new hole diminishes its thickness, but what it loses in circumference it gains in length, and consequently increases in surface, yet the gold still covers it. How great must be the ductility of both the gold and silver, when the latter is drawn by this process into a thread nine hundred times less than it was at first, and the gold still covers it! Silver readily combines with sulphur: those who rob the public by diminishing the current silver coin expose the coin to the fumes of burning sulphur, by which a black crust of combined sulphur and silver is formed, which, by a smart blow, comes off like a scale, leaving the coin so affected, that the operation may sometimes be repeated twice or thrice without much hazard of detection.

Silver is, like gold, a perfect metal—that is, it is not volatilized by heat, some of it having been kept in a glass-house furnace two months, with a diminution only of one-twelfth in weight; it has, however, been proved that, if heated in a stream of oxygen gas, the whole may be volatilized. All the imperfect metals may be either volatilized or reduced to a calx by heat, and thus is virtue spoken of as "gold or silver tried in the furnace." Silver is used chiefly for domestic utensils and current coin, but for these purposes it is generally alloyed with copper, without which it would not have sufficient hardness to sustain much wear. Our standard silver is formed of about thirty-seven parts of pure silver, and three parts of copper; and one pound of standard silver is coined into sixty-two shillings. The indelible marking ink, usually sold by druggists, is composed of silver and nitric acid; and the lunar caustic, which is the most active escharotic known, is also prepared from silver. There is likewise an article called fulminating silver procured from it, of so dangerous a character, that a minute quantity only can be made at a time with safety, and even that could not be removed to a phial without the utmost risk of shattering the glass into ten thousand pieces.

CRUMBS FROM A WALLET.

N passing through D'Olier street, city of Dublin, a few weeks ago, the observant eyes of the present writer were struck with the appearance of a professional female mendicant, standing at a hotel door, and balancing a pair of well-to-do babes in her arms. The infants, as a humorous friend observed, were got up regardless of expense, particular attention being paid to their heads, which were decently clothed in the whitest of white caps. Naturally of a benevolent turn, the writer was about to bestow an alms on the interesting trio, when the aforementioned friend caught his sleeve, and whispered in his ear, "You're a flat!"

"A flat!" quoth the owner of the sleeve, elevating his eye-brows and striving to look indignant. "A flat! Sir, is it possible for a man, possessing the slightest sympathy with his suffering kind, to behold, unmoved, poverty associated with the utmost cleanliness? Look at these babes! By Jupiter, I could kiss them for those dear white caps!"

"Credulous to a fault," was the reply. "Do you not understand this woman's game? Knowing that want is considered inseparable from filth, and therefore despised, she acts like an artist, she catches your eye with a display of clean linen, (mind how carefully she conceals all but the heads of her charges.) She absolutely levies contributions for soap and starch—she picks your pocket with a quilling, and washes your purse out with a bit of soap."

"Impossible!" exclaimed the writer, "my dear sir, my dear sir—"

"Hush!" interrupted the judicious friend, "hush! The heaviest curse which society voluntarily takes to itself is indiscriminate charity. Plead goodness of motive if you will, but do not forget that you increase a malignant evil whilst you minister to your self-complacency. When you have anything to give away, recollect that there are poor-boxes and public charities. Do not suffer yourself to be gulled by the exhibition of an ulcerated leg or a humped back. Both are frequently produced by artificial means."

"You astonish me!"

"Some thirty years ago," continued he, "there sat daily upon Ball's-Bridge, in the city of Limerick, a venerable beggar, with an incurably sore leg, the hideous appearance of which moved the passers-by to compassion and alms. That leg was worth the owner a clear hundred a year!"

"Come, I say, come—"

"The authorities made a descent upon his house one night, and found the mendicant supping off grilled steaks, which he washed down with bumpers of steaming punch. On examining his cupboard, they found £1,300 stowed away in a secure corner—the thirteen years he spent on the bridge divided into which would leave an annual income of £100 per annum!"

"Marvellous!"

"And further, it was found, that the ulceration by which this enormous fraud was sustained, was kept up by the constant use of irritating applications."

"You astonish me; pray, proceed."

"There is a comic as well as a serious side to begging. It may amaze you to hear that it also rejoices in melo-dramatic features of the highest order."

"Indeed!"

"As an example, take the got up 'destitute room-keeper.' She goes out, generally, between twelve and three, dressed in a faded gown and cloak, a thick cap, and an unexceptionable apron. To perfect her appearance, she carries a large door-key on the forefinger of the left hand. She keeps her eyes on the ground, and moves her lips as if in prayer. Her appeals are commonly of a retrospective nature—she has seen better days, and remembers, she tells you, the time when she could afford to send the children to school. Beware of her! That woman has no house, probably no children. Give her a few pence, by way of experiment, and follow her to the next public-house; the chances are ten to one that you shall find her quarrelling with the barman, insisting that the whiskey with which he has supplied her is not No. 1, or, as she terms it, 'the real thing.' This is your indigent room-keeper."

"Ha! ha! Good!"

"Is it not Addison that tells how a blind and a lame man occupied a begging post for many years opposite his lodging? The blind man carried his lame brother home on his back, the latter acting as pilot to his sightless companion. The spectacle was exceedingly pathetic; but one morning Mr. Addison rose with daylight, and, looking across the street, saw the lame man running down the pavement with most unprofessional celerity. He returned in a few minutes with a glass of gin which he handed to his colleague, who, holding the liquor between him and the light, examined it with a critical glance, and was heard to exclaim: 'My eye! by its pure Genivy.' Are you aware that mendicants hire children for the purposes of exhibition? I once overheard a conversation between two women who were resting themselves on my door-steps:

"Ah, thin, how much a-day does she charge yes for them?" asked one of the women, pointing to a pair of dirty-faced boys who were evidently in the other's custody.

"Musha, more than enough, avic. I pays her eightpence a-day for them, an' they're no bargain."

"Eightpence a-day!" exclaimed the other, with a look of agonised astonishment. "Eightpence a-day! arrah, woman alive, doesn't she lend out lords for half the money?"

"Lords," I interrupted; "lords! what did she mean by lords?"

"Deformed children—hump-backed."

"Oh!"

"Perhaps the most defiant, slatternly, impudent, aggressive, beseeching, and abusive swarm of beggars on the face of the world are to be met with in Kilrush. I once stepped from the steamer to the quay, and was instantly surrounded by a cohort of those wretches."

"The poor woman wid the five childer, yer honor," said one.

"Sure yer not goin' away widout lavin' the seven orphans a pinny," screamed another.

"Ah, wisha, look on the poor widdy, captain, ye'll niver miss it, and blessings be wid you," shouted a third.

"Seeing that their importunities were of no avail, for I strode away in the direction of the town, one cried out, in a tone unmistakably intended for my ears, and those of the bystanders,

"Biddy, Biddy, be considerate, and don't be persecutin' the poor boy. Sure, if he hasn't it for himself how could he have it for others, ai, omadhaun?"

"What impudence," I exclaim. "Let me hope you chastised the wretch's audacity."

"My dear fellow, if you have the least concern for your peace of mind, never engage in a contest of words with a mendicant. He or she is sure to have the best of it. Accustomed as they are to public speaking, they choose their language judiciously, they abound in epigrams, pointed allusions, and sarcasms, which have the notoriety of vulgarity to recommend them. Against such weapons, of what avail are your polite deprecations, and gentlemanly censures? Your opponent is sure to make herself understood, whilst you are condemned to speak Greek to the monkeys. Not that our beggars are more persistent or shameless than their fellows in the neighbouring kingdoms. Take London, for example. When frost and fog set in, troops of beggars patrol the streets in the guise of disemployed workmen, and bearing a banner on which is inscribed the words—'We've got no work to do.' From morning till night their monotonous chant assails the ears, until you are half convinced that the universe is going to pieces for lack of employment.

"We've got no work to do—oo,

We've got no work to do—oo,

Provisions dear, and lodgings high;

We've got no work to do."

"But, of all beggars, recommend me to the Spanish. I am astonished that Quivado, in his 'Vision of Hell,' does not mention them—an immunity which they enjoy in common with married men. Cervantes quips you a mendicant now and then with the grotesque humour for which he is famous; but it is in the fugitive literature of the Peninsula that they shine with astounding brilliancy. Away from the stores of my library, I do not pretend to be correct in names or data, but I shall be able to remember one or two strange anecdotes. There is a Spanish beggar who tells his own story, which is something in substance like the following:—He was apprenticed in early life to a scrivener, by whom he was half-starved—indeed, so much so that his joints, when moving, rattled like castanets, and his skin became so transparent that a candle placed at his back illuminated his chest. In the agonies of hunger, he used to appease his appetite by gnawing at mouldy parchments, and on one occasion succeeded in eating off an entire codicil from an important will. The scrivener's house had the reputation of being haunted by a demon in the shape of a serpent, and this circumstance our future mendicant turned to capital advantage. Having ascertained that the supernatural visitor was a mere delusion, he assumed the part himself by marching and countermarching over the house at night, whilst he alarmed the inmates by the most diabolic hissing. He succeeded so well that he was enabled to fatten the larder and eat to repletion. When this pleasant trick had gone on for some months, the scrivener was awakened one night by the hissing of the serpent in the apprentice's room. Our poor beggar was performing in his sleep, and his master, assured that the reptile was at last in his power, belaboured the bed so soundly with a cudgel that the apprentice sprang up and was glad to rush from the house with a broken arm. We next find him as director to an old blind beggar-man, who lived sumptuously and was never tired of grumbling against the decrees of Providence. They generally dined by the road-side. The beggar held the wine bottle, permitting the director one sip therefrom to five of his own. This was not fair treatment, so the director, who now assumes the name of Gomez, procured a long straw through which he contrived to suck as much wine as it pleased him. The old man was not slow to suspect that he was the victim of foul play. By listening attentively, he guessed at his comrade's stratagem, discovered him in the act of pilfering, and beat him unmercifully for his misconduct. Bruised and defeated, Gomez arose and led his master to the banks of a deep but narrow rivulet which it was necessary for them to cross. The plan usually adopted by the beggarman was to take a run, spring from the ground at a given signal, and leap over. When they reached the edge of the stream, he explained his plan to his companion, who promised to render him every assistance.

"Jump across, boy, and direct me, and when you have landed shout."

"Gomez sprang to the other side. 'I fear this place is too dangerous,' he said; 'come up further.'

"I've leaped it a dozen times, I tell thee, boy."

"Aye, aye; but now the banks are fretted, and might give way—follow me."

"The old man complied, and Gomez led him up the stream till they came to a ford stone on his side of the bank. By a variety of manœuvres, he managed to place his friend exactly opposite it, and there addressed him:

"A sweeter bank thou hast never alighted on than this. Step straight backward a dozen paces, run forward for the same number and spring, and God aid thee!"

"Am I fair, boy; am I fair? Does the bank promise firm footing, lad?"

"Delicious," replied Gomez. "Cheese! venerable sir, cheese! no slip here, or I deserve perdition!"

"Forward, you say, boy?"

"Forward, sir. Let your gallop be as straight as an Andalusian ladle, and I promise thee thou shalt not complain of my judgment."

"Then, catch my wallet, lad, and prithee, keep thy fingers from the roast kid, and do not meddle with the doubloons, if thou prizest fair bones and a whole skin. Jago!"

"And with this exclamation, the unfortunate man sprang from the bank and dashed his head to atoms against the ford stone."

"How awful!" I observe.

"Poetical justice, sir" replies my friend. "I presume you never heard the story of the three lazy beggarman of Chapelizod. Once upon a time, as the old formula goes, there lived in the village three beggermen, universally celebrated for their lazy habits and plump persons. A gentleman, desirous of judging for himself, visited the worthies and found them reclining against a hay cock in the sunniest corner of a large field.

"Come," cried he, 'I shall give a crown to the laziest amongst you.'

"Two beggars, elated by the prospect of the money, sprang to their feet, and declared they were the idlest, laziest vagabonds in the world, whilst the third merely opened his eyes, looked languidly at the visitor, and closed them again.

"The crown is yours," said the visitor. 'Incomparable idler, you have well deserved it.'

"The lazy beggar merely yawned and took a turn on the hay.

"Come, have the money, my friend," cried the gentleman, offering the coin.

"Can't yez put it in my pocket?" asked the mendicant.

"Do you remember the beggarwomen, whom poor Banim describes with such inimitable truth, in the chapters of 'Father Connel?' The wretches lived gloriously—for, not content with the simple flavour of tea, they took care to adulterate it with whiskey mingled with cream. By the way, about the year 1823, there sat daily at the North Strand turnpike, a blind beggarman, famous for his striking resemblance to the reigning sovereign, George IV. He died shortly after that monarch's visit to Ireland; crowds used to visit him for the purpose of comparing his features with those of his royal prototype; and it is said that the shape which the public curiosity assumed at the time was highly displeasing to the king."

"Well, well," I said, musingly. "Well! of course, after this you will dine with me at the 'Planet.' Denis, grilled steaks and anchovies for two."

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER I.

"ND there's no fear, sir, of the travellers' get-ten the start of us?"

"Make yourself easy on that head—I drew the charges myself, and saw Maney filling the clenching of the hoofnails, with my own eyes."

"Oh, if that's the case, we may count

it done; Maney's was the sure finger if he touched them. I see him at work at 'em meself the other day, an' he grinnen like a horse aten thistles; the day of the blind man, you know, sir, in the glyn below."

Suil Dhuv started and turned pale. The recollection of the act to which the man alluded had often before occurred to him, but never in a similar state of feeling. He put spurs to his horse, and rode on with Mun Maher, the last speaker and his companion remaining on the spot, and looking after them with some surprise.

"He's afraid he'll be late at the chapel," said one to the other—"but let us ride round, fair an aisy, as he says; and, stay, we have time enough, we'll just step into the shebeen-house over," pointing to a little wretched cabin, in the exterior of which no further indication could be discovered of its claims to the consideration of a cara-vansery, than the broken bottle which was stuck in the thatch, and a little piece of turf wrapped in a brown paper, and dangling from one of the scollops over the low doorway. "There'll nobody see us there, an' I'm so dhry I could drink faster thin a lime-burner's bag."

When once a certain train of feeling has been laid in the soul, it is extraordinary to observe what a slight accession of circumstances are required to stimulate and strengthen it until it has acquired a mastery over the judgment and the will itself.
Every new sight, every new sound, that arrested the sense of the Coiner as he pursued his route with his companion, served to confirm him in the disposition to mournful retrospection which the simple accident of a fine sunny evening, and the revisiting a soil untrod by him for many a year, had occasioned within his heart. The corn-fields, yet in ear, where he had been stationed, while yet a child, to terrify, by the clattering of two flat stones, the darkplumed plunderers of the neighbouring rookery from his patron's tillage—the very meadows in which he had assisted at harvest time in filling the load of sweet hay on the car, for the purpose of stacking in the haggart, the paddock to which he had been despatched on many an evening as fine as this, with an armful of grass for the weanling lambs, and a pot of milk and hay-water for the young calves—the very sally-grove where he was accustomed to walk and chat with her whom he had lured from her father's door (a door that had opened so hospitably to him in his necessities), and whom he was now preparing to desert; all these objects acted like fire upon the remorse that was already beginning to fester within the bosom of the guilty wanderer.

A crooked and (still) broken-up avenue leading to a farm house near the road side, was the next object that caught his eyes—and he again involuntarily slackened his pace, for the purpose of gazing upon the dwelling. The place was as familiar to him as his own home would have been; indeed, it was a house in which a very considerable number of years of his unsettled boyhood had been spent; but it was sadly changed in appearance from what it had been when he first beheld it in his young days. It was then a sweet cottage, embowered in foliage and fragrance, with all the indications of rural comfort and content about it. It had now a desolate and uninhabited air. The neat plot before the door was half converted into tillage, and the remainder disfigured and turned up by the grunting burgesses of the adjacent piggery. A muddy pool had settled under the front windows, in which a few meagre-looking ducks were dabbling and diving in silence. The hedge which encompassed the plot was broken and torn up, and, at one spot, had completely given way, blocking up almost half the avenue with its ruins. The alder tree, beneath which he had constructed a summer-seat which he often shared with the pretty daughter of his host, was now reduced to a stump. The house itself was stripped of its decent garment of rough casting—the thatch beaten in at several places—and the chimneys dismantled; these emblems of decay, together with the silence that reigned over the place, struck new feelings of melancholy into the young man's spirit.

"All was still

But the lattice that flapped when the wind was shrill;
Though raves the gust and floods the rain,
No hand shall close its clasp again."

A single poplar which stood erect in its graceful slenderness of form in the centre of the little plain, like a gnomon on a dial-plate, flung its lengthened shadow in a direct line toward the front door. The coiner started unconsciously as he observed it, for that was the indication of the expiry of the sixth hour in the afternoon. Breathing a short quick sigh, he checked the reins of his steed, which was making advantage of the meditative disposition of its rider, to drop a mouthful of herbage from the hedge over which he was gazing, and hurried forward with a spirit still more disabled than it had been before his arrival at this spot, for the dreadful task to which he had endeavoured to bend up the energies of his nature.

He was doomed, nevertheless, to experience still farther and more heart-shaking disquietudes. As he approached the spot which was destined to be the scene of the first act of the guilty drama of the night, his attention was directed, by his companion, to a little fort on their right, which Mun pointed out with a grim smile and nod of the head as much as to say—"I was a good job that was done there, sir." The situation of the spot was such as might, without farther explanation from the speaker, have intimated the nature of that "good" deed. As Suil Dhuv raised his head, in obedience to the light tap of his companion's whip, and looked around him for the first time since he had left the cottage, he was chilled and startled by the sudden alteration which appeared to have taken place in the face of the country, and the stern and sullen contrast which the scene he now beheld presented to that on which his fancy and his memory had been luxuriating a short time before. The verdure, the beauty, the sights of promise and of plenty, and the sounds of mirth and light-heartedness, had vanished as completely as if the wand of a malicious wizard had been laid over the face of the picture. Before the travellers, at a few perches distant, lay a long, deep, straggling glen, covered with heath, bramble, short hazel bushes, sloe trees, wild crab, and other stunted and dark-looking individuals of the family of underwood. A brown, boggy stream crept, then bounded, now rippled, then roared, and again murmured at various points of its winding progress through the sullen cleft—its dark waters, in several instances, narrowing and chafing against the ledges of crag, into a snow white foam, little masses of which floated down the black stream, like solitary virtues on the gloomy river of a bad world's history. The sun, which had chequered with so many sweet varieties of light and shade, the landscape he had left behind, served here only to increase the dreary dullness of the scene. A flat boggy plain or lack (a plot of level ground lying near the marge of a rivulet)—covered with a long tabid grass, which is indigenous to such a soil, and assumes the appearance of hay already dry, while it is yet in the act of vegetating, spread its dusky tablet on their left, at the foot of a rocky eminence, while the stream, forming a small semicircle around it, cut it sharply away from the base of a steep and bare cliff, over the summit of which, adorned with a coronal of the red-berried mountain ash, the heavy sunlight darted its sloping rays, which, corrected as they were by the mistiness of the place to a still more hazy faintness, threw an air of slight and softening indistinctness over the rugged outlines of the scene. Near the base of this cliff, in a dark angle on which the light had a still more limited influence than on the more exposed features of the picture, stood a thatched chapel, a plain oblong pile with a small iron cross fastened at the top of the gable, into which the door, an unpannelled plane of timber, marked with the same scored symbol in red paint, was made to open. A narrow road, winding down the hill, formed the approach to this humble temple—and a straggling path, presenting a short cut in this road, from the spot where the Coiner stood, ran almost under their horses' feet. This was pointed out by Maher, who dismounted, and flung the stirrups over the high pommel saddle of his horse, as he observed it. Suil Dhuv followed his example, and threw the reins of his steed to his companion—

"Remain here until I return," said he; "and if any danger should approach, do not forget, for your life, to give me the token. Where are the things?"

Maher handed him a wrenching iron, a bundle of picks, a file, and a small hammer.

"It's a droll thing if they were left there," the Coiner continued. "Wouldn't they be safer in his own chest?"

"Is it Father O'Regan's? No, indeed—I heard Watty the clerk say meself, that he was afeard o' em there, in regard o' the Dillons that he denounced from the altar o' count o' their night-walken. There's no harm in thryen at any rate; and besides, the priest puts great trust in the chapel above all other places—for, as he said himself, though there's a power o' villyans goes, there's few o' them that are wanten both in the fear and love o' God together."

"Ha! ha! he did not know you or me, Maher," said Suil Dhuv, striving by a painful exertion to laugh away the dark remorse that made the perspiration stand and glisten upon his brow. "Walk the horses softly here, and I'll be with you in ten minutes." And bounding over the stile, he hurried along the path towards the road.

"That's the queerest laugh I ever heard him laugh yit," said Mun Maher, in soliloquy as he gazed after the ruffian; "I wonder now, could it be anythen that would be comen over him, after all? Isn't it greatly he was thicken all along the road?"

Something, most assuredly, was "coming over" the young man in question, some (to himself) unaccountable state of feeling; a distress, an alarm, an uneasiness, which he could trace to no possible external influence, and which went on deepening and fastening upon his spirit in proportion to the violence of the exertions which he made to shake it off. He thought of his past crimes with pain and deep remorse; but it was not of that healthy kind which induces a longing after the peace of penitence, and casts a stumbling-block in the way of a guilty purpose.

On the contrary, the deeper and the fiercer the pangs were, which every reviving recollection struck into his heart, the more he raged and chafed, the firmer and more daring his resolution became; and even while his limbs shook with fear at the thought of the retribution he had already earned, he burned with the eagerness of his desire, to cast another yet heavier debt than all into the already fearful account. His soul might be supposed, in this respect, in a state of disease analogous to that which induces the patient who is suffering under the affliction of an acute nervous attack, to fling himself on the fire, dash his head against the wall, or use any other violent means of counteracting, by a different, though still more terrible excitement, the anguish of that which is already preying upon his frame.

As he passed the fort which had been pointed out to him by his companion, and which lay close to the path he was pursuing, he started, shivered with an emotion like fear, and then stamped his foot against the earth, and uttered a furious oath against his own weakness. He raised his hand over his eyes, and attempted to hurry forward, with his face turned another way, then suddenly stopping short, and meditating for a moment, he set his teeth hard, and said: "It was an ugly deed after all. The old dark man that couldn't defend himself, nor know what was coming upon him. It was a coward's blow that drew his blood." This was spoken something like the manner of self-condemnation which a sportsman might be supposed to feel, who had shot a hare sleeping in its form. "He was kind to me too, when I wanted kindness badly enough. But," (fiercely)—"what hurt? He blotted all from my mind, when he took from me the only friend I had." Then, with a sudden and hurried self-recollection—"Eh? what am I doing here? Well, to be sure, see this! and the sun going down already, and all I have to do before I meet him. Think o' that, why!" And once more assuming an appearance of steadiness and settled energy, he rushed from the fort.

He did not long, however, retain possession of this accidental firmness. As he placed his foot on the little stile which connected the foot-path with the hill road, an old, palkied, white-headed woman, her hair gathered up in a roll under her decent white kerchief, a few sods of turf and faggots in her check apron, and a string of large horn beads in her hand, met him at the other side. Raising her aged head as if with an effort, and expanding her sunken eyes as they fell upon his figure, she stopped short, and broke in upon the litany she had been telling, to wish the stranger a "good evenen kindly." Strangely moved by the contrast in the designs and occupations of both, the Coiner paused, and gazing fixedly on the old woman, returned her greeting with a degree of tenderness in his voice that arrested her attention, in turn. Perceiving that her route lay over the hedge, which was no slight obstacle for old and sapless bones like hers to surmount, and acting under the influence of one of those unaccountable sensations to which his present state of agitation rendered him liable, he stepped back for the purpose of suffering the devotee to pass first over the stile.

"Goen to pay your rounds at the chapel, over, this evenen, I'll be bound, you are now—a lanna-ma-chree?" (child of my heart)—she said, as she placed her withered and bony fingers (from which the rosary still depended) on the wall.

"Going to the chapel, indeed, a-vaneestha,"* replied the Coiner, smiling, in an access of fresh and stinging remorse, upon her.

"E then, may all that you do there be remembered to you at the day o' judgment, in the last o' the world, an through all eternity, for uvur, as you'll only just gi' me the hand till I get over this place it's so cross, entirely, my old bones will be broke in my body within."

Without paying any attention to, indeed almost without hearing, certainly without considering, her kindly meant benediction, the Coiner raised her in his arms with as much ease as he would have done a child, and placed her gently on the soft path at the other side, after which he continued his course, along the road.

"Millia buelus,† thin!" exclaimed the pious old creature, "and the Lord keep his eye upon you this blessed night, and hear the prayers of his holy Saint John, upon his own eve, that you may ever an' always continue in grace, and as well inclined as you are this moment, for it is a good sign o' you to help the poor old widow, and to be goen to the chapel on the Eha-na-Shawn, while many another boy oulder than yourself is at the goal playen, or in the publican's, this way."

No much for appearances!

The act of gentleness which he had done, once more contributed to throw Suil Dhuv upon the interrupted mood of retrospection which had been growing upon him throughout the evening. The little green spot, also, before the chapel, brought many an old and peaceful remembrance to his mind. He recollected the many summer mornings when the bright Sabbath sun beheld him hastening down the wild path, his neatly frilled white linen shirt lying gracefully on his open bosom; a small, carefully tendered "Path to Paradise" in his hand; his black and shining curls combed into a beautiful and closely-clustered mass; his shoes, a luxury only allowed him on occasions, when a special decency of appearance was deemed requisite, glistening in the sunshine; a little bottle thrust into his side pocket, which was given him by the old woman who had dressed him up, for the purpose of having it replenished from the can of holy water at the altar's foot—in this Sunday trim he had often hurried over this very ground, his heart, in its innocence of feeling, trembling with anxiety lest he should lose the benefit of the Mass, an evil which is regarded with a peculiar fear, in Irish humble life, even among those whose principles, unhappily, are lax enough in many other respects.

* Old woman. † A thousand thanks.

He paused, to gaze upon the little turfen seat where the pastor of the rural flock was accustomed to sit in the sunshine, to talk familiarly with the cottagers on their domestic affairs, or hear the confession of a penitent. He recollected the time when he had knelt on the green sod by the side of the holy man, his heart sinking within him with fear, as he meditated the humiliating disclosures of some boyish offence, an infraction of the Sabbath, or a word spoken in anger to some playfellow, and the gentle monitory voice of his adviser seemed once more to murmur in his ear.

His thoughts naturally reverted to his present condition, and he almost unconsciously put the question to his own heart, how different and how dark, in the comparison, would be the account which he should now have to render to the same minister of peace, if he were to rise from the quiet grave, in which he had long been sleeping the sweet sleep of the blameless, and resume his ancient place on this humble tribunal. The last fancy startled him. As a celebrated divine, with that insight into the machinery of the human heart which characterized a great portion of his writings, has said, that long habit of self-willed contempt for, and obstinate resistance to the truth of religion is often apt to substitute a mechanical superstition in its place; so it might now be observed of the stained and hardened soul that stood, with the purpose of the last of human offences, black, daring, deadly sacrilege, before the door of the temple, that the fouler and fiercer his resolution became, the more weak and nervous was his frame, and the more fearfully active his memory and his imagination. The short, quick breathings of the wind through the dry thatch made him start and tremble, while sudden flashes of light, of he knew not what or whose, seemed to flit before and about him, through the evening gloom. Again his memory conjured up new sights and sounds of terror from the familiar spot on which he stood. He beheld the buried clergyman, robed in the sacred vestments of his office, lifting his hands above his head, and pouring forth, as he had once done, the denunciations of the fearful judgment of the impenitent, from that awful text, the words of which had made the young blood of the Coiner curdle in its channels, when he had first heard them uttered—"I go my way, and you shall seek me, and you shall not find me, and you shall die in your sin!" The recollection of this occasion completely unshook the courage of the unhappy wretch. He trembled violently, flung himself unconsciously on his knees—struck his breast rapidly and violently with his clenched fist—muttered a hurried snatch of the half-forgotten rosary—and yet, by some strange influence, amid all this agitation and remorse, the thought of desisting from the crime, which he meditated at that very moment, scarcely once occurred to him.

Vague and general notions of an amended life, not in any instance assuming the vigour or sincerity of a positive intention, glanced across his spirit at intervals, while he busied himself in preparing his instruments, and examined the door and windows of the building. The very security which seemed to attend his undertaking, the absence of all human obstacle, the facility which the loneliness of the place itself presented, the slight resistance which the door seemed likely to oppose to his entrance, all furnished him with matter for new distrust. He paused before the building, with that feeling of fearful suspicion which chills the heart of the bravest soldier, when he finds a position totally silent and undefended where he expected to meet with an opposition worthy of its importance.

The sullen dash of the waters behind him began to boom upon his hearing, like the sound of distant thunder. He struck fiercely at the lock of the door, then started and trembled as the many echoes of the blow came back upon him from the rents and hollows of the cliff and glen, and again repeated the strokes with double vehemence. At length, flinging the hammer away, he stepped a few paces back, then dashing himself furiously against it, he sent it crashing round upon its hinges.

We dare not follow the sacrilegious wretch through all the detail of his impieties in the interior of the building. The whole proceeding, from this moment, was one of such absolute delirium, that he could hardly be said to have acted it with consciousness. He rushed to the recess in which the object of his search—the silver chalice or ciborium was kept, forced it open, flung himself on his knees once more, clasped his hands, prostrated himself on the earth, started to his feet, snatched the sacred vessel, dashed the contents, the sight of which almost maddened him, upon the altar—and fled in an abandonment of utter fear along the aisle, panting heavily, crossing himself, and striking his breast, and muttering prayers and curses blended—while his sight swam and wandered wildly over the place, his ears seemed to ring with the din of mingled thunders, hymns, and laughter; flakes of whitish light darted with throbs of anguish from his eyeballs; the air about him grew hot and suffocating; the darkening vault of the night seemed to press with a horrid weight upon his brain; and his conscience, rising like a buried giant, from beneath the mountains of crime he had cast upon it, revealed, and almost realized the Pandemonium which his slighted, though unforgotten faith had pointed out to him, with a warning finger in his days of early innocence.

The same red sun which had lighted the old Palatine and his party on their road by the Carrig-on-Dhiol, beheld the Coiner's accomplice, Mun Maher, pacing impatiently up and down the road near the fort, the sugan collar of his own, and the bridle of his leader's horse, both resting on his arm, while he busied himself in keeping peace between the animals, a question having arisen as to the right of property in the nutritious succedaneum which encircled the head of Mun Maher's charger, and which, in the opinion of the better appointed steed, was capable of being appropriated to a more gratifying purpose than that of a mere symbol of subserviency.

Mun Maher would have been much the fitter person (for the purposes of the gang) to have sent on the enterprise which the Suil Dhuv had undertaken. He was one of those happy characters who are relieved by Nature from the evil of either thinking or feeling deeply on any subject, and whose vice or virtue is the result altogether of accident and habit; who take whatever little ideas they may possess altogether upon trust, and live, as one of the most independent of the tribe of independent thinkers bitterly expresses it—"upon the alms basket—on scraps of begged opinions."

Maher's tone of mind or feeling, in consequence, was always formed by the company into which circumstances had thrown him last. He was ferocious after he had conversed for an hour with Red Rody—spirited, fiery, and ambitious while in the presence of Suil Dhuv—given to crusheening when he and Jerry got into a corner together—and he never left the room where Maney O'Neil sat, without a passion for roguery and low cheating.

Neither was this chameleon-like quality of imitation confined to the moral composition of the man. He generally assumed, with the tone of mind imparted by those into whose society he was thrown, the gesture, the voice, and even the very air of the features. By a singular flexibility of countenance, similar to that which, even in these days of the Drama's disgrace, enabled a Mathews to collect around his green cloth and lamps, a laughing circle of her once-generous patrons from the world of the Exclusives themselves—by such a capability was Mun Maher enabled, even without the intention or consciousness of it, to adapt his face and manner entirely to those of his companions—changing occasionally from Jerry's soft, open, gaze, to the hard-knit brow and fixed stare of Suil Dhuv—the stupid, foolish eye of Maney, and even, occasionally, to adopt the palsied agitation of Rody himself. He was certain, moreover, to remain in the condition of mind in which he had been last placed, until some new archetype was presented to him, for (like the bird of the American forests, that is songless in itself, yet can become the pupil or even the rival of the nightingale) he might be said to have no positive or original existence of his own, but to present at all times the double of some neighbour or acquaintance, playing the same part in the world which a loser plays at a game of forfeits, who is condemned to receive and retain an attitude from each of the company in turn.

The same feeling, moreover, which would render such a one impatient for being left for any considerable time in the same position, made Mun fret and chafe at a great rate whenever he was left long alone. He remained for some time after Suil Dhuv left him, with his arms folded and his eyes fixed musingly through his gathered brows upon the ground, then led his horses slowly up and down, wondered at the long delay made by his companion (a considerable time before the latter had reached his destination) and at last, taking from his coat pocket a bundle of smoke-stained, whited-brow papers stitched together in the form of a book, in which the print composed of a strange jumble of types of all shapes and sizes, was scarcely discernible in the gloom (a species of confusion of which our London readers may be enabled to form some idea by walking as far as the dead-wall in Oxford-street, or any other dead-wall where those elegant specimens of typography from "Pitt's and Son, at the Seven Dials," flutter on their pack-thread in the dusty street gale, and where, with reverence be it spoken, in the friendly hours of our literary noviciate in the great Babel, we were wont to charm away the remembrance of many a cold repulse and many a stinging disappointment), taking, we repeat (craving the reader's indulgence for our long parenthesis) taking such a book from his coat pocket, and turning over a few of the well-fingered and dog-eared pages, he selected, from a number of ballads, one which his habits had rendered very popular among the gang, and which he adapted to that exquisitely passionate air which our tuneful fellow-countryman, Moore, has since graced with no less exquisitely passionate words. The reader, however, is requested to keep those out of his recollection while he follows Mun through The Lamentation of Ellen Maguare, or the Angler's Deceit.

"Phoo! where is it at all for one song? Eh?—No—The Red-haired Man's Wife—the Colleen Rue—the—Hah! you animal, you—will you be quiet, there—Is it to ait me horse's collar upon her you mane, this evening? You're like your own master, you tyrant, wanten to have uvury thing to yourself—John M'Goulderick's trial for the Quaker's daughter—and that's a moven song too, and a dale o' tenderness and fine English in it. How is this it goes?—hum!.....

'My name is John M'Goulderick,
I never will deny—
They swore I was a Ribbonman,
Condemned I was to die—
As soon as my dead letter came,
My sorrows did renew—
Sayen, for to die
I do deny—
Brave boys—what shall I do?'

There's a hole in the ballad—I'm not able for that at all, to-night—You won't let that sugan alone, again? Sheela-na-Guira—A'then, joy be with you in a bottle o' moss, Mary, wherever you are this evenen, 'twas you that used to turn that nate:—

'I, trembling, approached this beautiful dame—
And in great confusion I asked her name—
Was she Flora?
Aurora?
Or great Queen Demira?
Says she, I am neither—I'm Sheela-na-Guira.'

Well, pass to the next—that's too moven! it puts me in mind of old times and things, intirely—Oh, here it is at last—'As I went—' Yes—oy—that's it—' and clearing his voice by a "hem" which made the neighbouring valleys ring, he commenced the Lamentation in a truly lamentable key, dwelling with a due degree of tremulous vehemence upon the semi-breves, and prolonging the key-note from the ferocious, ear-piercing loudness of a trumpet, to the buzzing indistinctness of the echo of an echo's echo.

'As I went a walken, one mornen in June,
To view those gay flowers whin spreaden in bloom,
I spied a young faymale, quite handsome and fair,
She had me enamoured—young Ellen Maguare.
She far exceeds Phœbus—Luna, the moon—
Her breath is far sweeter than roses in June—
I have travelled this nation—I vow and declare,
But I never could aiquil young Ellen Maguare.'

At length I stopt to her, and this I did say—
'Your modest appearance has led me astray—
Both you and blind Cupid has me in a snare,
I hope you'll rilase me, young Ellen Maguare.'

With this modest answer, then, she told her mind—
'If I could rilase you, I'd be well inclined—
My heart is entangled, af you're in a snare—
So that is your answer from Ellen Maguare.'

Gondoutha, wisha! And he murdered her, after all the love—oy, indeed—

'Now, I'll conclude, and let you understand,
May this be a warning to every young man!
To the lapboard of Sligo I straight must repair—
And die for the murder of Ellen ———'

"Maguare," he would have said—or sung—had not the quatrain been cut short in a manner which seemed almost to threaten the vocalist with a fate similar to that of the unhappy heroine of his monody. This was neither more nor less than a well-aimed blow, which took him on the middle of the crown and laid him sprawling, book and all, upon his face and hands in the very centre of the high road.

FACTS AND FANCIES ABOUT THE MONTHS.

APRIL.

"Next came fresh April full of lustyhed,
And wanton as a kid whose horn new buds;
Upon a bull he rode, the same which led
Europa floating through th' Argolick fluds;
His horns were gilded all with golden studs,
And garnished with garlands goodly dight
Of all the fairest flowers and freshest buds
Which the earth brings forth." SPENSER.

APPARENTLY Nature feels most keenly and most thoroughly the genial influence of Spring, in the changeful but exquisite beauty of wayward April, whose face, indeed, half smiles, half tears, has a capricious loveliness of its own, which the poets have not failed to sing of. And well may they chaunt the praises of April, for it flings from its fertile bosom, in prodigal love, the daintiest of blossoms, and warms with new life the young corn, which cold, stern March had somewhat chilled. We love the April; we love its shifting skies, its snatches of warm rain, its burst of glorious sunshine, its fresh cheery mornings, its cloudless nights. We love the month to come because it is the promise of the ripe, golden Summer, as yet standing only upon the threshold, and looking in upon us with a genial face. The character of the month has ever been that of fickleness. It has its soft balmy days, when the brightness of the sunshine is tempered by a dewy mist that sweetly blends earth and sky, and adds new beauty to the tender green of the one, and the celestial blue of the other; but it has also its days of wintry rigour, and of chilling showers, which appear doubly unpleasant by the contrast. Amidst those alternations of weather vegetation advances, and the bursting of buds and opening of flowers appears to fully establish for the month its right to the name of April, from the Latin verb aperire, to open, because it opens or unfolds the Spring. Philologists, however, will differ on the derivation of the word. Some ascribe it to the Greek Venus, Aphrodité; others assert that the month is so called in honour of the mother of Æneas, while many are in favour of the theory that the Latin aper, a wild boar, is its radix. However, we are disposed to incline to the first-mentioned etymology. The Saxons called April "Eostur-monath," after one of their goddesses who was called Eostre, and to whom, in that month, they celebrated singular festivals.

The first of April is, we need scarcely remind our readers, consecrated to the goddess of Folly, when jokes, whether offensive or inoffensive, are supposed to transform the individuals whom they annoy into "April-Fools."

"'Twas on the morn when April doth appear,
And wets the primrose with its maiden tear;
'Twas on the morn when laughing Folly rules,
And calls her sons around, and dubs them Fools;
Bids them be bold, some untried path explore,
And do such deeds as Fools ne'er did before."

The custom is a senseless one, and yet both ancient and general, the origin being unknown, although the amusement itself is carried on in many of the countries of Europe, and there are traces of it in Asia and America. Among the Hindûs, a festival is held at nearly the same period, called the "Huli Festival," when a similar kind of merriment to that indulged in amongst ourselves is carried on; people are sent on errands and expeditions which end in disappointment, and every one is seeking to raise a laugh at the expense of his neighbour. It would appear that high and low join in it, and that a Mussulman of the highest rank has been known to be first and foremost in making "Huli Fools." The joke is carried so far, that letters are sent making appointments in the names of persons who it is known must be absent from their houses at the time fixed upon; and the laugh is always in proportion to the trouble given. This festival is said by some to have been of Persian origin, it having been, in ancient times, the practice to celebrate with festival rites the period of the vernal equinox, which was, at that period, the commencement of the Persian year.

The origin of the custom is assigned, by Jewish legends, to the mistake of Noah in sending the dove out of the ark before the waters had abated, on the first of the month among the Hebrews, which answers to our first of April. To perpetuate the memory of this deliverance, it was thought proper, whoever forgot so remarkable a circumstance, to punish them by sending them upon some sleeveless errand. Dr. Pegge thus speaks of the custom: "It is a matter of some difficulty to account for the expression, 'An April Fool,' and the strange custom so universally prevalent throughout this kingdom, of people making fools of one another on the first of April, by trying to impose upon each other, and sending one another, upon that day, upon frivolous, ridiculous, and absurd errands. The name undoubtedly arose from this custom; and this, I think, arose from hence: our year formerly began, as to some purposes and in some respects, on the 25th of March, which was supposed to be the Incarnation of our Lord; and it is certain that the commencement of the new year, at whatever time that was supposed to be, was always esteemed a high festival, and that both amongst the ancient Romans and with us." Brande, in his "Popular Antiquities," observes anent the custom: "There is nothing hardly that will bear a clearer demonstration, than that the primitive Christians, by way of conciliating the Pagans to a better worship, humoured their prejudices by yielding to a conformity of names, and even of customs, where they did not essentially interfere with the fundamentals of the gospel doctrine. This was done in order to quiet their position, and to secure their tenure; an admirable expedient, and extremely fit, in those barbarous times, to prevent the people from returning to their old religion." In imitation of the Roman "Saturnalia," was their "Festum Fatorum," or Feast of Fools, designed to expose the pretensions of the Druids to scorn and derision.

To make an "April Fool," in Scotland, the plan usually adopted is, to send a person from place to place, by means of a letter, inscribed:

"On the first day of April Hunt the Gowk another mile;"

in other words, as similar missives in Ireland have conveyed, "Send the fool further." "On the first of April," writes Hone, "1712, Lord Bolingbroke stated to parliament that in the wars called the 'glorious wars of Queen Anne,' the great Duke of Marlborough [so unjustly defamed by Macaulay, the most brilliant of essayists, but most untrustworthy of historians] had not lost a single battle; and yet, that the French had carried their point—the succession to the Spanish monarchy, the pretended cause of these wars." Dean Swift, rightly enough, called this statement "a due donation for All Fool's Day." The custom of making "April Fools" prevails all over the Continent. Among the French a guy made on the first of April is termed un poisson d'Avril, that is, a mackerel, or silly fish, and their customs are similar to ours. On the first of April, 1810, Napoleon the First married the Austrian Archduchess, Maria Louisa, on which occasion some of the waggish Parisians called him un poisson d'Avril. The marriage was certainly not a happy one, nor even its political results what the great conqueror anticipated. A very good story was told some years since of a Parisian lady carrying the joke of making an April fool too far. She carried off a watch from the house of a friend, which was felt to be so little like a mere act of pleasantry, that she was arrested and taken before the correctional police. Her defence was, that it was an April trick, "un poisson d'Avril." When asked whether the watch was still in her possession she replied in the negative, but upon a message being sent to her apartments, the article in request was found, whereupon the fair time-keeper declared she had made the messenger un poisson d'Avril. The joke, however, did not end so pleasantly, for the lady was recommended to remain in the house of correction till the first of April on the following year, and then be dismissed as un poisson d'Avril—an "April Fool."

"Maunday Thursday," which occurs on the 17th of April, and is the day immediately preceding Good Friday, has its origin variously explained. Many assert that it was so termed because our Saviour suffered for the redemption of mankind on the Friday, and that the preceding day is hence called "Maunday Thursday," as being the last day of the commands of our Lord. Others affirm that the day in question is so named from the maunds, wherein were formerly contained gifts, which the English monarchs were wont to distribute on that day, to a certain number of poor persons at Whitehall. The Saxon word mand, is the name for a basket—French manne, and by consequence for any gift, or offering, contained in the basket. Formerly it was the custom for the kings and queens of England, as well as for persons of high estate, to perform their "Maundy," that is, to wash—by a sort of proxy, however, be it understood—the feet of a certain number of poor people—frequently twelve, in imitation of our Saviour washing the feet of his disciples. James II., was, we believe, the last sovereign who personally paid any observance to the custom, which is still preserved in the Greek Church, and is accompanied by many gorgeous ceremonials.

Good Friday, (April 18th,) is a day which, from the earliest records of Christianity, has even been held as a solemn fast, in remembrance of the crucifixion of our blessed Saviour. The custom of eating on this day buns marked with a cross, is a remaining fragment of the many peculiar observances of our ancestors connected with the day. Cecrops, one of the kings of Greece, about sixteen centuries before the Christian era, is said to have first offered up to the Divinity the sacred cross-bread called a bun, (Greek boun, from the representation upon it of the two horns of an ox,) which was made of fine flower and honey. It is a remarkable fact, that at Herculaneum were found two small loaves of about five inches in diameter, marked with a cross, within which were found other lines, and so, we are told, the bread of the Greeks was marked from the earliest period. Similar loaves were discovered in a bake-house at Pompeii. We see, therefore, that the cake or bun of the ancient Greek, crossed, to represent the horns of the ox, which was sacrificed, as well as for the purpose of more readily breaking it, was adopted by the Christians, and used as the only food on the day of the crucifixion, because it preserved, ready at hand, a symbol of that awful and solemn event.

The sixth of April is known as "Old Lady Day," when the presentation of "Easter eggs" commences. The custom of making presents of eggs—much interesting information respecting which will be found in our eighth number—on particular occasions, is of great antiquity. Ornamented Easter eggs were not only considered as offerings of friendship, but chargers filled with eggs having been presented at the church on Easter eve, and duly consecrated, a sacred character was imputed to the gift, which greatly enhanced its value.

If Good Friday is kept as a day of solemn fast and humiliation, Easter Sunday is no less one of joy and thanksgiving throughout all Christendom, as being set apart for the commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection from the dead. It was anciently called the "Great Day," and the "Feast of Feasts," and is the most important in secular transactions of the moveable feasts, inasmuch as the day on which Easter falls regulates all the rest. In some parts of England there are still vestiges of a custom which was once prevalent throughout all ranks of society, called "Heaving," or "Lifting," on Easter Monday and Tuesday. It was generally performed in the open street, though sometimes submitted to in the house. A chair, decorated with ribbons and favours of different colours, was provided, and the person to be lifted seated in it, when the chair was hoisted three several times from the ground. The person lifted was then expected to present a fee to the lifters, after having received a salute from each of the party. On Easter Monday, between the hours of nine and twelve, the men performed the ceremony towards the women; on Tuesday the women did the same for the men. There is reason to believe, from an old record of 1640 paid on the occasion, that Edward I. submitted to this absurd ceremony, and was hoisted in the prescribed manner, by a party of ladies of honour. The old custom of eating tansy pudding at Easter was done in remembrance of the bitter herbs used by the Jews at the paschal supper. It was formerly the custom for corporations to go in full procession, at Easter, to some convenient spot, where they joined in playing at ball with many of their townfolk; and there is a custom in several places of the inhabitants of towns and villages still annually playing the game on Easter Monday.

The fourteenth of April is known as the "first cuckoo day," being the first day on which, in general, the cuckoo is heard. It sometimes appears late in March, but may fitly be ranked among the followers of April, as various old country-ryhmes indicate.

"In the month of April
He opens his bill,"

says an old proverb, while the poet Haywood indulges in the stanza:

"In April, the cuckoo can sing her song by note;
In June, often she cannot sing a note;
At first, koo-coo, koo-coo, still can she do;
At last, kooke-kooke-kooke; six kookes to one coo."

The twenty-third of April is the anniversary of St. George, the patron saint of England. Divested of the many ridiculous legends and incredible stories that have been related of him, the true history of "St. George of Cappadocia," called by the Greeks "the Great Martyr," appears to be that he acquired a large estate in Palestine, and entered into the service of Dioclesian the Tyrant, who, in ignorance of his being a Christian, gave him command of a legion, and a seat in council. On the breaking out of a persecution against the Christians, St. George quitted the emperor's service, and openly distributed his whole fortune in their support and assistance. Dioclesian would have recalled him, but finding that neither offers of aggrandizement, or the threats of death, could make him abandon his faith, at length, after putting him several times to the torture, caused him to be ignominiously dragged through the streets of the city of Lydda, and, finally, beheaded on the 23rd of April, 299. He is patron of the Order of the Garter, which was founded by Edward III., in the year 1349. The twenty fifth of April is the festival of St. Mark the Evangelist, who, on that day, in the year 68, suffered martyrdom in the city of Alexandria.

As it has been well remarked, if the study of plants served no higher purpose than to people solitary places with pleasant thoughts, and render every way-side and hedge-row reminiscent of some foregone pleasure, the pursuit would be sufficiently compensatory. But what most claims our investigation is the almost countless varieties of the vegetable kingdom, their equally varied forms, not merely of foliage and efflorescence, but of roots, leaves, stems, and fruits; their wonderfully diversified places of growth; for nature leaves no nook of earth, from the superficies of the barren rock, to the margin of the oozy sea, unpeopled by them; not one variety of which but has its use, "if men would diligently distil it out." Most deserving of our commiseration, indeed, is anyone to whom

"A primrose by the river's brim,
A yellow primrose is to him,
And it is nothing more."

To us, as Wordsworth has beautifully said:

"The meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that too often lie too deep for tears."

Ere the smiling and tearful April has come to an end, we find it justifying its title to the character of the "opening month of the year." The wild-flowers begin to be more freely scattered, and we find blossoms opening faster than we can mark their appearance. The best way, perhaps, is to select a few examples of flowers that particularly attract our notice, and so get a little group, held together as it were by family ties, and, therefore, the more interesting objects of study. The "Speedwell" family is now very numerously represented. The ivy-leaved Speedwell (Veronica hederifolia.) grows in cultivated fields, as well as in woods. It is an annual plant, flourishing from this period to December. The flowers are small, of a pale, blue colour, diversified with lines of a deeper hue. The blunt-fingered Speedwell (Veronica triphyllos) receives its name from the fingerlike divisions of its leaves. The plant is three or four inches high, and is branched at the base, when the leaves are undivided and opposite each other, while at the top they are divided into three or five segments. The flowers are deep blue. The Speedwell family belongs to a tribe of extremely beautiful but suspicious plants, many of which are fatally poisonous, that is the Fox-glove tribe, to which belong the curious Monkey-flowers, (Minulus.) Slipper-flowers, (Calceolaria.) Snapdragons, (Antirrhinum.) and many other well-known plants. The Monkey-flower is an extremely handsome, profuse flowering plant, with singularly shaped and brilliantly coloured flowers, which are distinguished by their rich and strikingly beautiful marking. Seed sown in Spring makes fine bedding plants for Summer blooming, while seed sown in Autumn produces very effective early flowering choice green-house plants. The Calceolaria are plants of a highly decorative order, indispensable for the ornamentation of the flower-house and garden. The Antirrhinum, commonly called the Snapdragon, is one of our most showy and useful border plants; amongst the recently improved varieties of this valuable genus are large, finely-shaped flowers of the most brilliant colours, with beautifully marked throats. The prevailing colours are, white, crimson, scarlet, orange-scarlet, carmine, purple, and yellow. While the rose-tinted blossoms of the crab begin to adorn the hedge-row, and the sloe or blackthorn hides its leafless stalks beneath a profusion of white blossoms, and while the gardens present the opening bloom of the apple, peach, nectarine, and apricot, the scent and bloom of lowlier blossoms are not wanting to grace the close of the month. The Cowslip (Primula veris.) and the Oxlip, (Primula elatior.) those beautiful relatives of the common Primrose, are favourite flowers with our poets. Perhaps the most fanciful description of the Cowslip is that contained in the following lines, where Shakespeare makes it subservient to the Queen of the Fairies :

"And I serve the fairy queen
To dew her orbs upon the green ;
The Cowslips tall her pensioners be ;
In their gold coats spots you see ;
Those be freckles, fairy favours,
In those freckles live their savours ;
I must go seek some dew-drops here,
And hang a pearl in every Cowslip's ear."

Ground Ivy, (Glechoma hederacea.) which flowers in this month and in May, is a creeping plant, with purple blossoms. It may be easily recognised by these as they grow in threes between the stock and the leaf. It has been thus graphically described :

"And there, upon the sod below,
Ground-ivy's purple blossoms show,
Like helmet of Crusader knight,
Their anthers' cross-like form of light."

The leaves are roundish, and notched at the edges, and the whole plant has a strong, but not unpleasant, smell. It belongs to the Mint tribe, and was called by the Saxons "Ale-hoof," because it was a chief ingredient in their ale. A decoction of this herb is still drunk by many persons as a purifier of the blood, and the old writers tell us that it is also a fine strengthening eye-water, removing inflammations, smarting, and "any grief whatever." Two species of Scorpion Grass (Myosotis) may also now be noticed. These are members of the same family as that truly beautiful and favourite plant the "Forget-me-not." The species now in bloom are the early Field Scorpion Grass, (Myosotis coltina.) growing in dry pastures, in sandy and gravelly soil, and on wall-tops, with spreading flower-stalks, and small blue flowers ; and the yellow and blue Scorpion Grass, (Myosotis versicolor.) so named from having a small blue blossom with a yellow throat. The name "myosotis," given to this family, means "mouse-ear," and is taken from a fancied resemblance of the leaves to the ear of that animal.

That beautiful and delicate little plant, the Wood Sorrel, (Oxalis acetosella.) perhaps the most elegant of all our wild flowers, also flowers in April. Its trefoil leaves are of a bright emerald hue, tinted with crimson beneath ; its stem and root of that transparent carmine tint which adorns the red-stalked rhubarb, and the stalks of both flowers and leaves are of an extremely slight and fragile character. The seed vessel, when ripe, bends downwards, so as to be completely hidden by the leaves, a peculiarity of structure thus noticed by a poet :

"Wood-sorrel hangs her cups,
Ere their frail form and streaky veins decay,
O'er her pale verdure ; but parental care
Inclines the sheltering stems, and to the shade
Of closing leaves her infant race withdraws."

The expressed juice of its leaves forms the poison known as "oxalic acid." This is obtained by soaking them in water, when in the sediment they deposit in their decay are found small crystals, which are the pure oxalic acid. It is used to remove spots and iron-moulds from linen, and Gerard, the old herbalist, says of it : "Apothecaries and herbalists call the wood-sorrel 'alleluya,' and 'cuckow's meate ;' either because the cuckow feeds thereon, or by reason when it springeth forth the cuckow singeth most ; at which time, also, alleluya was wont to be sung in our churches." The species "Oxalidaceæ," is a charming and beautiful class of plants for rockwork, old stumps, etc., in sunny situations, also for baskets, vases, or pots, for indoor decoration ; their brilliant and richly coloured flowers,

"Veined with fine purple streaks," and dark green foliage give them a strikingly attractive appearance. Now, too, we begin to observe in moist situations the early flowering species of a very remarkable tribe of plants, the Orchis tribe. The singular form of their flowers may have made them familiar to most of our readers, especially as some of the species have attracted special notice, under the names "Bee orchis," "Butterfly orchis," etc., on account of the likeness to those insects exhibited in the lower lip of the flower. The species which blossom in April are the Male Orchis, (Orchis mascula.) and the Spider Orchis, (Orchis aranifera.) From the tubers of the former the nutritious substance called "salep" is prepared. Dr. Lindley speaks of the Orchis tribe as containing decidedly the most curious and beautiful plants of a European flora, and adds : "But it is in tropical countries, in damp woods, or on the sides of hills in a serene and equal climate, that these glorious flowers are seen in all their beauty. Seated on the branches of living trees, or resting among the decayed bark of fallen trunks, or running over mossy rocks, or hanging above the head of the admiring traveller, suspended from the gigantic arm of some monarch of the forest, they develop flowers of the gayest colours, and the most varied forms, and they often fill the woods, at night, with their mild and delicate fragrance." The Butterbur, (Tussilago petasites.) whose flowers appear during this month, is a singular looking member of the Colt's-foot family. A spike of pinkish flowers garnishes the top of each thick, spongy stalk, of a whitish colour, the whole not rising above eight inches in height. When the flowers have died away, the leaves rise, and are recognised by their large size, as well as their being dark green above, whitish underneath, and standing singly upon their hollowed footstalks of a white, purple, or green hue.

A VOICE.

MID a nunnery of dewy flowers,
Walked the moist morning, many years ago ;
The pulses of gray fountains notched the hours
The dial reddened in the broadening glow.
And one came to me, thro' the garden paths,
Pausing amid the scented lavender,
Under the lilacs, steeped in purple baths,
And rooted deep in golden moss and myrrh.
And, lifting up an amber viol, she Sang to the sun and heavens and dying dusk,
"Till all the fruit trees breathed of thyme and musk,
"Till the green peaches burst their fragrant musk,
And hung like jewels upon branch and tree.
And I awoke to hear in saintly sighs,
A sweet voice rise and fade into the skies,

ARDGLASS.

THE ancient castle of Ardglass, county Down, popularly known by the name of the King's Castle, was a fortress of considerable size and strength, but is now much dilapidated. A second castle here is called Horn Castle; and a third, Chond Castle; but the origin of these names is now unknown, nor is the period recorded at which any of those castles were erected. Of the remaining fortresses, the most remarkable is that called Jordan's Castle, which, though inferior in size to the King's Castle, is yet constructed with greater elegance than that, or any of the other buildings of the kind, and was a place of considerable strength. It is situated in the centre of the town, and appears to have been the citadel. This castle is memorable for the gallant defence made by its owner, Simon Jordan, who, in the Tyrone rebellion, held it for three years, till he in much obscurity. The ancient English family of the Savages are generally supposed to have been the colonists of the place, and the founders of most of the castles remaining here, to whom a good part of Lecale, as well the Ardes, anciently belonged; for it appears by an indenture, in the public records, dated the 31st of May, 28th of Henry VIII., made between Leonard Gray, Lord Deputy, and Raymond Savage, chieftain of his clan, that it was covenanted—"That Raymond should have the chieftainship and superiority of his Sept, in the territory of the Savages, otherwise called Lecale, as principal chieftain thereof, and that Raymond should give to the Deputy, for acquiring his favour and friendship, 140 fat able cows and a horse, or 15 marks, Irish money, in lieu thereof, at the pleasure of the Deputy." But, however this may be, it is certain that this southern part of Lecale originally belonged to the Magennises; and the historian of the county, Harris, is of opinion that the Savages were only intruders, of a rather recent time; "For," he adds, was relieved by the Lord Deputy Mountjoy, on the 17th June, 1601.

Ardglass is picturesquely situated on the shore of a little harbour of the same name, in the barony of Lecale, seven miles north-east of Downpatrick; and though now a mean village, with very few inhabitants, ranked, anciently, as the principal town of trade, next to Carrickfergus, in the province of Ulster. Its harbour, however, which is iron-bound and full of rocks, is only fit for fishing vessels to enter; for which reason the out-trade was, for the most part, carried on in Killough harbour, from thence called by Speed, the haven of Ardglass. Its antiquity is very great, as a church was founded here by St. Patrick. It is said to have been a borough, though on its ruin the privilege of returning members to parliament went into disuse; in the reign of Henry VI. it was a corporation, governed by a Portrieve. So late as the beginning of the reign of Charles I., the duties of the Port of Ardglass were let to farm. The history of this interesting town is involved

"there is a tradition in these parts that when the Savages had formed a strong body of men, in order to oppress the Magennises and other Irish families in Lecale, the latter were obliged to call for the assistance of the Earl of Kildare, and promised him one or two townlands, according to the extent of their territories, and by that means, that noble family got Ardglass, and other lands thereabouts. When the earl had marched as far as Ballykinlar, the Savages submitted, and so the quarrel ended."

During the various civil wars of Ireland, the castles of Ardglass frequently changed masters. About the year 1578 they were taken from the O'Neils, after a stout resistance by Sir Nicholas Bagnal, Marshal of Ireland, who placed here a strong garrison; and they again fell into the possession of the Irish in the memorable war of 1641. Ardglass formerly gave the title of Earl to the family of Cromwell, and afterwards that of Viscount to the family of Berington.

IRELAND.

I.

I SAW one, pale and stricken, by the sea,
Where the tide laps the crags, and cloudy stars,
Rising and falling through the endless night,
Light the black beaches and the sandy bars.

II.

Around her mournful brows, were interlaced,
Garlands of rosemary and shamrock leaves,
And on her cheek the wan bloom lurked that falls
From moonless heavens, upon Autumn eves.

III.

So sad, so sweet, the passion of all time,
The heritage of conquered race to race,
Immortal grief, intensified despair,
Sat in her closed eyes and drooping face.

IV.

Yet beautiful withal. The mystic charm—
The sense of loveliness unspeakable,
That wrapt her, as the gray mist wraps the morn,
Breathed of the paradise from which she fell.

V.

And, leaning on a broken harp whose strings
Answered with discords to the ocean wind,
She sat—the hopeless Future spread before—
The rayless Ages thronging thick behind.

VI.

For, with the echoes of the caverns, came
The full-voiced generations of the past,
Prophet, and priest, and seer, and warrior,
The field's bright ensign, and the galley's mast.

VII.

And there were cries of triumph on the shore,
And shouts of fighting men upon the brine,
And thundrous peans from exulting hosts,
Wafted round beakers, beaded red with wine;

VIII.

Which died away in sullen glooms and calms,
In whose great hearts, the voice of tumult woke—
Clashing of hostile swords and ringing shields,
And banners, reeling in the battle smoke.

IX.

Lo! as I gazed, there came the sound of prayer,
And pealings of sweet bells, for conflict ceast,
The blackened beach blushed roses to the mere,
The fair sun topped the vapours of the East.

X.

And, listening for the dewy note of morn,
From the four corners of the breaking skies,
I heard the voice of prophecy exclaim
"God's Faithful One, thy griefs are past—Arise!"

UNDER GREEN LEAVES.

ROM the first written chapter of man's history, as one of the most agreeable of our modern lady writers has observed, and that "forbidden tree, whose mortal taste brought death into the world," the sylvan portion of creation has held a very prominent place in various events connected with it. Local legends, and authentic history combine to render the subject an interesting one, even apart from its natural and botanic claims to our regard. Passing over those scriptural and Miltonic trees of life and knowledge, "high, blooming, ambrosial fruit of vegetable gold," we find the dove—whose weary flight over the inundated face of earth is said to have given rise to the after practised "ornithomaney," or divination by birds—returning to the Arkites with a leaf of that tree which is still the symbol of peace and safety. It was under a tree that Abraham pitched his tent upon the plain of Mamre, and entertained celestial visitants; and so early as the death of Sarah, when the first recorded sale of land occurred in the patriarch's purchase of the field of Ephron for a burial place, we find that not only the field and cave, (the natural catacombs of antiquity,) but the "trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure," a circumstance that, even in these primeval times, proves that they were considered valuable.

It is a curious circumstance, in connection with the after history of this tree, that the oak, even in the days of Jacob, appears to have been regarded with peculiar veneration, when, in his terror at the probable consequences of his sons' vengeance on the Canaanites, he fled to Bethel, purging his household of the strange gods that were amongst them, and the ear-rings which, like the sons of Ishmael, they wore, he hid them with the images under the oak that was by Sechem, the very tree where afterwards Joshua set up a pillar under its shadow on the plain. There was the "oak of weeping," also, where Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried, and the angel which Gideon saw sat beneath an oak which was in Ophrah. Whether the sacred groves of the heathens consisted of this tree we know not; but it is certain that in after years the ancient Gauls worshipped Jupiter under its form. The Druidical superstitions with regard to the oak are too familiar to require mention; but it may not be so generally known that, till comparatively modern times, it was accounted unlucky to fell them, and in the "Magna Britannia" it is observed that at Norwood, which is said to have consisted wholly of them, there was one which bore mistletoe, which some persons were so hardy as to cut for gain, selling it to the apothecaries of London, leaving one branch to sprout out. But they, it continues, proved unfortunate after it, for one of them fell lame, and the other lost an eye, notwithstanding which, in the year 1678, a certain man, though he was warned against it, upon account of what the others had suffered, ventured to cut the tree down, and he soon after broke his leg. "To fell oaks," it adds, "hath long been accounted fatal, and such as believe it, produce the instance of the Earl of Winchelsea, who, having cut down a grove of oak, soon after found his countess dead in her bed suddenly, and his eldest son, the Lord Maidstone, was killed at sea by a cannon-ball." In these expressions we can fancy a trace not only of the Druidical superstition relative to the sacredness of the oak, but a mingling of the Grecian fable of the Hamadryads, nymphs which were said to people them, and to be born with and die with those trees.

It was anciently believed that the souls of the dead dwelt in thick groves and forests, as well as that the gods occasionally made them their habitations; the natural gloom and silence of these leafy aisles, in vast tracks like the Hercynian forest, favoured this idea, and hence the custom of sacrificing and building altars in them, and under every green tree, as the Mosaiical phrase is with regard to the worshippers of idols. Poetry, in later days, has fabled them the haunts of the muses, and Virgil speaks of

"Narcycian woods of pitch, whose gloomy shade Seems for retreat of heavenly muses made."

The Romans carried their admiration of certain trees to a remarkable pitch of extravagance. Pliny mentions, amongst other the lotus—six of which was estimated at three millions of sesterces or upwards of twenty-four thousand pounds. The plane was a favourite. Horace speaks of it, and Plato makes the scene of his "Dialogue on Plants" a pleasant spot on the banks of the Ilissus under the shade of plane-trees. Virgil also mentions it as being used for convivial meetings on account of the shelter it afforded, and it was, perhaps, on these occasions that its roots are said to have been nourished with wine. The most singular example, however, of the estimation in which they were held is the anecdote which Tacitus relates of Valerius Asiaticus, who, when on his way to execution, requested that the funeral pile on which his body was afterwards to be burnt might be removed farther from the place of the wood, lest the shade of the trees might be injured by the smoke.

Laurentum, re-baptised in Christian times as Saint Laurence, received its ancient name, according to the Æneid, from the circumstance of a laurel which Latinus found on its site and dedicated to Apollo. Jupiter was also the patron of this tree, because it is said that lightning does not blast it. Hieroglyphically, an oak writer tells us that it signifies honour, conquest, triumph, favour, and preservation. Hence it was the custom of the Roman generals, when sending the senate an account of a victory, to wrap the letters in laurel leaves, a crown of which tree was decreed them on their triumph. With us it is still figuratively used in this sense when we speak of poets and great men as winning laurels.

Formerly, court-leets, as they were called, (a court held by the lord of the manor, wherein all offences under high treason were inquired into,) were frequently held under trees in England. At Singleton, in Kent, there stood in the highway, in 1718, a great old oak tree, beneath which the court was holden, and which retained the name of "Law-day Oak." Court-tree, in the Isle of Sheppey, received its name from a similar circumstance, and open seats of justice still traditionally exist. In Brande's time, there remained in the environs of Wolverhampton what were called "gospel-trees," a name sufficiently indicative of the purpose for which their shade had been used; and the boundaries of parishes and rural districts were commonly distinguished by trees. The Totworth chesnut, celebrated by Cowley, is supposed to have been a boundary tree in the reign of King John; and Sir T. Lauder observes, that he has met with other accounts which place it in the same honourable station as far back as the time of King Stephen.

According to Evelyn, the chesnut is next to the oak in the quality and endurance of its timber, and it appears to have been anciently almost as much used both for ordinary purposes and building. In the reign of Henry II., one Fitzstephen, who wrote a description of London, speaks of a very noble and large forest of Spanish chesnut trees spreading at that time on the boreal part of the city; and it is certain, from what the author of "The Sylva" tells us, that a great number of the houses of the London of his day were built of this wood. Not only Camden and Lambard, but other later topographers, assure us that forests of those trees were common in England, especially in Kent, in the natural history of which they are set down as indigenous. The cultivation of the Spanish chesnut has, however, declined in England.

The pleasant shade of trees, which made them in the palmy days of Greece and Rome the haunts of pleasure and the schools of learning, for many of their philosophers taught in groves, or made their gardens their academies, has rendered them in our own country (as in every other) the natural rendezvous of rural sports, and holiday fairs were very frequently held in the vicinity of remarkable trees, of which Fairlop is an existing illustration. Gilpin tells us that the traditions of the county trace, this interesting oak half way up the Christian era; forty years ago the shade of its eleven vast arms covered an area of three hundred feet in circuit, and no booth was suffered to be erected beyond the extent of its boughs. The fair originated in the annual practice of a Mr. Day, of Wapping, dining with his friends under its leafy canopy, on rustic fare, beans and bacon comprising the only dishes admitted at the simple feast, but they were sauced and powdered with such appetite and good humour as the fresh summer air and lovely scenery of the forest afforded them. That tree, hallowed to this day by the genius of Shakspeare and the wit of the "Merry Wives," the hunter-haunted oak of Windsor Forest, is another instance of the embalming process of association, and the spells which poetry and romance have woven around those children of the woods; nor must we forget, in our brief category of sylvan memoir, the famous oak in the neighbourhood of Wolverhampton, in the shady arms of which Charles the Second saved himself from his pursuers, after the battle of Worcester. The wearing of oak leaves on the 29th of May, and the decking of houses with its branches in commemoration of this event, is not yet wholly exploded; though from a courtly compliment it has degenerated into a vulgar usage. Tyrrell's Oak, as it is traditionally called, still marks the spot where

"Rufus, tugging at the deadly dart, Bled in the forest, like a wounded hart."

Penshurst Park, in Kent, boasts also its legendary tree, said to have been planted on the birth of Sir Philip Sidney, and rendered classic by the poets Ben Jonson and Waller.

APRIL.

THE day is dim, white cloudlands pass
Between me and the tearful skies;
And all around from grove and brake,
The melodies of Spring time rise.

The daisies, loved of childhood, lift
Their snowy clusters in the mead;
And cowslips, bright in hawthorn gloom,
Are hung with many a trembling head.

From happy groves, I hear the songs,
Ah! vainly syllabled in words;
The chrystal pipes and twitterings
Of sun and flower-awakened birds.

Between the rain and purple mist,
That phantom-like o'er hance the rills,
A stream of yellow sunlight falls
Along the reaches of the hills.

And, looking far a-skanee, I see
Bright villages and homes of men,
And blue smoke curling to the south,
From river bank and pleasant glen.

Or westward, where yon cloudy arm
Its rain across the landscapes drops,
At times I hear, distinct and loud,
The woodman's axe within the copse.

Save which no sound of life, except
The birds' songs by the brooks and floods,
Floats upwards from the universe,
Of shining fields and blowing woods.

DALKEY SIXTY YEARS AGO.

THE little rocky island of Dalkey forms the south-eastern extremity of the Bay of Dublin, as the bold and nearly insulated promontory of Howth forms its north-eastern termination. It is separated from the mainland of the parish from which it takes, or to which, perhaps, it gives its name, by a channel called Dalkey Sound, which is about nine hundred yards long, three hundred and eight yards wide at its south entrance, and two hundred and nine yards wide at its north entrance; the soundings in mid-channel varying from ten to five fathoms. This channel was anciently considered a tolerably safe and convenient harbour, and was the principal anchorage for ships frequenting the little castellated seaport town of Dalkey from which merchandise was transferred to Dublin, as well by boats as by cars. Hence also, the harbour of Dalkey was frequently used in former times on state occasions for the embarkation or landing of the Irish Viceroys and other state officers. The Lord Deputy, Philip de Courtney, landed here in 1386, and Sir John Stanley, the deputy of the Marquis of Dublin in the following year. In 1414, Sir John Talbot, then Lord Furnival, and afterwards the renowned Earl of Shrewsbury, landed here as Viceroy of Ireland; and in 1488, Sir Richard Edgecombe embarked at this harbour for England, after having taken the homage and oaths of fidelity of the nobility who had espoused the cause of Lambert Simnel. Here also landed Sir Edward Bellingham, Lord Lieutenant, in 1548, and Sir Anthony St. Leger, in 1553; and it was from this harbour that the Earl of Sussex, in 1558, embarked a large body of forces to oppose the Scottish invaders at the isle of Rathlin; and lastly, again, it was here that the unfortunate Sir John Perrot landed as Viceroy, in 1584. The conversion of this sound into an asylum harbour was at one time contemplated by government, and a plan for the purpose was proposed by the Committee of Inland Navigation; but from certain objections which were made to it, the project was abandoned. The situation would certainly have been a more imposing and magnificent one than that ultimately chosen.

The Island of Dalkey is of a nearly oval form, having a very irregular surface, in part rocky, and in part consisting of a fertile salt marsh, very valuable for the cure of sick cattle, who by feeding on it quickly recover and fatten. It is five hundred and twenty-eight yards long from north to south, and three hundred and eight yards wide from east to west, and comprises about twenty-nine acres of pasture. Its shore is rocky, and in some parts precipitous, and it commands the most beautiful views of the bays of Dublin and Killiney. Among several springs of fresh water on it, one on its south-west side has long been considered to possess sanative properties. On the same side there are the roofless walls of an ancient church dedicated to St. Benet, or Benedict, the patron of the parish; and at its south-eastern extremity there is a battery, and a Martello tower which differs from all the other structures of this class erected on the Irish coast, in having its entrance not at the side, but on its top. It is traditionally stated that during the remarkable plague which visited Dublin in 1575, many of the citizens fled to this island for safety.

Dalkey island has several smaller ones contiguous to it, one of which, Lamb Island, is covered with grass, while the others present a surface of bare granite. Of the latter islets one is called Clare Rock, and another the Maiden Rock, an appellation derived from a tradition said to be of twelve hundred years' antiquity, that twelve young maidens from Bullock and Dalkey having gone over to this rock to gather duilisk, they were overtaken by a sudden storm so violent as to prohibit assistance from the larger island, and all miserably perished. To the north of these islands is situated the group of rocks called the Muglins, extending one hundred and thirty-two yards in length, and seventy-one in width. On those rocks, in 1765, the pirates Mac Kinley and Gidley were hanged in chains for the murder of Captain Glass.

It does not, indeed, require a very great age for many Dublinians to remember when the country along the southern shore of our beautiful bay, from Dunleary to the land's-end on Dalkey Common, presented a nearly uniform character of wildness and solitude—heathy grounds, broken only by masses of granite rocks, and tufts of blossomy furze, without culture, and, except in the little walled villages of Bullock and Dalkey, almost uninhabited. The district known as the Commons of Dalkey, which extended from the village to the eastern extremity of the bay; the "Sound," or channel lying on its north-east, and the rocky hill of Dalkey on its south—this in particular was a locality of singularly romantic beauty, a creation of nature in her most sportive mood, and wholly untouched, as it would appear, by the hand of man. Giant masses of granite rocks, sometimes forming detached groups, and at others arranged into semicircular and even circular ledges, gave the greatest variety and inequalities of surface, and formed numerous dells of the greenest sward, so singularly wild and secluded that the elves themselves might justly claim them as their own. To these natural features should be added those of the rocky iron-bound coast, with its little coves, commanding from its cliffs the most delightful views of Killiney Bay, the Sound, the Island of Dalkey, and the Bay of Dublin. These latter features still remain, and can never change; but of all the others which we have noticed, what is there left? Scarcely a vestige that would remind the spectator of what the locality had been. The rocks have been nearly all removed, or converted into building materials for an assemblage of houses of all kinds of fantastic construction, surrounded for the most part by high and unsightly stone walls; and, except in the views obtained from some spots in it, the picturesque beauty of Dalkey Common is gone for ever.

We must not forget that our subject requires of us a notice of festivities of a very different character, of which Dalkey was in former times the scene—when Dublin and its suburbs poured forth their crowds to enjoy the fun and drolleries of the crowning of Dalkey's insular king—when Dalkey, its Common, its Sound, and its Island, on a June day, annually for several years, presented a spectacle of life, gaiety, good-humour, and enjoyment, such perhaps as was rarely ever exhibited elsewhere. What a glorious day was this for the Dunleary, Bullock, and Dalkey boatmen! Generous fellows! they would take over his majesty's lieges to his empire for almost nothing—frequently for nothing; but, being determined enemies to absenteeism, they would not allow them to depart on the same terms, but would mulct those with taxes ad libitum who desired to abandon their country. And, again, what a glorious day was this for the jingle-drivers of the Blackrock, the noddly-drivers, and the drivers of all other sorts of hired carriages in Dublin. Has it never occurred to the Railroad people to revive these forgotten frolics? What a harvest they might reap! But what do we say? The thing is impossible. The mirthful temperament, the thoughtless gaiety, the wit and humour that characterised the citizens in those days, are gone for ever. The Dublinians have become a grave, thoughtful, and serious people—we had almost said, a dull one. Their faces no longer wear a cheerful and happy look; the very youths of our metropolis seem to be ignorant of what merriment is, or at best to suppose that it consists in puffing tobacco smoke!

Ah! very different were the notions of their predecessors, the nobility and gentry of his Majesty the King of Dalkey! Smoking would not at all have suited their mercurial temperament: it would have been the last thing that they would have thought of to have had their tongues tied and their mouths contorted into ugliness in the ridiculously serious effort to hold a cigar between the lips, and look absurdly important! These fellows thought that mouths were given for a very different purpose—to sing the manly song, to throw forth, not clouds of tobacco smoke, but flashes of wit and humour; and we are inclined to think they were right.

The day selected for the festivities was a Sunday in the end of August or beginning of September; the landing of his Majesty and nobles from the royal barge under a salute of twenty-one guns, the band playing "God save the King," and the assembled multitude rending the air with their acclamations! Then the ceremony of his coronation, and afterwards his journey through his dominions, attended by his nobles! At an early hour the monarch and his court proceeded in ludicrously solemn procession from the palace to the church—at the present day a roofless ruin—in which the ceremony was performed with a mock gravity which was, however thoughtlessly profane, still irresistibly humorous. The nobles, with painted faces and a profuse display of stars and ribbons, had their titles and appropriate badges of office. There was the grand chamberlain, with his bunch of old rusty keys—the archbishop with his paper mitre and his natural beard of a month's growth! The very titles of these great personages were conferred in a spirit of drollery, and made characteristic of the peculiarities of the individuals who bore them. Thus there was a Lord of Ireland's Ey—a grave-looking gentleman who had lost one of his visual organs; a Lord Posey—a gentleman who was remarkable for his habit of carrying a bunch of flowers at his breast; and so on. All the nobility were wits, orators, and generally first-rate vocalists, and the royal visitors were similarly gifted. Charles Inledon, the prince of ballad-singers of his time, here sang his "Black-eyed Susan" and other charming ditties, and John Philpot Curran, the greatest wit of the world, set the table in a roar with his meteor flashes. But the prime spirits of the court were his Majesty himself, Stephen Armitage, his Lord High Admiral Luke Cassidy, and his archbishop—Gillespy. The long coronation sermon of the latter was one of the richest treats of the day, and produced effects such as sermon never produced before.

During this august and imposing ceremony, the church was not only crowded to excess, and its ruined walls covered with human beings, but it was also surrounded with a dense mass of anxious listeners. As to his Majesty himself, he was at times the gravest, and at times the merriest of monarchs, much of his humour consisting in the whimsical uncertainty of his movements, for there never was a crowned head more capricious or changeable in disposition than the King of Dalkey. He would set out attended by his court on a journey to some distant region of his dominions, change his mind in a minute, and alter his route elsewhere, and again change in a few minutes; and all these mutations of purpose were most loyally approved of and sympathised in by his majesty's nobles and subjects. Another trait in King Stephen's character was his love for song; and when the word ran through his empire that at the royal banquet his majesty had commenced or was about to commence his favourite "Love is my passion and glory!" there was scarcely one of his subjects, male or female, who did not make a rush to get within ear-shot of him. Peace be with thee, Stephen! thou wert a king "of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy;" and although thy reign was short and thy dominions small, thou mad'st more of thy subjects truly happy than many monarchs whose reigns were as much longer as their possessions were more extensive! The general outline of the proceedings, as given in that admirable little work, "Ireland Sixty Years Ago," was as follows:

The king landed in state, and was saluted by ordnance on the island. He assembled the most convivial members of the society under the names of his principal officers, and the other guests as his subjects, and in a mock heroic speech resigned his crown into their hands, and desired them to elect a successor. A re-election always followed, and his majesty, in a second speech, expressed his gratitude, was anointed with a bottle of whiskey, and crowned among the plaudits of the people. He then received their petitions and complaints, which were tendered and spoken upon with comic gravity. The members were all of the popular side in politics, and the entire proceeding was made the groundwork for squibs on the political topics of the day. Then followed a sermon from the chief of the Druids and primate of Dalkey, preached in the ruined church, which was called the Cathedral of Dalkey. This latter proceeding was often not a little objectionable, in treating with levity sacred subjects. An ode, composed for the occasion, was then sung by all the people, and the whole ceremony concluded by a feast on the rocks, after which his majesty and his officers of state again embarked in pomp, and were followed by his people.

The last president of this curious society was a convivial Dublin bookseller, named Armitage, who reigned under the title of "King Stephen the First." There is a cluster of rocks near Dalkey, called the Muglins, and another called the Maiden; there are also some small islands—one called Magee, in the bay, and the others, Ireland's Ey and Lambay, on the north of Howth. The king's title united dignities derived from all these localities, in the following form:—His facetious Majesty, Stephen the First, King of Dalkey, Emperor of the Muglins, Prince of the Holy Island of Magee, and Elector of Lambay and Ireland's Ey, Defender of his own Faith, and respecter of all others, Sovereign of the illustrious order of the Lobster and Periwinkle." Another illustrious member was "My Lord Tokay," a wine merchant. The office of primate was filled by a Mr. Gillespie. Besides filling the columns of the "Dalkey Gazette," the proceedings of the society attracted so much attention and were considered to be conducted with so much humour and cleverness, that their annual meetings were recorded in most of the Dublin papers, among the remarkable news of the day.

The politics of "Cooney's Morning Post" were very democratic, and the "Dalkey Gazette," of course, were of the same tone. Its merit consisted in being a serio-comic record of the proceedings of the society, and in satirizing the political events of the day, by means of this mimic kingdom—much in the style of a Christmas pantomime. It must have been indebted for its popularity greatly to the feelings of its readers. The paper is now difficult to be met with.

In imitation of the order of knighthood founded by the government, the king of Dalkey founded the order of Druids. The president was furnished with a large medallion, representing the bust of one of those mysterious persons, which he wore on state occasions suspended from his neck.

Among the persons who took part in the convivialities of the kingdom of Dalkey, was the celebrated T. O'Meara. As the times became menacing, and Ireland infected with French principles, the Lord Chancellor Clare was vigilant in watching every society which was formed, and, among the rest, the kingdom of Dalkey and its Druids attracted his notice. O'Meara was personally known to him, and supposing he could enlighten him, Lord Clare sent for him.

"You, sir," said the chancellor, "are, I understand, connected with the kingdom of Dalkey."

"I am, my lord," said O'Meara.

"Pray, may I ask what title are you recognised by?"
 "I am Duke of Muglins."
 "And what post do you hold under the government?"
 "Chief Commissioner of the Revenue."
 "What are your emoluments in right of your office?"
 "I am allowed to import ten thousand hogsheads, duty free."
 "Hogsheads of what, Mr. Commissioner?"
 "Of salt water, my lord."

The chancellor was satisfied without further question.

O'Meara was an attorney well known at that time, as many of the same profession were, for his conviviality, spirit, wit, singularity, and good nature. Among other anecdotes told of him was one very characteristic. An Englishman of rank and fortune visited Ireland, and accidentally met him at dinner at a friend's house. It was then the hospitable custom for every person who met a stranger at a friend's house, to ask him to dinner, and show him every attention. This was done with more than usual attention by O'Meara, who attached himself to the Englishman, invited him to his house in the country, and, in the display of his good nature and sense of hospitality, gave up his time and business to make the visit agreeable and instructive to his acquaintance, who left Ireland with many expressions of obligation, for the kindness and attention he had received. Soon after, O'Meara for the first time visited London, and being a total stranger there was well pleased to see one day his English acquaintance walking on the other side of Bond-street; so he immediately crossed over, and with outstretched hand declared how delighted he was to see him again. The gentleman was walking with a group of others of a high aristocratic cast, and dressed in the utmost propriety of costume; and when he saw a wild-looking man, with soiled leather breeches, dirty top-boots, not over clean linen, nor very close shaven beard, striding up to him, with a whip in his hand and the lash twisted under his arm, he started back, and with a look of cold surprise, said—

"Sir, you have the advantage of me."

"I have, sir," said O'Meara, looking at him coolly for a moment—"I have, sir, and by — I'll keep it;" and turned from him, casting such a look of contempt and superiority, as the other did not think it prudent to notice.

The last anniversary of the kingdom of Dalkey was, as we have mentioned, held in August, 1797, if we except a miserable attempt to revive it made a few years since.

The concourse of spectators on the shore and island on that occasion was estimated at not less than twenty thousand. The popular interest excited by the proceedings of the society, and its free political sentiments, were considered dangerous in the then excited state of the public mind; and to avoid being suppressed by the strong arm of the government, its meetings were, during the disturbed and alarming crisis of 1798, discontinued.

The odes composed for these commemorations had various degrees of merit. The following are two verses of the ode of 1793:—

"Lord of all Dalkey lands,
 Chief of our jovial bands,
 Are you not man?
 With you though peace doth reign,
 Nor blood your isle doth stain,
 Nor famine here complain,
 Are you not man?"

What though the realms rejoice
 In your melodious voice;
 Kings are but men!
 And while each subject sings:
 'God made us men, not kings!'—
 With echo Dalkey rings:
 'Kings are but men!'"

As we have already remarked, the last meeting of the convivial society of which the King of Dalkey was the president, and which formerly attracted so large a portion of public attention, was held on the 20th of August, 1797. The ode of that year is believed to be from the pen of Thomas Moore, who was a faithful and most convivial subject of his facetious Majesty, and we regret, from the interest attached to it as one of Moore's earliest poetic efforts, that the space at our disposal prevents us reproducing it here.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

VI.—INCH CASTLE, COUNTY KILDARE.

Inch Castle is situated about three miles north-east of Athy, in the barony of East Narragh and Rheban. It was built by De Vesey, in the reign of King John, and afterwards enlarged by the sixth Earl of Kildare, about 1420. There is but one of the towers now remaining, yet, from the extensive foundations, it must have been a place of considerable importance. The land in the neighbourhood lies remarkably flat, with the exception of two ridges that run nearly parallel northward from the castle, with a marsh lying between them.

It was on these heights the armies of Ormond and Mountgarrett, in 1642, marched in sight of each other the evening previous to the battle of Kilrush; that of Ormond on the high grounds of Ardsull, Fontstown, and Kilrush; whilst the forces under Mountgarrett, and attended by the Lords Dunboyne and Ikerrin, Roger Moore, Hugh Byrne, and other leaders of Leinster, proceeded in the same direction, along the heights of Birtown, Ballyndrum, Glassealy, and Narraghmore. Mountgarrett having the advantage in numbers, and anxious for battle, out-marched Ormond's forces, and posted himself on Bullhill and Kilrush, completely intercepting Ormond's further progress to Dublin; a general engagement became unavoidable. The left wing of the Irish was broken by the first charge; the right, animated by their leaders, maintained the contest for some time, but eventually fell back on a neighbouring eminence, since called Battlemount; where, after a determined resistance, they at length broke and fled.

The country for miles around Inch Castle has many historical connexions; to the east may be seen the much spoken of Rath of Mullaghmast, the ancient Carmen, or the enclosed place, which was the Naasteighan, where the states of the southern parts of Leinster met. It is situated on a high and gently sloping hill, and near it are sixteen little conical mounts, on which, it is supposed, the chiefs sat in council. Carmen was anathematized in the sixth century, and the place of assemblage of the chiefs was then removed to the present Naas, one of the shire towns of the county. It takes its present name, Mullaghmast, or Mallach Mastean, (the mount of decapitation) from the perfidy of some adventurers in the sixteenth century, who having overrun part of the neighbouring country, were resisted by the Irish chieftains who had properties on the Leix (Queen's county) side of the river Barrow. However, in order to have a final settlement of their differences, it was proposed by the adventurers, that a conference should be held at Carmen, which was agreed to; and on New Year's day, 1577, the chiefs of the Barrow side repaired to the place, where they were treacherously made prisoners and beheaded.

A little to the north of the castle is also to be seen the Moat of Ardsull, Ascul, or Arstoll, anciently Rath-ais-Ceal, corruptly Rath-scull. In 1315, the Scots, under Robert Bruce, gained a battle here, and plundered the neighbourhood. The rath stands where the battle was fought, and commands a great extent of country. Hammond le Crose, Sir William Prendergast, and John, Lord de Bonneville, on the part of the Irish; and Fergus Andressan and Sir Walter Murray, of the Scottish party, were slain in this battle, and buried in Athy.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

HEN Swift wrote "Gulliver's Travels," he attained a position among the world's celebrities. He created a book which possessed the principle of vitality, established the reputation of its author, and secured a lasting popularity for itself. Tainted with gross corruption as it is, the story is most original in conception, and careful in execution; for, of all English writers, Swift is the least chargeable with imitation or plagiarism. The real life of the Dean of St. Patrick's bears some resemblance to that of his imaginary Gulliver. He knew what it was to find himself surrounded by Lilliputians, and to be at the mercy of Brobdingnagians; to encounter every description of obstacle and disappointment, and the antitheses of his style are not stronger than the contrasts of his life, about the early part of which there is much obscurity. The place of his birth is undetermined; he was either born in Hoey's Court, Dublin, or at Leicester, in England; but in which place is a doubtful question, inasmuch as he never attempted to solve it. At any rate, he was Irish by education, as he went to school at Kilkenny, and was afterwards admitted to the University of Dublin.

Here Swift's troubles began. He obtained a degree by special favour, or, in other words, without any special qualification. It is a fact that he was suspended from his degree of B.A., for exciting disturbances within the College, and insulting the Junior Dean. He and another were sentenced by the Board to ask pardon publicly of the Dean on their knees, as having offended more atrociously than the rest. These facts afford the true solution of Swift's animosity towards Trinity College, and account for his determination to take the degree of M.A., at Oxford; and the solution receives confirmation from this, that the Junior Dean, for insulting whom he was punished, was the same Mr. Owen Lloyd—afterwards Professor of Divinity and Dean of Down—whom Swift has treated with so much severity in his account of Lord Wharton. During this time he was supported by his uncle, Godwin Smith, whose death in 1688 rendered it necessary that his nephew should resolve on his future course of life. He found a patron in Sir William Temple, with whom he resided two years, and by whom he was introduced to King William III., and by that monarch he was initiated into the art and mystery of cutting asparagus in the Dutch fashion, and offered a commission in a cavalry corps. As a protégé of Sir William Temple's, Swift was employed to lay before the king the strongest arguments which could be adduced for triennial parliaments. This commission he accepted, feeling the utmost confidence in his own power—an argumentative Brobdingnagian, who shrank into a Lilliputian in the presence of the king's majesty.

Although Swift's mode of life at this time was singularly regular, he was, during his residence at Moor-Park—the seat of Sir William Temple—affected by continued attacks of giddiness and deafness, for which he had been recommended to take exercise, and therefore he made it a rule to run half-a-mile up and down a hill every two hours. He had fixed hours of study, and improved every opportunity, resolving to eradicate his disgrace at Dublin by obtaining fairly a degree at Oxford. But, however agreeable Swift may have found this sort of life for a time, he at length grew weary of it. The hospitality of Sir William Temple became burdensome; and, as there was no money to be had, he left in discontent. The situation of Deputy-Master of the Rolls in Ireland, which Sir William obtained for him, and for which he was eminently disqualified, rendered him still more anxious to enter a profession. The church seemed to him the only road to advancement; he therefore chose it, but found it everywhere beset with thorns. As Prebend of Kilroot, he obtained one hundred pounds a-year; but he resigned this post at the suggestion of his old patron, with whom he again took up his abode, and continued to reside until Sir William's death. He had hoped that the King would have bestowed on him some clerical appointment, but in this, as in everything else, he was disappointed; and he, accordingly, accepted the office of private secretary to Earl Berkeley, accompanying that nobleman to Ireland. On his arrival in Dublin, he found that he had been supplanted by a man named Bush, a clergyman not being a proper secretary; but, as Derry was in want of a dean, and the preferment in Earl Berkeley's gift, Swift expected to obtain it, and was intensely indignant at only receiving a couple of livings in the diocese of Meath. He was disappointed in every way. He had written some verses, and Dryden, on seeing them, had remarked, "Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet." At Laracor, one of the livings bestowed on Swift by Earl Berkeley, he is said by Johnson to have performed all the offices of his profession with great exactness; but it was thither he invited the unfortunate Stella, about whom so much has been said, and concerning whom so little is known.

Swift was no precocious genius. Before he wrote at all he learned to exemplify his own definition of good writing—that is, placing proper words in proper places. His first work, except a few poetical essays, was entitled, "Discussions in Ancient Rome," and was not published till he was thirty-four years old. Three years later he issued the "Tale of a Tub," the authorship of which he never owned, although he lost by it the chance of a bishopric. In the year 1710, Swift began the busiest and most important part of his life. He emerged from the obscurity in which so much of his genius had been hidden into the broad area of political strife. He became the intimate of Harley. He was foremost in pamphleteering controversies on the conduct of the war, and was the first to point out to the people how they were being duped by Marlborough, and exhausting their wealth without any personal advantage—how much the Allies were accomplishing for Dutch interests, and how little for the aggrandizement of England. It was about this time that, according to his own showing, he lost his power of sermon-making, and was able only to "preach pamphlets." The place-seeker was now turned into the place-giver. His interest with the government was well known; and every man who had any claim, or who chose to imagine that he possessed such a claim, besieged him for preferment. He was in a Lilliputian world, and the Lilliputians swarmed about him in a manner which was, at the same time, gratifying and annoying.

In 1731, he was appointed to the Deanery of St. Patrick's. But in the midst of the excitement of public life, he was ill at ease; he no sooner acquired popularity than he pined for repose. The man-mountain yearned for congenial society; and, surrounded by the wits, scholars, and the statesmen of the age, he sighed for the quiet rectory of Laracor, and the society of the beloved and suffering Stella. When the Tory party broke down, and Whiggism came into power, Swift sheltered himself in obscurity; he proceeded to his deanery, and was, according to one authority, received with respect, and, according to another, was pelted by the populace. This circumstance may, however, refer to a later period of his life. At all events, he was not well received, and soon discovered that the repose he had so agreeably anticipated, was incapable of affording the relief he sought; he was soon pamphleteering as fast as ever, and maintaining a running commentary on the affairs of state. He felt himself an exile—he was an Irishman against his will—the Brobdingnagians were acting as they pleased towards him; his canonicals were fetters—his deanery a prison; and his spirit chafed at the constraint which he was compelled to bear. He sought society—threw open his house to visitors twice a week. He became avaricious—used to say he was the poorest gentleman in Ireland who ate upon plate, and the richest that lived without a coach. He married Stella, but kept the matter secret; and they continued to reside in different houses, making no change whatever in their mode of life. But Swift could not long remain in retirement. The duties of his deanery were not enough to occupy him; he could manage the revenues of his church with exact economy, be careful to maintain the excellency of his choir, rigidly perform the functions of his office, and still have time for other employment. His condition was unenviable; his tyrannical peevishness was chronic; and in rendering those about him uncomfortable, he made himself doubly miserable. To a kind heart he joined a rigorous temper; to a charitable disposition, an exterior naturally rough. His habits were so peculiar as to appear studiously eccentric; he complained that one of Lord Orrery's servants committed fifteen faults while serving at table; he stowed his pockets with all sorts of coins to give away, but never gave more than one piece at a time; he lent money to the peasantry, and sued them for its recovery; he insisted on Gay and Pope receiving half-a-crown apiece, as they refused to sup or take wine, saying that he was resolved to gain nothing by them; he sought admission into aristocratic society, and yet affected to despise the manners of the great; he wanted nothing but seclusion when at the zenith of popularity, and nothing but popularity when hidden in obscurity. He reiterated his complaints about his Irish exile, till Bolingbroke offered him an English living, and then he rejected that proposal and retained the pleasure of complaining.

In 1724 Wood's patent, empowering him to coin halfpence and farthings for Ireland, produced the "Drapier Letters" from Swift's pen. In these letters the author pointed out the folly of changing gold and silver for coin worth not one-third of its nominal value. The panic was universal; the coin was refused. The pamphlet which had occasioned the refusal was denounced as highly criminal, and three hundred pounds were offered for the discovery of the writer. Swift had only entrusted the secret to his butler, and the man was faithful. In 1727 Swift published his great work, "Gulliver's Travels," "a production," says Johnson, "so new and strange, that it filled the reader with a mingled emotion of admiration and amazement. It was received with such avidity that the first edition was exhausted before the second could be made; it was read by the high and the low, the learned and the illiterate." But, with his new reputation, fresh trouble came. He fell ill at Pope's residence, and left with little ceremony, intimating that "two sick friends could not live together." He returned to a home of sorrow to find poor Stella sinking into the grave; he stood beside her in her last moments, and offered, when it was too late, to acknowledge her openly as his wife. She had loved him deeply, and he had wronged her cruelly; she died a victim to the caprice of the man to whom she was devotedly attached, but who had never treated her as a wife. After her death the unhappy temperament of Swift increased. He was more severe, more exacting, more exasperating than before; he wrote occasionally, but produced nothing of lasting importance; he quarrelled with all his friends, and wondered why he was deserted. His mind gave way at length, and he became insane. Familiar faces were unknown to him; all that he was or had been vanished from his memory. He grew ill, and was afflicted with an inflammation in the eye, which occasioned him excessive torture. When that subsided it left him lethargic and heedless. He passed one year in total silence, and died in October, 1744, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.

THE world has gone searching for the philosopher's stone, but no one has ever found it. It is a question grave enough for consideration, if, in our days, any one knows the meaning of the term which once charmed kings, princes, nobles, sages, and charlatans, with its pleasing jingle. The history of a thing which occupied such a remarkable position in the minds of mankind is worthy our consideration.

The philosopher's stone was a pulverulent substance, named powder of projection, which was said to possess the strange virtue of effecting the transmutation into gold of divers metals, and particularly of mercury. This powder—the object of researches as assiduous as obstinate, consumed the life and fortune of very many individuals. Beyond all other periods, it was in the commencement of the fifteenth century this study became violent to the degree of insanity, and a great and ordinary passion. In those times we see men of the first desert, occupying themselves and their knowledge in this foolish enterprise. Furnaces, charcoal retorts, alembics, and crucibles—every costly utensil of the laboratory, absorbed enormous sums of money from them, without any good result. Clever schemers pretended, that they possessed the secret of the philosopher's stone, and wasted in a little time, all the wealth of those credulous persons who had the weakness to supply the means for their operations.

The name of Alchemist was given to those biased searchers after the marvellous powder. It ought, however, to be remembered, that their discoveries, frequently unexpected, prepared the way which chemistry opened up, at a later period—chemistry, that wondrous science, which, in multiplying every day the resources of industry, increased as well the happiness of society; chemistry to which modern civilization owes its immense progress, and which has, so to speak, changed the face of the world.

The number of men distinguished by their knowledge, who have pretended they possessed the philosopher's stone, or who have given their belief to transmutation, is sufficiently elevated. We shall cite a few of the most memorable.

Raymond Lully was, it is said, the first who gave himself up to the search for the philosopher's stone. His great wealth is attributed to this talisman; but the true source of his riches is the impost upon wool, which he established and which he fixed. Arnold de Villeneuve was a great physician and a clever alchemist: his practice and the favour of the Popes resident at Avignon, were sources of his wealth. The vulgar pretended that by the means of his philosopher's stone, Arnold made gold by heaps. Nicholas Flamel passed in the eyes of his contemporaries for a learned alchemist, who possessed the secret of transmutation. The immense fortune which he acquired in becoming the secret intermediary between the Jews, driven from France, and their debtors, caused the belief that he understood the composition of the philosophers' stone. Cornelius Agrippa allied the Cabala to medicine, and attempted to explain the apocryphal books of Hermes. This enthusiast gave himself up from his youth to the study of the magical and cabalistic sciences. He asserted that he had at last discovered the secret of the great work, and arrived at the invention of the philosopher's stone. From this reputation he passed in the eyes of his contemporaries for having the power to make gold. Paracelsus, great and gifted as he was, ranks the first amongst the alchemists. Endowed with a wandering imagination, we find in his works that he places the most miserable puerilities beside subjects the most grave. Presumptuous and vain, he vaunted that he had discovered the philosopher's stone, and the universal elixir. He proclaimed also with the effrontery of a charlatan that he could extend the duration of human life at his pleasure by means of the universal elixir. Michael Sendivogius and Antonio Bragadine, obtained great reputation as alchemists. It was said of them that they made gold with as great facility as a smith forges steel. Cardan and Pic de la Mirandola, Van Helmont and Sennert are also amongst the persons celebrated as professors of this art; of each of them there are testimonies to their ability to fulfil the pretences upon which they traded. It is a question, indeed, how far they themselves were not the dupes of their hopes, and the excited imagination to which those hopes gave rise.

There is no doubt that intellects the most enlightened of their time, and men of the most exalted station, became dupes of the tricksters in the art of alchemy. Martin d'Anvers, for instance, a professor of philosophy, eminent for his learning, was for a long time the enemy of the adepts. It is related that as he was disputing with warmth one day against the philosopher's stone, one of his adversaries brought before him some lead, a crucible, and a furnace. When the lead was melted in the presence of all who were listening to the philosopher, he poured in the powder of projection, and the base metal became changed into gold. Then, addressing Martin d'Anvers:

"Answer," said he, "that argument!"

From that day Martin d'Anvers became an alchemist. Another remarkable instance of this trick took place at Prague. The Emperor Frederick the Third, being at that city in the year 1648, was an ocular witness of the transmutation of three pounds of quicksilver, by one grain of the powder of projection. The man who worked this transmutation was called Rixhausen. For the deed he obtained a revenue and the title of baron for recompense. The Emperor caused a medal to be struck made of this philosophic gold. On one side of the medal was represented a young man having above his head a rising sun, on the other was read the words: "The divine metamorphosis made at Prague, January the fifteenth, 1648, in presence of the Emperor Frederick III." This Rixthausen, an artful and skilful man, sold to the emperor and to many of the nobility the secret of the powder of transmutation. He afterwards decamped carrying with him enormous sums of money. The new possessors of the powder wished to make gold, but in vain, nothing was accomplished by their labour. Rixthausen was sought for but he had quitted the country; then, at length, they perceived that he had audaciously deceived them.

Jean Gauthier, Baron de Plumerolles, was presented to the king, Charles IX., as being able to make gold by transmutation. The king caused one hundred thousand livres to be given him for expenses, and the alchemist went to work, but after seven days of fruitless labour, he was nowhere to be found, and the money of the monarch was departed also. The police were put upon his track, and he was captured. The gibbet put an end to his philosophical researches.

Guy de Creusembourg received twenty thousand crowns to work in the Bastille at gold manufacture. Many great noblemen came to assist him in his labours, of which the result was the imperfect transmutation of mercury. One night he fled, carrying with him his twenty thousand crowns, and appeared no more in France.

A philosopher possessing the Hermetic science presented himself to Henry, the first Prince de Bouillon, and sold to him the alchemic secret for forty thousand crowns. This adroit labourer had purchased at Sedan all the litharge which the apothecaries of the village of Sedan possessed. Then he placed an injunction on them to sell it back to any one requiring it at a low price. Whilst he had the litharge in his possession he had mixed it with some ounces of powder gold. The Prince of Bouillon having operated on the litharge succeeded in obtaining gold from it. But when all the litharge of the apothecaries of Sedan was exhausted, and that it became necessary to purchase it elsewhere, the powder of projection lost its transmuting power. The adept had in the meantime vanished with his forty thousand crowns. The Prince de Bouillon perceived he had been robbed, and could only enjoy the benefit of his experience by swearing he should never be taken in again.

In this way, for five hundred years, during which this mania for the philosopher's stone continued, a number of knaves of this kind, wasted the wealth of the greedy and avaricious rich, in order to augment their own. It was long, indeed, until the tricks which they put into practice, were understood: but their manner of effecting them was discovered at last. They removed the metals which they pretended to transmute with spatulas, or wands, filled with gold, which thus mingled with the melted metal. They cast into the crucible, powdered charcoal, mixed with oxide of gold. They employed crucibles with a double bottom; in the lowest compartment they placed the gold, and in that above it was melted the other metal. When the fusion was complete, the liquid was poured out, the contents of both parts of the crucible flowing out together, the spectators of course beheld the transmutation. They also used crucibles whose inner wall, lined with an amalgam of gold, detached itself by the heat, and fell to the bottom, to form an ingot. These are some of the ways by which they effected their purpose of deceit, but they varied the trick so as to deceive the most clear sighted. Besides this, in order to give a recondite air to their vain science, the alchemists used a hollow jargon, which is perfectly unintelligible now.

Amongst the alchemists as everywhere else, there were to be found men of good faith, and scoundrels. The believers in this art who passed their lives in the depths of a laboratory, far from attaining the end of their desire, always arrived at their ruin, whence came the proverb: "Alchemy is an art without art, of which the beginning is falsehood—the middle, labour and pain—and the end beggary."

Perhaps, out of all this night of intellect, a conclusion may be drawn, not without its instruction. The terrestrial globe is formed of simple bodies, and complex bodies, but man cannot produce a simple body—for in order to produce it, it is necessary to create it, and to create is beyond human power. Gold being a simple body, it is absurd, that is to say, it is an absolute impossibility, to seek to produce it by other mineral substances. Thus, that which has been said about the famous secret of the philosopher's stone being known to some alchemists is completely false, and ought to be only left in the domain of fable.

TO OUR READERS.

We regret to have to inform our readers that in consequence of the non-receipt of any manuscript from MR. BLANCHARD JERROLD, we are necessitated to discontinue his story of "FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME." The fault rests solely with the author, who, by his agreement with the Publisher of this Journal, undertook to furnish the necessary amount of copy, but has not adhered to his stipulation.

(good people) as mischievously inclined, notwithstanding the conciliatory appellation which is given them, as any among the host of malicious spirits who are supposed to make holiday on those sacred vigils—and be gifted with a power almost unlimited over all who, unprotected by the shield of a secure conscience, are found wandering at sunset in lonely places—a thousand surmises of this nature flashed in indistinct and hurrying masses upon the mind of the prostrate Maher, and, for a time, prevented him from lifting up his eyes, as he would very speedily have done under any other circumstance, to ascertain from what cause or with whom the aggression originated. His doubts on this subject, however, were solved by the sound of a shrill voice, the tones of which, though not heard during the lapse of many a long day before, were most familiar to his ear:—

"Millia buehus—agus millagloria! you contrary boy! have I found you at last? get up wit you, an ooom along home wit me this minit, I tell you, agin!"

Mun raised his eyes cautiously, and beheld, standing above him, with the fragment of an ashen bough in her hand, and the rosary transferred from that hand to her neck, the old woman to whom Suil Dhuv had been so civil when he met her in the glyn.

"Aih, mother, is that you that's there?"

"D'ye hear him for one rogue? 'Tis thin, I that's there—get up an ooom along with me now. Ah, you ingrateful rebel—you that I rared and cared for, and that I thought would be spreaden a bed in heaven for your old mother, yit—to go after sech coorses as them! Whose horses are them you're bounden?"

"My own and the Suil Dhuv."

"The Suil Dhuv!" the old woman exclaimed, dropping the bough, and clasping and wreathing her bony fingers in strong terror. "Oh, Mun, a boughleen dhown! is that the company you're keepen now, darlen?"

"What else would I be doon?"

"Stayen at home, to be sure, minden the ould widowed mother, you thief o' the world—look! look over! Do you see that fort beyont, with the black hazels stirreit upon the edges of it? and do you know what was done there! Eh—the gentle Heaven preserve us, may be 'tis to one o' themselves I'd be taken this way! Answer me, eroo, wor you one o' them that did that deed, in that place, that night?" and the old woman moved back from him with some distrust.

"Ax me no questions, mother," said Mun, enjoying, for a moment, even the unenviable kind of superiority which the horrible suspicion of his worthy parent gave him—and affecting a degree of gloomy and mystical importance—"ax me no questions, an' I'll tell you no stories. There are some people in the world that are obliged, sometimes, to do things that other people arn't to know anythen about. Do you think," he added, bending on her one of his leader's dark glances—"do you think you are able to judge that deed, whether it was good or bad? did you ever hear tell of the bunch of loghero?" (rushes.)

"The bunch o' loghero! eroo—" said the old widow, quite bewildered.

"Coom, sit down a-near me here on the ditch—an' I'll tell you it while the Suil Dhuv is away. Siedh shus! here. The moryil of it is that you arn't to say anythen is wrong when you jodge be yourself, and can't for the life o' you see the inward meaning o' what's done. Listen to me.

"A holy and a good man, but too much troubled with doubts, Father Dennis, was awoke in the middle of a dark December night by a great noise outside his window. He got up, threw open the shutters, and looking out, he saw two men, one of them striving to kill the other with a hatchet, and the other endeavouring to save himself as well as he could. Just as the Priest was going to cry out a thousand murders, he heard a heavy crash, and a groan, and then a great fall, and then there was a silence, so he knew all was over.

"He held his tongue, and waited to see what would become of the murderer. 'I shall now know to a certainty,' said the Priest 'whether there is a Providence or no.'

"Opposite to the Priest's house was a sweet cottage tenanted by a young couple who had been married only a few months, and were the admiration of the whole village for their fondness. To this house he saw the murderer drag the body—he laid it near the cottage door, and placing the bloody hatchet on his breast, he went his way.

"The Priest never returned to his bed that night, but stood at the window waiting for daylight, to see what would become of the murdered and the murderer. 'If there be a Providence,' says the Priest, 'the murderer surely shall not be suffered to escape.'

"Day broke—there was very little light—scarcely so much as might serve to guide a man upon his road; for the moon and stars had gone down, and it was long—long before sunrise. He saw the cottage door open—and the man of the house—a young, hale, handsome man come out. He stumbled over the dead body, and fell;—not knowing the cause, he was greatly surprised on rising, to find himself dabbled with blood. He startled and trembled from head to foot—stooped and touched the corpse, taking the hatchet in his hand, and after making certain that the man was dead indeed, he ran towards the high road, scarcely knowing what he was about to do. At the gate he was met and hailed by a neighbour.

"'Ho! you're early rising this morning, sir,' said the strange man—'where to, now?'

"'I'm going—I don't know—I want help—there's murder has been done.'

"By whom? Not by you I hope—what brings the blood upon your vest and face—and what business have you (Lord save us!) with the bloody hatchet in your hands. Show me the body. What? at your own door too? In the name of the great Lord, and of the king of the land, I take you a prisoner for this deed."

"Surely," says the Priest, 'if there be a Providence, this innocent man won't suffer for the deed he never shared in.' The young man was sent to gaol, and the Priest staid all that day praying in his own room, that if there was a Providence, it might be made known to him in that business.

"The next morning he was roused from his knees by a wild shrieking and clapping of hands in the street. He went again to the window, and he saw a young woman, fair and well formed, standing on the roadside, crying bitterly, wringing her hands, and now and then looking, like one that is crazed, along the road, giving a loud cry, and clapping her hands, and shaking her hair over her shoulders. Father Dennis looked along the road in the same direction, and he saw red coats, and horses prancing, and guns and swords glittering, and a crowd of people pressing round a car, in which, after the whole procession came a little nearer, he saw, sitting, very pale—and looking now and then at the straw that covered the hangman near him—the young man of the cottage—his neighbour. Then the Priest started, and determined, before matters went further, to put an end to the matter, by telling all he knew. He got up, and was about to leave his room, when he was struck senseless in a fit.

"When he came to himself, he saw one through the curtain of the bed sitting by him, and watching for him to awake. Supposing that it was his clerk, he asked if the execution had passed?

"It is over," said the man; 'I saw the dead man with my own eyes!'

"Then," said the Priest, starting up in bed, 'I have cast away my life in prayers that were never heard—for there is no Providence!'

"Take care how you say that too speedily," said the man, drawing back the curtain, and looking him straight in the face. It was the murderer himself.

"Father Dennis felt his heart faint away within him; but he could not speak, neither was he able to deny the man, when he walked towards the door and bade him follow. He got up, put on his old hat, took his stick and breviary in his hand, and away with him into the fields, the murderer still going before, and now and then beckoning him on, until they came to a lonely, quiet place, where there was a bunch of loghero growing in the middle of the fields.

"Do you remember," says the murderer, 'a young man of your parish that was spirited away into these wild places and never heard of after?'

"The man was going to be married," says Father Dennis, 'to the same young woman that is now a widow, mourning for the innocent man that was hanged yesterday.'

"Did you mark how he started and trembled when he felt the blood upon his hands, and saw the bloody weapon? Take this spade and dig there?'

"The Priest put the spade into the earth, and turning up some loose sods, there he saw the body of the young man they were speaking of, as fresh as ever, with a deep gash on one side of the head.

"Take the hatchet that is on the breast," said the murderer.

Father Dennis took the rusty hatchet, and there, sure enough, he found out upon the handle, the name of the man that had been hanged that morning.

"There is a God then," said a voice above his head, 'and a just and a good one.'

"Father Dennis looked around for the murderer, but he was nowhere to be seen, and there was no bush nor place where he could hide himself. At last, looking up, he saw, floating in the air above him, a glorious angel, with bright wings waving, and white garments flying, and a smile on his lips like the dawn of the May morning.

"I am he that brought you here," said the angel; 'Return to your house and believe. You can see now that your doubts were daring and guilty, and that it is not what man thinks evil that is evil in the sight of God.' So that's the way wit you, you see, because you can't see the reason why Segur should be murdered, an' he dark, you think it must be wrong done, surely. Ha! what's that—murder! murder! how he runs! O they're chasen him, surely—He's pinned, an' we'll be all hung together on a string, like onions. Go along, mother, and hide yourself—Here he is, an' they hunt him."

"Who is it, Mun, eroo? Ah, darlen?"

"No matter, mother dear, run for your life—sunuher to me, (though that's no great curse) if you won't be kilt av you stop a minnit—"

"I'll not stir till you come along wit me now, Mun—"

"O, d'ye hear this? I'll go to you to-morrow now—see! that I mightn't sin af I won't! I'll be at your table by the hob with the first light in the mornen, or else, may I never die in sin! That the two hands may go to the grave wit me av I don't. That the head may stick to me, now—murder! only see how he flies like a greyhound over the ditches. He'll be atop o' you in a minnit—"

"Mun, I won't lave you now I have you, for I know it's the last that talks to you it's them you'll be said by."

"O then, see this, why! What am I to do at all with you, afther all the cursen! I tell you I'll not stop more than this night with him, and isn't that enough?"

The old woman's answer was cut short by the arrival of Suil Dhuv, who bounded clear over the stile behind them, and seemed about to continue his headlong flight yet farther, when Mun laid hold on his arm.

"Hia! hold off? Who takes my arm?" he cried in a convulsion of fierce terror, while his eyes, staring and dilated, wandered over the person of his accomplice (scarcely less terrified), his hair stirred upon his forehead, which was pale as marble, although bathed in perspiration. "What—Maher? Where are the horses?"

"Here! sir, what's the matter? Are they after us?"

"They are! they are! O blessed night! I'm burning!"

"Who are they?"

"All that's evil, I think! Mount and be off—Don't you see 'em, and hear 'em, and feel 'em? I do, if you don't—There—there!" he added, dashing the chalice at Maher's feet, while the latter started back—"there's what they're all of 'em screeching after, and what I brought through the midst of 'em all—take it, you, and bring it along."

The old woman, at sight of the sacred cup, clasped her hands and uttered a scream of horror. Suil Dhuv looked upon, and instantly recognised her. At the same instant too, the recollection of her intended benediction, to which he had paid no attention at the moment when it was spoken, and which seemed to have been preserved hitherto in the mere avenues of the sense, now forced its way with all its original distinctness into the understanding, and froze him with horror. "May all that you do there be remembered to you at the day o' judgment, in the last o' the world, and through all eternity for ever!" The solemnity of the anathema, the more fearful as it was most innocently meant by the speaker, and seemed to be altogether the voice of Providence unconsciously transmitted to her, pealed with a stunning influence upon his heart and brain. That very innocence of intention, moreover, served only to increase his rage against the poor woman. He rushed furiously upon her, and would, most probably, have shook the unfortunate creature's bones "out of her garments," in spite of the vigorous resistance which was made by Maher, had not a new subject of alarm suddenly struck his sight. He relaxed his hands, which were clenched hard upon the throat of his accomplice, and remained for a moment silent, and staring fixedly over his shoulder, on the distant hills.

"Light he's gotten, surely," said Mun.

"A judgment from Heaven!" exclaimed his mother.

The Coiner continued gazing on the distance, and muttering, between his teeth—"Ay now—there 'tis—it's really coming now through—Look, look at all the fires breaking through the earth—Look!—Look!"

Mun turned, and beheld indeed a sight which showed him there was some ground for the wild words of the Coiner. The mountains and the plains on all sides around them were lighted up with numberless fires—the red lustre of which, during the space of time consumed by their conversation, had supplanted that of the heavy evening sun.

"'Tis the Eha-na-Shawn, sure," says the old woman.

"Is it St. John's fires you'd be wondheren at, that way?" asked Maher.

Suil Dhuv paused a moment, breathed heavily, then sprung into the air, stamped both feet against the ground, and shaking back his hair that was damp with perspiration, he snatched the reins of his horse and was mounted in an instant.

Maher was about to follow his example, when his mother bent forward and laid her hand entreatingly upon his arm. "Mun, Mun, darlen? O Mun, a lanna ma chree!"

"To-morrow, mother—to-morrow mornen I'll be in my father's house agin, but I must be good to my word to-night. Take care o' the chalice, for I wouldn't touch it," said Maher, as he rode after his leader, the tramping of whose horse's hoofs were already heard in the distance.

"Heaven speed that morrow, then!" exclaimed the old woman, clasping her hands once more, and turning up her old eyes in fervent prayer—"Heaven keep my child out of sin and blood this dreadful night! Aih! see where they left the chalice, the two of 'em." And plucking some dock-leaves, which she reverently wrapped about the sacred vessel, taking care not to pollute the consecrated silver by her touch (an impiety from which it needed not the remembrance of the fate of Oza to warn her)—she carried it between her hands, with many a genuflection, and many a sigh, and many an "Allilu! O hone! mavrone!" to her own humble dwelling.

The reader may possibly remember some allusions made in the early part of this narrative to a fair friend of Robert Kumba, whose name has afterwards frequently occurred under circumstances which it was intended should be interesting, although the original construction of the history has rendered it difficult for us to introduce the lady personally to his notice before the present moment. The story of her love and her disappointment is so brief, and at the same time (owing to peculiar circumstances in her disposition and education) so unfrequent, that we are sure of obtaining his indulgence if we venture to arrest, even in the zenith of its middle bound, the main action of the story, for the purpose of claiming for one, whose happiness or misery is most closely entangled in its results, that portion of his attention which she deserves, and which, we can assure him, she would be very unwilling to solicit for herself.

A clear, open forehead, beautifully rounded off beneath a cluster of that dark (not black) and shining hair, which is so general as to be almost characteristic among Munster maidens, and which parting easily in the centre of the forehead, formed a darkening semicircle on the pure marble of the slightly hollowed temples, and fell in waving curls upon the shoulders—a fashion which was then very popular among those younger members of the gentle sex, whose years had not yet entitled them to the womanly honours of a tête—a masque of a full, yet delicate and tapering outline—and a chin sharp, sweet, and small as those which the great father of the English school of portrait painting seemed to look upon as the cæstus of female, or at least of infantine beauty—dimpling to every smile, and scarcely inferior in expressive sweetness to the exquisitely curved and "wee bit" lips above it—a cheek which combined the mossy tenderness of the rose bud, with the delicately vigorous hue of its expanded petals—a nose (it is an awkward feature to introduce into a mere description—but if ever there was a nose that looked well in prose or poetry, that nose was Lilly Byrne's) a nose then, we say fearlessly, which would have safely braved even the critical eye of that renowned Italian magnate whose perception was so acute that he could observe a fault which in reality did not exist, and an improvement where in reality none had taken place; a fine well-opened eye, over which the long quivering lashes played with an influence which at the same time tempered and heightened the fiery sweetness of the light-blue sparklers beneath them; teeth, convex, close set, and pearly; a neck and gorge which, as the curiously fanciful writer of Arcadia might have expressed it, formed the most delightful isthmus that could be wished for, between that lovely peninsula, her head, and that most fair continent, her person—and which presented the most exquisite model that even he could desire, of that exquisitely delicate sharpness of outline which characterises the most lady-like of Laurence's portraits; which is no less characteristic of real elegance and gentle descent in the sex of Lilly Byrne, than the curling hair and aquiline nose is in the other, and which, moreover, seems to depend on such a hair-breadth nicety of touch, that nothing less than absolute instinct or accident in the painter can enable him to accomplish it—round, yet narrow shoulders, which were connected by a fine conchoid with the slope of the neck, and from which the arms fell into a position of infinite ease and concord, confined by the closely fitted sleeve of the gown (as was the fashion of the time) as low down as the elbow, where the silk was cut out from the hollow of the arm, leaving a graceful lap over the softly rounded flexure, and suffering the remainder of the limb to continue revealed, in all its tapering softness—its elegant diminutiveness of wrist, its daintiness of finger, and polished convexity of nail (there is nothing like being particular), to the admiration of the beholder, unless, perhaps, on certain occasions when its beauties were "covered, but not hid," by the mist-like shadowing of a half-handed silk net glove; a waist squeezed up into a cruelly delightful littleness, such as would have satisfied the charming Lady Mary Montague herself—confined within a peaked body, which was on state occasions ornamented with a stomacher of small brilliants, and for the most part with the narrow ribbon work of the stays, which were left exposed by the opening of the gown in front, that sloped upward and revealed just so much of the white neck as was consistent with the feminine modesty of the period—and that was very little indeed (we don't mean the modesty, but the neck)—for

"Y que quae Hídalgas son,
No solo no nos den pechos,
Pero ni pechos, ni espaldas;"

was a prohibition more in favour with our fair Hibernian ancestors than among the heroines of Las Armas de la Hermosura; or we will dare to say, the young and beautiful of our own day: a small foot, confined within a sharp-pointed, high-heeled satin shoe, ornamented with rows of gold or silver spangles, and glancing from beneath the richly quilted green silk petticoat—(to use an adaptation of Sir John Suckling's celebrated simile)—like little gold-finches, fluttering among the summer foliage of a scyamore; an ankle, the glossy whiteness of which was qualified, not concealed, by the thin, faint flesh-coloured checked silk stocking, and which formed the most perfectly finished termination in the world to the classically large and easily fashioned person: these constituted the claims of Lilly Byrne to the title which was given her of the village beauty, and if, after all the pains we have been at in detailing them, the reader should refuse to have those claims allowed, we can only say that we wish him a better taste.

But the portrait which we have just presented was that which a painter might have taken with advantage, when Lilly Byrne was younger and happier than she was on this day; when the hope of authorised affection lived in her heart, and breathed in every movement of her frame; when she loitered and listened with a cheek alternately flushing and whitening with the gentle tumultuousness of expectation for the approach of her accepted lover, mistaking the creaking of the iron yard-gate for his pattering summons upon the brazen rapper of the hall-door, nibbling her pretty lip in anger at the disappointment, glancing towards the window, and along the elevated lawn by which he was to approach, fidgetting and quarrelling with her work, talking of everything but the subject, and blushing even to the fingers' ends, when she found herself detected in the midst of her manoeuvres by the experienced eye of her mother, or the sudden loud laugh of her father, as their glances met—when the day was consumed between the lovers in those unmeaning words and actions, which, between lovers, have so deep a meaning—in jests which were laughed at, and not worth being laughed at, and those tantalizing annoyances, by which even the most sincere and the fondest among the gentle tyrants of the hours of courtship delight in manifesting their power over the great awkward fool who is lying at their feet—a power, indeed, which, considering how very short-lived it is in general, it would be an act of naughty supererogation to take from them; when light heart and merry word was the order of the day, when Lilly Byrne could do nothing for Robert Kumba, who was hiding her balls of cotton and her bobbin, and pulling the thread out of her needle, and Robert protested it was Lilly herself that was so idle, and mamma remonstrated, and wished that Mr. Robert Kumba would mind his own business, so she did, and let her daughter mind hers, and Robert said Lilly was a spiteful little tell-tale, and the old gentleman said they were all a parcel of fools together, and—but if we say more, we shall come in for share of the censure.

Few love-matches, commencing under such circumstances, so blameless and so seemingly prosperous, were ever so suddenly deranged and overclouded as this was.

The affair proceeded far beyond that limit within which the prospects, at least, if not the feelings of a girl may be said to remain secure. Those little privileges of address, which are not even allowed to the accepted lover, until all is believed to be as certain of accomplishment as if the ceremony had already passed, and which perhaps it were well for the peace and happiness of many a forsaken heart to have altogether prohibited, until the very possibility of a disappointment had been removed, had been long accorded to Robert Kumba. The envied and (what was more) enviable position by her side on all occasions—the solitary evening walk—the tête-à-tête in crowds—the certainty that he imparted pleasure while he whispered welcome nonsense in

"The soft labyrinth of the lady's ear," and a thousand other harmless intimacies which the memory of those who have been, the consciousness of those who are, and the imagination of those who wish to be, lovers, will save us the pains of recounting—were, for a long time, freely granted him; and the consequence was, that he had at length become completely wound up, and entangled with all the joys, the sorrows, the hopes, and the fears of the young and ardent girl, that it should be as reasonable to look for the survival of her happiness after he, its heart had been snatched from her, as to suppose that her material frame should continue uninjured in any of its functions after the great organ of life had been torn from her bosom. She died this moral death, however; for her lover was snatched from her—and so suddenly, that the ruin reached her spirit even before a single fear could prepare her for its approach. The manner of the "break off" was so strange and rapid—so utterly unlooked for—so startling and dream-like, that all was past and gone before she could even imagine the possibility of her desolation.

The lovers had been taking their usual evening walk, and were occupying their usual position on the strait-backed, strait-armed, chintz-covered sofa (or settee, as it was then called), Lilly complaining pettishly of fatigue, while her lover untied the strings of her gypsy-fashioned white chip hat, and laid aside her scarf—while Mrs. Byrne sat knitting a gray worsted stocking by the clear turf fire, and a clean sleek tortoise-shell cat sat on her knee, in that beautiful position for which it is almost proverbially celebrated, purring its monotonous song of pleasure and contentment—and while Mr. Byrne, who had manifested a degree of reserve in his manner to Kumba throughout the evening, which was attributed by the latter to the accident of some disappointment in his farming affairs, continued walking slowly back and forward from the corner near the cupboard to the corner near the window, jingling a handful of halfpence behind his back, and humming the popular air, the burthen of which runs:—

"Dholinahin cruiskeen, lawn, lawn, lawn,
Dholinahin cruiskeen, lawn,
Dholinahin cruiskeen
Slauntha gal ma vourneen
Bohumilum a cooleen dhuv no bawn."

On a sudden the old gentleman stopped short, and said:

"Robert Kumba, who were those people I saw on the grounds, over, to-day?"

Kumba let Lilly's hand go, and reddened slightly, with the angry consciousness of one who conceives that a "liberty" is about to be taken with him.

"They were—poh!—they were fellows from Mr. Rose, sir."

"I thought so. Where are the little vaugh of black cattle that you were so proud of, that you had in the east meadow a week ago, Robert?"

"O then, sir, I'm sure I don't know, they're gone, sir," said Kumba, in increased displeasure.

"Sold?"

"Poh, yes," with an impatient laugh.

"By you, Robert?"

"By the driver, sir."

"I am sorry to hear it, they were a great loss."

"O, I'm sure I don't want any body to tell me that. They wouldn't go if I could help it."

"Don't speak so impatiently, Robert, to your friends. 'Tis in kindness I speak, believe me. Your uncle James says that you could have helped it."

"My uncle James," said Kumba, vehemently, "never interferes in my business from any kind or generous motive. I wish he would spare his censures, since he can afford nothing else."

"I don't know, but a timely censure may be a very good thing," said Mr. Byrne, in a fair and easy way; "and I should like to hear you show that this was undeserved, before you get into a passion about it."

"O, well, there has been enough about it now," said Kumba, turning to Lilly, whose agony during this scene may be well imagined; "Come, Lilly, will you play a game of chess?"

"Indeed sir, there has not been enough about it," replied the father; "and I am determined to have a great deal more about it before Miss Byrne either plays chess or plays the fool."

"Miss Byrne!" Kumba could not help echoing, unconsciously, in a murmur of perfect astonishment.

"I give myself great blame," continued the old gentleman, his warmth gradually increasing as the subject became more fully developed, "that I did not take care to make myself aware much sooner of all the circumstances that I have heard to-day. Lilly, go to your room."

"Whatever you may have to say to me, sir," said Kumba, taking Lilly's hand, which trembled in his, and smiling, though with a quivering lip, upon her—"may be said in Miss Byrne's presence. Our interests are single."

"Not yet, thank heaven!—Do you hear me, madam?"

Lilly, who knew the extremities of anger which her father was capable of indulging, looked entreatingly towards her mother.

"Perhaps you were misinformed, my dear, interposed Mrs. Byrne, gently.

"I was misinformed, my dear," said her husband, passionately; "I was misinformed when I took a spendthrift and a prodigal into my house—a wasteful, extravagant wretch—(don't stop me, woman!)—that is sitting there now with his mouth open looking at me, after having squandered the beautiful property that was left him not four years since, and plunged himself over head and ears in debt, while I thought he was clearing off those left by his father."

Mrs. Byrne uttered an exclamation of surprise and dismay, and and poor Lilly's heart sunk as low as if the whole world were forsaking her.

"You were much mistaken, sir, if you supposed that it was ever my wish or intention to avail myself of your ignorance on that head," said Kumba, spiritedly.

"I wish I had known that sooner," retorted the father.

"O, 'tis never too late for repentance, sir," said Kumba, springing quickly from the sofa. "I permit no intermeddling in my affairs."

"Young man!....." Mr. Byrne exclaimed—his aged brow flushing, and his frame trembling with anger—"but no—pish! no—" checking his anger by a violent effort—"this is not altogether my affair. Hear me, sir. You shall not enter these doors again for six months. If, during that time, you—"

"O, my good sir, you deceive yourself very egregiously," said Kumba, with all the pride of voice and manner which he was capable of assuming—"my course, my conduct, my fortunes and my misfortunes are my own. You cannot point my way, sir. Undeceive yourself, if you please."

"Very well said, sir," replied the old gentleman, smiling and bowing—"you are your own master, and a fine scholar you have, sir. But suppose I said your way lay there, sir?" pointing to the door.

"I could find it without giving you the trouble, sir," said Kumba.

"The sooner the better, sir," the father continued, smiling and bowing him out affectedly.

"As soon as I get my hat," said the other, snatching it at the same moment, with a degree of levity which, though in accordance with all his character, the poor stupefied Lilly could not help feeling was unkind almost to heartlessness, and muttering, as he returned her father's ironical smiles, something about "the old man's prudence," and his own "misfortunes."

"Quit my house, ruffian!" and the old man now broke forth in a paroxysm of fury, while his wife and daughter flung themselves with cries of terror about his neck—"quit my house, ungrateful scoundrel that you are, or I'll fling you out of the window."

Kumba, perceiving at once all the impropriety of his conduct, used an action which seemed as though he wished to say something in extenuation, when he was prevented by Lilly, whose displeasure (for she could be displeased on occasion as well as another) had been strongly roused by the last insult to her parent.

"Begone, sir!" she exclaimed, drawing up her head, with a tone and look of virtuous anger, before which Kumba's own pride crumbled into dust—"I did not know you until now. We want neither your presence nor your apology. You have deceived yourself, sir, if you suppose that any interest you may possess in my affections can make me insensible to the duty I owe my father. How dared you, sir," she continued, panting with agitation—"how could you use such coarse terms to my father—and in my presence? Go, sir, your apology can do little!"

In a few seconds the hall door had closed on the rejected Kumba, while the old man gathered his daughter to his bosom with murmured praises and kisses of affectionate admiration. This access of tenderness, however, was the most injudicious course that could have been used in the present condition of our little heroine's feelings. It softened and let down the strings of her generous nature, and unhinged the proud consciousness of injury by which she had been sustained. She sunk from between his arms in a fit of convulsive grief, succeeded by fainting and renewed hysterics, which it required all the usual expedients of ether, burnt feathers, and cold affusions to subdue.

For many days after this occurrence had taken place, Lilly could not persuade herself that all was in reality at an end between her and her lover, and that the scene which she had witnessed was other than a dream. All passed so suddenly, so swiftly, so unexpectedly! she could not believe that the beautiful and glittering fabric which her young and sanguine heart had constructed with so much pains and self-gratulation, should thus, at the very point of its completion, be utterly hurried from her view, passing as rapidly as the rushing of a summer wind, and leaving no trace of its existence more evident than the dreary sound of its departing glory. She still listened while at her work for the knock of her lover—suffering under an agony, in which all the fever of protracted expectation was combined with the sullen and barren stillness of despair. Every approaching footstep startled her with a sudden hope, which was awakened only to be again struck lifeless by the pang of a disappointment quite as sudden. Her parents no longer received from her that devoted attention which, in the security of her youthful affection, she had been accustomed to pay them. When she knelt before them and bent her head to receive the parental benediction at morning and evening, the once sweetly murmured "Blessing, father; mother, blessing!" was hurried over almost unconsciously; and the affectionate prayer of the old couple, that "God would bless her, and mark her to grace!" fell with the influence of an unmeaning sound upon her ear. Her more secret devotions, too, were distracted and unsatisfactory. When she detected herself in the midst of a train of wandering reflections, it was in vain that she reproached herself, knelt more erect, clasped her hands more firmly, and attempted, by gazing steadily upward, to raise her thoughts above her own worldly interests, and still the unsettled throbbing of her heart, by striving to lay all its feelings at repose in the lap of a pious confidence. The form of Robert Kumba, with his angry, rude, and selfishly passionate look, would come floating on the eye of her memory through the upper air, and then every word and action, no sound or gesture omitted, of the scene which had taken place would steal silently through her brain, her heart would swell and throb with a new tumult, to be followed by a new self-recollection, a new effort at resignation, and again a new distraction and a new distress. Her little domestic arrangements, also, were conducted with less care and diligence than formerly. The tortoisecat (before mentioned) had holiday times in the pantry, the door of which, notwithstanding all Mrs. Byrne's agonized remonstrances, was repeatedly left ajar, and the good lady was once heard solemnly to affirm, that she had found the animal actually lapping the milk at one side of the peck, or keeler, while Lilly was skimming at the other. The full-bound [firkin] of butter, home-made, which formed one of Lilly's own housekeeping perquisites, remained unfilled, although the fair of Cork was fast approaching, and uncle Cuthbert, the grazier, had repeatedly offered to dispose of it along with his own, which was always first quality, because the butter-taster was a particular friend of his; a series of advantages, the possibility of losing which, made poor Mrs. Byrne's heart ache with apprehension.

Her daughter, however, continued to neglect the fair of Cork—her fine uncle—the full-bound—the tortoisecat and the pantry-door, in spite of all her lectures. Her fits of abstraction and absent acts and words continued to grow and fasten the more upon her manner in proportion as they were observed, and her melancholy, which at no time presented violent symptoms, was silently wearing a channel in her heart, which deepened so rapidly, as, at length, to endanger the foundation of her health itself. "Dry sorrow baked her blood." She would frequently gaze for a long hour together upon the sunny lawn before the windows of the house, with a fixed and tearless eye, absorbed in a fit of intense abstraction—from which, if roused by her mother after many unheeded calls, she would start (like one who had been surprised in slumber,) with a thousand hurried apologies; if by her father, with a sharp and peevish shortness of reply, which was most foreign to her character, and which made the old man's heart bleed.

She never smiled; but very frequently, when passing to her room at night, she would pause in the middle of the long and narrow flagged hall—the candle elevated in one hand, while the other gathered her thin night-dress about her bosom—and remain motionless as a statue, her eyes rivetted on the ground, her lips parted as if in astonishment, and her whole being apparently suspended, for several minutes, until at length the conviction of her desolation came back upon her, and biting her nether lip, while she uttered a low, tremulous, and murmuring scream of anguish, she would rush along the passage to her own apartment, and fling herself on the bed in a passion of tearless grief, which wasted itself in short sobs, shiverings, and muttered sounds of suffering.

Mrs. Byrne could not "tell what to make" of all this. She could not form a conception of any ill affection of the frame which was unconnected with a positive disease—and though grief might possibly affect a young girl a little, in the manner of Lilly's complaint, it could not possibly be grief, for Lilly cried a great deal less than she did herself. Her father seemed by his silence to understand the matter better—but, as he saw no remedy, he did not think there was any use in contesting the point—and held his peace therefore, when Mrs. Byrne, arguing from the hot and dry skin of the patient, pronounced a sentence of typhus fever (the plague of Ireland). Strange to say, nevertheless, although Mrs. Byrne was wrong in her premises, she was right in her conclusion, and her diagnosis was confirmed by the physician of the neighbouring village.

The old man was now really terrified. He loved—he doted on his daughter, and the actual conviction of her danger burst upon him with the influence of a sudden and deep misfortune. He would have given the whole farm, live stock and all, to hear that the doctor was wrong (and "sure" that would be no such miracle neither); but the doctor in this instance was right—a typhus fever he pronounced the complaint, and a typhus fever poor Lilly had—a fever that wasted and sapped her brain, and brought her to the very gates of freedom. As the illness proceeded, and the doctor's face lengthened in sympathy with his bill, the old man's agony became absolutely phrenetic—he usurped the mother's place and the mother's offices by the bedside of the sufferer—mixed the saline draughts, administered the medicine with his own hands, and spent long nights in sleepless anxiety by her couch.

"I'll tell you what'll come of it," the servants said to one another in the kitchen, "the poor darlin' 'll die—Lord save her—an' 'himsel' 'll be fit to be tied, with lightness afther—that'll be the way of it."

THE SCIENCE OF THE ANCIENTS.

MODERN civilization has arrogated to itself the fame and merit of the knowledge of physical sciences. This is not wholly true. Certainly in the times of antiquity they did not attain the high degree of perfection which they have reached in our times. Yet the discoveries of the older order of society deserve our admiration, and the men of genius amongst the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Greeks, who served to make them, by their labours and research, merit our gratitude. Mathematics were very little inferior in correctness and extent in those times, to their position in our own, and as men usually are most easily attracted to the occupations which are rendered facile by the means of which they are possessed, so we find that it was in astronomy and mechanics chiefly they were engaged with most enthusiasm. Pythagoras and Archimedes are the most celebrated names of scientific antiquity. Archimedes performed in mechanics some prodigies of which we shall make mention in the course of our details. Notwithstanding this, the sciences which are to-day public property, were in those epochs the privilege of only a few, and this cause is most likely the source of the hindrance which they experienced, whilst the arts were carried to a perfection which the moderns have never been able to surpass. As an exposition of the divisions of science which the ancients cultivated with success may be interesting to the readers of the Dublin Journal, as showing the progress of ages which we look back upon, as being the time of the infancy of the human race, we shall give an account of the principal branches in which they directed their labours.

Optics takes a pre-eminent place in this summary, as it was very progressive amongst the Egyptians and the Greeks. They understood the construction of mirrors which they formed of different capacities. Some of those multiplied objects, others exhibited them reversed, and others placed in a particular position reflected no more. They possessed conic mirrors, convex, concave, and magic mirrors. They used the prism for the decomposition of the solar ray, they understood the camera obscura, had the magic lantern, and served their purpose of spreading the vulgar illusions which prevailed by all these catoptric constructions which have since become toys for amusement. Suidas relates that wonder workers of his time were very skilful in the art of fascinating the sight, of giving to some the most attractive forms, and to others the most hideous. Pomponius Mella attributes to the Druidesses of Sena the power of transforming men into animals. All this can only be produced by optical illusions. It was so in the cases of Memphis, of Saïs, of Eleusis, and other celebrated places where initiations took place. There, the adepts were submitted to proofs in which pyrotechny, phantasmagoria, and ventriloquy, played a great part. Cicero, Seneca, Iamblichus, Aulus Gellius, and many other authors have explained in their works the means taken to magnify objects and render them visible at great distances. Indeed, the researches of distinguished archæologists leave no doubt about the various optical means in use amongst the ancients, such as concave glasses, convex, and others shaped of all kinds. The hydraulic microscope, as well as a particular kind of magnifying glass and telescopes, were also employed to magnify objects and shorten distances; some authors have considered the famous burning mirror of Archimedes as being fabulous. A short description of it is a proof that many discoveries, attributed to the moderns alone, were perfectly known to the ancients.

The burning mirror with which Archimedes consumed the Roman fleet besieging Syracuse, has been treated as a real invention by many historians. Tzetzes expressed himself as follows in description of it. "Archimedes burned the vessels of Marcellus, by the help of a burning glass, composed of small mirrors, which moved in every manner, by means of hinges, and which were exposed to the solar rays, and directed upon the ships, reducing them to ashes at the distance of an arrow shot."

Anthelmus of Tralles, in Lydia, a celebrated architect and learned mechanist, gives a long dissertation on this famous mirror in his treatise called, "Mechanical Paradoxes." Not only does he admit its existence, but he gives himself the model of a mirror which could inflame wood at a long distance. Lucian Tonara, and Vitellius, state positively that, at the siege of Syracuse, the Roman fleet was burned by the mirror of Archimedes. Proclus afterwards constructed a mirror on the same plan, and burned the fleet of Vitalian, at the siege of Constantinople. Eustathius, in his commentary on the Iliad, says, that Archimedes, by a catoptrical invention burned the Roman fleet at the distance a bolt would carry shot from an arbalest. In this way and by such evidence, there is no historical fact better proved than this. Indeed, Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, wishing to verify this fact, constructed an immense mirror composed of thirty six smaller mirrors, of which the focus fixed the sun's rays on the same point, and he found that the reflective power of this immense mirror could fire a plank of pine at the distance of twenty five paces.

We can understand by this relation, that optical science was far advanced in those early days; but the research and inventions of the ancients are as remarkable in mechanical art as the history of the Greek and Roman civilization testifies. The instruments of war, for instance, were colossal in size, and by three or four platforms surpassed in height the most lofty ramparts. Upon the summit of these moving towers was placed a flying bridge, which they let down on the ramparts of the besieged city, in order that the besiegers could easily descend into the place. Below those machines an immense ram was suspended, capable of battering down the thickest walls. Those enormous machines, constructed by the architect of Demetrius, gained for that prince the name of Poliorcetes, or the Taker of Cities.

A mechanist of the city of Alexandria, then besieged by Julius Cæsar, invented a machine as vast as it was complicated, which pumped up a prodigious quantity of sea-water, and hurled it with violence upon the besiegers. Those artificial inundations incommoded the Roman troops to such a degree, that they would have raised the siege without the energetic will of Julius Cæsar to prompt them in its continuance.

It was, above all, in the temples of Egypt and of Greece that the most learned mechanicians were to be found. The immense instruments which they employed in the ceremony of proofs for their initiations—the phantasmagoric appearances of all kinds, reuniting every prodigy of statics, hydraulics, optics, acoustics, etc., should necessarily be constructed by men very skilful, and profoundly versed in those sciences of which they made the application. Of all the men illustrious in mechanical art, none can be compared with Archimedes. This great genius, if we desired to relate marvellous inventions which issued from his creative brain, would furnish matters for many columns. It is a writer, whose works will endure as long as the English tongue, who said of him:—"This great man has placed the first foundations of almost all the sciences and inventions which our age makes its boast to have brought to perfection." There is no scholar who has not read that Archimedes defended by himself the city of Syracuse when it was besieged by all the power of Rome, and defended it with success! When the vessels of the enemy approached too close to the walls of Syracuse, an enormous windlass grasped them with an iron hand by the prow, and lifting them high in air, roughly hurled them down again, breaking them or plunging them in the depths below. The enemy, stupified, believed that the gods alone could use and hold such power. If, then, they removed their vessels from the walls, to elude the grasp of the iron hand, the burning mirror, directed by this master mind, gave them to the flames, which destroyed them without mercy.

Archimedes constructed a colossal galley for the King Hiero, his patron and admirer. There were in this gallery apartments vast and sumptuous; gardens set over with flowers, promenades planted with trees, with a wealth of shade; rivers, with pools full of fish; in fact, every comfort and luxury which King Hiero could require. Archimedes produced so many marvellous things, executed labours so gigantic, that they are almost incapable of belief. It was his vast knowledge of sciences and his confidence in the power of machines which made him declare "Give me where I may stand, and I shall move the world."

After Archimedes, Ctesibius is cited, who invented a system of hydraulics very ingenious; and the mathematician, Hiero, who constructed clepsydra, or water-clocks, very ingenious, and of great exactitude, also windlasses of extraordinary power, and air balloons. Archytas acquired a great renown by his artificial pigeon, which flew like a living one, soared around, and returned to perch upon the finger which he presented to him. Many other mechanicians rendered themselves renowned by their inventions and their labours. From all this it is seen that the ancients made immense progress in mechanical art. Of this the historical documents and the monuments, eaten away by the destructive tooth of time, are sufficient evidence. In the last century there was a celebrated mechanician, whose works at least equalled those of Archytas. Vaucanson, a Frenchman, constructed many automata of the most perfect finish, amongst others a flute-player and a duck. This duck showed in his interior the mechanism of those viscera destined for the functions of digestion and nutrition. The play of all the parts necessary to those functions was exactly imitated. He bent his head in order to peck at the grain which might be presented to him by the hand of a by-stander; he swallowed it, digested it, and disposed of it in all the ordinary movements of life in such fowl. Every gesture of a duck which gobbled with precipitation and redoubled with quickness the movements of his gullet in order to make the food which was eaten pass into his stomach—all was rendered in his action with a similarity mocking nature in its truth. As soon as the aliment was introduced into the stomach it passed there through all the processes of complete digestion, as in the living animal, and with the same fidelity to real existence.

It must be observed that Vaucanson did not attempt to make this digestive action of mechanism in order to supply all the functions of a perfect digestion capable of supplying blood; he had only desired to imitate the mechanism of digestion, and illustrate the changes of the food. It was necessary to overcome great difficulties in order to arrive at this astonishing result, and Vaucanson succeeded in a wonderful degree, never before equalled, and certainly fixing his reputation as a great mechanist. The duck he constructed drank, quacked, shook his wings, raised himself on his webbed feet, walked, and executed all the actions of a living duck. The second chef d'œuvre of Vaucanson was a flute-player. He was dressed in the costume of a shepherd, as we see him upon the stage, and played twenty airs, minuets, rigadoons, and country dances. He played a flageolet with one hand and beat a tambourine with the other. The automata of the skilful French mechanist were equal to the pigeon of Archytas, the Greek.

There was yet another art beside those of optics and mechanism which was brought to great perfection amongst the ancients. The power of increasing, diminishing, and returning sounds, of charming and startling the ears, was perfectly known to them. They knew that the voice or a sound driven through a tube with widening passage acquired a greater volume and intensity, according to the degree of its relation to the force of the impulse. They knew that sound reflected itself as light does, and thus produces the phenomenon named echo. They knew also that a sound reflected once can be reflected again if it meet surfaces which will return it, and give place thus to multiplied echoes. The persons attached to the temples, and the affiliated, for initiations, cut into hills, dug out caverns, and rounded vaults, whose reflective properties augmented or diminished sounds, in order to produce astonishment, joy, or fear. In the presence of the numberless secrets of acoustics put in play by the Thaumaturgists, and which history has preserved to us, we are forced to avow that they had to give long study and great skill to reach such perfection in its practice. The echoes of Thessaly, of Thrace, of Eleusis, and above all, of Delphos, were remarkable for their magnifying power of sounds, and by their tripled and quadrupled repetition of them. At the period of the Persian invasion, the temple of Delphos was preserved from pillage, and the city was partly saved, thanks to the echoes which the priests had constructed in Parnassus. Some hundreds of men, dispersed in the hills, shouted with right energy, and their voices increased in volume and multiplied, which the echoes returned singly, producing thus a noise so formidable that the startled enemy did not advance, and withdrew their forces.

In the temples and the recesses where the mysteries passed, there was always a hall disposed in a manner productive of astonishing acoustic effects. The weakest sounds acquired the intensity of the strongest. Sometimes they were repeated with surprising variations. They withdrew, dying in the distance, then returned again with their former intensity, and finished by being lost in faintness. Sometimes they were sweet, soft, and charming to the ears. Sometimes the piercing sound of trumpets bounded from echo to echo, to thrill the listener with its rough clangor, and then became soft and flute-like in tone. Those echoes were constructed with admirable art, so much so that it is certain the ancients were more advanced than we in its mysteries and practice.

In the labyrinth of Saïs, in Egypt, the noise of a closing door was not heard by any one who stood near, whilst that any person who was withdrawn from it many hundred paces would believe he heard the rolling of thunder. The caves of Eleusis were also remarkable by the effect of many parabolic vaults. The voice of the Hierophant, hidden behind a recess in an immense hall, came sometimes powerful and terrible, and sometimes mild and soothing to the ears of the adepts grouped at the extremity of the cavern. This illusion of acoustics depended upon certain apparatus, which was fixed or withdrawn at pleasure.

Cressus erected a tomb to Metella, his wife, near a hill, where a Greek architect constructed an echo which repeated five times the sound which reached it. In the valley of Eurotas there exists still an echo which repeats words of six syllables very distinctly. This echo arises from many excavations made by the hand of man, but whose purpose is unknown. Amongst the most famous natural echoes are cited those of the villa of Cysicus, which repeated four times distinctly any sound which struck it. The subterranean hall, called the Prison of Dionysius of Syracuse, gave to the weakest noise a great intensity, which terminated by an explosion. The aqueduct of Claudius carried the sound of a voice or any other tone to many miles distance. There existed lately, near Verdun, two towers which produced an echo that reproduced sounds four times over. Barthins speaks of an echo, situate near Coblenz, which reproduced a noise twenty-seven times. Kircher and Schott, in a curious description of the echo of Simonetti, at the old chateau, say that, in placing themselves at certain aspects of the building, the cry made by them was repeated forty times. Addison has heard an echo more strong than all those. He asserts that, in a gorge of the Appenines, his cry was reproduced, without interruption, fifty times over. This fact resembles fiction, and has a spice of Gascon wit about it native to the old Garonne.

In the "Memoirs of the Academy of Science, of 1692," mention is made of an echo offering this peculiarity, that the person who spoke heard nothing, whilst whoever listened heard the voice with surprising variations. The voice seemed first lost in distance, and then returned again, suddenly, with great loudness. There exists many churches in Spain in which there are halls with elliptical arches performing the duty of sound boards. The tones which strike on one side of the vault are reflected on the other in such a manner that those persons placed at two opposite extremities, and speaking in a low voice, hear each other very distinctly, whilst those who were in the middle of the hall could not hear any of their conversation. Much more could be related of the curiosities of acoustics, but that which we have detailed is sufficient to show the knowledge and practice of the science is not confined to modern times, and that in optics and mechanics, also, the elder civilization of the world was as renowned as for arts, and poetry, and eloquence. It enjoys a reputation still undisputed and unequalled by modern society.

CORCOMROE ABBEY.

THE Abbey of Corcomroe is situated in a lonely winding vale in the barony of Burren, and county of Clare. It was anciently called Corcamruadh, from the Irish Cor, a district, Cam, a quarrel, and Ruaidh, red, and was also denominated the abbey "De Viridi Saxo," or "of the Green Rock," from the amazing fertility of the mountainous and stony land around it. Even the interior of the abbey at this day presents a surface of nothing but rugged stones.

The ruin of Corcomroe Abbey is one of great splendour. In the engraving the spectator is supposed to stand near one of the angles at the western end of the nave, immediately under the square steeple or belfry. Before him is the choir, exhibiting a groined arch, inferior to none—that of Holycross, in the county of Tipperary, excepted—and the north and south transepts, opening to the right and left by large plain circular arches, through which are visible two small chapels, situate on either side of the choir. This fabric stood in the centre of a square plot of land containing about six acres, and which was enclosed with a wall ten feet high. The entrance was by an arched gateway and gatehouse opposite to the western end of the abbey.

Corcomroe was, in the year 1088, thrice plundered by Roderic O'Connor and Dermot O'Brien. According to the red book of Kilkenny, in 1194, Donald, King of Limerick, founded a sumptuous monastery here for Cistercian monks, and dedicated it to the Virgin Mary, while other authorities assert that his son, Donogh Carbrac, was the founder, in the year 1200.

This abbey was an adjunct to that of Suire. It was afterwards made subject to the celebrated abbey of Furness, in Lancashire. The cell of Kilsanna, otherwise Kilshanny, was some time after annexed to this house.

In 1267, Donogh O'Brien, King of Thomond, was killed in the battle of Sindaine, in this barony, and was solemnly interred in the abbey, where was erected to his memory a grand monument, the remains of which are to be seen at the present day. It is placed in a niche on the north side of the choir.

A great battle was fought near this abbey in 1317, in which many of the principal O'Briens fell. Amongst the slain were two sons of Brien Ruadh, (or the Red,) King of Thomond, viz., Teigh and Murtoigh Garbh, or the boisterous, from the latter of whom it is probable the neighbouring village of Murtoighclogh takes its name. The ground where this battle took place lies along the bottom of the hill between the village of Murtoighclogh and the abbey, which is now called the Hill of the Galloways.

John, abbot of Corcomroe, was, in 1418, made Bishop of Kilmaeduaich; and Archdall reports that the abbey, with eleven quarters of land in Corcomroe and Gicammangh were ultimately granted to Richard Harding. Notwithstanding this grant, it appears that this religious establishment was not forsaken by the Cistercian monks as late at least as 1628, and that it was subject to the Cistercian Lord Abbot of Holycross, whose predecessors were mitred abbots and peers

BALLEEN CASTLE.

ABOUT two miles north west from the little town of Freshford, county Kilkenny, stand the imposing ruins of Balleen Castle. Situated on ground of considerable elevation, though of rather gradual ascent, they overlook a country of beautifully diversified appearance, in fine cultivation, and interspersed with numerous interesting remains of antiquity. Once a principal strong-hold of the noble house of Ormond, this castle was of considerable importance, as is sufficiently attested by the extent of the ruins, and the elegance of those parts of the building that have escaped destruction. Of the original structure but two towers at present remain. The north-west tower seems to have been erected in the course of the fourteenth century, and was the keep of the fortress as it then stood. It contained four floors, one of which was arched; a fine stone staircase in one of the angles that is now nearly destroyed, together with fire-places and the other usual appendages to a building of the kind—all now in a most dilapidated condition. The other remaining tower is obviously of less antiquity; and were we not possessed of the real date of its erection, we would immediately attribute it to the middle or termination of the fifteenth century. The windows of this tower, with their graceful label-mouldings, mullions, and transoms, some of which are overhung and interwoven with beautiful and exuberant ivy, are of elegant construction; over one of them is the date A.D. 1455, showing the erection of this side of the castle to have taken place in the time of James, fifth Earl of Ormond, who possessed great power, and was a favourite of Henry VI., who conferred on him the additional title of Earl of Wiltshire.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MISS ASHBY, in due time, read Mr. Faversham's letter.

"Your letters seem to keep, my dear," Mrs. Ashby had remarked. Mrs. Ashby being on "thorns" to know what the letter contained, Miss Ashby silently pursued her work; nor did she tear the envelope until she reached her room, and was alone.

"What a strange girl she is!" said Mrs. Ashby, to her younger daughter.

"And always was," responded Miss Victoria.

Miss Ashby remained so long in her room that her sister was sent to inquire whether she intended to make her appearance at the tea-table. Victoria found her severe elder sister writing.

"How flushed you are, dear!" said Miss Victoria.

Miss Ashby replied with a request that some tea should be carried to her room. She had two or three letters to write.

"Letters!" Victoria chirped, laughing over her sister's shoulders. "Why, this one is as long as a sermon."

The letter was a long one, even for a lady to write. It cost some trouble in the composition. Miss Ashby did look flushed. The most placid and serious young lady cannot be expected to receive a love letter, without betraying the flutter it has made at her heart.

"MY DEAR MR. FAVERSHAM," Miss Ashby wrote, in reply, "I confess that I am greatly moved and astonished by your letter, which I shall endeavour to answer at once. I agree with you with all my heart, in deploring the want of sincerity that prevails at the present day. We undervalue interchanges of feeling. How often we hear even brothers say, they have nothing to write about to their sisters; even children to their parents. I cannot see, however, how the world interposes to prevent one person speaking frankly and fully to another. You must permit me to remind you that there are many, very many, people, who have not felt what you call the harness of the world, as you have felt it. I know how mere worldly society deadens the heart, and bears away the mind from things worthier of its contemplation than dress, and operas, and plays; and I am glad that you tell me that you have often been tempted to withdraw yourself from your artificial world. You are wrong, and you do me injustice, when you fear that I shall despise you for confessing your weakness. We are all weak, and full of resolves, which we seldom carry out, or we carry out badly. I am, indeed, proud of the confidence you are kind enough to place in me.

"Your perturbation and distress, alarm me. How am I to understand you? I am most flattered, I assure you, for the deep interest you take in my unworthy self; and that you find pleasure in my sincerity. I hope I may continue to deserve your good opinion. But why should you be ridiculous in my sight? I have read this part of your letter again and again; and I own, I have no doubt you will think me very dull and foolish—I own I cannot thoroughly understand it.

"I am, perhaps, a prosy little body. It is true that I have never before received a letter couched in the warm language in which you address me. There is a most flattering interpretation to which your words are open; but it would be folly to give them such interpretation, since we know so very little of one another. Yet you set your life before me, that I might judge it. Such judgments are not for us, nor for this world. I am sorry that you have wasted so much time, but your education and abilities will enable you, I fervently hope, to redeem the past, and to take that position in the world to which you aspire. You call your confession of weakness humiliating. It is the best part of your letter, and has touched me more than the rest. You speak of my generosity and charity. I wish you would not flatter me. I am no better than my neighbours, and only hope I am no worse. If I have striven to be of service here and there to a few poor fellow-creatures, I have only done my duty, and that barely. Rank you with the herd? My dear Mr. Faversham, you prove how little you know me when you address such phrases to me. You allude to our walk. I confess, with a candour which you will not misinterpret, that I derived very great pleasure from it. This pleasure may have expressed itself in my eyes and voice, but I am much afraid you misunderstood the expression, or gave too much importance to it. We had an agreeable walk, and we were happy. I am always pleased when a gentleman will forget all the small, and, to my mind, humiliating compliments which are generally held to be gallant and well bred, and will be content to talk rationally and audibly to a female companion. I should have been more content had there been fewer compliments in your strange letter. You must not write to me nor talk to me about my courageous and devout soul. Its truth and strength are for a higher judgment. You then crave my mercy. This is really too absurd. I am to be your model of excellence—your shining light. It is monstrous. I am inclined to laugh, and I should laugh if I did not see plainly that you were in earnest. You say that I am not a phantom of yesterday, but I fear that I am exactly so much, and no more. You are to be improved by approaching me! Since when am I a great teacher and professor of everything? Every word that follows convinces me that you labour under some hallucination in regard to me. Close application to some study, or travelling, would do you more good than the advice of a Solon.

"You are the strangest correspondent. I am told in one line that I hate compliments and despise a flatterer; and then my correspondent falls to write whole baskets of sugar plums, and nearly suffocates me under them.

"Where you are really serious, and where you speak of the world and its vanities, I find that we think very much alike, and I am pleased to find this. There are indeed deeper and holier feelings, as you say, than those which manifest themselves in drawing-rooms. I have always had a horror of ball-rooms from my childhood. Dancing is not, to me, the amusement of a rational creature. It is natural in children, for it conduces, I am told, to the healthy development of their bodies. The quiet, sensible conversation of good and educated people is amusement enough for every well regulated mind.

"Again, you say that every heart should speak without reserve. This is quite true. Are you quite sure your letter is that of an entirely candid writer? I can only say, for my part, that I find it a very hard lesson to master the meanings of it. I am most delighted with its earnestness; and, where it refers directly to my humble self, I should not be a woman—I should not be human, if I did not feel some gratification.

"But you fly about in a most unaccountable manner. From flowers and hedge-rows, and hopes soaring from the dust to your worldly prospects; that these are modest is no misfortune to my mind. They who are not content with a little, should themselves make that little more: You appear to be ambitious, and you tell me that you want strength of character. I fear you overrate my powers when you appeal to me, a weak, inexperienced woman, who knows little or nothing about the world, (nor cares to know,) to give you courage. Reflect how you impose a responsibility on me, when you declare that I may destroy all your courage—all your prospects! I! a creature you have not seen half-a-dozen times in the whole course of your life! We live in railroad times it is true, but we may surely afford some few months at least to consider requests of the nature you address to me. I feel naturally flattered by them, as who would not? Still, give me leave to say that, so short and trivial is our acquaintance, and so unused am I to such a letter as yours, that I am puzzled.

"My mother and father, who are at tea down stairs, wonder what I can be writing about all this time; and I feel anxious, for I am not satisfied that I am right in holding this correspondence with you. You have deeply disturbed and unsettled me. What a young lady of the world would say, in reply to a letter like yours—who can say? I am sure, nobody in this house. You see, you desire, if I understand you, to escape from the conventional trammels of society, while I almost regret that I don't know more of them. Perhaps I ought to disguise my sentiments, and be very formal; this part I could never consent to act. I can only hope that you will not misunderstand me. I own frankly to you that I am proud of your confidence, and shall endeavour to understand how to value it. I am constrained to admit that I feel an interest in this correspondence which I cannot describe. Pray, don't mistake me. I mean no more than I write.

"You say, will I destroy your dream? It is a dream that has death in the very heart of it. I cannot bear to read the conclusion of your letter a second time. I remember all our walk, every word you said, how completely I was interested. All the evening it dwelt happily in my memory.

"I am afraid that you will not quite understand this rambling note. Believe me, I shall think of you, and pray for you. Your sincere friend,

"ARAMINTA ASHBY."

Miss Ashby's letter was admirably adapted to confound and perplex a man of Henry Faversham's temperament, and did confound and perplex him accordingly. The lofty gentleman was crest-fallen under the criticism of the young lady, to whom he had addressed his flowing sentences. His images and conceits had gone for naught. The lesson was not a useless one. We shall see presently how Faversham profited by it.

ERROR AND PREJUDICE.—What renders man unjust? Are not errors and prejudices the causes of the abuse of power? If you really wish to prevent the commission of injustices, you must first remove error and prejudice. Any one entrusted with power will abuse it, if not also connected with the love of truth and virtue, no matter whether he be a prince or one of the people.

IN A CHURCHYARD.

I STOOD to day
Mid the ruins gray
Of a church, with ivied crest,
'Twas carpeted with greensward fair,
It had a silent, solemn air,
As if all nature's music there
Was hushed that the dead might rest.

The hand of Time had fallen on much,
But with a light and wayward touch,
As if even he felt with awe.
The church had scarcely felt his rage,
The tombs, 'tis true, were bent with age,
But the memories scrolled on each marble page
Were there without a flaw.

Those letters did appear to me
Like to the faith of infancy,
Upon our spirits wrought;
When we bend and grow hoary with care and with years,
When each friend, and each scene, of our youth disappears,
That faith remains with our joys and tears
Till we sleep in the hope that it taught.

RAMBLES AFTER WILD FLOWERS.

"Thank God! when forth from Eden
The weeping pair were driven,
That unto Earth, though cursed with thorns,
The little flower was given.
That Eve when looking downward,
To face her God afraid,
Beheld the scented violet,
The primrose in the shade."

Mary Howitt.

THE love of flowers is a sacred feeling; it is felt and acknowledged by the savage as well as by the philosopher; in earliest infancy as well as in extreme old age; and the poor and humble derive as much pleasure from it as the great and wealthy. The universal heart of man, indeed, as has been well observed, blesses flowers. They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage-altar, and the tomb. The Cupid of the ancient Hindûs tipped his arrows with flowers, and orange flowers are a bridal crown with us—a nation of yesterday. Flowers garlanded the Grecian altar, and hung in votive wreaths before the Christian's shrine. This love of flowers is totally independent of the abstruse classifications of science. It is not according to their systematic arrangement in orders, their number of leaves and petals, nor their peculiarities of growth; it is for themselves alone—in their exquisite forms, brilliant colours, and delicious odours. Rousseau has truly said, though at first sight it appears rather paradoxical, that a man may be a good botanist without knowing the name of a single plant. We do not, by any means, desire to underrate the advantages of science, but merely to impress our readers with the conviction that the cultivation of flowers is not the occult mystery that many take it to be. "If delight may provoke men's labour," says Gerard, "what greater delight is there than to behold the earth apparelled with plants, as with a robe of embroidered work, set with orient pearls, and garnished with great diversity of rare and costly jewels! Give me leave to tell you that God, of his infinite goodness and bounty, hath, by the medium of plants, bestowed almost all food, clothing, and medicine upon man." Mrs. Hemans has beautifully said:

"Flowers! when the Saviour's calm, benignant eye
Fell on your gentle beauty; when from you
That heavenly lesson for all hearts He drew,
Eternal, universal as the sky;
Then in the bosom of your purity
A voice He set, as in a temple-shrine,
'That life's quick travellers ne'er might pass you by Unwarn'd of that sweet oracle divine."

Let us ramble for a while into old hoary woods, among gray rugged trees, and thickly matted hedge-rows; over green fields, beside silent waters and, amid Spring's plenitude of wild flowers. Here is our old friend the daisy, which we love for its simple beauty, and cherish for its sweet name. What a lovely suggestion: "the eye of the day," or as old Chaucer called it, the "ee 'o the day"—the day's eye, just waking at the first blushes of the dawn, and struggling with a few silent tears which make it blink; and then laughing in very joy at the glory of the sun, greeting the lark after the first breaking of the morn, with its sparkling star-like form. Old Chaucer's heart gushed with joy at the first budding of Spring. His blood began to stir with new anticipations. He was up betimes in the morning, before the daisies were well rid of their tears. His books were dead letters then—there were better books without; he went to hear the birds sing, to see the flowers blow, and to inhale their hallowed fragrance. He tells us that he loved the daisies above all flowers that grew, and under the shade of the great oaks at Castle Donnington, he would sit and contemplate their starry blossoms.

"—I am up and walking in the mead,
To see this flower against the sun spread.
When it upriseth, early on the morrow,
That blissful sight softeneth all my sorrow.
So glad am I, that when I have presence
Of it, to do it all reverence,
As she that is of all flowers the flower,
Fulfilled of all virtue and honour,
And ever alike fair and fresh of hue.

And ever I love it, and ever alike new;
And ever I shall, till that mine heart die;
There loveth no one hotter in his life,
And when that it is eve I run blythe,
As soon as ever the sun sinketh west,
To see this flower how it will go to rest,
For fear of night—so hateth she darkness.
Her cheer is plainly spread in the brightness
Of the sun—for there it will unclose."

In Chaucer's time the daisy was called "Marguerite," and was considered an emblem of constancy and love. It is called by this name at the present day in France; the word in French signifying a pearl. It was the device of the unfortunate Margaret of Anjou, and, while prosperity surrounded her, her nobles wore it in their hair, and her maids had it embroidered on their bodices. The significance of the name was well understood by Francis, I., who called his devoted sister, Margaret of Valois—the companion of Erasmus, she too who had the daisy-flower worn in her honour—his "Marguerite of Marguerites." Its botanical name, "Bellis Perennis," "Unfading Beauty," is highly poetical and suggestive.

In the mutations of languages substantives and adjectives undergo the fewest changes; and those which refer to the appearances of nature have a remarkable permanency. The English word rose may be traced up to the old Persian, and will then be found identical with the modern word, and signifying red. In the French the word is rose, in the Latin, Italian, and Spanish, rosa; in the German and Danish rose, in the Dutch roos, Swedish ros, Armenian rosen, Irish ros, Welsh rhôs, Greek rodos, from the root of red or ruddy. Rosemary is formed of a compound implying sea-rose; in the Welsh rhos mari; Irish bath ros, a sea-rose.

Our old friend the buttercup has an especial charm in its name. We remember when we went into the lawns and meadows, and gathered such armfuls of the glittering blossom, that our little arms were well wearied with their load. And then the great charm so inseparable from buttercups, of ascertaining which of our young companions were most fondly attached to butter, by holding the flower beneath the chin; we were unfortunately much given to studies of philosophy in our younger days, and on these occasions always had a lively intuition that the flower would reflect its golden light without caring for the individual's love of butter. The little celadine is a near neighbour to the buttercup; it is sometimes called small-wort. In Lyte's "Herbal," which was "first set forth in the Almaigne tongue in 1578," the greater celadine is called "Chelidonium," that is to say, swallow tribe; because, as Plinî writes, "it was first found out by swallows, and hath healed the eyes and restored sight to their young ones, that had harme in their eyes, or have been blinde." The author tells us that the lesser celadine was so called because "it beginneth to spring and to flower at the coming of the swallows, and withers at their returne." Of the same tribe is the pheasant's eye, so called on account of its close resemblance to the eye of that bird. It was called by Gerarde "rose-ae rubie," in allusion to its brilliancy; it has also the classic name of Adonis, from the ancient fable which states it to have sprung from a drop of the blood of Adonis. The sweet anemone is another of the same class; its name in Greek signifies "wind" or "spirit." Its English appellation of wind-flower is a poetical name, and characteristic of its fragile beauty. The elegant clematis is a member of the same extensive family. Old Gerarde claims the honour of having given it its poetical name of "traveller's joy," on account of its "decking and adorning waies and hedges where people travel":

"On wilding rose-bush apt to creep,
O'er the dry limestone's craggy steep,
There still a gay companion near,
To the way-faring traveller."

All these flowers are comprehended in one extensive family, having the ranunculus as the type of the whole, and termed "Ranunculaceae," from the Latin root, rana, a frog.

The many appellations which some plants have received, and the many plants to which the same name is sometimes applied, renders it exceedingly perplexing to the reader of the older poets to understand all the allusions that are made to flowers. One of the prettiest names which occurs in English poetry, will serve to illustrate this. Sir Walter Scott has applied the name to the traveller's joy, as the following lines would indicate:

"On the hill
Let the wild heath-bell flourish still;
Cherish the tulip, prune the vine,
But freely let the woodbine twine,
And leave untrimmed the eglantine."

In another passage he bids a lady twine a wreath of eglantine for her brow, but we cannot admit the prickly briar—the eglantine of the old poets—in such a case, as a wreath of thorns could add nothing to the charms and graces of beauty. Milton makes a similar error; in the following couplet he appears to allude to the honeysuckle:—

"Through the sweetbriar or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine."

Spenser and Shakspeare do not commit such mistakes; they are both careful to preserve the old poetic names of flowers, and a botanical connection in their floral groups. The true eglantine of the older writers, is the prickly sweetbriar rose, one of the most lovely children of the woods and green lanes, and which, during the whole Summer, exhales the most delightful perfume from its leaves and flowers. It is the "Rosa rubiginosa" of modern botany, and the "Rosa eglanteria" of the olden time.

Of the flowers which have obtained the special notice of the poets, the violet stands almost first. Like the eglantine, however, the name has been applied to several distinct plants. In old times, the snowdrop was often called the narcissus violet; the wall-flower was called the Garnesee violet, and in French, violette jaune. The periwinkle was anciently called du lisseron, or, violette des sorciers, and our own violet was termed violette de Mars. Not to modern poets alone do its beauties belong, for scarce a poet from old Homer down to Wordsworth has failed to sing its praises, and fables without end have been invented, to account for the origin of its name. We can find no better etymology than that which derives it from the Latin viā, by or on the wayside, where it grows to cheer the wayfarer with its odorous breath. The sweet little heart's-ease, or pansy, is of the violet tribe! What an endearing name is that! Ease for the heart. Who can tell how many sorrowing hearts may have found solace in that lovely flower, how many weary spirits may have seen in the soft, loving smile of that little blossom, a new world of joy, a new source of life and comfort. The heart's-ease has been the subject of some grotesque appellations; herb-trinity, three-faces-under-a-hood, love-in-idleness, and numerous other strange compounds have been applied to it. In the "Midsummer Night's Dream," where Shakspeare describes the uselessness of Cupid's aim at the heart of the Fairy Queen, he thus refers to it:

"Yet marked I, where the bolt of Cupid fell;
It fell upon a little western flower,
Before milk-white, now purple with Love's wound,
And maidens call it, 'Love in Idleness.'"

There is a bewitching beauty in the simile, equal to any floral metaphor which has emanated from Shakspeare's genius.

A little group of pansies, mingled with marigolds (called Sonch, cares) is a common offering of friendship in France. The fond lover frequently presents them to his mistress, with the motto, "May they be far from thee."

The classical beauty which characterizes many of the botanical names of our field flowers renders the study of botany particularly charming in a literary point of view. The deadly nightshade is a pleasing instance; its botanical name of "Atropa belladonna" is very suggestive of its history and properties. Atropa, one of the Fates, was endowed with the privilege of cutting the thread of life. The wasting disease termed atrophy is named after this fatal deity. The specific named belladonna, signifying a beautiful lady, conjoined with the generic tense, serves as an admirable symbol of the plant—Death embalmed in beauty, a blighting poison lurking beneath a lovely form. Shakspeare is supposed to allude to this plant in "Macbeth," under the name of the insane root. The origin of the name of hyacinth is another beautiful instance. The ancient poets tell us that the flower received its name from Apollo, who, having the misfortune to kill his friend, the elegant youth Hyacinthus, changed the blood that was spilled into that flower. In sooth, it is a sweet fancy to be embalmed for ever in regenerative beauty—to live again, from season to season, in undying loveliness. The flower would consecrate his memory, and keep his gentleness enshrined.

The naming of the Andromeda is a very noteworthy incident in the life of the great Swedish naturalist, Linnæus. It is cheering to watch the footsteps of a genius like Linnæus, departing from beaten tracks and time-honoured usages, striking out into a new pathway, and by it arriving at some of the grandest truths of nature. In the wide field of natural history, he walked as a conqueror going on to triumph; tracing out new analogies, founding new systems of classification, and illuminating, as with the wand of an enchanter, beauty, harmony, and light, from a dark and dingy chaos, throwing chains over the great Proteus at the instant when he slumbered, and, by his genius and imperturbable determination, forcing him to reveal his mysteries. In traversing the bleak uncultivated wilds of Lycksele, Lapland, whither, while yet in his youth, he was sent by the Royal Society of Upsal, he found this plant in great profusion, decorating the wide and desolate marshes with its myriads of lovely blossoms. The plant closely resembles one of the heaths (Erica dabocia) and is extremely beautiful. The buds are of a blood-red colour before they expand, but when fully blown, the colour is a flesh-colour. In contemplating its chaste beauties, and it is just such a plant as might have bloomed in Eden, the imaginative mind of the great naturalist was struck by a fancied resemblance, in the general character of the plant, to the story of Andromeda, as related by the poets. He went on over snows and moors, and the sweet flower still shed its holy light upon him, to cheer him on his way. All the details of the fate of Andromeda occurred to his mind, and he thought that if the mythologists had intended to symbolize the plant, they could not have devised a more appropriate fable. Andromeda is represented as a virgin of exquisite beauty, chained to a rock in the midst of the sea, and exposed to dragons and venomous serpents: the flower always grew on some turfey hillock, amid the wild swamps, where the water bathed its roots, as the sea washed the feet of Andromeda. The unhappy virgin was assailed by sea-monsters; the abode of the flowers was frequented by various reptiles. The poets fable that Perseus came to deliver the afflicted maiden from all her dangers, and to chase away her foes; and so, too, thought Linnæus, does the Summer, like another Perseus, come to give men light and hope to all things, drying up the water which surrounds the plant.

These elegant ideas, and poetical allusions in the writings of Linnæus, have done as much for the advancement of natural history as his deep and penetrating inquiries in matters of pure science. The picture is a cheering one, of the solitary traveller refreshing himself with his classical recollections, and handing down to posterity the result of his day-dreams, by affixing a new name to the flower which had been his solace in the wilderness. And while digging down into the dry details of physical science, he was yet lighted, as a miner by his lamp, with these beautiful fancies of the olden time, these relics of a lost world of poetry; breathing so much that is good and true, so much that is lovely and divine, that in the enthusiasm of our love, we are almost lured into the belief they are verities.

LOST AND FOUND.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

TOWARDS the close of the reign of Louis Philippe, there lived in a handsome villa, situate on the southern suburbs of Dublin, a retired gentleman of large taste and independent fortune. His taste had been acquired in Italy, where he had spent several years, chiefly in the literary and artistic society of Rome, and where he derived considerable advantages from almost constant intercourse with the savans and virtuosi of that brilliant capital. His fortune was acquired by railway speculations, which he had managed with such foresight and prudence, that he contrived to escape the crash that followed the steam mania of the early part of this century. Mr. Simon was looked up to as a great authority on all the niceties and stratagems of finance; and long after he had ceased to speculate in public securities, his house continued to be the resort of the gay and fashionable society, which consents to soil its aristocratic fingers in the muddy waters of seven per cents. He had but one child, a delicate, high-spirited, and vivacious girl of eighteen, whom he loved to excess, and who, but for the amiability and goodness of her nature, would have been spoiled beyond hope of recovery by his unwearied concessions to her whims and caprices. Agnes loved her father in return, and, when sickness or despondency slackened the usual flow of his spirits, proved to him in the best sense of the word, a household angel. Woman's love, however, is large and deep, and Agnes found room, in a sly corner of her heart, for a second idol. She had not seen plain John Waters a dozen times when she secretly surrendered him her heart, and worshipped him with that high fervour, whose best adoration is silence. Independently of his personal graces, which were few, his ways were dear to her, for the nobleness and sincerity of the nature which seemed to animate and guide them. His very laugh, was in itself a treasure, so vigorous, hearty, and jubilant it was; and his humour was of that quaint cast which becomes irresistible from its mock gravity and affected solemnity. What brought Waters to Ashbud Villa, it would be hard to say. It was understood at one time, that he was a speculator seeking advice. Agnes had a tradition which she reserved for herself, that the speculation took another direction than that which leads to stocks, share-lists, and investments, and, strange to say the same idea, took the shape of suspicion in other minds than hers. Old Lady Faddle, a respectable dowager, who shared with Mr. Simon all the fine art enthusiasm of the society frequenting the villa, was known to have said that if she was not mistaken, Mr. Waters "had a pearl in his eye," a statement which she accompanied with an expressive look and shake of the head, very distasteful, it must be told, to young Mr. Rogers, an exquisite, more remarkable for his faultless gloves and pretty neckties than for good taste or good breeding; and who was known to cherish a passion, and that a hot one, for the young mistress of Ashbud Villa. Spite of all we may say to the contrary, it will be taken for fiction that Lady Faddle absolutely loved Mr. Rogers, or as she decorously called him, greatly to his disgust, "my Master Rogers." Her partiality was evinced in various ways, not the least remarkable of which was her constantly forcing on him queen-cakes and oranges, whenever they happened to encounter each other. If she caught him at a public promenade, she would insist on taking his arm and marching him up and down between rows of people, who praised him for his filial attention to his mother; if at the theatre, he carried her bouquet, helped to cloak, and assist her to the carriage. The wags of his acquaintance insisted that matters were fast approaching a crisis, and counselled him to adopt green spectacles and shoe-buckles, that the coming event might not lack harmony and uniformity. To all those reproaches Rogers answered with sublime silence and a well-sustained air of contemptuous indifference. He hated to be chaffed, he hated Lady Faddle, but, as, in renouncing her, he should have to renounce Ashbud Villa, he concealed his emotions and even mustered up enough patience to tolerate, without reciprocating, the gifts and caresses of his venerable wooer.

On a morning of July, 1844, Agnes Simon and her father were seated at breakfast in a prettily-furnished room opening into a small conservatory, and admitting through its windows glimpses of the green and citrol-coloured foliage in which Ashbud Villa was embosomed. Mr. Simon was buried in the pages of his newspaper, whilst his daughter was employed in grouping to her satisfaction a bunch of fresh-cut flowers. Some happy thought was evidently tickling her fancy, for smiles passed and re-passed her face like summer ripples intersecting the sunny surface of a lake.

"Papa."

"Darling."

"Did you hear what happened to Lady Faddle at the drawing-room, on Friday last?"

"Didn't fall over her train, I hope?"

"Dear sir, no; her heels, at least, are not artificial, though you are ill-natured enough to insinuate so; she dropped her teeth."

"Her teeth?"

"Her teeth! She was complimenting Master Rogers on the whiteness of his wristbands when her tongue suddenly ceased, a tinkle was heard on the floor, and somebody exclaimed, 'Bless me, what lady has lost a row?'"

"She recovered them, of course?"

"Dear sir, you will never let one finish a story. When I was a child, I knew Jack would kill the giants, but I scorned to anticipate the catastrophe."

"You are a precious torment."

"Except when papa is sick, or in the blues. Dear sir, when will Providence bless you with another fit?"

"Of what, child?"

"Of the blues, sir."

"You appear anxious to see me laid up, I presume."

"I am guilty of that weakness, sir. If you knew how delighted one feels at being called an angel, and a darling, and twenty other fine names, you could scarcely blame me."

"H'm?"

"When you were ill last time, you said I was a seraph. Dear sir, I am ready to lower my pretensions; make me a plain saint next time, and leave the canonization to posterity."

"May I ask the cause of Miss Simon's mirth this morning?"

"Lady Faddle's teeth, sir, she can't help thinking how queer one must feel sitting down to dinner with one row of teeth in her mouth and the other taking the round of the castle."

"Agnes, Agnes."

"Master Rogers, I am told, sir, was so delighted at what happened that he took to bed and wasn't seen till last night, when our John caught him playing claquer to a ballet dancer in that very handsome theatre in Hawkins street."

Mr. Simon laid down his paper and looked with some severity at his daughter, who returned his gaze with an arch show of bewilderment.

"Miss Simon, I—"

"Will you pardon me, sir, on a solemn occasion like the present, is it not indecorous to assist in a morning wrapper? Pray, excuse me for me for a moment, whilst I run to put on poor mamma's mourning."

"Will you kindly have a little discretion, Miss Simon? I intend you shall hear a little sermon from me on—"

"And the text, sir?"

"Charity, Miss Simon."

"That I believe is an angelic attribute, dear sir."

"I wish it were a more womanly one, Agnes."

"Dear papa, did Captain Cooke touch at the island of Utopia?"

"Now you are getting wearisome. Poor Lady Faddle, Agnes, is, and I mean nothing disrespectful when I mention it, a person whose age at least ought to secure her respect and attention."

"You are not forgetting Master Rogers, sir?"

"Time brings its infirmities, with which society is supposed to sympathise, and the failings which accompany them are condoned by the amiability of those on whom they fall. What are you writing?"

"A new system of ethics, sir—the author is a dearly beloved relative of the amanuensis."

"If Lady Faddle wishes to wear artificial teeth, there is no law to hinder her doing so. If she love Mr. Rogers, let her. She is still good looking."

"Thanks to the inventor of the looking glass."

"Has a fresh complexion?"

"Dear sir, how can you? Surely you would not deny a lady the pleasure of painting in water colours?"

Her figure."

"Papa, dear, where does Shakespeare speak of leather and prunella?"

"Her eyes are fine."

"Oh! true!"

"There came a knight out of the west,
With a rey do—lo lonna,
Quoth he, I ride from morn till night,
In search of Ma Bella Donna."

"I declare Agnes, you are growing intolerable. Another cup of coffee."

"It is long since you were so eloquent, sir. It will delight me to be able to tell her ladyship what a warm partisan she has secured in Ashbud Villa."

"You do no such thing, Miss Monkey."

"Lord! papa."

"Do, if you please, with the certainty of my displeasure. I should blush to have this conversation repeated, Miss Simon."

"Only fancy Master Rogers' jealousy, sir."

Mr. Simon frowned for a moment, but had to laugh the next.

"Can you imagine the consequences, papa? Indignant accusations—challenge—early morning—Dalkey Island—pistols and chocolate—fire to be delivered at twenty paces—entrance of Lady Faddle—'up, up with your weapons, gentlemen!—Master Rogers, away, thou hast turned my love to wormwood!—' dear Mr. Simon, I faint—support me!—ha! ha! ha! How charmingly melo-dramatic, sir!"

"I tell you, Agnes, I shall not allow this lady's name to be under the subject of your pleasantries. If, for instance—"

"She should become my stepmother, sir, her revenge would be terrible."

"I will not envy you the credit of this rude jest, Agnes. You have a trick of slipping the button off your foil, even with your best friends. I suppose a marriage between Lady Faddle and me would give you satisfaction—throw down all obstacles, for instance, between you and Mr. Rogers! Eh?"

"Dear sir, you take too much advantage of your penetration. I aspire so high? Cypress and laurel, what would a poor little woman, like Agnes Simon, do with so eligible a person?"

"Beautiful humility! Not good enough for him, child!"

"You forget his neckties, sir, and then, if you knew how much the lustre of his boots contributes to the brilliancy of his mind, you would pronounce the idea hopeless."

"Neckties and boots! you do not blame him for bestowing care on his person—do you?"

"I, papa! Let us be grave, pray, as becomes the subject."

"Do I smile?"

"Do I, dear sir? Smile, indeed, and Master Rogers on the carpet. Let me send you another cup."

"The evasion is pretty, but inartistic, Miss Simon. What is your objection to Mr. Rogers? Is he not handsome?"

"Lady Faddle vows he is, sir."

"Does he not love you?"

"With your consent, I shall ask him, papa."

"I trust even my authority would be insufficient to make you do so. It is plain, then, that you do not care for him."

"How ungrateful of him to say so."

"Suppose, Agnes, we give over bantering, and exchange confidences."

"In that event, papa."

"I should tell you that I do not think of Lady Faddle in the light of your conjecture; and having satisfied my little tormentor as far, I would ask her, if she loves?"

"She would say, let us suppose—I do, sir."

"I should ask her to follow the current of her thoughts, and tell me where they rest."

"Dear sir, with due respect for the metaphor, she would answer, 'in calm Waters.'"

"Halloa!"

"Did the coffee scald you, sir?"

"Waters—aye—to be sure. Blows the wind in that quarter. Agnes?"

"Many a day, sir; swallows come from the south."

"And your solitary bird has made a Summer?"

"Spare me, papa, I have been indiscreet in telling you so much."

"I hope your heart does not reproach you, Agnes."

"Never, when you are concerned; here comes Lady Faddle, as I live, up the avenue. Her advertisement was answered, then."

"Advertisement, what was that?"

"Din't see it sir! let me think—aye—'Stolen or strayed, lost or mislaid, by a young and fascinating female, one row of teeth and a—'"

"Silence, for goodness sake, they come. 'Good morning, Lady Faddle. How dye do, Mr. Roger?'"

"Charming day, Mr. Simon," said Lady Faddle, as she disengaged her arm from Mr. Rogers, and threw herself, with an air of considerable dignity, on a lounge. "Master Rogers, will you fetch me a hand-screen, the light is so brilliant. How is my pet?" she continued, reaching her hand to Agnes, who, with eyes reverently bent to the ground, approached her with a gait full of mock timidity. "Don't go out, child, if you care for your complexion—freckles are no longer fashionable."

"Is the sun the ton yet, madam?" asked Agnes, with a bewitching shrewdness.

"Heaven knows child. Since the shilling novels came out, nobly who has a reputation for common sense to preserve will look at the moon."

"The change would be perfect, madam, if the stars also were put upon the index. Is it allowable to speak of roses and nightingales?"

"No, my dear, the prevailing taste inclines to dahlias and parquets; even parrots are voted bores, and are being sold in hundreds to the Jews."

"The bores, ma'am?"

"The parrots, child. The tendency of the age is taking the direction of common sense. We have begun to exalt the natural, and set down the artificial to its proper level."

"A healthy sign of the times."

"V'ey," added Mr. Rogers. "'Tis charming, it is."

"Thus, you see, the world reverts once more to the beautiful and good."

"Which deprives you and me of all chance in the scramble. Lady Faddle."

"Chance! Miss Simon, chance indeed. I should like to know by whose authority the legitimate claims of goodness and beauty are reduced to mere chances!"

"The world is not wholly bawbious," remarked Mr. Rogers.

"The observation is very excellent for you, Master Rogers."

"Thank you, Lady Faddle."

"It is refreshing to hear a person who can say something original," said Agnes, whilst she looked as demure as a sphynx.

"Thank'ee, Miss Simon, praise from such a source is—au—au—"

"Suppose we say inestimable," suggested Agnes.

Mr. Rogers bowed and smiled approvingly.

"Will you, like a dear, place this pillow a little higher?" asked her ladyship, with a look meant to conquer the young gentleman.

"Delighted to oblige you, Lady Faddle; you look as grand as Jove—you do."

"How fortunate the god is in having so sweet a Hebe," said Miss Simon, with a little silvery laugh.

"Hebe! Hebe! Miss Simon."

"Yes, Mr. Rogers, you surely must remember. She was wine-cooler to Olympus."

"Aw, dont."

"Indeed!"

"Mr. Simon," broke in Lady Faddle, "did you see the Athenæum?"

"Anything strange?"

"A stupid eulogy of those horrid Caracci; they've dug up a new light by the way—one Sassoforatti, whose painting, they say, resembles the finest enamelling."

"Poor praise, Lady Faddle."

"Depends on the canon in vogue, my dear sir. When I was a girl, and Maclise was in the first blow of his reputation—colour was everything—now 'tis figure, sir. That disgusting, snuffy old man, that vile Turner has a school of his own—I don't know where we shall stop. Did you see his mountain gen?"

"No."

"Such a monstrosity—all red, and blue, and pink, and ultramarine—they dragged me across half London to look at it. It reminded me of a piece of canvas sadly attacked with scarletina, and purple fever. Now, there's a love!"

"Which, Lady Faddle?"

"Haydin's burning of Rome—superb, sir. Thackeray lifted his hat to it. By the way, talking of the great moralist, you did not hear his latest bon mot?"

"Not so fortunate."

"Well, it's so good! You must know that Albert Smith—capital man for a small party where nobody else has a tongue, wrote these lines in the Countess of Titbat's album, at her special and pressing request:—

'Mount Blanc is the monarch of mountains,
They crowned him long ago;
But who they got to crown him,
Nobody seems to know.'

It happened a few weeks after, that William Makepeace—euphonious name by the way for a gentleman whose pen-handle is a bludgeon—was also requested to brand his burning genius on the same pages. And underneath poor Albert's lines he wrote as follows:—

'I'm sure that Smith wrote in a hurry,
To criticise I don't presume;
But still, I think that Lindley Murray,
Instead of who, had written whom.'

Is it not very sarcastic, Master Rogers?"

"Astonishing, Lady Faddle. Who but the author of Pickwick could have thought it?"

"Pickwick! Mr. Rogers," exclaimed Agnes.

Lady Faddle, seeing her charge in danger, resumed her chat with unladylike vehemence.

"Talking of art, Mr. Simon, old Crackfun, the Jew, has succeeded in purchasing the celebrated Cenci vase."

Mr. Simon literally leaped from his chair, and clasped his hands in amazement. "Crackfun, the purchaser of the Cenci vase! Impossible!"

"Well, I don't see how."

"Perhaps you are not aware, Lady Faddle, that the vase you speak of has been, and is, the dream of my life. Good morning, Mr. Waters."

The salutation was addressed to a plainly-attired gentleman, who entered the room unannounced, and, having shaken hands with the party, seated himself near the glass doors of the conservatory.

"Of your life! Mr. Simon, who would have taken you for an enthusiast?"

"Who?" echoed Mr. Rogers, deferentially.

"I saw it at Naples, in the cabinet of a reduced nobleman, I offered to become the purchaser for three thousand guineas; but the man's taste was greater than his necessities, and he refused to part with it. I left Naples a discontented man, and am so still."

"Nonsense—discontented! You, to imitate a baby crying for a slice of mouldy moon! ha! ha!"

"Banter me, as your ladyship may, this is the whole truth. I am a fanatic in art. There is a group of Bacchanals on that vase that I would lose an eye to own."

"Bless me, Mr. Simon, I can scarcely credit your fanaticism. Fancy one going about with one eye!"

"My eye!" ejaculated Mr. Rogers.

"Be as sarcastic as you like, Lady Faddle, I——"

"Sarcastic, Mr. Simon! here is Master Rogers who shall witness for me against you. Now, Rogers, dear, when it was given out that one of Mrs. Grunestone's feet was an inch longer than the other, who went about to all her acquaintance and contradicted it? who put down the report that Miss Swan had to be confined once a month in a straight jacket? who dispelled the terrible rumour that the Beresford's used salt pork at breakfast? who denied in every corner of the town that Lady Bencher flung a toast rack at her husband, and put pins in the arms of his dressing gown—who?"

"You astonish us, Lady Faddle—we never heard these accusations made before," said Agnes, hurriedly.

"The fact speaks poorly for your experience, child. Where is the use of being alive, if one does not know what is passing? Besides, should those abominable details ever reach you, shut your ears to them. Society, as you shall yet find, my love, is very uncharitable."

"It would seem so, indeed. How those unhappy victims of falsehood must feel in finding in your ladyship an advocate, who, not only rebuts actual charges, but anticipates others that have not yet been made."

"Conscience, child, a peaceful conscience is my only reward. Take it for granted, that when your reputation is attacked, I shall not be slow to defend it. Was it not cruel to say, that the Hon. Mrs. Slarkey had lost a row of pearls at the last drawingroom by the bursting of her stomacher. Oh! for a whip—you know the quotation, my dear."

"How kind of you to think of my reputation, Lady Faddle. Fortunately for us both, it is an anomalous thing that takes care of itself."

"As you like, my dear; yet, when Mrs. Perkins said that the colour in Miss Basset's nose was the fruit of French brandy, was it not providential that the poor, maligned girl had some one to take her part? Not that I would say that Miss Basset does not take brandy, but, I should think, only medicinally, at least moderately."

"I have heard it discolours teeth strangely," said Agnes. "Ladies should be cautious, your ladyship, for——"

"As I was saying about the vase, Mr. Simon," said Lady Faddle, adroitly, turning the conversation, "Crackfun has got it; and his den in Bishop street is the resort of all Dublin."

"Did you hear what he gave for it?"

"A trifle, sir. Only five hundred pounds."

"Gone for a bagatelle!"

"Crackfun himself is in Dublin."

"Then I shall call on him. May I mention, your ladyship, merely by way of introduction?"

"With my heartiest good wishes, Mr. Simon. By the way, should the fellow tell you that I played him foul about a miserable brilliant, don't lose your temper from a friendly impulse. People will tell falsehoods, Mr. Simon. Do I suggest anything new to you, Mr. Waters?"

"Merely a boomerang, madam, which I had the good luck to get for a trifle this morning."

"And pray, what is that, sir?"

"A curious weapon, which might recommend itself to your ladyship. Its peculiarity is that, after being discharged, it may return with increased force to wound the hand that hurled it."

"You puzzle me sadly. Can you illustrate its advantages?"

"Well, allegorically, we'll say that Jones says that Smith picked a pocket; the lie here is the boomerang discharged, Smith replies that Jones stole a pair of stockings from a drying line, there's the boomerang returned. Do I convey myself to your ladyship?"

"So, so. Is the world improving, do you think, Mr. Waters?"

"Taking your ladyship as an instance, I should say we are making admirable progress."

"And yet, people will not hold their tongues. Rogers, dear, what did Mrs. Belmont say of me, the morning after the drawing-room?"

"Aw! something to the effect that Lady Faddle was the most chawming woman present."

"Are you surprised that I should feel vexed at the impertinences of those creatures, Mr. Waters?"

"I should have ground my teeth with anguish were I your ladyship."

"And General Sweetman's sister said I was a toad—the wretch!"
 "I am never annoyed, madam, by people who are vulgar enough to call a spade a spade. Even I come across some of this coarse tattle at times."

"You do? Of course, they say cruel things of me, don't they?"

"I regret I do not feel justified in gratifying your curiosity, Lady Faddle."

"Dear Mr. Waters, pray don't spare your revelations for my sake. Does not the salamander live in fire?"

"Your ladyship will excuse me—there's nothing indelicate; but"

"Economise your 'buta,' dear Mr. Waters, and let me know what they have said of me. 'Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just.'"

"To begin; for instance," —

"Yes."

"They report your ladyship's age as considerably over fifty—that your spirit is constantly elbowing its way into balls and parties, whilst your body is performing slow cotillions round the family vault of the Faddles."

"I can credit all this; well?"

"That your complexion is gone, and its substitute is as much at home as a patch on the cheek of a corpse, or a harlequin on the hearse-box at a bishop's funeral."

"Yes—yes!"

"They say that your hair first saw the light in Brittany, where it was bought by the ounce, and now suits you as a yellow carpet suits a green drawing-room; in other words, is as much out of place as a broken-voiced bailiff in an organ loft, or a death's head at a coronation."

"Oh! day and night!"

"Am I distressing your ladyship?"

"Sir! Cannot I afford to despise this farrago of falsehood?"

"Uncharitable, from the beginning, they pretend to believe that your ladyship's circle is kept together by the fear of your ladyship's tongue—that you unite personally the hideousness of the black lizard with the venom of the puff-adder."

"The puff-adder! Good."

"They affect to regard your ladyship's visits as an epidemic for which there is no remedy, and believe that you travel in cycles, like the cholera—that"

"Pray, that will do, Mr. Waters—dear Mr. Waters. And who, in the name of injured society, are my accusers?"

"Let us have their names," said Mr. Rogers, violently agitating his person.

"Again, I must beg your ladyship's forbearance. Were I to reveal the names of the uncharitable persons—those carrion vultures of the salons—nine of every ten doors in the city would be closed to me, and your ladyship's list of acquaintances be so diminished that seventy per cent. of the town knockers should have to put on mourning."

"And to me the ingrates are indebted for whatever elegance or to be seen amongst them. I may justly say I have been the foundress of Dublin society."

"How forgetful! Ah, my dear madam, people are too apt to forget benefits conferred when circumstances make them independent of those who bestowed them. You will find it hinted in the lost books of the Sybils, that Romulus flayed alive the wolf that suckled him."

"But, am I to have no reprisals? Are these people to be suffered to poison my reputation anonymously? The assassins!"

"Which, by the way, is a very ancient and honourable profession, if madam remembers. Masks were invented to some purpose, and gentlemen who could not stab in the daylight took advantage of the dark."

"There is still some consolation. 'Wert thou as pure as ice and as chaste as snow thou would'st not escape calumny.' Beautiful poet—injured woman! Where is Mr. Simon, Agnes, child?"

"Gone to call on Mr. Crackfun, madam."

"You are right. That vase seems so have turned his head. Give me your arm, Master Rogers. Good morning, Mr. Waters. Agnes, child, kiss me."

TO OUR READERS.

Since our last issue we have received a communication from Mr. BLANCHARD JERROLD, relative to his not having furnished a sufficient supply of MS. for his story of "FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME." MR. JERROLD has intimated that he was not aware his copy had been exhausted, as he was out of town, but that he shall forward it regularly for the future. The Publisher has, therefore, decided upon resuming the publication of the story.

A NIGHT AT SEA.

CHAPTER I.

DON'T tell me — don't tell me! Brother, do you lock up your daughters, like chickens in a coop, if you please, but leave me to manage mine as I please."

"Well — well —"

"Demor-tuis nil — therefore I say nothing of the earlier part of poor Eliza's education. My late excellent wife, and your sister, were quite of your way of thinking, and what was the consequence? Why, that the child used to go dawdling from room to room, like a chicken with the pip, its pretty little face as sad as a funeral, and its cheeks the opposite of convex."

"Poor Ellen!"

"Poor Ellen? so says I, Captain Beauchamp. She was nearer to me than to you — and if I said dearer also, perhaps I should advance no more than I had argument to maintain. I'll leave it to any one to judge whether I did not show as much before her death and after. She had all the advice that Dublin could afford, and her funeral, including a weeping Hymen for her monument, cost me five hundred pounds. I'd like to know what more could be expected from any disconsolate husband in the country?"

"It is not the dead — it is not the dead, Major O'Brien — it is to save the living from destruction that I speak to you. I say you give your daughter too free a rein."

"And I say you keep too tight a one on yours."

"To see a little giddy cockle-shell like Eliza allowed to choose her own reading — her own friends — her own society — her own hours for study or amusement. What can you expect from it?"

"To see a number of young people, all health and good-nature, clapped into a room, and ranged along the wall, like mummies in a catacomb — a school-book or the 'Pilgrim's Progress' for their only reading — dressed up to the throat in black — taught to think jesting worse than murder — to laugh by note, and to be drilled in their very sports! Now, what can you expect from that?"

"The slackened bow will never send an arrow home."

"The bow o'er-bent will break."

"Well, Major, you are too many for me at this word-play. You have the advantage; for you are one of those persons who love to turn everything into matter of ridicule, and it is as vain to reason with a jester, as it is to bring cannon to bear upon butterflies. For my part, I never hear one of those modern philosophers advocate the turning a child loose into a library and choose his own reading, that I do not feel inclined to ask him—sir, if your child were sick, would you send him alone into a druggist's ware-room to lay his hand at random upon bane or antidote? If your child were in want of society, would you turn him into the street to choose what company he pleases? For what are books but company? A good book is good company—and a bad book is very, very bad company indeed. A little time, brother, will, I fear, too plainly show you the fallacy of your fashionable philosophy. Take your own way—but mark what I tell you: Eliza will give you cause to regret your over-indulgence before she is many years older. Had my poor sister lived (what fancy possessed her to marry as she did I cannot tell,) there would have been some hope of safety; but as it is, I look for a lee shore, with blue lights and minute guns, I promise you."

"A LITTLE DISH O' MUSHROOMS!"

"And had my poor sister lived," replied the Major, "whose only foolish act that I remember was that of giving her hand to Lieutenant Beauchamp, of Mizen Lodge, R.N., my nieces might have some chance of happiness and—comfort—but as it is——"

The above conversation passed between Major O'Brien and his brother-in-law, as they sat together, at sunset, on a rustic seat in the little shrubbery of Drumshambo Hall, the Major's wooden leg pointed horizontally forward, and the dark and sallow-faced Lieutenant sitting in the gloomy shadow of a laurel at the further end.

"Come—come—however," added the Major, observing some vexation on the sailor's countenance, "I have done; we must not quarrel, brother. Eliza's marriage will decide the question—and I cannot better show you how little I am disposed to anger at this moment, than by wishing that every one of your good daughters may meet as fair an offer as that of Henry Courtenay."

"Ay," said the Lieutenant, "in that, indeed, she has met a happy fortune. Yet, I don't know how it is, although all appears so certain in that quarter, I have strange misgivings that the match will never be. Have you mentioned the matter to Eliza yet?"

"No—I waited until to-morrow to propose it to her."

"Ten to one she runs adrift at the idea of it."

"Good brother, I am sorry you do not know Eliza. Her father's wish would be enough to make her instantly forego her own. This is the effect of rational indulgence. You shall see the proof before you leave Drumshambo Hall, for I intend to speak to her about it to-morrow, as soon as we have taken breakfast."

At this instant, a long shadow was thrown across the lawn, from the rustic gate which led towards the village road, and a sweet voice was heard singing at a distance the first verse of Burns' beautiful song:

"Their groves o' green myrtle let foreign lands reckon,
Where bright beaming simmers exalt the perfume;
Far dearer to me yon lone glen o' green breckan,
Wi' the burn stealing under the lang yellow broom."

"There she is," said the Major, with a delighted eye.

Casting their eyes in that direction, they beheld standing at the gate, with eyes reverted to the village, a young lady, dressed in simple white, with a plain blue sash around her waist, and dark and curling hair, of somewhat less than the usual length. While the gentlemen observed her, a second shadow fell in the same direction, and immediately after both disappeared. It was plain Eliza had not seen her father and her uncle. Supposing that it was one of the tenantry who might wish to use her intercession with himself, the Major did not take notice of the circumstance, but continued the conversation with his brother-in-law.

"That was a volume of Burns which she carried in her hand—just the poet for her—the wild unshackled bard of nature. You may have seen the glen, which we call the Glen of Ferns, running between the mountain and the village. It is a favourite haunt of Eliza's, prized for its very wildness, and the Irish character of its scenery. It is just the place for her to sit and read such a book as that, the sweet smelling ferns around her, and the wind rushing over the beds of rushes by the little river side. I remember on the day after the skirmish at Drumshambo——"

"Here comes Eliza again," said the Lieutenant, who had his reasons for dreading the mention of Drumshambo.

Although Mr. Hammond bore the title of Major, it must not be supposed that any considerable portion of his life had been devoted to the service of the state in which he lived. His military experience was confined to a campaign or two in a volunteer corps which was raised for the protection of social order, during one of those civil convulsions which used to confer variety on the occupations of rural life in Ireland. In this brief space, however, his reputation had risen high, and he was accustomed in his retirement to speak of the achievements which he had witnessed in the neighbouring bogs and mountains, with a solemnity that to persons more experienced in warfare had something amusing, but which did not fail to strike many of his hearers (particularly when they happened to be members of his household, or guests invited to his table) with astonishment and admiration.

Some of his friends considered that an over-fondness for such reminiscences and Major O'Brien's foible, but, if it deserved the name, he had many good qualities to make amends for so slight an imperfection. He dealt mildly with his tenantry, and other dependents; as a father he was more than kind, and in a country where it was not easy to be all to all, he was hospitable and neighbourly, without distinction of sect or party.

Drumshambo Hall (so named from the scene of that memorable skirmish, the most considerable in which its proprietor had ever been engaged, and in which he had nobly laid down a limb for his king and country) was more remarkable for the beauty of its situation, than for any superior elegance or grandeur in the edifice itself. It stood on a bright green point of land, jutting out into the Shannon, at the distance of less than two miles from——. On the left a grove of firs overshadowed an antique fort, supposed to have once glittered with the arms of the mighty Brian, the Caliph Haroun Alraschid of Irish history. Behind arose a craggy mountain, washed at its base by the waters of the stream, which dilating a little farther toward their source, formed a spacious lake, studded with islets, and graced with many a wood and many an antique ruin. On the left of the hall, the wooded slopes were spotted with handsome villas, or with the cottages of the peasantry, while the front windows commanded a view of the town and bridge, an antique and somewhat fantastical structure containing more than a score of arches, Saracenic, Gothic, Saxon, Norman, pointed, parabolic, elliptical, and of every curve and form that were known in the history of architecture.

The situation on the whole, was one of unusual beauty. Here, in the calm summer days, flat-bottomed mari-boats floated slowly along the glassy basin that reflected the gray crags of the neighbouring mountain. The call of the boatman was echoed amongst the lonesome sunny heights; the marten twittered round the caves, or skimmed the shining surface of the stream, in chase of his invisible prey, or toyed triumphantly with his prize above the alder tops, while the cottager, released for a season from his yearly toil, strolled idly by the hedges to observe the ripening harvest, and to estimate its probable amount. Enchantment was never absent from this delightful solitude. In the spring, the cooing of the wood-quail filled the groves with softness, and in the wreck of the year, the lofty firs upon the fort sung dirges in the wind to the memory of the departed valour that once shone beneath, or the departing beauty that was perishing all around.

Major O'Brien's associations, however, were rather of a warlike than a poetical description, and even the former he seldom carried farther back than the history of his own times. He talked a great deal more of General Humbert than of Hannibal, and of Colonel V—— than of either Fabius or Scipio. The fight of Lake Thrasy-mene was to him less memorable than the skirmish at Drumshambo, and the defeat of Asdrubal a trifle to the surrender of the French invaders at Ballynamuck.

The neighbourhood comprised some thirty or forty families of various grades of gentility. A few grandees lived immured within the walls of their demesnes, and seldom mingled in the assemblies of the place, for, though shining as remote points in the universe of fashion, they were stars of the first magnitude in our neighbourhood. They were somelanded proprietors more affable, but more needy, also besides a few oddities, and a great number of gentlemen farmers, rich people in business, in professions, and others who were lumped, among the Messrs. and Meesdames at the great balls and parties in the neighbourhood. To judge by the conversation that went on amongst these people when they met, one would suppose that the sole business of one rank was to offend that immediately below, and to be offended with that immediately above it; for there was scarcely a being amongst their acquaintances that was not talking of somebody who had offended him. There was, too, as much manœuvring about visits and invitations as was sufficient to show what apt scholars they would be if they had been tutored in a more extensive school. The O'Briens, however, by their hospitality, their good nature, and minute attention to all the courtesies of their station, contrived to please all their neighbours, without giving offence to any, in a circle where the latter was not easily avoided. Their immediate neighbourhood consisted of a few families, who, being nearly equal in rank and in easy circumstances, were tolerably free from those absurd and pitiful jealousies which made society a torment to its members in the village and its vicinity. It was true, the Stuccoes, of Stucco Hall, were every grand and dignified. Mr. Stucco listened with most obvious placidity and condescension to the major's stories of Drumshambo, and Mrs. Stucco's head, when she wished to beam patronage on Eliza O'Brien, turned round upon her shoulders with the majesty of a world revolving on its axis. Miss Stucco received her attentions with a face and eyes that seemed as if she did not see her, and Mr. Alonzo Stucco seemed to value the sound of his voice as highly as an opera-singer, but the O'Briens continued to be pleasant in defiance of the Stuccoes and their extreme politeness.

Early on the following morning, being the tenth of the same date since the immortal skirmish, the front door of the hall was thrown open, and a remarkable figure issued forth in the morning twilight. It was that of Adam Dobe, who was famed throughout our neighbourhood for a certain tendency to the failing of King Arbaces. He had formerly been a sergeant in the L—— militia, when that body had the honour of ranking Major O'Brien amongst its officers, and now combined the offices of valet, courier, page, and groom, for the service of his mutilated commander. His costume was indicative of both his present and his past condition. His lower limbs were incased in a pair of black military leggings, closely buttoned up to the knee; above these appeared a pair of yellow plush undergarments, while a striped jacket, black leathern stock, and military waistcoat, completed the costume of the upper man. A well-set figure, a face marked with a character of habitual severity, and a head but thinly furnished with hair of a dubious brown, and now blown back by the September wind as he looked downward on the river and the distant village, gave a hint of age and some portion of a life devoted to military service.

Advancing to a lofty flag-staff which stood a few paces from the house, Adam Dobe proceeded to hoist an Union-Jack with great satisfaction, after which he prepared to load a small swivel that stood at the foot of the staff, while he muttered and hummed alternately to himself:

"I once was light-hearted and happy,
But now all my pleasures are o'er,
Since my soldier has gone and has left me
Alone on the Shamrock shore.

"The sun above the fir-wood, and the hero of Drumshambo still a-bed. That's more than I have seen since the day of the battle. The Major's dreaming now that he has Humbert on his marrow-bones crying for quarter.

"In Dublin the regiment was quarter'd
To which my brave soldier belonged;
And for a dispute with the sergeant
My bonny brave soldier was wrong'd."

"That's right—there it flies—just as it did when we left Sligo with the Colonel—

"He soon was tied up to the halberd,
His back with the lashes was tore;
And that was the cause of his going
So far from the Shamrock shore."

"I will wait for the first stroke of the clock, and then I'll let off the shot whether he's up or not—

"My father's snug cottage was placed On the pleasant sweet banks of the Finn—

"Well, gorsoon, what's your business with me?"—he addressed a ragged boy, wearing a hat without either leaf or crown, who had approached him unperceived.

"I want to know, please your honour, could I spake to Miss O'Brien?"

"What's your business with her?"

"A little dish o' musharooms, please your honour."

"Well, there's the lady, go and speak to her."

The boy approached the hall-door, from which Miss O'Brien was at the moment in the act of issuing, accompanied by her waiting-maid, who bore a suit of bathing attire upon her arm.

"A little dish o' musharooms that I had for you, ma'am, if you please," said Jacky Donovan.

"Thank you, my good lad—they are beautiful indeed; take them in, Kitty. Did you gather them yourself?"

"Oh yes, ma'am," replied the boy, waiting until the girl had disappeared, and then producing from his corduroy jacket a paper parcel handsomely tied and sealed—"One you know, ma'am, bid me give you this."

Miss O'Brien took the parcel with some confusion of manner.

"Thank you, thank you," she said, putting some silver into his hand, and concealing the packet in her dress. "Run off, now, as fast as you can, and tell him I said there could not be a cleverer messenger."

"I will, ma'am, long life to your honour."

They departed, Miss O'Brien and her maid, to bathe, the gorsoon the way which he had come, while Adam Dobe continued his task at the foot of the flag-staff, varying it occasionally with snatches of cottage minstrelsy:

"Light-hearted I rose ev'ry morning, Contented I sat down to spin—"

"Good morrow, Mr. Hiffe. You're early from the shreet,"

The person whom he addressed was one of a class common to Irish villages; he was at once inn-keeper, pound-keeper, and senechal of the parish, on orator and an oracle on all points of law and politics, a man who read the newspapers—and could hold forth by the hour on their contents. It was his practice to pick out of editorial articles, popular harangues, arguments of counsel and charges of the bench at quarter sessions, as well as from other learned sources, the hardest words which they contained, and to apply them afterwards in a manner which showed they had rather caught his ear than penetrated his understanding. However, when he found them envelop his meaning too closely, he generally concluded his speech with a familiar interpretation. This display of verbal wealth was not unaccompanied by suitable gesticulation. A plain oak cudgel, from which he rarely separated, was to him what the thread was to Lord Chesterfield's orator. It was now wheeled around his head as he gave utterance to some stroke of fancy, now planted upright on the earth to give force to an irrefragable opinion; now pointed oblique, now vertical, now horizontal, now to this side, now to that, it kept the attention of the listener alive to what might otherwise not have been heeded as much as it deserved. He now approached the sergeant with a solemn stride.

"Your most obedient, Mr. Dobe," he said, bowing and kissing his hand with a look of the sweetest courtesy. "Has the Major condescended yet?"

"Condescended, sir?"

"Yes—has he come down stairs?"

"Oh, no, not yet, but the swivel will soon rouse him. Condescend—to come down stairs—

"I'll press my child in my arms,
In hopes that the peace might restore
My soldier from war's dread alarms
Safe home to the Shamrock shore."

"On my veracity, Mr. Dobe, I admire that flag. 'Tis very harmonious and versatile in the wind. Pray, can you enlighten me if there be any fundamentality in the rumour of the Major's matrimonial idiosyncrasies in regard of Miss Eliza? if she's to be married as they say?"

"Ay, that's all settled long ago," said Adam.

"I really rejoice to hear it, and the more, Mr. Dobe, if Mr. Courtenay should be the felicitous individual—the happy man—as I am told he is."

"You are told the truth."

"Upon my veracity I rejoice at it, although she is, if I might use the expression, rather young, being, as one might say, in the verdure and plenitude of existence, not yet arrived at the full incipience of maturity. But Mr. Courtenay is a very commendable young gentleman, and with an overweening fortune."

"Yes, he can—hark ye!—There goes the clock! clear out o' the way, Mr. Hifle!"

He applied the match, and almost before the seneschal had time to jump aside (although he did so very nimbly), the report of a small piece of ordnance resounded over the water and amongst the hills and woods upon the opposite bank. Soon after a pair of window shutters were opened overhead, and the Major made his appearance in a green silk night-cap.

"Well done, Adam! Good morrow, Hifle! [The seneschal bowed low.] Do they cry quarter?"

"Not yet, your honour. Shall I give them another shot?"

"Stay, stay, till I come down. What! Eliza! Captain! Where's the Captain? Where's Miss O'Brien?"

"I saw Miss Eliza and her maid go in the door just now, your honour, after bathing; and the Captain—"

"The Captain is here," exclaimed a voice from a bed-room window on the same floor, which had just then opened on the other side of the hall-door. "Good morrow, Major, your men are early in the field. Hold hard a moment, I will be with you soon."

Both windows closed, and Adam Dobe, who was as great a Thraso as his master, though in a broader style, renewed his conversation with the seneschal.

"That's Captain Beauchamp, the master's brother-in-law. He is here on a visit. He has a house and family of his own about a gunshot below the old Abbey. He's a great man; only for him the English would be beat at Trafalgar."

"Do you tell me so?"

"An' I'll tell you another thing. The Major talks a dale of Drumhambo, but it is my own doings the French being kept out of Sligo after all."

"Your doing, Mr. Dobe?"

"Yes, and I'll tell you how. It so happened that my piece (for I was then in the ranks) missed fire for five or six rounds, an' I never knew it; but kep ramming cartridge after cartridge till the barrel was half-full. Well, just as the enemy were making one desperate charge upon our line, my shot went off at last; oh, it beggars history, as the Major says; five-and-thirty of the enemy fell stone dead. So their general gave orders at once to sound a retreat: 'Boys,' says he, 'we've better be off in time, for there's more where that came from.'"

"Dear, dear Mr. Dobe, that was a shot!"

"I fired a better since: when the Major got his wound I was sitting by him in a trench on the road-side, when a party of the French an' rebels passed us: so they began makin' game of us an' they going by; I said not a word till the last man had passed, and then I rested my piece upon the ball o' my foot and elapped at 'em. Oh, I declare the ball went through a whole file, forty deep, an' lodged in a drummer that was walking at the head o' the battalion."

"Dear! what a shot!"

"Poh—so-so,—but say nothing of it, lest it might be looked upon as boasting. Here comes the Major."

By this time the hall-door had opened, and the Major issued forth, accompanied by his daughter and his naval relative. At sight of the seneschal, Miss O'Brien drew back a little from the group, in order to conceal her visible alarm.

"What adverse fate," thought Eliza, "has blown that man to the hall at such an hour? He looks, too, as if he had some important discovery to communicate: I must draw them away if possible. What a delicious morning!" she continued, getting between her father and her uncle, and taking an arm from each; "you must both come with me to the Glen of Ferns."

"With all my heart," exclaimed the Major, "and I can finish the story as we walk along. As I was saying, Captain, we had just come in sight of Drumhambo—"

"May it please your magistracy," said the seneschal, making a graceful bow and kissing his hand with a most sweet smile, as he planted himself directly in the way of the party.

"You must come some other time, Mr. Hifle. Papa is too busy to speak to you."

"I hope, miss, when his majority graciously comprehends the importance of what I have to advance—"

"For goodness sake, papa, don't stay listening to that Irish Dogberry, who does not understand a word he says, or we shall be late."

The seneschal looked round upon the lady in high indignation.

"I never dales in dogs, Miss O'Brien; I hope I know how to exterminate between what is to the purpose and the reverse. I am sorry, ma'am, you should feel it expedient to upbraid any thing in regard of dogs against me; and as for not understanding what I say, I hope, ma'am, I hope I know how to express my little sentiments in commendable topography."

"Come, come, Hifle, what's the matter? Eliza, be quiet."

"Please your majority, it is rather a contrarious predicament, so that if your honour would vouchsafe (if I may be allowed the phrase) a few expressions in seclusion, otherwise a word or two in private—"

"The sooner the better. Captain, Eliza, you will excuse me for a moment. Well, now, Mr. Hifle?"

"Your majority is in possession of the fact," said the seneschal, addressing himself to his task with promptitude, "that as the legal authority, and, as I may say, custos rotulorum of the neighbourhood, we are all compulsorily bound to submit for your gracious consideration every fortuitous circumstance—"

"To the point, Mr. Hifle, if you please."

"To the point, then, since your magistracy so vouchsafes it. Last evening, as I was standing at the door of my humble tenement, I contemplated a spruce equestrian, attended by a solitary domestic, that is, a single servant, approaching my repository."

"A gentleman, of course?"

"He must be a gentleman, please your majority, for he treated us all like dogs, and did not waste a civil sentiment on any individual on the premises."

"Well, quick, if you please, Mr. Hifle; what is to come of all this?"

"What chiefly aroused my vigilance was the fact, that several times before the evening had elapsed, the young fugitive, for we did not learn his name, elicited various interrogatories respecting Miss O'Brien, which made me consider it imperative on me to communicate the ingredients to your magistracy. To my certain knowledge he has scarcely imbibed a particle of nutriment, or enjoyed repose, since he has taken up his residence with me, which, exciting my keener idiosyncracies—"

"Well, well, Hifle, I am obliged to you. I shall call to see the gentleman in the course of a few days; some acquaintance of my daughter's, I suppose. Good morning to you, I am busy."

The seneschal bowed, smiled graciously, and kissed his hand, like one who did more honour to himself than to any body else by the obeisance.

"I reciprocally deprecate a fine afternoon to your magistracy."

With these words he withdrew, and the Major followed his daughter and brother-in-law to the Glen.

Miss O'Brien, as the reader may have already suspected, was amongst those young persons who suffer from the laxity of modern ideas of education, as her cousins the Beauchamps did from the opposite system. Epicurean feelings, and short-sightedness of mind, were the natural defects of a heart unaccustomed to self-denial, an understanding to which anything like labour was quite unknown, and an incongruous and unregulated course of reading. No disposition, however naturally excellent, could withstand the ill effect of such united influences; and, accordingly, this young lady, with every friend except her father, obtained but little credit for steadiness of feeling.

Notwithstanding the Major's unbounded confidence in Eliza, he was not sorry in his secret soul when an opportunity offered of relieving himself, as he hoped, from all future care on her account. This was furnished by the proposal of Mr. Henry Courtenay, alluded to in the commencement of our tale. Though the circumstance gave the Major unqualified delight, it would have been difficult to make a more unhappy choice as regarded Miss O'Brien.

Mr. Courtenay was what many worthy ladies about New Auburn called a "rock of sense." It would have been impossible, perhaps, for his warmest friend or bitterest enemy to convict him of a single very foolish or very generous act in the whole course of his life. But he was a great deal too sensible to have either warm friends or bitter enemies. There never lived a more thorough master of his feelings: whether he possessed any or not, it is impossible to say; but it is certain that he never suffered them to come in the way of his worldly interests. He was just so far generous that he would serve a friend, provided he did not thereby injure himself; so far honest, that he would not lose his credit to overreach his neighbour; and so far hospitable, that his table was always spread for those whose superior rank, or fortune, or influence in any way was certain to make solid, though not apparent, compensation for the courtesy. He paid his debts, however; was punctual with his tradesmen, and was generally accounted a rock of honesty and sense.

Mr. Courtenay was never known to indulge in any of the coarser vices. He had a great deal too much sense for that. He did not drink, because it injured the health, and led to quarrels; he did not gamble, because it invited poverty; he did not hunt, because it endangered the neck; he was not an epicure, because it accumulated cost; he was free from every glaring vice, and destitute of every solid virtue. His good and his evil were both of dwarfish stature.

Prudence, in the worldly and most erroneous sense of the word, was Mr. Courtenay's forte. Of the prudence which points out the surest road to wealth, and influence, and credit in the world, he was a perfect master. Of the true prudence, which demands a constant sacrifice of self, a boundless devotion to other interests, a spirit of continual martyrdom, such as Cicero demanded for the Republic, and the Christian, with more reason, exacts for the Creator, of such prudence as this Mr. Courtenay not only had no share, but he did not believe in its existence. He did not believe that a motive purely generous, and free from selfishness, existed in the human breast; a clear confession (if any were needed) that it had no place in his own.

To tell Mr. Courtenay that there exist men, and women too, who, led by a simple feeling of love for the Creator, are ever ready to abandon life, health, fortune, and all, for his service, and to embrace, without even a moment's pause, as a self-evident duty, any suffering whatever, sooner than transgress his law, was to tell him stories of the dog-star. He had a great deal too much sense to credit it. At the same time that he was too "sensible" to believe all that he professed, he was a great deal too sensible not to profess all that could procure him credit with his neighbours. He adopted as a mean, a kind of negative hypocrisy, compensating to his self-conceit by unfeigned contempt for all that he allowed to his prudence in external seeming.

To no friend or acquaintance that he ever had, did Mr. Courtenay, at any time, give the opportunity of saying that he had cut them, yet he never kept either friend or acquaintance longer than he found convenient. No one understood so well as he the use of the chill, yet hardly chill salute, the smile grown dull that was of late so ready and so bright, the diminished pressure of the extended hand, the all that all but said the heart was changed. He did his part with more or less relief, according to the quick-sightedness of the other's pride, and left that to do the rest. He once met an old benefactor in altered circumstances. He shook hands with him—smiled—was glad to see him—sorry to hear of his misfortunes—offered his services—asked him to his house—entertained him well, but all in "such a sort!" Nothing was omitted, yet something was wanted. The old man could not find fault, yet he never went near the house again; and what was just equally singular, his absence never gave the least surprise to the grateful Mr. Courtenay.

Persons of a timid conscience or of sensitive affections were the never-failing themes of Mr. Courtenay's vigorous ridicule. And yet, to see his sufferings when Mr. Stucco passed him in the street at an assizes, between the terror of being thought intrusive and the anxiety to catch a fashionable nod!

Mr. Courtenay, too, was a good deal liked in company. He had too much sense not to endeavour to make himself agreeable. His laugh was always at your service, whether you made a bad jest, or stabbed a neighbour's reputation, or gave utterance to any fashionable blasphemy. He always made himself an agreeable listener, whatever was the subject; but then, to make amends for any stretch of complaisance, in this way, to a superior or equal, how he did frown when an inferior dared to address him in a similar strain!

As self was Mr. Courtenay's undisguised motive, so worldly custom was his rule of conduct. What custom sanctioned was to him admissible; what custom disallowed, he disallowed. To cheat in horseflesh—to swindle the public by what are called jobs, or the revenue by illicit traffic, was not outside the comprehensive circle of his honesty, provided that it did not proceed to a discreditable extent.

To be loved (Miss O'Brien's favourite object) was not the end of Mr. Courtenay's pains amongst his neighbours. He understood too well the nature of most human attachments to build upon a foundation so frail and so mutable. To make himself necessary to them was, he knew, a more certain means of securing at least the appearance and the practical offices of friendship, and for more than this he never sought or cared. Nevertheless, while the worthiest characters in the neighbourhood were subject to the keenest censure, few were ever heard to speak ill of Mr. Courtenay, and he was generally looked upon as a downright rock of sense.

Major O'Brien heard with joy his proposals for Miss O'Brien, first prudently communicated to himself. Mr. Courtenay's birth, which was most unexceptionable, made it easy to overlook some other circumstances, not equally magnificent. His income, which was considerable, was chiefly derived from the produce of two or three extensive nurseries, one of which had a gateway opening into the centre of the village. He was a Courtenay, however, and visited by every body.

Mr. Courtenay, always well received at Drumshambo Hall, was soon established there in happy intimacy. He listened with deep interest to the Major's warlike stories, and was almost the only individual who was not terrified by the ominous words—"I remember at the skirmish of Drumshambo." He supplied young ash and sycamore for the green knolls, and scarlet and ragman oak for the avenue, and weeping willow for the water side; and scarce a day elapsed without some exquisite rarity making its appearance at the hall with Mr. Courtenay's compliments, for the decoration of the Major's lawn or Miss O'Brien's garden.

There being no great conqueror, or orator, or warrior, or poet in the neighbourhood (if you except such men as Hifle or Bat Henderson, the village bard), Miss O'Brien, who was not yet made privy to the bargain about herself) was not displeased with the visits of Mr. Courtenay. His figure was good, and his complacent "y-e-s," and smile, and laugh for ever at her service.

It was about this time that Miss O'Brien first became acquainted with the gentleman, her interview with whom in the Glen of Ferns has been related in the opening of our tale. When we say that their first meeting took place at a ball, it may appear that we relate a very common-place occurrence; but as a ball in our neighbourhood differs much from balls in other places, we will venture to describe the adventure in detail.

LOVE IN IDLENESS.

WERE hard to guess what thought,
(I leaning o'er the peaches and the wall)
Hath stopped thy fingers, sweet, ere they had wrought
In that rich purpled broid, the symbol small Thy heart designest. Careless on thy lap
The white silk twinkles, and the violet thread
Winds round the hyacinths. Sun-goldened head
Pray this be love in idleness mayhap.

Pleasant it is to dream

In the June sunshine when not one is near,
And the crisp melody of peach-leaves stream
From every side into the listless ear.

O happy quiet, dost thou think of him
Thy tongue rebuked in the park, this morn,
When thou didst quit him, with austerest scorn,
Bidding his hopes like merc-mists to dislign?

It will not do. Again,

Solemn abstraction and broad dreaming eyes,
And white lids fringed with sweet rain,
Shunning all intercourse with sun and skies.
Swear as thou wilt, but, sweetest one, forbear
To wrong thy heart. I, leaning o'er the wall,
Have guessed its happy impulses ere this,
And comprehend all.

PALISSY, THE POTTER.

THREE hundred years ago, a Frenchman, inspired by genius, fought his way to the mastery of an art then unknown in Europe, except amongst the Italians. The cottage of the peasant and the castle of the baron were almost equally destitute of those articles of utility and luxury which are now within the reach of all. Cups and saucers were as little known as bohea; while plates, dishes, and the endless variety of utensils which may now be had in the simplest ware and the finest porcelain, were then represented only by rude vessels of pottery or stone-ware.

This self-taught potter was Bernard Palissy. He was born in the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the district of Agenois, on the western coast of France. Having learned in his youth the art of glass-painting, he travelled for some years through his native country, sojourning in various places on his route, and maintaining himself by the exercise of his craft. Beyond this we know very little of him, until, at about thirty years of age, he married and settled in the town of Saintes. Adding to his skill in "venerie" a knowledge of mapping and surveying, he was able to provide for the simple wants of his household. Thus a year or two was spent. Then there occurred a simple incident, which disturbed the even tenor of his life, and gave a new impulse to energies which had not before been evoked. We give it in his own words:—"There was shown to me," he says, "an earthen cup, turned and enamelled with so much beauty, that from that time I entered into controversy with my own thoughts, recalling to mind several suggestions that had been made to me in force when I was painting portraits. Then, seeing that these were falling out of request in the country where I dwelt, and that glass-painting was also little patronised, I began to think that if I should discover how to make enamels, I could make earthen vessels and other things very prettily; because God had gifted me with some knowledge of drawing. And, thereafter, regardless of the fact that I had no knowledge of drugs, I began to seek for the enamels as a man gropes in the dark."

Palissy at this time was not a potter. He could not have made the simplest earthen vessel which served his wife in the cuisine of her little household. But his was not a soul that could rest content with painting on glass the portraits of the good folk of Saintes, or keeping the stained windows of the neighbouring chateau in repair. So he set diligently to work upon the new path to fame and competence, which the cup opened up to him. He had been used, in his work on "venerie," to the grinding and mixing of colours; and he began his experiments by pounding all the substances that he "proposed likely to make anything." Then, purchasing a number of earthen pots, he broke them into fragments, and spread on each some one of his different compounds. Constructing a furnace "according to his fancy," as he naively remarks, "for he had never seen earth baked," he heated it to a promising temperature, and put his trial pieces into bake. The chemicals had not been chosen quite by chance, for many metallic colours were used in glass-painting, and these, with the action of fire upon them, were known to Palissy. Allowing such time as he supposed requisite, he drew out his pot-sherds, eagerly looking for any on which the compounds should have melted; but there was none such; the labour had been all in vain, and he was none the nearer to the accomplishment of his object. He did not even know that these mixtures were not the right ones; for he was as much an experimentalist in the construction of furnaces and the baking of earth, as in the art of enamelling; and it was impossible to tell where his errors lay. To produce a successful result, all the antecedents must be according to rule. Nothing daunted, however, Palissy set to work afresh; and every day found him, at all spare hours, pounding new materials, or constructing new furnaces. For all this time he worked at his old trade, to maintain his household and to supply the materials of his costly experiments. In this manner, to use his own words, "he fooled away several years." Domestic cares increased upon him, and, instead of being able to improve the circumstances of his family by a new and more lucrative occupation, he was, to outward seeming, and doubtless, in the judgment of his neighbours, fruitlessly expending what was their just inheritance. But such men as Palissy can work against discouragement of all kinds.

After the year thus lost, Palissy began a new series of experiments, at a pottery some miles distant. He hoped, by this plan, to avoid the large outlay on fuel and furnaces which had hitherto drained his slender resources. But, alas! disappointment met him here as before; and, after several failures, he determined to "take relaxation" for a time, and "comported himself as if he were not zealous to dive any more into the secret of enamels."

Just at this time a profitable engagement fell in his way. The "gabelle," or salt-tax, was about to be levied in Saintonge, which contained extensive salt marshes, and Palissy was employed by the government to survey and map the district. This occupied him nearly a year, and, being much more profitable employment than glass-painting, he found himself at its close in possession of "a little money." So, with his mind at ease for a time on the subject of daily bread, he "resumed his affection for pursuing in the track of the enamels." This time he had recourse to a glass-house, the furnaces then in use there being much better than those employed in the potteries. Nearly a hundred different compounds were duly prepared, three dozen earthen pots were bought and broken; and, at the appointed time, Bernard, his heart once more beating high with hope, repaired to the glass-house. Courage, mon brave! the clouds are breaking, and there is promise of the dawn. This time some of the compounds had begun to melt.

Starting with fresh vigour from this new point, the unwearied worker pursued his researches for two years longer without gaining another step in advance; at last he began to lose courage. Not that he despaired of ultimate success, or was weary of the struggle which he had so gallantly carried on. But he did not stand alone in the world. There were those who shared with him the discouragements and privations of these long years. Doubtless, his wife had listened with fond and willing faith when first he told her what he hoped to accomplish, how her husband would be sought after by all the nobles of France, and have riches and honours for his reward. But when year after year passed away, and no result appeared; when she saw him neglecting his trade, and expending a large portion of his scanty earnings on drugs and furnaces, and fuel; when it was no uncommon entry in his journal, "I broke three dozen earthen pots, all of them new," we cannot wonder if with such things as those came the sickness of hope deferred, or if, in losing heart, the wife lost temper, too. More than once the earth had closed upon a little grave, and a seat was left vacant at Palissy's meagre board, but still many little faces clustered there, and their wants were not diminishing with years. It was at least a natural thought to the wife and mother, "Why not abandon these costly experiments which have wasted so many years, when you can maintain your household by diligence in an honest calling?" Palissy began to think he must give up: "One trial more," he said to himself, "and if I fail, I have done with it for ever!"

The last effort was to be a great one. Upwards of three hundred trial pieces were prepared, and poor Bernard went himself with the man who carried them to the glass-house. The time for drawing out the batch comes, and one piece appears on which the mixture is completely melted. It is set aside to cool, and Bernard watches anxiously. As it hardens, it grows white. At length it is cold, it is the long sought enamel—"singularly beautiful" to the longing eyes of Palissy. With what joy he turned his steps homeward that day one can easily imagine.

In possession of the secret, the next question was, how to make use of it. Palissy did not deem the housewives of that day worthy of enamelled cooking utensils, and he therefore declined to expend his skill on the jars and pipkins which the neighbouring potteries could furnish. Without ornamental pottery his enamel was useless, so he set himself to make vessels suitable for his purpose, and this labour cost him seven or eight months. These vessels must next be baked, and straightway we find Palissy toiling at the construction of a furnace, such as he had seen at the glass-house. His finances were now so low that he could not procure himself the help even of one man; he had to carry the bricks on his back, to temper the mortar, and to erect the works with his own hands. The first baking of his cups was successful, but the more difficult task was yet to come. For more than a month he worked night and day in preparing the materials of "that beautiful enamel," and, carefully applying it on his vessels, he put them in to bake. Six days and nights he watched and fed the fire, but the enamel did not melt. Suspecting an error in the proportions of his compound, he began to grind and pound afresh, and all the while fed the insatiable double-mouthed furnace, that it might not cool.

The fresh compound being ready, he was forced to purchase pots on which to try it, for his own were all lost by the last failure. These being prepared were put in, and the whole of his remaining stock of wood was thrust into the furnace. Anxiously he watches, but no sign of melting appears. The fire is burning low; what is to be done? He has neither fuel, nor money to purchase it. There was no time to be lost; now or never, thought Palissy; so he tore up the palings of his garden, and they were soon consumed by the devouring element: but all in vain. Half frantic, he rushed into his house, and, bringing forth the tables, broke them in pieces and cast them into the furnace. Still no change in the inexorable chemicals. Once more he appears before his astonished household, and, tearing up the flooring of the little dwelling, consigns it likewise to the flames. His resources, and the demand upon them, are at end together—the enamel is melted.

"Another such victory and I am undone!" was the exclamation of Pyrrhus after a battle with the Romans; and in such a spirit might poor Palissy have spoken of his hardly-earned triumph. He had succeeded in producing a beautiful white enamel, but it glistened only on fragments of broken pottery, which were of little account in the eyes of his practical wife. Exhausted by the heat of the furnace and the excessive labour he had undergone, Palissy turned to enter his dwelling. Alas! it had been dismantled by his own hands; while his wife, she "from whom solace was due," as he touchingly expresses it, had run to proclaim publicly the insane conduct of her husband, and to incite vulgar mockery against him whose sins she should have tenderly covered. Poverty and reproaches saddened him at home, while the finger of ridicule everywhere met him abroad, and for a time his soul fed upon its griefs; but soon again he was up and at work. Having made drawings of such vessels as suited his purpose, he hired a potter to execute his designs, and once more set about the erection of a furnace. His means being quite exhausted, and the potter discharged, he was forced to build it himself, with incredible labour, out of the materials of the former furnace. Borrowing money for the purchase of wood and chemicals, he had now, at length, a fair prospect of success, and confidently reckoned on the proceeds of the batch to clear his debts and give bread to his household. His creditors hastened to the furnace in the morning when the time for drawing out arrived. But alas! alas! an unforeseen misfortune had destroyed all his hopes. The mortar employed in the brickwork had been full of flints, and the intense heat had caused them to explode, while at the same time it had liquified the enamel. The cups and medallions were, in consequence, stuck all over with sharp fragments of flint, and thus, though otherwise very beautiful, were entirely spoiled. Some there were who offered to buy them at a mean price, but Palissy preferred to break them in pieces with his own hands.

But, reflecting that "if a man had fallen into a pit, it would be his duty to endeavour to get out again," Palissy arose at once, and "gaining a little money by painting and in other ways," expelled want for a season from his hearth. Many times more he laboured, and saw his work destroyed by some unforeseen mischance. But he was gaining knowledge by these bitter experiences, and gradually approaching the mastery of his art. During fifteen or sixteen years he "blundered" on, as he himself tells us, but for the last six or eight of these he accomplished works which had a ready sale, and supplied him with means not only to maintain his household, but to carry on his experiments. Vigorous, indeed, must have been the frame that could endure such labour, and execute the behests of that dauntless spirit. But "sweat of the brain" and "sweat of the arm" had sapped the strong man in those days of sorrow. He tells us that for ten years together he was wasted and worn to a shadow; but most keenly of all he felt the isolation of soul in which he lived. "I often walked about the fields of Saintes," he says, "considering my miseries and weariness, and wondering above all things, that in my own house I could have no peace, nor do anything that was considered good." True misalliance this—where a noble soul of either sex is mated with one that has sympathy neither for its sorrows nor its aspirations. True solitude—where there is association without companionship, and personal intercourse without communion of spirit.

It is curious to find, in looking at the history of one who lived three centuries ago, that with all the difference produced by the manners of a time so far distant, men and women were then very much what they are now. A certain lecture seems a modern thing, and brings up before us the image of Mrs. Caudle; but if the dead could speak, poor Palissy might tell us "there is nothing new under the sun." After recounting the hardships which attended his labours, chiefly because he had not means to protect his furnaces from the inclemency of the weather; and how, many times, at midnight, or near dawn, he went to bed cold and weary, "filled with great sorrows," inasmuch as, having laboured long, he saw his labour wasted—he adds, "then I have found in my chamber a second persecution worse than the first, which makes me to marvel now that I was not consumed with suffering." But we would not deal too hardly with the failings of Palissy's wife; it would have required the devotion of a true-hearted woman to last through nearly ten years of failure and defeat. We will add but one word more, and rest content to leave to our fair readers the judgment of her sins. One night, the wind being high, and the rain falling in torrents, Palissy found that the poor hut which sheltered his furnace would no longer resist the inclemency of the weather. His precious cups and vases would be destroyed by either cold or wet, and something must be done. Entering the house, he sought about for what might suit his purpose, and failing to meet with anything more portable, he carried off his wife's chamber door! We should be glad to know where is the matron that would not be indignant at such usage.

Palissy now began to take heart to call himself a potter. No longer weighed down by poverty, he was able to procure assistance in his work, and the nobility of the province were eager to purchase the beautiful productions of his skill. The name which he assumed for himself was that of "Worker in Earth and Inventor of Rustic Figulines." These figulines were models from nature, of animals, reptiles, and plants, with which he adorned cups or vases. Palissy was an ardent lover of nature; from his youth he had delighted to wander in the forest, through the meadow, or by the sea shore; nor was it with an uninquiring eye that he gazed upon the wonders that they present. He was a close observer and a careful analyser; and in the beautiful adaptations and contrivances which he everywhere discovered in creation, he devoutly recognized the care which the Maker had exercised for all his creatures, and the wisdom which presides in every department of the universe. So fully did the artist prove himself the naturalist, that, as his biographer remarks, "his leaves and reptiles, and other rustic designs, are so copied, in form and colour, with minute accuracy, that the species of each can be determined accurately. There has been found scarcely a fancy leaf, and not one lizard, butterfly, or beetle, not one bit of nature transferred to the works of Palissy, which does not belong to the rocks, woods, rivers, and seas of France."

Another year or two the potter carried on the practice of his art at Saintes, and then removed to Paris. The Palace of the Tuilleries was then in course of erection for Catherine de Medicis, and he was employed in its decoration. All that we know of the remaining years of his life in the licentious capital is highly interesting. Collecting around him such lovers of science and literature as could be found in the precincts of Henry the Third's riotous court, he delivered a course of lectures, in which he propounded his discoveries in science, his own rich collection of specimens serving him for illustrations. He continued this practice for many years, and in 1580 published some of these lectures, together with a treatise on agriculture. Two other volumes from his pen had before, at intervals of some years, issued from the press. The first, a medical treatise, is lost; the others which remain prove Palissy to have been far in advance of his age, and establish his claim to many discoveries in chemistry, geology, and natural history.

In the year 1585, Palissy was imprisoned in the Bastille, on account of his religious opinions. Here, after four years of captivity, he died. With the potter perished his beautiful art. Two sons survived him; but the genius which presided in the laboratory had departed with Bernard Palissy.

INISCATTERY.

INISCATTERY, or the Island of Scattery, near the mouth of

"The spacious Senan [Shannon] spreading like a sea," has been styled in an Irish MS., called the Book of Ballimote, "the wonder of Ireland." And well it may, if we are to credit the legend which Mr. Moore has followed in his version of the dialogue between St. Senanus and the lady who sought his holy isle, in a vessel guided by an angel,

"Through wintry winds and billows dark," and was inhospitably repelled.

Connected with the former sanctity of Iniscattery, the most remarkable object at present is the Round Tower represented in the annexed engraving. This tower is an important land-mark in the navigation of the Shannon, and it is also probably the most ancient building upon the island. It is said to measure one hundred and twenty feet in height, and springs from a base twenty-two feet in circumference. Although scathed and rent by lightning, the proportionate breadth. Teampul an eird, that is, the church of the height, is of similar dimensions, and equally unadorned. The light was admitted into each of these Lilliputian temples by one or two very small windows, little superior to loop-holes; so narrow, that, when entirely open, we must be struck with surprise, how the light which they admitted could have sufficed."

In a memoir for the reformation of Munster, which was drawn up for the information of the English government, in the reign of Henry VIII., by Edmund Sexton, who was Mayor of Limerick in 1535, and who had previously distinguished himself by his efforts to advance the English interest in Ireland, Iniscattery is described as an island within the mouth of the Shannon, distant eight miles from Loop-head, at the northern entrance of that river. Upon the island the merchants of Limerick dwelt, and had castles and stone houses of their own inheritance, "with a provost, or warden, who might dispend a hundred marks yearly." He recommends the place as a proper situation for a fortress, which, with one ship of sixty tons and two or three galleys, would keep O'Brien, Desmond, (that is to say their countries, the present counties of Clare, Limerick, Kerry, and Cork,) and all the Irish from Waterford to Galway in awe.

original roof remains. While its fellow pillar-towers, as at Kildare and Clonyne, have been compelled to assume embattlements, that of Iniscattery retains its primitive covering, and stands proudly crowned with that barrad, or conical cap, which, according to Walker, the national architects and sculptors of Ireland regarded as a dress becoming even to angels.

Although it has been asserted that eleven churches were built upon the island by Senanus, the remains of seven churches or cells only are to be traced; from a glance at which it is evident to the eye of the architectural antiquary, that the date of the building of three of these ruins must have been long subsequent to the days of the ungallant saint. "The cathedral, (which is seen in the engraving, close to the Round Tower), St. Mary's church, and one other," observes a modern pilgrim to Scattery, "are in pointed style, but possess no particular attraction. The neighbourhood of the latter is used as a burying ground, and the interior of the cathedral has been cleared away and converted by the irreverent islanders into a ball-alley." Three more ancient structures, "one of them called Simon's own, stand in the north-west of the cathedral, the largest of which is but twenty-two feet long, and the smallest twelve, and of

CHANT OF SPRING FLOWERS.

H! welcome sisters, once again we hail the bright'ning sky,
Each heart is lightly leaping, joy lives in every eye,
And ev'ry bud and ev'ry leaf, and ev'ry bird and bee,
Are blossoming in gladness now, are singing merrily.

See! rosy Spring is smiling at her lovely children's birth;
And their radiant eyes of beauty glad their foster mother, earth;
And she kimes her sweet infants, and she dresses them, with pride,
As some she rears in garden bow'rs and some on mountain side.

Tho' bright the dreams of glory that thro' winter lit our sleep,
While our kind and genial mother watch'd our slumbers long and deep,
Still brighter are the faintest gleams that on our eyelids play,
When morning from the East comes forth, and wakens blushing May.

Oh! happy, happy sisters! how beautiful we are!
No chill ungentle breezes our loveliness to mar;
Fond bees are humming o'er us, sweet birds to cheer us sing,
And all the world doth truly love, and welcome flowers of Spring.

KELLS PRIORY.

THE remains of the once noble Priory of Kells, county Kilkenny, are situated on the south side of the Vourigh, or King's River. They stand upon the ascent of a hill, and are bounded at the northern extremity by the river. They are more or less in a state of ruin; and though some parts may be pronounced as excellent in preservation, there are others in a shattered and most dilapidated condition. Dismantled towers, with whole sides torn away, clad in a rich garb of ivy, that sometimes entirely shrouds the ancient masonry; broken arches, and immense masses of fallen fragments everywhere strewing the ground, present a most striking and imposing spectacle. The Priory was comprehended within a large oblong square, divided into two courts, separated by a strong wall. The southern, or, as it is sometimes called, the Burgher's court, (of which the above engraving is a representation,) is about four hundred feet square, and was apparently never occupied by buildings. In each of the northern angles, and in the centre of the northern and western curtains, is a strong tower, all in good preservation, fitted up with fire-places, closets, and narrow stone stair-cases; and their summits are provided with bartisans and machicolations for the defence of the door-ways. Indeed, this court, with its strong towers and wide compass of enclosure, reminds one rather of a military strong-hold than a religious establishment. A branch of the King's River, with a high wall, flanked by a strong tower, judiciously placed in the centre, divides this court from the other, which contains the ruins of the church, cloister, and other monastic attachments.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XIX.

"O U vulgar little brute!" said Miss Clara Faversham to her sister Ada, who appeared in their joint bedroom, in the house of Mrs. Mellon, where we have been already introduced. En effet, Ada made a strange appearance. Her curls were tucked upon the top of her head, her sleeves were drawn up beyond her elbows—she had been making pastry. She laughed at her sister Clara's disgust. Ada was always laughing. She had been laughing in the kitchen with the cook and housemaids. She had been laughing in the nursery with the children—and there were plenty to laugh with. She had had "a good laugh" with Mrs. Mellon in the breakfast parlour.

"What on earth do you think visitors would say, if any of them were to catch sight of you in that plight?"

"Ha! Clara, what do I care? There's no great harm in making pies and puddings. Besides, I like it, and that's everything."

"Well, I wish you wouldn't indulge your farm tastes when you are out on a visit. You compromise me, as well as yourself."

"That's a good joke. Why, Mrs. Mellon is delighted with me; and has just been saying what a capital little housewife I should make."

"Do you expect to marry a farm labourer?"

"Who knows?" Ada answered gaily, shaking down her curls before the glass.

"There, make yourself fit to be seen—do."

"I am fit to be seen, except by your stuck up people."

Ada had the best of it.

Somebody's kitchen is well furnished; salmis and suprêmes can be easily elaborated there; nay, it could send forth ice-puddings flavoured with a thousand fruits. In it the ovens and the boilers are arranged to the hand of somebody's chef and his scullions. Here the science of cookery is skilfully practised, for the comfort and enjoyment of the master of thousands. But the science is unknown in England beyond the bounds of these great kitchens. Waste prevails in the midst of want. There is waste in the kitchens of Bloomsbury and St. John's Wood. Widow Walsh has no money to spare, heaven knows. She would faint if she were charged with the smallest extravagance. If a friend from abroad were to tell her that a foreigner would live upon the scraps she threw away, she would meet this friend with a flat contradiction. Yet what did poor Soyer show? The enthusiastic old cook, who gloried in his saucepans, preached against the waste of English kitchens, and showed how wholesome food might be got out of matters generally thrown, by ignorant and hungry folk, into the dustman's cart. Many laughed at his enthusiasm; but when our troops fared ill in the Crimea, he went to their rescue, and did good service among them.

G. H. M. possibly gives in the winter months to the hungry, who are not afraid of the overwhelming nature of potatoes. Suppose that he gives his annual cheque for £100, this is little compared with the good he might do. When the frost comes soup-kitchens are erected in all the poor neighbourhoods. Ragged crowds flock about the great cauldrons, and are fed from the bounty of the rich. There is a charity, however, that is better than alms-giving. These soup-kitchens might be highly useful institutions. Here tutors might be stationed to teach the poor how to help themselves. I confess that I should like to see G. H. M. installed as tutor-in-chief, bringing his undoubted knowledge of the kitchen to the homes of working men. Our great tutor of the kitchen should not content himself with little lessons given in soup-kitchens. He should go forth into the world, mount platforms, and lecture to the people. Nay, before a thousand people, he should cook a cheap dinner, and bid his audience taste of the fare. He should, moreover, establish schools of cookery for the poor in all our great towns. His campaign would be of service not only to the poor—he might turn the gossip of an American paper to account, in which it is broadly asserted that the young English princesses have their little kitchens at Osborne, where they cook and make pastry, and learn other household duties. Having shown that it is not beneath the dignity of a princess to have a light hand at a crust, he might divert somewhat of the attention of young ladies from fillagree work, and the last new song—to those household duties which it has become a fashion to despise. We venture to suggest to him that somebody's fair daughter would not detract from the grand airs she has acquired by the help of her mamma and her French mistress, if she were to become famous for her custards. There was a time when girls spun their own trousseau, or the greater part of it—when they prided themselves on their preserves—and when they could bustle prettily about a kitchen with good effect. Now, my ladies, wives of poor men, with some three hundred pounds a-year, are proud to profess a total ignorance of the kitchen. Farmers' daughters, we must be good enough to remember, are not the cooks of the farm dinner nor the guardians of the dairy. They are at the piano en crinoline. Were our grandmothers, who gloried in their homely accomplishments, less loveable and less estimable than their grandchildren of the fair sex? Illusion has taken the place of the home-spun kirtle. We are in the middle of the age of veneer, of electroplating, silks with cotton back, and the like. In default of stone, we must have stucco. Twenty pounds must look like forty.

If G. H. M. would set the kitchen in fashion again, of how many married men would he reap the blessing? With this fashion many old ways of ours would return to us. The economy of the mistress might teach the servant to be prudent. Cheap imitations of her mistress's dress would no longer have any charm for her. Betty's mistress is indignant, because Betty has dropped her hair into ringlets, or had a flounce or two put to her holiday dress. Betty may not on any account wear artificial flowers. Betty must wear a plain white cap becoming her station. And it is well for Betty to be kept from extravagance and displays that may lead her astray, for Betty cannot afford them. But then the same rule applies to Betty's mistress.

Widow Walsh is overpowered with the necessities of her gentility, and she is very miserable. The time came when she felt keen pangs of hunger—of hunger that she might have satisfied had she not been so very genteel. Her daughter Lydia! What had become of her? Marian had married a poor schoolmaster of a village, near which she was living with a country family. Lydia had tossed her head at the shabby match. But what had become of Lydia? Who dared ask the widow what had become of her proud child? The time is not far off when, hollow-cheeked and in rusty finery, she shall throw herself at the feet of her humbly-mated sister, and implore a crust and a garret. May Marian, when that day shall come, have the courage and the heart to lift the fallen beauty from the ground, and forgive her! There was a time when Lydia might have married, but she would have married two hundred a year, an idea that made her mother's blood "run cold." The Walshes, who had moved in the best circles, stoop to a little city clerk! Ada is right. "A fig for the gentility" was Mr. Thomas Walsh's remark to his sister-in-law, again and again repeated, when she dwelt upon what people who bore the name of Walsh might do, and what they might not do. Mr. Tom had a rough, rude way of speaking his mind, but he was also a tender man at heart. When the clerk proposed to marry Lydia, Mr. Tom congratulated the young lady.

"Perhaps you don't know," said Mrs. Walsh, dropping her words as though they were pins she was driving into the flesh of her brother-in-law, "perhaps you don't know, that the young man's father keeps a shop in the borough?"

"Indeed I do," quoth Mr. Tom, "and a very good business he has, I assure you."

"Well, Lydia has refused him, so there's an end of the business."

"More fool she!"

Yet, according to recent newspaper controversies, Miss Lydia Walsh was right. It is hard work to do battle for the gentilities with two hundred pounds a year. Miss Lydia vowed that she could not cook a potato—to save her life. Miss Lydia had never been taught to make her own dresses. It matters not to tell how Miss Lydia, at last, left her mother's house. For, what an old, threadbare story is her's!

These stories, with their complex details, and their final tragedies, have the simplest beginnings. False standards of excellence, that appear the most unimportant things in the world, lead the most honourably disposed people astray. Mrs. Walsh was a well-meaning woman, who loved her children. She made them all unhappy by her belief—and it was an honest belief—that, if she exerted herself to maintain them by trade, they would never be able to hold up their heads in the world again, that is in what she called the world. Ada is right.

They who should do battle against gentilities like those which governed the Walsh family, would perform a very useful service to society. Is there a more pitiable picture in the world than a shabby-genteel family, that starves, but keeps its nose heroically turned up upon the busy people, who work, and who are therefore beneath it. Yet there is not a cheap, genteel neighbourhood, in any English city, where Walsh tragedies are not being played out at this present moment.

Then lead the way, G. H. M., manfully, and make a study of the kitchen fashionable. If a princess would only deign to make a pie in public, a social revolution would be effected. Educated women might possibly discover, that it is really possible to be the wife of a man who has no more than £200 a year. If another princess were, with heroic patriotism, to darn a stocking before her Majesty's lieges; if a third were to exhibit a dress made by her own royal fingers, ladies who despise the science of the kitchen, would revel in it. Marriageable demoiselles would darn themselves into the affections of their future, and even old maids might find their way to the church, by showing the wedding dress made by their own hands.

Then, may Ada continue to make her pies and puddings, and may she every day have a lighter hand for the crust, and a lighter heart to enjoy it.

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER XII.

UT, like the good people of Islington, the rogues were out in their prognostic, for Lilly recovered of the fever—her robust father it was that died. We might be censured in these enlightened times if we asserted that he took the fever from his nursing; but it made little matter to poor Byrne whether the disease was contagious or no—for the fever he took, wherever he got it—and he died of it, too—died after extorting—no—we do him and his daughter grievous wrong by using the word—after obtaining from Lilly a readily accorded promise that she would never receive Kumba again into her presence until he had gained a place for himself in the estimation of those whose esteem was worth his seeking, and until her mother should withdraw the interdict which he left upon his visits.

The reader may imagine what he pleases of the force of passion, and of female fickleness, and feebleness, and a great many other easily-mouthed phrases, which are more fashionable, we suspect, in certain romances, than in human nature; but we can assure him that there are girls in the world upon whose perseverance and resolution a reliance might be placed as secure as that which one would repose on the firmness of a Mina or a Bolivar—in situations far more trying than any which those rude, rocky-hearted fellows could be tempted with—a resolution, too, a great deal more noble in its motives than theirs; for those gentle creatures do from duty, and even in violence to their natures, what a great rough man will do from pride, and the impulse of a ferocious and passionate temperament. While the one breasts the shock as sulkily as a rocky headland in a tempest, the other yields and recoils alternately, blending the grace of submission with the dignity of self-assertion; like a willow in a swiftly-gliding stream, seeming to droop and suffer itself to be hurried away by the torrent that has entrapped its boughs, while it clings with an easy determination to the bank where it has taken root. Lilly Byrne was just such a girl as we have described. Feeble in heart and frame as the feeblest of her sex, her conduct showed as if the energy which had been stolen by long suffering from the latter had been all transferred to her mind, and erected there into a tower of strength, against which all the assaults of feeling and still surviving affection (for love like hers could not be extinguished) were unavailingly, though powerfully, directed. Religion was her grand stay in those days of pining and of solitude.

Startled by the dangerous illness with which she had been visited, and touched by the restoration of her health, she had looked earnestly from the interests of her heart to those of her soul, and had at length, after much self-examination, and prayer, and self-restraint, succeeded in obtaining the object of her exertions, that true religion which, by making all earthly affections subservient to the one eternal and divine, frees its votary from all possibility of an entanglement in the latter which could be dangerous to his peace of mind (at least). That true religion we mean, which, notwithstanding all the efforts of wit, and genius ill-directed, and learning ill-applied, has lain, and still continues to lie, bedded amongst the instincts of the mighty heart of mankind, governing the tumultuous action of its passions, and sweetening all its impulses, inspiring it with that finely ambitious love which, scornful to fix itself upon any of the results of nature, mounts at once to the First Cause as well as the centre of all beauty, as the object most worthy of it; and there lies sheltered with all its hopes, its pains, its sorrows, and its fears, while the tempests of human evil roll in harmless murmurs to its feet, and the sunlight of human happiness is made more calm and sunny by the reflection of its smiles. That true religion which, far from stealing the tone of the heart to a philosophical indifference (as its calumniators say, while they mistake it for its ape, fanaticism), gives a keener edge to sympathy, a warmer pulse to moral feeling and affection, which bids the heart be hard to nothing but crime, cold to nothing but the suggestions of evil, and deaf to nothing but the call of selfishness; which presents the only and perfectly satisfactory solution that can be offered to that mighty enigma, the creation, and which can make a grander spectacle still than all the material wonders of that creation—a man, at least equal to the philosopher in moral goodness and in dignity of endurance, and superior to the philosopher in sublimity of motive.

Sorrow, however, had been beforehand with piety in the heart of our little heroine; and though the latter re-conquered, or, at all events, contested the possession of the region with the spoiler, it could not repair the ravages which had been already made. The acuteness of the pang was blunted and made dull, and a sweetness was breathed upon the festering wound that tempered and allayed its anguish; but neither the danger nor the suffering was removed—for religion, even such as hers, is a soother and paraclete, not a liberator; and the world would be no longer a place of probation if it were otherwise. The last struggle which Lilly had to maintain against her own heart was on the day on which Kumba, after suffering many months to pass away without daring to intrude upon the grief of the family, requested (by a letter, addressed, with a delicacy of which he was very capable, and which Lilly appreciated at its full worth, to Mrs. Byrne) to be permitted to visit them.

Lilly and her mother were both seated at the breakfast-table when the messenger entered with the note.

"A letter that one left for you, ma'am."

"From whom, James?—give it me," said Mrs. Byrne.

The servant approached, watching the eyes of "the young missis," and availing himself of every moment when they were turned from him, to communicate, by a hundred cautionary grimaces, gestures, winks, jerks of the head, dilations of the eyes and mouth, and other strange contortions, some indication of the nature of its contents. Mrs. Byrne, however, was not sufficiently quick of apprehension.

"What do you mean, James? Why don't you give me the letter?"

"Bekays he toul't me—to—you know"—(turning his back towards Lilly, and pointing his thumb slyly over his shoulder, while his eyes seemed to reverse themselves in their sockets,) "he did, indeed."

"Well, you are the queerest man that ever lived. He did what? Who did?"

"Mr. Kumba did!" thundered the man, exasperated beyond all patience. "Robert Kumba, sense I can't make you see it, that's what he did. There's no use in talking!" he added, grumbling, as he tossed the letter carelessly on the breakfast-table, and turned to depart.

Lilly did not start, nor break a tea-cup, nor scream, nor perform any other of those antics of astonishment which, perhaps, those of my fair readers who are versed in the stage-business of romance might have expected from her.

More quick of eye and apprehension than her mother, she had formed a just conjecture on the subject, from the moment she beheld the servant's caution, on entering the room, and Mrs. Byrne, had she looked towards her daughter, might have seen in her flushed and whitening forehead, her trembling lip, and straining bosom, that which would have saved her the trouble of asking so many questions, and the sin of putting James in a passion.

"It is from Robert, indeed," said Mrs. Byrne, looking for her spectacles; "who brought it, James?"

"I'll tell you that, thin, ma'am," said James, turning suddenly round, and forgetting all his anger in the interest of the new question. "I'll tell you all about that," he repeated in a soft tone, as if fearful of being overheard; then bending his person, and stretching his head to the furthest limit that his neck (as coarse, and almost as long, as a cable) would permit, while he still held the handle of the door behind his back, "I'll tell you that," he once more repeated, hushing the tone of his voice into a whisper that was all but inaudible, "himself, no less!"—and then, confirming by a nod the truth of what he alleged, he suddenly drew himself up to his full height, and stared, as if in sympathy with the astonishment he had excited.

"My goodness!" exclaimed both the ladies.

"Is, indeed," James continued, gathering his hands together under the skirt of his coat, and renewing his nod of emphatic assertion.

"And is he below, James?" inquired Mrs. Byrne.

"Oh, below! what below, ma'am?" said James, his head recoiling with a tone and action of remonstrance and astonishment, "Is it into the house he'd come? No, indeed. But I'll tell you what," he added, walking a few paces further into the centre of the room, placing his cauboge (old hat) upon a chair, looking fixedly in the eyes of his auditors, and throwing his disencumbered arms out from his shoulders, as if preparing for a regular oration. "Here's the way it was. Goen to the ford, over, I was, this mornen, to water the little filly-foal, the same that Miss Lilly there used to be riden, whin she'd be along with him (and a good warrant you had at it, too, miss," he interpolated by way of parenthesis, while he grinned at Lilly), an' I trothen along, thinken o' nothen, along the road, whin all of a sudden, I felt a great change comen in the baste under me. Oh, sarrow word of a lie I'm tellen. Lord save us! says I, is it anythin' bad that's there? and hardly the word was out o' me mouth, whin 'James!' says he, above upon the hedge. Oh, it's a fact. 'James!' says he, on the hedge. Lord between us and harm, says I, who is that's callen me? says I. 'Don't you know me, James?' says he again; Mr. Kumba, indeed, he did. Aw, thin, sir, says I, is that you? 'Tis, indeed, James,' says he. So we stopped a minute, looken at one another. Why thin, it's a long while since I seen you now, sir, says I. He made me no answer to that, but after a while, 'James,' says he, 'I'm sorry for your trouble, westwards.' Heaven's will be done, sir, says I, you needn't tell me that, an' sure 'twas true for me, ma'am, for—" looking all round the room for an illustration—"see, 'twas as pale as this table cloth, his face was, and his eyes sunk in his head, within, an' his cheeks all gone, intirely. He looked, you'd think, as if he wasn't there at all, you'd think, a'most. Not but," he added, on meeting Lilly's eye, "he's greatly improved from what he was, I'm told, and thriving again very fast, but still an' all 'twould make the stones weep to look at him. 'Well, James, isn't it greatly they wouldn't let me come a near 'em, at all,' says he, 'an' my heart bleeden to hear about it.' He did, indeed, miss. Sir, says I, sarious, this way, I never spake o' the family, says I, but there never was a smoke without a fire yet, an' begging your pardon, says I, may be, if you behaved honest (i.e. more mildly) whin you were there, you'd have the liberty o' the place to-day, says I, the same as ever. 'Why, then, I believe it's true for you, James,' says he, and then he continued moven unaisy about for a few minutes, like one that would have somethen on his mind, you'd think; an' at last, 'James,' says he, 'would you do me a favour now, an' I'll do as much for you another time,' says he. If you never did anything for me, sir, says I, I'll do it and welcome, and I would too, ma'am. With that, he put it into my hand—the letter—he did, and says he, 'don't let your young miss see you given of it, James,' says he, 'and I'll wait here,' says he, 'until such time as you bring me an answer, and don't delay it, James, if you can, for my heart is within it,' says he. He did, indeed. Signs on, see the state I'm in, racen hither wit it," he continued, pressing his open hand upon his brow, and wiping away some drops of perspiration, "an' there he is, waiting this way, over in the sally-grove, seeing would he get a favourable answer to the petition." And having graced his peroration with a suitable gesture, James took up his hat again, and remained silent, looking alternately into the eyes of both his auditors, as if to observe the effect of his narrative.

"He has taken the proper course, at all events," said the old lady, showing the superscription "To Mrs. Byrne, Drumsconlon," to her daughter.

Lilly did not answer, but her glowing cheek and brightening eye showed that her mother's observation was not lost upon her.

"Am I to wait for the commands below, ma'am?" said James—an innate sense of delicacy (a quality which even the humblest of the Irish possesses to a great degree, in common with people of strong feelings) informing him that, although they had forgotten his presence, it could not but be an incumbrance at the present moment.

"You may, James," said Mrs. Byrne, "but don't be out o' the way."

"Is it I be out o' the way, ma'am!" James murmured in surprise as he left the room.

They proceeded to examine the contents of the letter.

It is most extraordinary to observe how completely, how utterly, as age grows on us, we lose sight of all the lesser feelings and sympathies of our youth—how perfectly incapable we become of entering into all the fineries of our early condition of mind and heart, when re-acted in our presence by those to whom they have descended. With all Lilly's patience, she could not help wondering at the comparatively uninterested way in which her mother proceeded to wipe her spectacles, drive her old friend the tortoise-shell cat from her knee, examine the seal, and smile at the device and motto, a crucible, with "swift yet sure" beneath, the popular allusion of which she readily understood, before she gratified the longing ears and eyes of Lilly with a disclosure of the contents. Kumba spoke truly when he told James that his heart was in it—and certainly, if mere words ought to have made way with the widow and her child, the appeal which it contained would not have been unsuccessful.

"I only wish, my dear Mrs. Byrne," he continued, after having made his own object known in a very sensible and feeling manner, "I only wish that you would give me an opportunity of showing you that the great impropriety of conduct (to say the least of it) of which I was guilty in your presence, was not the effect of habitual and accidental ill-temper. It was an occasion which I cannot think on without grief and humiliation; but when you agree with me in reprehending it, do not forget, my dear madam, I beseech you, the sufferings which it has already brought upon me.

"To your feelings, as a mother, I appeal for some indication of what those sufferings must have been. Consider how you would have felt, if any circumstances had excluded you from the sick chamber and the bed-side of your daughter, your only child, whom you love so tenderly, when she lay in a dangerous illness—and think whether even the absolute necessity of those circumstances, and their being unmerited by any act of yours, would be sufficient to reconcile you to the privation. If not, my dear madam, what must have been the torture of my heart, when I had to endure a similar banishment, and had not even that ineffectual resource of a secure conscience to comfort my heart—when I heard, hour after hour, of some new grief, some new calamity befalling her in whose happiness all mine was centered; and yet could not but acknowledge that you were all acting right in shutting me out from her presence, and that the suffering which I deplored, and the agony which I felt, was all the work of my own hands—that I had been the cause of my own rejection from the paradise I sought—the cause of my poor, gentle, but justly indignant Lilly's illness—of your displeasure—of—Oh, madam, even while I write, the stinging of my own heart tells me that I have done too much, and that I ought not to be heard.

"Nevertheless, I send the letter as I have written it. If I should be still doomed to suffer for that unhappy morning, however dreadful my life may become to me, be assured that never, even in thought, will I entertain the suspicion that I have any thing to blame but my own unprovoked and wanton rudeness for my misery.

"ROBERT KUMBA."

Mrs. Byrne slowly folded the letter, and remained, meditating for a moment, while she endeavoured to make the bowl of a teaspoon float in her cup.

Lilly, whose countenance had changed almost as many times as there were sentences in the letter, during its perusal, remained anxiously expecting the speech of her mother. She had, during the early part, manifested a degree of warmth and approbation (in her look and manner only,) which had Kumba beheld her at the moment, would have put him in fine spirits, but before her mother stopped reading, the expression of her face had altered. The tears, which his allusion to her own illness had brought into her eyes, were checked upon the lids, the glow on her cheek became fainter, the panting hope that struggled in her bosom appeared to subside, and a slight degree of chagrin and of disappointment was manifested upon her brow and lip.

"It is a very nice letter, my dear," said Mrs. Byrne, "but it does not contain all that we want to know. I believe we always gave him credit for feeling; but why does he not mention anything of the farm all this while?"

"The reason appears to be, mother, that he has mistaken our motives altogether. Surely, neither you nor I, nor any body else, ever could have intended to make that unfortunate fit of passion a cause for utter banishment, as he calls it. My poor dead father was not so inveterate. He even attributed a great portion of the blame on that morning to himself."

"Ah, my dear, your poor father was a great deal too forgiving. Heaven forgive me for saying so—I mean for his own worldly interests; but, I thank Heaven he was so, for if it were otherwise he could not have hoped for the reward that, I trust, he is now enjoying."

"Neither ought Robert to suppose that he has had all the suffering to himself," said Lilly, while she strove to keep herself from crying.

"You are very right, my love," replied Mrs. Byrne, turning emphatically towards her, "and that is very selfish of him, to say so, certainly."

Lilly meant only the internal suffering to both, consequent on their separation; but the matter-of-fact old lady took it for granted that so strong a word would only be used with application to the physical calamities of all parties, and Lilly was too timid and delicate to explain—so that the undeserved censure was suffered to remain upon poor Kumba's shoulders.

These are the mistakes that set the world by the ears.

After some farther conversation, it was agreed that Mrs. Byrne should answer Robert's letter, or petition, as James called it—by undeceiving him with respect to the cause of his exile—laying down the condition of his recall, which was to be such an improvement in the circumstances of his property and his conduct as would suffice to justify a reasonable hope of his perseverance; and, finally, a friendly exhortation to him, that he would make an exertion to restore to all as much as yet remained on earth of the peace which they had lost.

"Mother!" said Miss Byrne, as she was about to leave the room—"you will tell him I had not forgotten him." And having with difficulty restrained herself while she uttered the sentence, she hurried away to relieve her heart in the solitude of her own apartment.

By another of those contre-temps, which, however alight in themselves, yet involve so deep and very often tragical consequences in the history of the human heart, it unfortunately happened that Mrs. Byrne (who, as my readers may before now have conjectured, was not one of those persons who can think of one thing and attend to another at the same time) was, at the very moment when Lilly spoke, absorbed in the consideration whether she should address the letter "My Dear Sir," or "My Dear Robert," and never heard, and, consequently, never gave Lilly's remembrance. The letter wanted it too—(which was worse and worse)—for the precise, good-natured lady took so much pains to communicate every thing in so very proper terms, in so neat a hand, and with so many almost invisible erasures, nicely polished over with the finger nail (so as that the ink should not sink), and other pretty precautions, that poor Kumba, when he got it, felt as if he had walked unawares under a waterfall.

He might, perhaps, have yet received enough of encouragement to stimulate him to some exertion, if he had known how often Lilly wept upon her mother's neck in the course of that and the following day. But there was nothing to alleviate the coldness of the letter which, indeed, would have been perceptible to a person composed of much less combustible and enthusiastic materials than himself. The effect which it did produce on him we have already seen, and the accounts which reached the inmates of Drumsanlon of his excesses, contributed more effectually than all she had before endured, to shatter the feeble remains of Lilly's constitution, render her more assiduous in all her duties, more silent, more resigned, more woe-worn, more gentle and timid, more smiling, more cheerful, and broken-hearted.

One of the principal of these last was a ceremony which the innovations of modern custom has restricted altogether to the humble classes of Irish life. Every morning, before any part of her household affairs were permitted to obtrude themselves upon her attention, she walked to an old church, about a "small mile" from her own residence, for the purpose of "paying a round," that is to say, offering up, on her knees, a few prayers for the repose of the spirit of him who was sleeping beneath the mound, of soliciting an increase of strength to abide by the resolution she had formed, and commemorating the sacrifice she had made of her own feelings and happiness to his dying wishes. An accident which occurred during one of those morning excursions occasioned the conversation which took place between Kumba and the Suil Dhuv on their first introduction to the reader.

Lilly had been, a few mornings previous to the day on which the old Palatine arrived at the inn upon the mountains, kneeling, as usual, in the morning sunshine at the foot of her father's grave, her hands clasped, and her head bowed down in pious reverence, when she was startled by hearing the ivy rustle upon the low and ruined wall beside her. Raising her eyes quickly, and in some alarm, she beheld the face of a man, whom she recognised as an occasional labourer of her father's, staring in upon her devotions, with some expression of surprise and compassion.

"Whisht! whisht, Miss!" he exclaimed, waving his hand to her, as if to signify that she should not regard his presence.

"How did you know that I was here, Jerry? Were you sent for me?" said Lilly, rising from her knees.

"Oh no, Miss—not I—but—" observing her eyes red from weeping—"you oughtn't to do that at all, Miss, he wouldn't like it."

"Why so?"

"Tisn't good, Miss. I knew meself of a time, a lone woman, a widow, that used to be goen that way every day to cry over her son that was buried in the church-yard—an' at last, you see, one day as she was kneeling that way, an' claspen her hands, and ochoning over the grave, she hard somethen above her, upon the wall, as it might be this way as I am now—and sure, what should be there but himself. 'Ah then, darlen,' says she, 'is that you Mick? Lord save us!' 'E'then it is so, mother,' says he, 'and don't do that any more,' says he. 'Oh then, what for, shouldn't I cry over you, Mike, darlen?' says she, looken at him. 'No, don't, mother,' says he, 'for it's well I suffered to you for all you cried already. Look here!' says he, liften up the winden-sheet that was upon him, and shouwen her his side all full of holes. 'There's one of them,' says he, 'for every tear you shed for me,' says he, 'and don't do it any more upon me, mother,' says he. 'No, I won't indeed, Mike,' says the poor woman, dryen her eyes at once. 'Don't then,' says he agen, an' he vanished. An' she didn't either."

"Well, I think you for the advice, Jerry, but I will thank you still more, if you will not say a word of your having seen me here to any body."

"Is it I say a word of it?" said Jerry O'Gilvy, indignantly.

He did say a word of it, however, and two words; and this circumstance it was which induced Suil Dhuv to suggest to his dupe, Kumba, the idea of meeting Lilly at the place to which Jerry would conduct him, a grove lying on her road home from the church-yard; the latter being strictly cautioned by the Coiner not to make the young man aware of the object of her morning walk, for he had penetration enough to know that Kumba's feeling, if not his principle, would never permit him to disturb her on such a mission—indeed we may say his common sense, for, however much he trusted to the effect which he might be enabled to produce on Lilly's resolution in a personal interview, he could expect nothing less than an indignant and final repulse to such an attempt as the present. Neither would it have answered the views of Suil Dhuv that they should meet, or that Kumba should in any way succeed in his wishes. It was enough for him to have acquired an additional influence over the mind over the mind of the latter, by making the proposition—he was not by any means so anxious as his friend imagined, that it should proceed to a satisfactory accomplishment. This, however, was sufficiently provided against by a slight circumstance which took place the very evening before. An anonymous note directed to Miss Byrne, and informing her in two lines of Kumba's design, which was left at Drumsanlon, not only filled her with indignation but effectually confined her to the house, while Kumba and his chaperon Jerry beat about the grove until noon, in vain. The note was left at the kitchen door, by a thin, sharp-faced, and bare-footed lad, who neither made nor answered inquiries, and of whose mission James could collect no further indication than that he spoke in a half-Englified way about "dis, an' dat, and de oder ting."

Thus circumstances stood at Drumsanlon, on the day preceding that which was destined to involve, in so singular a conjuncture, the fortunes of so many characters in our history.

A LADY'S SMILE.—A recent authoress compares a man to a silk umbrella in these quaint terms: "A good man is like a strong silken umbrella, trustworthy, and a shelter when the storms of life pour down upon us. A mere walking-stick when the sun shines—a friend in misfortune."

LOST AND FOUND.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER II.

RAIN was descending in torrents over Dublin, when Waters entered the little garden lying in front of Ashbud Villa, about a week after his unpleasant parting with Lady Faddle. He found Agnes in the drawing-room. She was seated in a low chair near the window, and was busily engaged in sewing trimmings on a summer bonnet. When Waters entered she raised her head for a moment, and then resumed her work without speaking.

"How is my little melancholy," he asked, as he took a seat at her side, and maliciously tugged the ribbon from her fingers.

"She will feel delighted if Mr. Waters will employ his hands otherwise, and allow her to go on with her bonnet."

The gentleman hummed two or three bars of "The Song of the Shirt," and looked puzzled.

"You are spiteful to-day, Agnes."

"Heigh, ho! when will you patent that discovery?"

"When you recover your good temper. Why do you wear that hateful lilac?"

"'Tis a sad colour and suits my mind; besides, it will harmonize sweetly with rosemary and willow leaves."

"Ah! make the thing perfect at once."

"What would my friend, M. de Milliner suggest?"

"To line the bonnet with a half yard of dejection, and turn up the curtain with a strip of pensiveness."

"What exquisite taste!"

"Any accounting for your strange humour to-day?"

"Where have you been those six days? Violent head-ache, of course, a low pulse, and dimness of sight, and so forth!"

"No."

"No! Pray, don't meddle with my ribbons. No, you said?"

"I said 'no.'"

"And, by the way, with charming tautology."

"'Tis so pleasant to imitate those whom we—"

"—won't permit to trim their bonnets. Why are you so slow of speech? I guess your thoughts before your tongue can interpret them."

"This rain makes me feel so stupid, Agnes."

"How unfortunate that you should be always in a shower. Where have you been?"

"Dining with Mammon."

"One of his viceroys, I take you to mean."

"You are right. You have heard of old Crackfun?"

"Yes."

"And of the vase?"

"I have."

"He refuses to sell it."

"Ah, that accounts for papa's inexplicable melancholy. Well?"

"Mr. Simon made him several offers but without effect. At last he commissioned me to call on the old usurer, and exert my eloquence with him in his behalf."

"How did you succeed with that two-handed weapon—your eloquence?"

"Badly at first. Ambition gave me the victory."

"So, so; papa promised to make a present of Dutch tulips if you won for him."

"He went further, Miss Simon."

"Did he, your worship?"

"Well, will Agnes please you better?"

"Did you speak, John?"

"He told me that the beauty of this extraordinary vase, in which, by the way, I see nothing to admire—had haunted him from the moment he saw it until the present hour, and that he would refuse nothing to him who should make him master of it."

"Wonderful gentleman."

"His liberality surpassed everything. Guess what he told me, Agnes?"

"Your request is very sensible."

"You cannot even conjecture?"

"Too much. The difficulty lies in picking out the most sensible of my suspicions."

"Do you love me?"

"Why do you ask?"

"He said you did. He told me you despised Rogers, and cared for me. Was it delirium?"

"You who heard him are the best judge."

"Is there any foundation, however small, on which he could build so blessed a promise?"

"In his mind?"

"In your heart, dear?"

"I never had time to fathom it."

"Do not the ripples on the surface tell of the depths below?"

"My dear Mr. Waters, you are growing poetical. Suppose you follow up the history of this vase?"

"As you please, Miss Simon."

"Huffed?"

"I assure you, no. We forgive the buffet for the hand that dealt it."

"Amiable man. But, this detested vase affair?"

"A friend of mine, Jefferson, who is manager of a bank in London, came to my assistance. Crackfun had once attempted to pass a forged cheque on his establishment. Out of pity for the old wretch he retained the cheque, wrote the forger a letter in which he told him that his villany had been discovered, and warned him to be more careful for the future. That cheque hung like a sword over Crackfun's head until this morning, when he solemnly undertook, on condition of having it burned in his presence, to deliver up the vase to Mr. Simon for a thousand guineas."

"You surprise me. I can fancy papa's delight at this unexpected good luck."

"On coming out we met Rogers, to whom I communicated my success."

"Of course, he congratulated you?"

"Yes; but with a very rueful face. We left him hanging about the door, looking down-cast and miserable. The vase will be here in an hour."

"I wonder did papa solicit Mr. Rogers' services in this affair."

"It is hardly complimentary to you to say he did."

"He must have lost all control over his tongue. Did he mention my name in connection with it?"

"So, I understand."

"And the lady was to take the knight who should fetch her glove out of the den of the lions."

"That, I believe, was Mr. Simon's arrangement."

"Poor papa. He calculated badly on my patience."

"Perhaps, on your love too, Agnes?"

"You are too cunning. Would you have me fetch incense and burn it to your worship?"

"I am satisfied."

"Heaven send the vase safe home."

"Amen! I have not told Mr. Simon how matters turned out, nor shall I until the coveted treasure arrives. I've got it made up mysteriously, that his delight may be greater when he opens the case. Keep our secret."

"Do not doubt my fidelity. I think Lady Faddle will be here to-day, so I shall work in the summer-house to avoid meeting her."

"Poor Lady Faddle."

"Poor Mr. Waters."

"Blessed be the lips that mimic so sweetly."

"I declare, Mr. Waters, your success is degenerating into impertinence. By, by!"

Lady Faddle, who had been "down town," and read the "Freeman" placard, through her gold-mounted eye-glass, made her way to Ashbud Villa, an hour and a-half after Waters had parted with Agnes. It was plain that her ladyship had news of no small importance to communicate; her steps were hurried, her face pinched up to an expression of nervous anxiety and impatience. She learned from the servant that her master was in the library, and presuming on the familiar terms on which they stood, the lady tapped at the door and was received with a hurriedly spoken entrez from within. She found Mr. Simon standing, in gloomy abstraction, before a black-board on which the outline of a vase was carefully drawn in white and orange chalks.

"Well, be quick," he said, without moving round to see who his visitor was.

"Pray excuse me, Mr. Simon. How rude of me to intrude on you!"

He looked over his shoulder, and for a moment his face reddened. "Pardon me, Lady Faddle, I dreaded it was one of the servants. Will you be seated?"

The tone in which this was spoken implied but little welcome. The visitor was keen enough to see that her intrusion was not relished, and she hesitated a moment whilst deciding what to do. A second request, less icy than the first, that she would be seated made the lady resolve on stopping; she threw her reticule on the table and sank into a chair.

"You are thoughtful to-day, Mr. Simon. I can hardly help feeling miserable myself when I see other people dejected. Can you love that vase so much?"

"Whatever my friends may think of my sanity, I feel convinced that in this matter I am a monomaniac."

"You are an excellent draughtsman."

"Thrift, thrift, Lady Faddle. This sketch is the mere shadow of a recollection—a thing seen twenty years ago, and never forgotten."

"How truly it has been said—'a thing of beauty is a joy for ever.'"

"Yet this has brought no joy to me; on the contrary, it has clouded my days with anxiety and bitterness, and longings, hopeless of requital."

"After all, do you think it sensible to attach such importance to the owning of a mere piece of pottery?"

"Men will dream, Lady Faddle, each on his particular hobby. One runs mad after a race-horse, another for a puppy-dog, another for a something equally ridiculous as either. My inclinations take another channel."

"You are in love with ornamental crockery, it would appear."

"And will, as long as this machine is to him, Simon. You laugh."

"No. Talking of machines, you heard of the attempted regicide?"

"I did not."

"Some wretches have attempted to murder Louis Philippe by means of an infernal machine. Very awful."

"Very."

"It is even stated that numbers of those engines of destruction have been sent into this country for the purpose of killing off persons of wealth and station. You and I had better look out."

"They shall not catch us napping. Singularly enough, I dreamt last night that I was mortally wounded through some unfriendly stratagem, which I do not now recollect—a box of bullets or something of that sort."

"How providential. Forewarned is forearmed, Mr. Simon, and I should advise you to be on your guard. You make me feel very nervous."

A servant entered—"There is a heavy parcel below stairs addressed to you, sir."

"Who brought it?"

"A man, sir, with a queer face and a shabby hat."

"A secret society agent," suggested Lady Faddle.

"Did he leave his name?"

"No, sir."

"The miscreants!"

"By Jove, Lady Faddle, this is curious. What do you say?"

"Why, but one thing, your life is in danger. Oh! I implore you to be cautious."

"Fetch the parcel."

"Yes, sir."

"I shall leave the room, Mr. Simon."

"Don't go for a moment. After all, it may turn out to be only a heap of millinery for Agnes."

"Millinery! And sent by a man in a shabby hat. How can you dream of such a thing?"

"We shall see. Here it is."

With the assistance of the servant, Mr. Simon placed the parcel on the table. It was a massive square box, securely nailed down, and protected at the angles with bindings of brass. Lady Faddle withdrew to the furthest end of the library, whilst she repeatedly exclaimed, "Mr. Simon, I conjure you to beware of what you are doing with that infernal machine. Do you wish to blow up the house?"

"Your ladyship need not be alarmed. I have hit upon a safe plan of discovering the contents of this ugly present. John, take the box and put it on the garden path. Steady, steady."

When the servant had left, Lady Faddle approached the window, timidly.

"There" she said, "I see the man setting down that fearful machine on the gravel."

"So I directed him."

"Indeed. And pray what will you do?"

"Fire the contents of this horse pistol at it from where we stand."

"Should it explode?"

"It can injure no one. Any one in the garden?" he shouted, as he raised the window. There was no reply. In another minute the house shook from the heavy report of the pistol, and the box lay in broken pieces on the path.

Mr. Simon, followed by Lady Faddle, rushed out to see what it contained. At the same moment Agnes, alarmed by the report, hastened up from the summer-house. The little group collected round the box, and bent over it.

"As I live," said Lady Faddle, "there was nothing in it but some old china."

"What a curious present," cried Mr. Simon.

"Why did you break it, papa?" asked Agnes.

"You shall learn by and by dear."

"And a letter, I declare," quoth Lady Faddle, lifting one from the debris of the box.

"For me?" asked Mr. Simon. "Ah, read it for us, lady Faddle; I am too mystified to do it myself."

Her ladyship put up her glass and read:—

"DEAR MR. SIMON.—Elated by the hope you held out to me of obtaining the hand of your charming daughter, on condition of prevailing upon Crackfun to part with the vase, I waited on him this morning, and purchased it for fifty guineas. I understand that my rival had agreed for it previously, but, as all is fair in love and war, I out-bid him. For various reasons I am proud of my success first, because it makes the mirror of all female goodness and beauty mine; secondly, because it liberates me henceforth from the attentions of that blasé and superannuated dowager, old Lady Faddle. I shall place this letter on the top of the vase, and, kissing your hand, am—"

"I can read no further," screamed Lady Faddle, leaning against a garden seat for support.

"What name," asked Mr. Simon, snatching the letter. "Rogers—ah! the vase is lost—catch me;" but before assistance could be given he had fallen insensible to the grass. Whilst Agnes was helping to raise her father, Mr. Rogers came rushing down from the house.

"Overcome with joy," he cried, clapping his hands, and dancing around the flower-pots. "All's fair in love and war, hurrah!"

"Miserable wretch!" exclaimed Lady Faddle, "pollute not this place with your presence. Begone!"

"Dear old lady, don't be jealous, don't. By my faith we'll make you a bridesmaid, we will—hurrah!"

"Your vase is broken, miscreant!" screamed her ladyship. "Look at that," and she kicked the pieces asunder.

Rogers looked bewildered. "Broken!" he exclaimed, "broken! Mr. Simon, what does this mean?"

The gentleman addressed looked at the speaker and answered.

"Do not alarm yourself, all shall be made right. You sent me the vase; I broke it; you fulfilled your promise; I shall keep my word. There is your wife. Agnes, let me introduce you to your future husband."

"The poor girl recoiled at her father's words, and leant, pale and trembling, against the trunk of a beech. "Never," she muttered; "never! There are bounds to everything, I will not be huckstered away to those whom I love not."

"Dear Miss Simon," said Rogers, advancing a few steps, "may I—"

"Pardon me," said a manly voice, and Waters stepped between the pair. Instinctively Agnes flew to his side, and hung upon his arm.

"You have lost, Mr. Waters," said Mr. Simon, with a regretful tone in his voice.

"Lost, sir?"

"Mr. Rogers bought the vase. I broke it—I shall not break my word."

"If you want evidence of what we say," interrupted Rogers, "there are the mortal remains," and he took up a fragment and handed it to his rival, who examined it attentively.

"This is not the vase," he exclaimed.

"Indeed!" cried the whole party.

"You had better measure your words, Mr. Waters."

"You should have observed that rule with your shameless impudence, Mr. Rogers. Halloa, Crackfun, bring the box."

Mr. Crackfun, the Jew, stepped out of a side path and laid a deal case on the ground. He uncovered it with great care and drew forth the Cenci "vase." "That is like the sheese," said the Jew.

"Mr. Simon ran up, and falling on his knees before the beautiful object, pressed his lips to the base on the side.

"I claim your word and promise, Mr. Simon," said Waters.

"It is I who have obtained the vase—not this charlatan."

"You are right, sir. Mr. Rogers, all is fair in love and war. I would not break my word with you, I shall not break it with Mr. Waters. Agnes, whom do you love best?"

She nestled closer to Waters, and twitched her fingers nervously.

"Your case is desperate, Mr. Simon. Shall I press the question?"

"No, thank'ee. I say Crackfun, I shall have you arrested before dinner."

"For whath, masther?"

"Obtaining money under false pretences. You sold me the wrong vase."

"Excushe me. When I thook dhe Shenahi vashe out the windhow, I puth in that whish you bought. You askhed me no questhuna, I gave no information. Ladiash and gentlemen, am I onesht?"

"Then give me my money, confound you, and I shall say good-bye to you."

"Give me back my vashe and I will."

"Deuce take you, for a scoundrelly Israelite. I might have reckoned on my luck. Good morning, ladies."

"Won't you dine with us to-day, Mr. Rogers," asked Agnes.

"No, thank'ee, Miss; no, thank'ee."

"Come, dear Master Rogers," said Lady Faddle, "let us leave this place."

"Shall we go out through the side path, Lady Faddle?"

"As you please, my dear Master Rogers. By the way, Mr. Waters."

"Madam."

"You appear to have an excellent memory."

"Your ladyship flatters me."

"Pray dismiss that notion. But when next you hear people of position maligned by their equals, will you remember that their talk is not intended for plebeian ears, and have the goodness to withdraw."

"How considerate of your ladyship; can you mention any other rule of etiquette which would suit the exigencies of your ladyship's character?"

"Just this, how very comical! The Murrays have published a shilling 'Etiquette,' you might study it with advantage."

"I trust the book contains an appendix on special points, from the fine Roman hand of your ladyship."

"The retort is clumsy, Mr. Waters; and, by the way, as there is a secret or two on the proper management of one's figure, could you not find time to drop into the gallery of sculpture, and endeavour to improve yours?"

"I am told that Lady Faddle need never leave her own house in search of anatomical studies, for opinion reports that your ladyship has a gallery filled with the hacked and bruised skeletons of strangled reputations and broken hearts. Amid their ruins your ladyship might often pass an hour with profit. 'Sweets to the sweet'—decay communing with decay."

"Now you lose your temper like an ill-bred boy. Agnes speak to poor Mr. Waters."

"I am under the impression, madam, that the gentleman is equal to that task himself."

"Sooth him, Miss Simon, sooth him."

"Would that I could assist in tranquillizing your ladyship."

"Tell him that all is not lost."

"I dread he will have to suffer the loss of your ladyship's friendship, but, as you say, that is not all."

"Poor Mr. Waters, ha! ha! ha! Come, dear Master Rogers. Bon jour, my loves—ta, ta."

A NIGHT AT SNA.

CHAPTER II.

HERE is in the principal street of the village, a house which, being (with the exception of the pound and the post-office) the only public building in the place, was turned to more uses than Codrus's stockings. It was, by turns, the sessions-house, assembly-room, bride-well, and (when pestilence visited the place) the public hospital. Nay, it is said that it has even, upon some pressing occasions, served more than one of these purposes together, and that while the officers of justice have been occupied below stairs in launching her awful bolts against some devoted head, the feet of the dancers have made the ceiling shake above, and sentence has sometimes been pronounced to the accompaniment of "Haste to the Wedding," or the "Humours of Glin." On this occasion it was selected as the scene of the subscription ball.

We have already said that ours was not free from the common plague of Irish villages. There had for some time past been symptoms of—not exactly war—but something unpleasant between Stucco Hall and Mizen Lodge. In birth, Lieutenant Beauchamp was (to speak moderately) not inferior to that worthy family, but in fortune there was this difference—that Mr. Stucco's land was an estate, while the Lieutenant's was what, in our neighbourhood, is called a "take." Pride of rank, and place, and purse is, to be sure, a failing which prevails almost every where—and where it does not, one is pretty sure to find some other pride as bad or even worse. And to a certain degree, how is it reprehensible to take pleasure in the contemplation of a long line of glorious ancestors, provided one does not fancy that their merit renders one's own a matter of supererogation? or to maintain one's place in the order of society, provided one does not fall into the common error of supposing that the superiority he claims is real, and not conventional? But in Ireland it is to be lamented that bigotry, party, and poverty combine to render the causes of social disunion peculiarly irremediable. The real nobility and gentry forsake the country, and their place is taken, in many instances, by individuals who multiply their pride tenfold, and make it ludicrous by the addition of their own poverty and ignorance. Mr. Stucco's pride was exactly in inverse ratio as his family pretensions.

There lived in a neat house at the end of the street, as you entered the village from the highroad, a family of the name of Moran, the mildest, gentlest, and most inoffensive household in the country, but straitened in means, and living, like the Beauchamps, on a "take." Stucco Hall did not visit Laurel Cottage, and as Stucco Hall gave law to all around, the circle of the Morans' acquaintances was very limited. On this occasion it entered the wise heads of Mr. and Mrs. Stucco to think that the Morans should be excluded from the sessions hall-room—the Almacks of the place, of which they had all the patronage. The whisper spread through the village. Aunt Nancy heard it at the doctor's and told it at Laurel Cottage. The Morans were thunderstruck, the poor dear girls especially. Do but suppose the case your own—a ball but once in six months, and that the only place of public amusement which pride and poverty left open to the Morans. It was, as Lord Liverpool said, "too bad." Woe filled the walls of Laurel Cottage, and dismal anticipations of utter exclusion from even the little society they had—when enter Lieutenant Beauchamp.

"Good-morrow, ladies. What, preparing for the ball? eh? I know what this will end in, Mrs. Moran. You will have a Moran or two less at Laurel Cottage, before the buds are on the trees again. Nay, don't be reserved about it. I suppose the young ladies gave you a terrible character of me, but I like to see amusement on foot in a reasonable way."

He was told the secret.

"Not ask you to the ball!" he exclaimed in a voice of brass.

"Hav'n't they visited you?"

They had not. A dead silence.

"Never mind," said Beauchamp. "I have a remedy for that he little dreams of. Good-bye! you shall be at the ball, depend upon it, and the Stuccos in the same set with you too, if you care to have it so."

"This," said the Lieutenant, as he walked homeward, "is thoroughly Irish, and very, very paltry; not to speak of its want of feeling. But there is ever that difference between true and false gentility. The one can afford to be affable and kind, the other dare not."

There was in the title deeds of the Stucco property a curious clause, characteristic of the times in which they had been framed. The estates were made over to the possessor (from one of whose descendants they had passed into the hands of Mr. Stucco's father) subject only to the annual rent of a partridge and a pair of gloves, or gauntlets, to be delivered by the said possessor and his said descendants, on their knees to the lineal descendants of the original proprietor. As it happened, the present lineal descendants of the latter was Lieutenant Beauchamp. The claim was one which had not for a long time been enforced, nor would it probably in the Lieutenant's lifetime, were it not for what had reached his ears at Laurel Cottage.

In the course of the following day Mr. Stucco was at luncheon, when the servant handed him a note from Mizen Lodge:

"Sir, (it began)

"I am directed by Mr. Beauchamp to request that you will, without fail, appear at Mizen Lodge, on Thursday next, to pay up the arrears of rent due to him on the Stucco Hall estates, in the form which you will find prescribed in your title deeds to that property.

"I have the honour, &c.,

"F. FERRITER."

Consternation! What could be the motive of all this? A postscript solved the enigma.

"P.S.—He desires me to add, that as he understands the Morans of Laurel Cottage are not to be at the sessions ball upon the afore-said evening, the whole family intends to favour him by acting as witnesses upon the occasion.

"F. F."

This let the secret out. What! Mr. Stucco go to Mizen Lodge, to present a partridge and a pair of gloves to Lieutenant Beauchamp, on his knees, and with all the Morans looking on! What was to be done? There was but one course; to seek an honourable peace—to send tickets instantly for all the Morans, and to pay a conciliatory visit and talk the matter over with the stubborn seaman. Accordingly, on the ensuing day, Mr. Stucco made his appearance at Mizen Hall, holding out his hand to the Lieutenant, and laughing heartily. And the issue was that the Morans made a great figure at the ball.

An accidental illness prevented Miss O'Brien from taking so active a part in the amusements of the evening as she was accustomed to do in all such entertainments. She had taken her place in a set of country dances, when a sudden faintness obliged her to sit down. Her partner, with whom she was not then acquainted, not only did all that was requisite at the moment, but declined dancing for the night (a sacrifice of not slight importance in Miss O'Brien's eyes). He was very young, very fashionable, both in manners and appearance, and soon showed to his fair partner, what she did not know before, that there existed in her neighbourhood a person of taste and information fully equal to her own. He spoke in a manner altogether au fait on all the subjects which she loved. He showed an entire intimacy with her favourite literature, and evinced his own good taste on every subject, without impugning her's; a distinction so seldom made by those who love to shine in conversation.

His friend, one of the stewards, had introduced him to her as a Mr. O'Connor, but there was no one who could give her any further information at the ball, where her inquiries must, of course, be very limited. On her way home, in her house, in her dreams, at her uprising, toilet, breakfast, she could not banish from her mind the two lines of Campbell's beautiful poem—

"Glory, they said, and power, and honour,
Were in the mansion of O'Connor."

A bright idea struck her after breakfast. Aunt Nancy knew everybody. She could ask Aunt Nancy what she pleased without restraint. Accordingly she proceeded before dinner to the village, in order to obtain all the information she desired, with respect to the family and character of her partner of the preceding night. It was rather late in the afternoon when the carriage stopped before a little green hall-door, with a parapet and a pretty wooden railing of the same colour, with clematis and monthly roses trailed around the wall, and the brass knocker shining like gold. The door was opened by a girl, who was to Aunt Nancy what the Irishman in the "Horse and Widow" was to his master—cook, butler, waiting-maid, and all.

It is not to be supposed that in calling this lady Aunt Nancy, we mean to intimate that she stood in that degree of relationship to Miss O'Brien. They were not at all connected, but "Aunt Nancy" was a name by which Mrs. Burke was known all over the country, as well or better than by the patronymic of her deceased husband. The good woman was one of a class but rarely now to found, even in the villages of Ireland. Upon an income of forty pounds a-year she contrived to keep one of the prettiest houses in the village, as neat, within and without, to use the familiar but exact similitude, "as a new pin." It was a kind of gratuitous caravansera, ever open for the reception of Aunt Nancy's thousand-and-one relatives, who chose to make it a baiting place on their way to the city. Her cupboard was never without a delicious ham, some bottles of raspberry vinegar, and a peculiar sweet cake of her own invention, the fame of which resounded far and near. In return for these, and countless other minute attentions bestowed upon her visitors, the only penalty exacted by Aunt Nancy was, that they should listen, or at least seem to listen, with complaisance to the interminable histories of her daily adventures among her neighbours—how the butcher wanted to have three shillings for a leg of mutton, and with what arguments she defended her resolution of not giving more than half-a-crown; and how she had met Mr. Stucco riding through the village that morning, and how he pulled up his horse to speak to her, and a minute detail of the whole conversation. This, however, was a small defect to counterbalance daily hospitality, incessant attention to the real wants of the poor and sick of the village, and a heart at all times ready to feel for everybody's sorrows before her own.

"Mr. O'Connor? O'Connor?" she said, in answer to Eliza's question; "oh, I know. Is it possible, my dear Eliza, that you could have stood up to dance with any of that family?"

"Why, Mrs. Burke, what of them?"

"Why, independent of their being in very inferior circumstances, his father and your's, my dear, don't speak. Don't you know that the O'Connors laid claim to your estates, and were at one time thought to have a very good chance of gaining the cause?"

A feud between the sires!

"Besides this, William is a younger son, and without a penny but his pay as a navy officer. But if you wish to know everything about him, you can learn it at Mount Orient; he is a constant visitor there."

This information was at the same time satisfactory and embarrassing. Miss M'Orient was one of the squeezed oranges—one of the many friends whom Eliza had cannonaded with all her force upon their first acquaintance, with sweet billets of every shape and colour, oblong, triangular, blue, green, yellow, etc., and with professions of a deathless friendship, which had lasted fifteen weeks.

What was to be done? Mount Orient must be pacified. Miss O'Brien went home; she called for the gardener, and bade him fill a little basket of peaches and nectarines; she added a garland blended of the olive and the rose, and penned a pretty note on paper of the constant blue, embossed with shamrocks, and sealed with green wax, motto—Je ne change qu'en mourant, which was so exactly in point. In the note she delicately upbraided Miss M'Orient with neglect—hoped it was not occasioned by her forming some new attachment, at least on their side of the human species—reminded her that—

"Friendship, like Love, is but a name, Unless to one you stint the flame;"

and concluded by hoping that she might have the happiness to find Mimosa at home on the following day.

The embassy was graciously received. Setting out early after breakfast Miss O'Brien had the good fortune to find brother and sister at home. They knew Mr. O'Connor perfectly well, and Eliza had the satisfaction of learning that he was their constant visitor. The acquaintance commenced at the sessions hall was here continued long. Miss O'Brien had many reasons for encouraging the attentions of Mr. O'Connor, independent of the personal merits of that gentleman; he was precisely the person, of all others, whom her father would have least approved as a suitor to his child. He was likewise a younger son, and destitute of all but his commission, and the hopes it gave him; accordingly their acquaintance proceeded by rapid strides to intimacy. And here we would gladly terminate the career of our heroine, but it is necessary to show the full extent of folly of which even well-intentioned minds are capable when they know no government except their own. The voracious adage that "he who is his own master has a fool for his scholar," was amply illustrated in the sequel of Eliza's story.

On the morning after the anniversary of the skirmish, which the good Major took care to celebrate with all appropriate splendour, he entered the library of Drumshambo Hall, for the purpose of making the intended proposal to his daughter. He was surprised to perceive that she did not meet him with her accustomed gaiety. There was an appearance of care upon her cheek, and she had altogether the look of a person who had just received some disagreeable tidings.

Miss O'Brien remained sitting at the table, with her work before her; while the Major paced to and fro, between the window and the door, as if to consider in what form he might best convey the information he desired to communicate.

"Eliza," he said at length, "lay aside your work a moment. I have something of importance to say to you."

It might be quite natural, that such a sentence coming in this solemn way from a father to his child should call the blood into her cheeks, and make her tremble with confusion; so the Major did not seem to notice Eliza's agitation.

"You must be sensible," said he, "that, as dear as your society has always been to me, your happiness is still dearer; that has been my favourite object from your childhood, and I feel pleasure now in telling you that an opportunity has arrived of showing you that I prefer it to my own enjoyment."

Eliza could only bow. Was it possible her father could have earned the whole?

"I think, Eliza, you cannot yourself be at a loss to guess what I allude to. The attentions you have long received were too marked to have escaped your notice."

He knows some, thought Eliza, but not all.

"I confess, sir," she said in a trembling voice, and with the tears gushing to her eyes, "that I have received attentions, which I could not mistake."

"Well, well, there's no necessity to whimper about it, I know it—surely, you do not think me blind. Well then, I can only tell you, that this day week I received proposals from that quarter, which it will be your business to consider more than mine."

"Dear, dear papa, your goodness overpowers me—"

"Hey! what goodness, child? What does she mean?"

"Forgive me," cried Eliza, bursting into tears, and extending her clasped hands, in a deprecating attitude.

"Why, what a plague ails the girl! For what should I forgive you?"

"I did not dare to hope, sir, that you would honour it with your approval."

"Oh, yes—yes—but I do, though, and think it a highly desirable union, I assure you; his family is one of the most ancient in the kingdom, and though his circumstances may not be fully equal to his birth, your own fortune, my dear, will warrant you in overlooking such a trifle."

"Dear father," exclaimed Eliza, "this is beyond my hopes."

"Well, very well, if it is, do be quiet, and have done making attitudes, and pray, hear what I have to say. He will be here this evening in person, to follow up his proposals to me, by addressing himself to you; and, as I supposed you would not have many objections to offer—"

"Dear father—"

"We have taken the liberty of already settling the day between us; on Tuesday it shall be. I intend giving a dinner to the tenants on the occasion, and something of a fête. Poor fellows! We landlords—Irish landlords in particular, seldom think of calling them to a share in our enjoyments, and yet who deserve it better? Poor fellows! little fêtes of this kind, soberly, yet gaily conducted, tend to keep them from the fight and the ale-house, and bind their hearts more closely to their masters, than even more solid benefits; so, as I said, we'll have the wedding fête on Tuesday, after the ceremony. For the first year, you remain at Drumshambo Hall; we will afterwards begin to talk of your removal to Strawberry Cottage?"

"To Strawberry Cottage, sir?"

"Ay, girl, where else?"

"Why, that is Mr. Courtenay's cottage's, sir!"

"And of whom, in the name of reason, are we speaking, but of Mr. Courtenay, my son-in-law that is to be?"

"Mr. Courtenay, your son-in-law!" cried Eliza, faintly.

"Eliza, you are utterly incomprehensible; you cannot hear nor speak a word, without some ridiculous foolery of voice or manner; I have told you now what has been put in progress for your happiness, and I hope you will give it your best consideration. I am going over to pay a visit at Mizen Lodge, and I expect to find you rational on my return."

Miss O'Brien had the presence of mind to suppress all further signs of disappointment, and suffered her father to depart in silence.

It happened on this very day, that Lieutenant Beauchamp, of Mizen Lodge, had to contend with much anxiety of mind. He had married early in life a worthy young woman, sister to Major O'Brien, who died a few years since, leaving him the father of sixteen children, all daughters, with the solitary exception of the youngest, who was not yet able to walk. It may be imagined what a change this was to the poor lieutenant, who, in addition to stern, integrity, and complete disciplinarian habits, had a profound and unflattering distrust of the sex.

"A parcel of giddy, giggling hussys," he pronounced them, "whom it was impossible to impress with any serious thought; a set of ricketty small craft, neither good for metal nor ballast; without the understanding to direct them right, if they had the will; and without the will if they had the understanding."

By the assistance of Miss Beauchamp, now grown up, and sleepless vigilance on his own part, he had, however, hitherto succeeded in keeping his house in peace. The young Beauchamps were indeed, as it happened, as good, considering all circumstances, as any in the neighbourhood; noisy, perhaps, and a little inclined to romp, when their father was out of the way; but good-natured and pleasant, and without the least thought of harm that ever was. The worthy lieutenant was not so sure of this, that he suffered his vigilance for an instant to be lulled to sleep.

It happened one day that, in prowling about the house, his eye lighted on a torn piece of note, which he saw to be in the handwriting of his eldest daughter; it was directed to a female acquaintance, but nothing remained except the conclusion, which was in the following words:

"I shall anxiously expect your answer on to-morrow evening before I betake myself to the abode of Morpheus."

"Tuesday."

"Ever your affectionate

"AMELIA BEAUCHAMP."

A classical education was not amongst the advantages for which the good lieutenant had to thank the guardians of his childhood. The falling of a thunderbolt, could not have astounded him one-tenth so much as this unblushing epistle. He held it for some moments in his hand—re-perused it—gathered his grisly brows, and seemed absolutely petrified with astonishment.

"The abode of Morpheus!" he repeated slowly; to-morrow evening, that's this evening—hum!—and Amelia, too! But, never mind! I'll keel-haul that fellow, whoever he is—I'll be on the qui vive with that hero!"

He called the servant.

"Tom, come hither."

Tom obeyed.

"Do you know," with a piercing glance, "a gentleman of the name of Morpheus?"

"Sorra Mr. Murphy I know, sir."

"Did you see any fellow skulking about the place this time back?"

"Eyeh, wisha, is it I, sir? sorra one did I see."

"Well, look you—I am stepping over to the village—load the blunderbuss—all the fire-arms, and leave the house-dog without his food. I'll pepper that fellow—I'll worry him—I'll teach him to come haunting Mizen Lodge. The abode of Morpheus! An impudent scoundrel! Put plenty of slugs into the blunderbuss. I'll send that fellow home with work for the doctor about him—never mind."

He strolled into the village, where he made many inquiries, in a cautious way, with respect to the person named in his daughter's note, but no one could satisfy him. Mr. Morpheus? Morpheus? There was no such gentleman about that neighbourhood. Was he anything to the Murphys of Prospect Hill? No one could give him any information.

Returning to his house, he was met at the hall-door by Amelia (who was really an excellent girl, though somewhat given, like most young ladies fresh from school, to romantic turns of speech, and to crossing letters). She advanced towards him, as usual, with a skip and smile, and was about to lay her hand upon his shoulder.

"Go—go, madam!" he said, in a furious voice. "A rope's end would be fitter for you than anything else."

Amelia opened her innocent mouth in wonder.

"Come in here," he continued, seizing her wrist; "I'll teach you to betake yourself to the abode of Mr. Murphy."

"Me, papa! me betake myself!"

"Ah, madam, you may squall yourself hoarse as a south-wester, while I have it in black and white, and with your own name to in and under your own hand. Come in here, I say; I will find you something else to do."

"I declare, papa," cried Amelia, sobbing bitterly, "I don't even know what you mean."

"I know what I mean myself, and that's sufficient. Ah, you that I confided in beyond all others; fie, fie! shame on you, miss, shame on you! I was wrong to think there was one of ye that could be trusted; a pretty example this to younger sisters—go in there to your chamber, miss. A great deal I give for those tears—they are no signs of repentance; you cry because I have found you out. I'll pepper that gentleman to-night, I warrant you."

He locked her chamber door upon her as he spoke, and put the key into his pocket.

"Go along to your rooms," he said to the multitude of female Beauchamps of all sizes who thronged about him at the sound of Amelia's voice, as a flock of sheep huddle together to see one of their species expire beneath the butcher's knife. "Did you know anything of this Mr. Morpheus?"

All clamorously declared their innocence.

"Well, go to your rooms; your turn may come hereafter."

He had scarcely taken off his hat when he beheld the Major and Adam Dobe riding up the little avenue. The former was surprised to find his brother-in-law with the appearance of perplexity and heaviness on his countenance. But his concern was mixed with a certain degree of triumph when the Lieutenant let him know that the cause of his chagrin was a piece of misconduct in Amelia.

"Well, brother," said he, with a serious look, "you will give me credit for being in the right at length; I told you it was not safe to keep too hard a hand upon these young people. Do you remember our little conversation about Eliza? she has never, before nor since, given me a moment's inquietude of mind."

The Lieutenant looked downward with a forlorn aspect.

"But what is it Amelia can have done?" said Major O'Brien; "nothing very culpable, I hope? I remember at the skirmish of Drumshambo—"

The Lieutenant put a scrap of note into his hand.

"Read there," said he, "and judge for yourself."

The Major laid the note on his knee, while he took out his spectacles, and put them on.

"Well," said he, "and what of this?"

"What of it! can you not see? Do you know anything of a Mr. Morpheus?"

"Mr. who?"

"Mr. Morpheus. Don't you see, she talks of betaking herself to the abode of a Mr. Morpheus? Do you laugh at that? But it is no laughing matter; I'll have a blunderbuss well filled, and old Tearcoat waiting for him to-night at the yard gate. Do you make a joke of that? he'll find it no joke, I promise you."

"My good brother," said the Major, "you are under a mistake. This Morpheus is nothing more than the ancient heathen god of sleep, and Amelia, in saying she should betake herself to the abode of Morpheus, meant only in a pretty style to say that she intended going to rest for the night. If this be all the ground of your uneasiness, you may set your mind at rest."

Though much relieved by this explanation, the Lieutenant was not satisfied until the Major sent for Lempriere's dictionary, and showed him the name and genealogy of his domestic foe.

"Well," said he, "I am better pleased at this than a pension. I'll let the poor girl out."

While he was passing through the hall, with this pacific intention, he was met by one of the servants, with a letter for Major O'Brien. It had been left, he said, at the "Harp and Shamrock," only a few minutes since, and Mr. Hifle, not knowing but it might contain some important matter, had sent a boy with it in the direction which the Major had been seen to take about an hour before. It was from Eliza, and ran as follows:

"MY DEAR PAPA,

"The conversation which we had this morning leaves me but one course to take; I have already cast my earthly lot. Forgive me if I say, that my fear to meet your anger compels me to another step, which you may probably condemn no less than that which has for ever fixed my earthly destiny—

"Though tempests round me gather,
I'll meet the raging of the skies,
But not an angry father."

If you should ask why I feel the necessity of a separation which, believe me, rends my very heart-strings while I write, I can only answer in the words of the simple-minded Desdemona—

"I do perceive here a divided duty;
To you I am bound for life and education;
My life and education both do learn me
How to respect you; you are the lord of duty,
I am hitherto your daughter. But here's my husband;
And so much duty as my mother showed
To you, preferring you before her father,
So much I challenge that I may profess
Due to—"

Mr. William O'Connor, of whose family I believe you have some knowledge. Haste, my dear father, compels me to be brief. Adieu! Accept, for the past, my love and gratitude—for the future—

"Once more adieu!

"ELIZA O'CONNOR."

At the conclusion of this epistle, which the unhappy Major put into his hand, the Lieutenant gave a long whistle.

"Upon my word," said he, "a very shrewd, sensible, business-like letter. She'll make a notable mistress of a house, there can be no doubt."

The poor Major sat in a chair, utterly overwhelmed with affliction, his gray head resting on his hand, and the fingers pressing on his eyes, as if to prevent the tears from starting. His brother-in-law was much tempted to make use of this occurrence (so mal-a-propos to the recent boast of Eliza's docility) in order to enforce the superiority of his own principles; but a moment's glance at the Major showed that such a triumph would be barbarous. The latter could not speak a word. After a considerable time he called for a glass of water, bade Adam Dobe to get the horses ready, and left the lodge in silence.

A NEGLECTED BRANCH OF IRISH INDUSTRY.

Every fact relative to the manufacturing and commercial interests of Ireland possesses a national importance, we are induced to avail ourselves of some recently-published statistics relative to linen and calico-printing in this country, for the purpose of giving our readers an insight into the history of those important branches of Irish industry. With respect to the history of calico-printing in Ireland, it would appear that very little is known concerning it. We have no record in what precise year the first Irish print-works were established, or whether the trade commenced in Leinster or Ulster. It is most probable that the former province had the merit of originating the trade in Ireland. From all the information that our authority has been able to glean, it would appear that Dublin and its neighbourhood were, perhaps, the earliest seats of it. The abundance of pure water there offered every facility for bleaching purposes, and, accordingly, we find that about the year 1770, an attempt to bleach and print cotton goods, was made at a place a few miles from the city. The business increased rapidly, and, in the course of a few years, several persons had embarked in the trade near Dublin. The goods manufactured were not exported, but sold in the city of Dublin, where the more fancy kind of them were held in great esteem. In the year 1780, there was a large establishment combining bleach-fields and print-works, at a place called Prosperous, county Kildare. There was also a small one then near the city of Cork. The trade had extended considerably about Dublin, and had assumed importance enough to attract the attention of the Irish Parliament, with the view of legislating for its protection. It was suffering from the competition of English master calico-printers, who had found in Ireland a ready market for their goods, which they were enabled to sell at prices much lower than those at which the Irish printers could afford to sell them. The Dublin manufacturers were greatly alarmed at the consequences likely to ensue to the trade, if such a state of things were allowed to continue, and they boldly appealed to their Parliament, in College-green, for protection. The result was, that an act was passed in 1782, imposing a duty of one shilling per yard upon all printed calico imported into Ireland. This was ample protection, and the measure was hailed as a great boon by the Irish calico-printers, who had now a monopoly in their own markets. In the same year (1782), Ireland exported nearly nine thousand pounds of cotton yarn to England, and in 1784 she was able, for the first time, to export cotton yarn and printed goods to America, to the value of £8,000.

In consequence of this protection to Ireland the English manufactures were virtually shut out from the Irish market. They were alike suffering from Irish legislation, and from an oppressive law passed against them in their own Parliament in London. This is a curious historical fact. Whilst the Irish Parliament was anxious to promote cotton or calico printing in Ireland, the English Parliament was decidedly opposed to the trade in England. It set its face against it in all its branches. For instance, in 1721, an act was passed prohibiting the people of England from wearing or selling cotton clothes. The cotton trade had been introduced, and it was feared by the legislators of the day that if it were encouraged the woollen and flax trades would be annihilated. Hence this prohibitive enactment.

In 1755, this act was repealed, and the cotton manufacture was declared lawful; but parties were permitted only to engage in it on condition of paying three-pence per square yard of duty on all cotton goods "printed, painted, or stamped with colours." These were the words of the act. It was, then, in the face of this law that the English manufacturers were sending their printed goods into Ireland, when the Irish act of 1782 was passed. In England machines were extensively used for printing calicoes and cotton, notwithstanding the great opposition given to them by the block-printers, whose formidable combinations struck terror into the hearts of the manufacturers. The latter aimed at quantity rather than quality, and the price of goods was greatly lowered by the operations of the machines. Extensive houses not unfrequently had large stocks on hands, upon which a duty of three-pence per yard had been paid for two or three years, without being able to effect sales. One great English house, which gave employment to 20,000 persons in 1790, suffered frightfully from over-stocking. It commenced business on a capital of £130,000, and in the course of a few years failed in £1,500,000.

Coming down to the year 1800, we find that there were then in Dublin and its vicinity, eleven houses engaged—some of them extensively—in the calico and linen-printing trade. At Stratford, in the county Kildare, there was also a large establishment carried on by a Mr. Orr, who began the business there in 1790. In 1809 there were some fourteen or fifteen houses in the trade in and about Dublin. Mr. Duffy had a large and prosperous concern at Ball's-bridge, Mr. Burton had one at Island-bridge, and there was a third at Harold's-cross. Mr. Patrick Dillon carried on business at Donnybrook, and Messrs. Anderson and Son, were in Love-lane, in the city of Dublin. There were likewise extensive concerns at Palmerstown and Rathgar. In fact, the trade had very much increased, in Dublin especially, and was of importance, not only in regard to the amount of capital invested in it, but also on account of the large number of people to whom it gave employment. The goods printed were, for the most part, exported to the United States, and South America, but there was a large home trade done at the same time. The cloth was hand-loom woven, and the prints were of the best description of chintzes, varying from four to nine colours. Block-printers were paid at the rate of a shilling per piece of twenty yards. Most of the extensive Dublin houses had printing machines in use, as early as 1800, some of which were wrought by hand, and some by water-power. In the year 1820, Mr. Duffy, of Ball's-bridge, gave employment to some ten or twelve engravers, and at the present time there is not in Ireland an engraver supported by the trade of any one house. Mr. Duffy had employed four surface and four cylinder machines capable of doing from one to six colours, and had in addition, upwards of one hundred block printers, at work, each of whom could then earn about twenty-eight shillings per week.

In the early part of the present century, the calico-printing trade very much increased, as may be inferred from the fact that in 1812 the houses engaged in it in Dublin and its vicinity numbered upwards of twenty. In Cork, in 1814, there were some four or five houses engaged in it, and doing a good business. At Island-bridge, in 1826, the establishment changed proprietors. Mr. Burton, who held it from 1809, gave place to Mr. William Henry, an enterprising gentleman, who pushed the trade with great energy and skill. He printed for the London market, where it is affirmed he sold his muslins at about a guinea a piece profit. He wrought chiefly in blacks and purples, and printed on what was called "tape muslins," giving employment to 140 block printers, and six cylinder machines. Altogether, there were about 500 hands daily at work in his concern, which was broken up in the year 1845.

In 1830, the trade was greatly on the decline, there being then only nine or ten houses employed in it, in Dublin and its vicinity. In the course of a few years the number had decreased, and went on getting "small by degrees and beautifully less," until 1850, when the last of the firms ceased to exist. In the north of Ireland block-printing on a small scale was attempted, it is supposed, as early as 1765; but there is no printed record of which we know anything to establish this as a fact. The only thing certain in regard to the time when it did commence is, that, in the year 1770, Mr. Nicholas Grimshaw, an Englishman, laid the foundation for the trade which still maintains itself in the neighbourhood of Belfast. He opened a print-works on a small scale at Greencastle, employing only some three or four block-printers; but he persevered, and increased in business satisfactorily. He carried on there for fifteen years, and then removed to Whitehouse, which offered greater advantages to him in his trade. At Whitehouse the block-printing trade, so far at least as he was concerned, was in a promising state. He opened that place with about one hundred block-tables, and continued to do a prosperous business. Several men were employed on the premises to execute designs, but the great proportion of the patterns in use came from England. Travellers from London came round two or three times a year to solicit orders, and by this means there was always a good variety of patterns on hands. The cloth on which the printing was done was what was called "linen warp and cotton weft." It was in use many years before calico was employed. As time wore on improvements were introduced into the trade. The ingredients employed in dyeing were principally vegetable matters. Chemistry, as applied to the print-works and bleach-fields, was very imperfectly known, and the immense resources of the mineral kingdom, now available for the purposes of the trade, were in a great measure undiscovered. In the early days of block-printing indigo was an invaluable colouring stuff. Blue and white were predominating colours in handkerchiefs and women's dresses. The pattern was printed on wax, and the cloth was then dipped in a blue vat. The wax preserved the part covered from the action of the indigo, and in this primitive manner were blue and white produced. About the year 1800 the chints pattern goods printed at Whitehouse sold at from 2s. 6d. to 5s. per yard, and now an article of a similar character can be bought at from 5d. to 10d. per yard. The first machine in the North for printing on cottons was introduced at Whitehouse, in 1810. It was turned by hand, and was looked upon by the block-printers as a great innovation. In two years after there were two machines, one flat-press, and sixty block-tables at work in the establishment. In order to encourage calico-printers to do their work with taste and skill when linen goods were employed, the Irish Linen Board offered premiums to the most deserving. Mr. Grimshaw carried off the premiums on several occasions. He distributed the money among the workmen in his concern, and the effect of that was to make the men more exact and particular in the execution of the work. All the cloth used was bleached on the premises, the supply of water being then particularly good. In 1824, the year after the duty had been taken off cotton goods exported from England and Scotland to Ireland, and when free trade in cotton was fairly established, the business transacted at Whitehouse was considerable. The goods printed were chiefly for exportation to America and Mexico. Other houses in Belfast were doing increased business also; but there was a general feeling of doubt pervading master printers, and the workmen too, that a reaction would soon come, as the result of free trade, and destroy the business in this country. In 1828, we find Mr. Thomas Grimshaw proprietor of the works at Whitehouse. In that year there were four cylinder machines and one surface machine at work in the establishment, besides seventy block-tables; and in 1835, there were eighty-five tables and six machines in operation. The trade was then very brisk, and continued to be so until 1836, when cotton and linen printing here ceased entirely, and the establishment was converted into a flax-spinning one.

The manufacture of cotton was unknown in the north of Ireland until the year 1777, when the first attempt at it was made in Belfast. From an exceedingly valuable work, by Mr. Hugh McCall, entitled "Our Staple Manufactures," we learn that the merit of introducing there the manufacture of cotton is to be ascribed to a Mr. Robert Joy, who resided in Belfast, in 1777. This gentleman, it appears, had been on a tour in Scotland, where he saw the importance of the trade; and, believing it could be carried on successfully in the Athens of Ireland, commenced there, in conjunction with a Mr. Thomas McCabe, cotton-spinning eighty-four years ago. They, at first, essayed manual labour, but it was found that the yarn was so unskillfully spun that it did not answer the purpose, and they were obliged to abandon the experiment, and employ machinery. At this period (1777) the entire population of Belfast was only about 12,000; according to the census taken last year it exceeds seventy-six thousand!

The cotton trade was commenced in the counties of Wicklow and Kildare, as far back as 1750. In 1770, the manufacture of cotton yarn and cotton hose was carried on briskly in Balbriggan, which is still noted for its beautiful specimens of hosiery.

As an illustration of the esteem in which Irish manufactures were "once upon a time" held in England, to say nothing of their Continental repute, we may cite an instance not generally known, evidencing the universal use of Irish cloth in England at an early period—that of Henry IV., in 1410. It is on genuine documentary record that this monarch gave a royal grant of tolls, for the purpose of paving the town of Cambridge, in which, among other articles, Irish cloth is taxed at the rate of twopences per hundred. The grant, "De Villa Cantabrigie Pavementa," will be found in Rymer's "Fodera." Now, the manufactures of Ireland are but the "baseless fabric of a vision;" the wrack may be seen in deserted squares, in massive but tenantless edifices; in poverty, hunger, and dirt.

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XX.

HE Mellons had long sought a tutor for the hope of the family—Master Arthur. On the recommendation of Mr. Henry Faversham, they were at last prevailed upon to give Mr. Clifton a trial. Clifton had his private reasons for accepting the post. Arthur, therefore, was now in the hands of a tutor:—a poor—very poor gentleman. This poor young gentleman had not immediately succeeded the nursery governess. There had been two or three tutors of this young idea—between the above sensible young lady and the actual director of Arthur's young mind. They had left for various reasons. One had declined to be treated no better than the butler:—another—a young lady, had been disgusted by the advances of Mrs. Mellon's brother. But the poor governess! Her story is that to which we would fain point the earnest attention of the reader, in due time and fit place. For the moment, we must remain with Arthur Mellon and his tutor Mr. Clifton—they got on very well; throughout the morning they read together—Clifton explaining the difficult passages of Latin and Greek authors to Arthur; while Arthur bit the end of his pen; and pretended to be perfectly clear on the point. Then, mathematics were gone into—Clifton generally writing a love-letter while his pupil was busy at his work. And then a conversation ensued, in the course of which the tutor was supposed to inculcate moral precepts. The conversations that actually took place, were hardly of a nature to satisfy the severe scruples of Mellon senior; or the transcendentalism of his wife.

"I tell you what it is, boy," Clifton would observe, as he completed the caricature of a man and dear friend upon the blotting paper before him—"you are much too forward. I shall really have to take you down a peg or two, or tell your governor. A boy of your age smoking—it's preposterous!"

"Well, I've put it out," retorted Arthur. "It was a very mild one. Besides, there are heaps of pastilles upon the mantel-piece. By the way, there is some sherry in the cupboard. Will you have a glass?"

"A thimble-full," replied the tutor.

"I told Clara Faversham, last night, that you said she was a pretty girl," said Arthur, as he produced the wine.

"The deuce you did, you young scamp," retorted the young gentleman's mental adviser.

"Then, you deserve to have your neck broken. What did she say?"

"Oh! she only laughed, and said it was like your impudence."

Mr. Clifton was not a little pleased by this revelation, and, silently, resolved to make a note of it. In the first place, his family was much older than that of the Mellons; in the second place, although he had no money, he had a good social position. His quarters (which he didn't care about himself) were surely worth her fortune.

"Well, Arthur, she was not offended—you are certain?"

"Not she," replied that exceedingly knowing young gentleman of thirteen, "she rather liked it."

"Well, she is pretty, my boy, and that's the truth of it. I cannot help repeating it. But mind, you young rascal, no repeating this."

But Master Arthur Mellon instinctively knew that his tutor would be in no serious degree annoyed if he imparted to Miss Faversham this second expression of Mr. Clifton's admiration. He knew also that the communication would not be distasteful to the young lady. He took advantage, therefore, of a walk in the square inclosure to say to Clara Faversham—the pretty, dainty, mocking Clara—that Mr. Clifton had felt it impossible to repress his admiration. The young rascal's chubby cheek was saucily patted by Clara's little hand in reproof. And he was called "a forward boy," and desired never again to repeat Mr. Clifton's impudence.

While this conversation was going forward within the enclosure, Mr. Clifton was passing along on the road-side of the railings.

"By George!" exclaimed the pupil, "there is Clifton," and as he said this, he sprang to the gate to stop him.

Before Clara could politely turn away, the tutor was talking to his charge in a most becoming manner, and had raised his hat to the young lady. Arthur looked knowingly at Clara, then equally knowingly at Clifton. Clara's eyes sought the gravel walk, and "the summer" rose in her cheek a sweet and heaven too for a sunrise.

Clifton managed to say that it was a fine afternoon, and Clara contrived to intimate her assent. It was a relief to both of them when Faversham, having warned his charge to look well to his studies in the evening, lifted his hat to his goddess, and passed on.

Arthur was mightily amused at the interview. He laughed at Clara, and vowed that she was "as red as a turkey-cock," (boys are not generally nice in their comparisons). He said that he had never seen Clifton look so sheepish.

"Be quiet, you bad boy—do," said Clara, in the utmost confusion. "Why, on earth should you think I was embarrassed by your tutor? Why, my dear Arthur, we are perfect strangers. Hold your tongue—do, sir, and talk on some more rational subject, or, I declare, I'll box your ears."

To see Clara trying hard to look vexed, was a pretty picture. The forehead wrinkled, but the eyes laughed.

"By George! though," soliloquised Mr. Clifton, as he proceeded in the direction of the Adelphi, where he was to meet a friend; "by George, she is prettier than ever. The little forehead, white as snow, giving a sharp outline to that sun-kissed hair, the white chin supporting that mouth exquisitely cut, and tender-tinted as a shell, those eyes to which deep lashes give a perpetual dream, and then that elastic, supple, graceful, lively figure—yes, by George! she is one of the prettiest girls I've ever seen in my life. Walking, too, with that idiotic boy, I'm coaching! Well, such is life, to make an original remark. I—I suppose she'll marry some old swell with one foot in the grave and the other in a back parlour. Why should she care two-pence for me? Girls now-a-days marry to have a house, receive the attention of their friends, put their children out to nurse, outdo Mrs. —, who lives next door in finery, and read the last new novel in peace. By Jove! that little mouth would bite at nothing coarser than a partridge. Those dainty feet were made to lie in an exquisite carriage, upon the skin of the royal leopard. That neck was formed for emeralds and pearls, and that head to find a graceful age under marabout feathers. The pretty creature wants these little necessities, as the humming-bird wants the burning sun. Shall I, then, because when I lifted my hat to her, she blushed—step in between her and her happiness? No—I should be a sorry rascal. She has enough to help another's fortune, but not to divide her own. If she married me, I should take four at least, of the side dishes from her table every day. I should represent the loss of her second carriage, the suppression of their servants, the elevation of the opera box from the second to the third tier. Still, there's no doubt at all about it, she is foundedly pretty."

These remarkable reflections, and Mr. Clifton's legs carried this gentleman to the chambers of his friend.

"How are you, Pontifex?" said Clifton, as Mr. P. opened his door, and discovered his proportions draped in a dressing-gown marvellously coloured. "Give us, there's a good fellow, a bottle of soda-water. Shall I ring? I've seen, by Jove, the prettiest girl in Europe. Where are the pipes?"

"How goes the work, Arthur?" said Clifton, on the following morning, to his pupil. "You get on very slowly. You know I shall certainly have a row with your governor, if you don't pay a little more attention. A joke's a joke."

Arthur blundered on with his reading, paying very little attention to his tutor's corrections, for he was conscious of his power over the teacher.

"How Clara blushed when she met you yesterday, said Arthur, suddenly breaking off from his reading.

"Come, go on; never mind yesterday," Clifton retorted, for he was somewhat confused himself, now, and did not care to let his pupil enjoy the advantage of perceiving his weakness. Arthur returned to his book, read a few lines, then broke again into the interesting subject:

"I asked her if she thought you were good-looking."

"You impudent young monkey," replied Mr. Clifton. "Come, go on—"

"She said she thought you were very gentlemanly," continued Arthur, perceiving clearly the pleasure he was giving.

"Gentlemanly, eh?" replied Clifton, now fairly entrapped. "Is that all she said?"

"She didn't say much more, I can tell you, for I chaffed because she blushed, and then she got all the redder, and then she boxed my ears!"

"Does she often walk in the square?" Clifton enquired.

"That's good!" roared Arthur, as he burst into a violent fit of laughter, which the anger of his tutor could not check, even with the threat of a "sound thrashing."

"Why, yes, nearly every day," Arthur said, when he had recovered his equanimity. "If you like, we'll take our books there some morning, and then you'll be sure to see us."

"You're a sad young dog, Arthur," responded his tutor. "What on earth you'll be when you're twenty, I dare not say. Now for the Greek. This isn't work."

At this moment the street-door was closed rather sharply. Arthur started up and ran to the window.

"There goes Clara," said he, "with Tip!"

"Who's Tip?"

"Why, mamma's dog. He's so fat that when he rolls over on his back upon the rug, mamma has to ring for the servant to turn him back upon his feet. Suppose we go, and read under the trees?"

The idea was obviously pleasant to Mr. Clifton, but he hesitated. He hardly cared to be seen, the tutor of young Mellon, patiently doing his work. To him there was no dignity in the teacher. He had been bred to learn that gentility was the essential of life, wanting which, no man should care to live. He had mixed, all his life, with cultivated people. He had hobbled and nobbed with earls and marquesses at college. He had been taught to regard himself as a man destined to take a high place in the world's esteem. He had seen ladies, far above Clara in station, if not in fortune, without having felt his inferiority. His ancestors bore mighty banners in the front of bloody war, when Mellon's progenitors were tilling the soil of their lord and master, and now their poor descendant of the noble took gold of the vassal's prosperous kindred. A gentle voice whispered to him, from the depths of splendid libraries, and pointing to the glorious roll of genius, that to teach is to pursue the most honourable—the most noble of all callings. But the world—and he lived in the world—laughed the sentiment to scorn. All his sound sense was worsted in the argument. Still he would have the courage to hold his position even while, as he wrongly conceived, he was the vassal of Mellon senior. He took his hat bade Arthur take up the Greek and Latin authors they were studying, and went boldly forth with an exulting pupil at his side.

Clara was sitting under a broad chesnut tree, her face shaded by a plain gipsy hat, reading. With one finger pressed against her glowing cheek, and a tender arm leaning upon the gnarled rustic seat, she appeared to be buried in some scene of thrilling interest—some climax in the fortunes of the hero and heroine. Were they, in the rich recess of some curtained room, with the ancestral park spread out nobly before them under the splendid influence of a setting sun, drinking, for the first time, the deep sweets of a first love avowal, or were they parting for the last time, at the park-gates? Any way, Clara was intently interested, and never raised her eyes from her book till Arthur and his tutor were close to her.

It was wrong, undoubtedly wrong, in Mr. Clifton to use his pupil's studies as a subterfuge. If he felt an interest in Clara, he should have waited his time, and then, in a fair opportunity, he might have manfully avowed his passion. But he should not have drawn young Arthur into this exercise of a naturally deceitful disposition; he who was hired to make the boy a pattern of every virtue under the sun, for the modest sum of £100 per annum. The young scamp was only too ready to take advantage of the tutor's weakness, and the tutor was only too glad to concede the advantage. This is human enough. Clifton was convinced that here was his sole chance of seeing the young lady, on reasonably intimate terms. His vocation alone was against him; and he could hope to bear down its influence, only when the being to be acted upon was away from drawing-rooms, and under the influence of romance. That Clifton was romantic he knew full well. Arthur had told him that she admired "Vivian Grey," and that she had read "Nouville Heloise." The young lady knew Byron by heart (except, of course, the passages no young lady should read) and had even written some indignation verses against Lady Clara Vere de Vere. Here was very ample ground to work upon—ground that, in the possession of Clifton, would be turned to excellent account.

Clara's eyes parted from the entrancing page, and met those of Mr. Clifton, but were quickly turned upon Arthur. A bright glow came upon the young girl's face, and she dashed into a thousand questions about Mrs. Mellon's hour for the drive in the park, about her canary, about the dog at her side. Her eyes did not turn again willingly upon the tutor, till he spoke.

"Arthur has persuaded me, Miss Faversham," said Clifton, presently, "to allow him to read to-day under the trees. It will not disturb you. Come, Arthur, let us find a shady place." And Clifton, raising his hat, moved along the path.

"Wait a minute!" exclaimed Arthur, who had taken the dog's collar off, and could not fasten it. "Here's a go, I cannot get it on again."

"You tiresome boy!" said Clara. "How I should like to be called a tiresome boy, by those lips," thought Clifton. "You never will leave the dog alone."

To see the little fingers of Miss Faversham busy about the collar was a pretty sight—the prettier, because they were so unsuccessful at their work. It was a patent collar: and did a lady ever understand a patent? Mr. Clifton looked on, and as the young lady waxed impatient, and petulantly exclaimed "dear! dear me," after every failure, felt that he ought to offer his services. To any other young lady he would have offered his more solid fingers, a long time since.

How small, how microscopic, he felt then, when Miss Faversham, holding forth the collar, shook back her overhanging curls, and said sweetly, "Perhaps, Mr. Clifton, you could manage it for me?"

The dog remained—happy dog (thought Clifton, if he had self-possession enough left, to have an idea) upon Clara's lap. And as Clifton leaned over to adjust the collar, the curls of the young lady almost touched his hands; Clara, who had forgotten—really and truly forgotten to remove the dog, was now horribly embarrassed by the proximity of the tutor. Arthur saw her confusion, and laughed outright when he perceived that his tutor, too, had actually an unusual quantity of blood in his face.

"I am afraid we have very rudely interrupted your reading," said Clifton, when he had fastened the collar, (the operation was not sufficiently difficult in his wonderful opinion.)

"By no means," replied Clara, "the book is not very interesting."

"Might I ask the title?"

"It is 'Gertrude, or Love at First Sight,' was the reply, accompanied by an irrepressible titter.

"The subject, at any rate, is interesting," said bold Mr. Clifton. Clifton was hazarding too much. We can in no way commend him for his generalship on this point of the attack; a touch of indifference, is a wonderful improvement to the ordinary tactics of courtship.

CARLINGFORD ABBEY.

THE above engraving gives a correct idea of the picturesque ruins of Carlingford Abbey, which was situated on the eastern side of the town, and whose long aisle and central belfry, being of the pointed architecture of the fourteenth century, would naturally place the date of its erection about that period. It is said to have been built by Richard, Earl of Ulster. The scenery in this direction is of a very interesting description. In proceeding towards the little town of Carlingford, from Newry, the road to which lies along the water's edge, nothing can exceed the grandeur and beauty of the prospect.

KILTEEL CASTLE.

In the above sketch is represented the ruins of one of those monuments of antiquity which, in the olden time, were looked upon as the glory of this our Emerald Isle, but which are now fast falling into decay, and which, but for individuals possessing national spirit, would, in a few years, be altogether forgotten that they had ever existed. And this is one way in which we think this journal well calculated to subserve the interests of Ireland, by giving "a local habitation and a name" to some of those ancient buildings which lie scattered over the country, and which the hand of time is fast levelling with the dust.

Kiltel Castle, the subject of our sketch, lies about four miles from the village of Rathcool, and fourteen from Dublin, branching off to the left of the Naas road.

It is questionable whether the tower (which now forms part of the castle, and serves as a staircase to the interior) is not one of the many specimens of those mysterious edifices which are to be found in various parts of Ireland, usually denominated Round Towers; from the circumstance of there being the remains of an old Abbey and church near to the site, as also an ancient stone cross, (in a tolerable state of preservation,) standing in the garden immediately adjoining. The ascent to what were the several floors of the castle, is by stone steps, in the Round Tower, sixty in number, varying from seven to nine inches in depth.

The remains of the Abbey are, at present, unimposing; and, with the exception of the gable and ruined doorway, nothing but low and ragged bits of the early walls are left.

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRIFFIN.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE day following was (as the reader has already been made aware) the Eha-na-Shaun, or the Eve of St. John's Day, a festival which is celebrated in Ireland with peculiar devotion. The people have a number of traditions current among them, relative to the origin of many of the ceremonies peculiar to this vigil (one of the most remarkable of which latter is, the lighting up of fires on the mountains, and, indeed, in all parts of the country about even-fall—the appearance of which on this night occasioned so much terror to the Coiner). It is believed by some that the ceremony is nothing more than a relic of the idolatrous worship of the aborigines of the soil—while a greater number of the peasantry suppose that they commemorate by those nocturnal illuminations, a general massacre of the ancient enemies of the land, the unfortunate Danes, who were (as the cottage historians assert) all slaughtered one fine summer evening (the signal for the general uprising of the oppressed natives being a number of beacon fires, lighted on every hill, hillock, mount, and mountain throughout the country)—and who have left no other memorial of their deadly purchased conquest in the still unsubdued, though often conquered island—than the ruined lish, or fort, through whose woody covering the night wind sighs above their bones—or the mouldered and almost rust-eaten coin that is thrown up by the blaster or quarrier in the lonely regions of the inland—to furnish matter of speculation to some pantalooned and spectacled antiquarian of the R. I. A., or Dublin Society.

The fires had already been lighted on the fields adjacent to Drumsanlon, when Lilly Byrne, having discharged, as was her never-failing custom, all her household duties to the very letter—given the servants their dinner—cut out the slim-cake for the evening—set some milk in a saucer for the cat—counted all the linen into the press—seen the ducks, hens, and chickens fed—the cows milked—the dairy set in order—the garden-gate locked—the butter printed—the mouse-traps baited—and the dough set by the fire—when Lilly Byrne, having discharged, we say, all those duties, sat in her chamber making her little preparations with an aching heart, at her toilet, to perform a cheerful part among a small family tea-party, who were invited to spend the evening at Drumsanlon.

Poor Lilly's toilet was not now a matter of very excessive labour or concern to her. She was careful to omit nothing in the adjustment of her dress (a simple suit of mourning) which the general custom of the time rendered absolutely necessary to prevent the appearance of affectation or a disrespectful singularity; but no adornment that a positive feeling of duty did not point out to her, was any longer used. Human motive was now fatally quelled within her bosom, and she no longer felt those little struggles between her love for things "lawful though dangerous," and her fears of secret vanity, which had given rise to nearly all the trials of her girlish virtue, when there was a reason why she should look to good advantage in other eyes than her own. She rejected, therefore, the fine jet necklace which her mother had left upon her table, and contented herself with the plain silk ribbon and black cross which lay near it, in one of the little recesses of her dressing-box.

In loitering among the now neglected trinkets which were thrown together in the casket, she removed a piece of paper, folded, and marked on the outside in her own handwriting (as if by the way of index to the contents), with the initials "R. K." Those contents were a song adapted by her lover to one of the old ballad airs of the country, which Lilly had often sung to her harpsichord, when the young gentleman was not present, for she was far too scrupulous to flatter his vanity at any time by letting him hear how she honoured it.

The recollection of the circumstances under which Kumba had placed these verses in her hand, threw Lilly into a train of feeling which would have been dangerous to her resolution of meeting her mother's friends with a gay spirit becoming the occasion—had not her meditations been interrupted by the slight pressure of that mother's hand upon her neck, as she leaned forward in her chair.

"Well, Lilly, my love, will you not come down? The company are waiting, and Mrs. Hasset has been asking for you no less than three times. What! you have been crying again, I declare! Well, then! O then, to be sure, now, Lilly!"

"Ah, mother, do not blame me. It is not for the Robert Kumba that is now wholly abandoned to low courses, I weep, but for him who was so kind, so generous, so amiable, so feeling! Do not think that any degree either of hope or discontent mingles with my regret. I look upon myself, on the contrary, as one who has been providentially delivered from a veiled and certain danger. Neither," she added, as she observed her mother's eyes glisten and fill, "neither have I given up all hope even of this world's happiness. Can it be criminal, mother, in me to suffer such a hope to mingle with those which are fixed where they cannot change or darken? Was it criminal in me, just now, when I knelt before the Almighty, to offer up a tear and prayer for him; and to indulge the belief (illusive perhaps) that even at that moment my sorrow might have found its way to the throne of heaven, and that some single pang, some misfortune, some threatened danger, might have been spared to my once-loved friend in mercy to my agony?"

The reader, who has accompanied Kumba through the events of this day, might perhaps have told Lilly a secret on this subject.

"I will own, mother," she continued, after a pause, while the afflicted old lady endeavoured, by caresses and entreaties, to console her, "that it cost me some struggles, and was a long while before I brought myself to make the sacrifice of myself entirely thus—and if I do not deceive my own heart—if indeed it is made, I have no merit in it—for it seems to me to be only the pressure of repeated disappointments in my fondest wishes, that has at last conquered my obstinate will. You think me melancholy, now, mother," she added, smiling with real cheerfulness, as she looked into the eyes of her parent, "but indeed I am not. I do not," she continued, smiling yet more gaily, and hesitating a little, while she laid her finger on a borrowed volume of the letters of a celebrated and titled authoress, which were then creating a general sensation in England, (a sensation that time has little diminished)—"I do not, at present at least, feel that mortification which this lady expresses at growing wiser every day, and seeing, like Solomon, the vanity of all temporal concerns. And is not that a great deal? Come, mother, you shall see that I can be happy in spite of my own peevish wishes," and passing her handkerchief over her thin, white, and wasted, but light and pleasant countenance, she paused one moment with clasped hands on the threshold of the door, and moved her lips, as if to solicit an increase of contentment and resignation; after which she breathed one short sigh as a last tribute to the dominion of melancholy for the evening, and quietly followed her mother.

One very brief but painful struggle only she had to endure, when first the sounds of merriment broke upon her now unaccustomed ear. It was the first time that any number of friends (for relatives only, and those a few, were invited) had met in that apartment since those two dear ones had been lost to the circle. Another vigorous exertion, however, enabled our little heroine to recover her self-possession.

There are few trials which the resigned spirit has to encounter, more distressing than to find its fortitude mistaken for real, positive happiness. Those who feel their constitution sapped and shaken by some chronic disease, know how dreary a thing it is to be congratulated by a friend on their good looks—clapped on the shoulder—and told that they are better than ever they were in their life; while the secret malady is silently eating away the foundation of their existence within, and reminding them, perhaps, at the very instant that they make a ghastly effort to correspond with the gay and smiling countenance of their well-wisher—reminding them, by a new pang, of the deadly certainty of their doom. Although Lilly Byrne had long since compelled herself to refrain in all instances from any act, word, or look, which had no other object than that of attracting pity to her sufferings (contenting herself, according to the precept of her religion, with having the Being that visited her with these for their only witness)—still she could not help feeling a certain blank and dismal solitariness of spirit when her friends all rose and crowded round her as she entered, smiling, pressing her hand, and congratulating her on her merry looks—when Mrs. Hasset, a rather subordinate relative of the family, took her seat in Robert Kumba's old place, on the chintz-covered settee, and laughed, and shook her head, and "knew" it would not last, so she did! "Time did wonders," the old Lilly slyly insinuated; and though it was very true that—

"Love is longer than the way,
Love is deeper than the sea;

yet even the sea itself would run dry at last if the rivers were cut off—and it would be a very long way indeed, that did not come to an end or a turning, at any rate [this word was pronounced with a very roguish emphasis] at some time or another. Lilly would forget it all before she was twice married. There was Mrs. Blaney, mother to the Blaneys of the Hill, some of whom were there, sitting opposite her—who went on just in the same way as Lilly, when she was slighted by her first lover; nobody thought she'd ever recover again, and see there she was now, the mother of a set of fine young men as any in the three counties; and the grandmother of that little fat girl that sat, looking shily round upon the company. So let Lilly not be down about it—for she had only to set her cap at the right side of her head, to win a better offer than she had lost the last trick."

Although Lilly endured all this martyrdom without a single look or even wilful thought of impatience, we should accord her a degree of fortitude, perhaps beyond the reach of sympathy or truth, if we said that she did not feel inexpressibly relieved when the entrance of the tea diverted the worthy Mrs. Hasset's attention from her and her sorrows. While the good lady was occupied in bestowing her admiration on the transparency of the immense china bowl—the delicacy and shortness of the slim-cake—discussing the respective merits of the Cork and Limerick groceries—(Uncle Cuthbert and herself having always a dispute on this subject whenever they met)—and deploring the economy of some neighbouring family who never brought out tea to their visitors at luncheon, a practice which the novelty of the beverage in those days made fashionable in the country parts of Ireland—Lilly stole on to a group of grown girls who were gathered around the little Blaney above mentioned, some on their knees before her—others leaning on the back of her chair, and all joining in a request that she would give them a song.

When Lilly Byrne approached her she looked with a timid smile from beneath her brow, and said—"I'll sing if you bid me, I will."

"I do, then, my little darling," said Lilly, kissing her.

The girl then plucked up courage, and chanted with a tremulous little pipe, a piece of nursery nanby-pamby, which ran as follows:—

"What are little boys made of—made of?
What are little boys made of?
Of snips and snails
And puppy-dog's tails—
That's what little boys are made of!

What are little girls made of—made of?
What are little girls made of?
Of sugar and spice,
And all that's nice—
That's what little girls are made of!"

Before the murmurs of approbation and encouragement had subsided—and while Mrs. Hassett was declaring that the "wee" songstress had a fine clear voice and a very good ear, and ought not to be neglected, the latter ran over to Lilly, and throwing herself into her lap, looked up in her eyes and said, in her little brogue, "If you please, I call on oo for a song, now."

"What song, my love?"

"The song you know yourself about 'Old times,' you know."

Lilly had as lief, for certain reasons, that her young friend had spoken of some other song—but seating herself immediately at her harpsichord, she complied with great sweetness. We happen to have a copy of the stanzas in our possession:—

"Old times! old times! the gay old times
When I was young and free,
And heard the merry Easter chimes
Under the sally tree.
My Sunday palm beside me placed—
My cross upon my hand—
A heart at rest within my breast,
And sunshine on the land!
Old times! old times!

It is not that my fortunes flee,
Nor that my cheek is pale—
I mourn whene'er I think of thee,
My darling native vale!—
A wiser head I have, I know,
Than when I loitered there—
But in my wisdom there is woe,
And in my knowledge, care.
Old times! old times!

I've lived to know my share of joy,
To feel my share of pain—
To learn that friendship's self can cloy,
To love and love in vain—
To feel a pang and wear a smile,
To tire of other climes—
To like my own unhappy isle,
And sing the gay old times!
Old times! old times!

And sure the land is nothing changed,
The birds are singing still;
The flowers are springing where we ranged,
There's sunshine on the hill!
The sally, waving o'er my head,
Still sweetly shades my frame—
But ah, those happy days are fled,
And I am not the same!
Old times! old times!

Oh, come again, ye merry times!
Sweet, sunny, fresh, and calm—

And let me hear those Easter chimes,
And wear my Sunday palm.
If I could cry away mine eyes
My tears would flow in vain—
If I could waste my heart in sighs,
They'd never come again!
Old times! old times!

"Very well! Sweetly sung indeed, Lilly," said Mrs. Hassett—"but I think you used to sing it with more spirit long ago. The last time I heard you, I believe, was when—"

"Oh! no matter when, ma'am," said Lilly, laughing off the frightful reminiscence that the worthy old lady was about to blunder upon in her honest, plain way; "but I must use my privilege." And, wishing to stop the good woman's tongue in one way by employing it another, a stratagem which she was the more induced to adopt as she knew that the very shortest of Mrs. Hassett's songs would consume a considerable portion of the evening, she flung her mantle in turn to that lady.

Mrs. Hassett's little melody completely disinclined the company from any farther amusement in the vocal way, the more especially as the night had fallen in the meanwhile, and the darkness was so great by the time she had wound up the history of "The Lady of Skin and Bone," that the company could no longer discern each other's faces.

"Lilly, my love, I think it would be almost time to get the candles," said Mrs. Byrne.

"How suddenly the night fell!" said Mrs. Hassett. "It looks as if we were to have a storm, and I brought nothing but my patens and cloak."

"Oh, we can manage that very well," said Mrs. Byrne. "Well, Lilly, what about the candles?"

"I told James to get them ready an hour since, mother."

"Ring the bell for him, my dear."

Lilly did so.

"I don't know what keeps our uncle Cuthbert so late," said Mrs. Byrne; "he was to have been here before now. We had all such laughing at him the other morning about a bargain he made; with whom, guess?"

"Oh, indeed, I heard of it—Maney Mac O'Neill, the gold-finder. That was a pretty business."

"He went off with two of the sub-sheriff's men this morning to look for the fellow. Eh? Heaven preserve us! Was not that lightning?"

"Oh, no; it was but the flashing of the candle-light from the hall upon the tea-things."

"But there's no candle-light in the hall, mother, said Lilly, "or 'twould be here before now. I wonder why James doesn't answer the bell."

"I'll be bound," said Mrs. Byrne, "he's gone out to look at the bonfires on the furze-hill. Will you run down and see what keeps him, Lilly? and take care now not to hurt yourself with the bad step at the foot of the stairs, as you're in the dark."

Lilly left the room, closing the door behind her.

Immediately after, the distant muttering of the thunder placed Mrs. Byrne's conjecture out of the reach of all doubt. The conversation of the company became hushed and broken, and confined altogether to observations on the effect of the change.

The door again opened and shut.

"Well, Lilly, where are the candles?" said Mrs. Byrne. "Is James below?"

There was no answer. "Who was it came in?" said Mrs. Byrne. "Ah, come now, Lilly—no tricks, if you please. This is no time for joking. Why don't you answer, girl?"

The handle of the door again turned—and again it was shut fast.

"Bless me!" exclaimed one of the young ladies, starting from her chair and clasping Mrs. Hassett's shoulder.

"What's the matter, you foolish child?"

"Oh, ma'am," the girl replied, panting with fear, "I—I don't know—but something brushed close by me."

"Pooh!—nonsense!" said Mrs. Byrne, peevishly. "Well, Lilly, my lady," she added gaily, while her heart failed her, "I'll pay you for this. You're a pretty girl, to oblige me to leave my guests."

So saying, Mrs. Byrne left the room, the guests remaining hushed in an anxiety which their hostess's affected levity did not at all tend to alleviate.

In a few minutes, Mrs. Byrne re-entered with a light—her countenance being moved with an expression between vexation and real terror.

"I beg your pardon," she said, hurriedly, "but I see this girl is determined to play the fool to-night. She has hid herself somewhere or other," she added, forcing herself to believe what her heart and her knowledge of Lilly's character ought to have prevented her admitting for an instant.

They all proceeded to search the house. The hall door was found open—the wind and rain driving in, and wetting the large arm chairs that were placed beneath the hat-racks. But Lilly was nowhere to be seen.

The silence, the suddenness of this disappearance, had something supernatural in it. It was a long time before the wretched mother would admit the reality of her misfortune, but when, at last, it burst upon her mind so forcibly as to break down all the opposition which her fears had raised against the conviction, the scene which Drumsacannon presented was such as no one, who had witnessed the quiet, social enjoyment of the family party an hour before, could possibly have anticipated—the guests hurrying to and fro, or standing still and staring on one another in silent astonishment, while the poor distracted hostess, forgetting all the ceremonies of her station, hastened from room to room, mingling her heavy screams of terror with the pealing of the thunder, and clasping her hands, with the action expressive of deep affliction which is so peculiar to her country.

The reader, however, can learn but little of the causes of this change by remaining to witness the affliction of the good old lady. We shall, therefore, once more, venture to pinion the wings of old Time, while we relate an incident that may assist in explaining them.

Mrs. Byrne evinced nothing more than an acquaintance with the character of her servant, James Mihil, when she supposed that he had been seduced into a neglect of his domestic duties on this evening, by a curiosity to witness and participate in the festivities of the Eha-na-Shaun. Having, as he imagined, completed all the offices which fell to his share, on the occasion, seen the party fairly established at tea—the griddle laid aside to cool—the turf-basket outside the parlour-door, replenished with good hard soda, broken small so as to take the fire kindly—the silver-plated candlesticks nicely polished, and set in order on the kitchen-table—so that if any unforeseen misfortune should detain him, Miss Lilly should have nothing more to do than to light them with the twisted touch-paper he had placed near them: having taken all these precautions, and, moreover, unlooped from the wall above his own settle-bed a small bottle of last Easter Sunday's holy water, which he preserved with an economical reverence, sprinkling his forehead with the consecrated liquid, and left the house, not without keeping a wary eye about him as he proceeded, lest some evil disposed spirit of the night should take him at an advantage.

Within a few hundred yards of the house, lay a large field, which was allotted to a few collop of cattle, as grazing ground, its extent being greatly disproportionate to the quantity of its herbage; a circumstance which was in some measure accounted for by the number of furze bushes which were scattered over it. The night was already dark, before James descended the earthen stile which led into the field—and the brilliancy of this little district in itself, made the gloom of the surrounding heavens still more dense and impenetrable. The bushes had been set on fire, at various corners of the field and were now crackling and blazing away with great fury. The herdsman of the farm and some of his retainers, with lighted faggots in their hands, were chasing the cows back and forward making them sometimes leap in their desperation over the flames, and burning the hair on their sides with their faggots—a practice which is supposed to avert the curse of barrenness in the herd. After exchanging a salutation and a few ready jokes with the men, James proceeded slowly, his hands behind his back and a broad grin of admiration on his features, towards the central bonfire of the field.

While he stood gazing on the blackened trunk and boughs of the burning shrub, the flame, as it were, hollowing out a dwelling for itself in the centre, while it left the green and blossomy texture overhead yet uninjured, his attention was attracted by the approach of two strange men, who seemed as if they had been exhausted by a long and rapid journey on foot. One of them was a tall, awkwardly built fellow, to whom James did not pay any particular attention; but on the other—a low, thin-faced lad, with the patched and corduroy trousers turned up on his bare legs—he could not avoid fixing his eyes, with a certain misgiving that he had seen the face under suspicious circumstances, somewhere or another, before. The usual greeting having passed between both parties—

"A smart evenen, sir," said the lesser of the two.

James accorded an assent.

"We made so bold, sir," he continued, very respectfully, "to step out of the high road—a bad night comen on—an' to ask lave, sir, to stand here, sir, be the fire, to take a hait o' de blaze agen the road, sir."

"You're kindly welcome," said James, "without sir-ring the likes o' me at all so much about it."

"Thanky, sir. Mac!"

"Aih?"

"Where's de dram-bottle? De jon'leman 'll give uz de liberty o' de fire for a while."

"Here's the bottle. Will you take a taste?"

"Why, den, dat I will so, you may take your bible oat of it. But, stay, aisy a mini!" [uncorking the flask, wiping the jole with the sleeve of his coat, and handing it most politely towards James, who continued eyeing him with great suspicion]—"may be you'd like to try what's inside of it, sir."

"No, no, we're obleest to you!" said James, waiving him off, with a degree of sullenness which he thought the freedom warranted.

The refusal did not appear to break the heart any more than it lessened the spirits of the stranger, who immediately took upon himself the task which James had declined, and performed it with evident satisfaction.

"I don't blame any man for liken his own best," said he, fixing his eyes, with a knowing leer, upon James's bottle.

"Oh, then, indeed you're out there, for all!" returned James, "I wasn't so fond o' meself, that way. Its only a drop o' somethen I brought with me, in case any thin bad would be there before me."

"Poh! sure 'tisn't to-night dey have any power at all, only Holland-tide, and the Inhiad-low-onthina?"

"Oh, iss, beggen your pardon, and to-night also"—said James, who piqued himself on being a kind of authority in all superstitious matters—"as I," he added with a mysterious nod, and compression of the lips and eye brows, "have good reason to know. 'To-nig' isn't so bad as Holland-tide for 'em, but still they do be there for all."

"I wonder who dey are dat do be dere at all."

"Various sorts, they say. The dhi na mauha people; that is, the fallen angels that was a'most lost formerly, and must remain that way, Heaven save the mark, 'till the day o' judgment, and more o' them the souls o' those that arn't bad enough for the great purgatory, and must be doen pincene that way upon the earth—wanderen over and hether, some without air a head on 'em, and more this way an' that, until their time is expired, and others of 'em that arn't buried in consecrated ground, and more that has debts upon their souls, an' things that way."

"See what it is why!" replied the stranger, who had sidled closer up to the speaker, and before James had power to enforce the moral of his anecdote, he found himself on the flat of his back—a great bundle of hay stuffed into his mouth, so as nearly to smother him, while the foolish-looking fellow whipt out of his pocket the key of the hall-door. He could neither stir nor groan.

"Drag him o' one side out of the light," said the latter—"the boys are laying the field. Let us get into the dark until they pass. Cry out, sir, if you like, Pigs may whistle, but they have very ugly mouths for it."

They moved on, and James had the cruel mortification to see the herdsman and his companions saunter slowly along within fifty yards of them, towards their own homes—making some observations on the change which was just beginning to take place in the night. They loitered an instant about the fire, where James and his unwelcome visitors had been standing—held out their hands as a hissing sound in the circle of flame led them to suppose that the rain had already commenced—and then walked off and disappeared in the darkness, to seek a remedy in the luxury of slumber, for the weariness of the evening's pastime. James felt his heart die away within him, as their voices grew faint in the distance, for, always disposed to overrate any peril in which he happened to be placed, he thought he had no further chance of deliverance from the blood-hounds into whose hands he had fallen.

"Here is the key, Awney," said the taller of the men; "now where are you to meet Suil Dhuv?"

"Here, dis way—near to the path, down the field—so that the horses won't miss us. Drag this gomeril after us."

While they were hauling the poor unresisting James along the ground, in that fashion which Teague, in the Committee, calls an Irish sedan, the thunder-storm commenced in good earnest—and the sound of horses' hoofs ringing against the hard field, was heard plainly, at a distance which rapidly diminished.

"Here dey come!" said Awney; "he told me to be before him an' try a trick o' dis kind. Little he thought we'd have it doon so aisy."

At the same instant the four horsemen whom they expected, came on at full speed, and bolted upon the footman at so perilous a proximity before they reined up, that the foremost animal sunk his hoof deep into the soil within an inch of the head of the prostrate domestic, who was unable, even by a groan, to make them aware of his danger.

"Who's there? Maney? Farrel? Well? what have you done?"

"Whist? Coom down o' your horse, and see!"

Suil Dhuv dismounted.

"Ay, well done! Awney," said he, when the latter had put him in possession of the whole of their proceedings—"Now, let me see! My lads, which of you knows Drumsacanon house?"

"I remember every twist and turn of it, said Awney, "since I gev de letter dat night to this nat'el on de ground." James groaned in heart at the recollection.

"Very well, Awney—since I have got the key, I will require little assistance. So do you, lads, ride hard and fast over the commons, to the Carrig-on-dhiol, for fear we miss the other prize. They must have foundered by this time."

Mun Maher and his two companions rode off, seemingly well contented.

"Maney," continued the Coiner, "take the reins of my horse, and stand close to your prisoner. And now Awney, the key, and follow me! If anything should happen, Maney, you know our signal."

They went off together towards the house, leaving James in a state of mind which may possibly be guessed at, when we say that the very gentlest idea he had of their intentions was, that they were about to set fire to the dwelling, and rob and murder every individual they found under its roof.

THE CREATION OF THE SUN.

WHEN did the Sun ascend into the Heaven,
Monarch of day! Creation's beaming eye!
Upward he rose, in spherèd majesty,
Through clouds of vermeil vapour, widely riven;
And power, and glory, were unto him given;
And earth sent up unto his throne on high
The mists of morn, as incense, joyously;
And the pale breathings of the purple even.
He looked upon the mountains on that day,
The first accendant morning of his birth;
They doffed their cloudy crowns to hail his sway,
And the hills kindled to their heart with mirth;
Ocean, the many-voiced, heav'd in wild play,
And smil'd as gaily as the laughing earth.

WHAT IS A HUSBAND? He is, said a married lady, a snarling, crusty, sullen, testy, froward, cross, gruff, moody, crabbed, snappish, tart, splenetic, surly, brutish, fierce, dry, morose, waspish, curriah, boorish, fretful, peevish, huffish, sulky, touchy, fractious, rugged, blustering, captious, ill-natured, rusty, churlish, growling, maundering, uppish, stern, grating, frumpish, humorsome, envious dog in a manger, who neither eats himself, nor lets others others eat.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

VII.—MONGEVLIN CASTLE, COUNTY DONEGAL.

ONGEVLIN Castle, the subject of the prefixed engraving, is situated in the county of Donegal, on the banks of the Foyle, about seven miles from Londonderry, and one from the village of St. Johnstown. It is thus mentioned in Captain Pynnar's Survey of the Escheated Counties of Ulster, in 1619:—"Sir John Stewart hath thrice thousand acres, called Cashell, Hetin, and Littergull. Upon this proportion there is built, at Magevlin, a very strong Castle, with a flanker at each corner."

The walls of the court-yard and gate-way, erected between the Foyle and the Castle, were standing till within a few years ago. A small stone flag, with the following inscription, was built in the arch:

I. S.
E. S. T.
1619.

This stone has been lost, but another remains, bearing the following inscription:—"The Hon. Elizabeth Hamilton, daughter of John, Lord Culpeper, and widow of Colonel James Hamilton, (who lost his life at sea, in Spain, in the service of his king and country,) purchased this manor, and annexed it to the opposite estate of the family, which paternal estate itself has improved by her prudent management, to nearly the yearly income of the dower she received thereout. She hath also settled her younger son, William Hamilton, Esq., in an estate acquired in England, of nearly equal value in the purchase to this, and given every one of her numerous offspring, descended from both branches, some considerable mark of her parental care. Her eldest son, James, Earl of Abercorn, and Viscount Strabane, hath caused this inscription to be placed here for the information of her posterity. Anno 1704."

James II. stopped here for a short time during the siege of Derry; and from this place he sent proposals of surrender to the garrison, by his host, Archdeacon Hamilton.

In connection with the history of Mongevlin Castle, the fertile imagination of the peasantry has conjured up many legends. They are, however, but "airy nothings," having not the slightest foundation of truth, either as regards the events depicted, or the actors concerned.

The Earl of Abercorn derives the title of Baron Mountcastle, from Mount Castle, county Tyrone, at one period an edifice of very considerable extent, but of which the above engraving represents all that now remains. It is supposed to have been erected in the early part of the seventeenth century. Adjacent to the ruins is a fine prospect of the surrounding country; which presents that variety of appearance, hill and dale, mountain and valley, which invariably characterizes the province of Ulster. To the west is seen the river Foyle, winding through the rich and well-cultivated parish of Clonleigh, with the numerous fine plantations and snug farm-houses appearing on its banks; and the prospect is bounded, in that direction, by the mountains of Donegal, appearing dim and indistinct in the far distant horizon.

THE LAKE OF THE LOVERS.

A LEGEND OF LEITRIM.

HOW many lovely spots in this our beautiful county are never embraced within those pilgrimages after the picturesque, which numbers periodically undertake, rather to see what is known to many, and therefore should be so them, than to visit nature, for her own sweet sake, in her more devious and undistinguished haunts! For my part, I am well pleased that the case stands thus. I love to think that I am treading upon ground unsullied by the footsteps of the now numerous tribe of mere professional peripatetics—that my eyes are wandering over scenery, the freshness of which has been impaired by no transfer to the portfolio of the artist, or the tablets of the poetaster; that, save the scattered rustic residents, there is no human link to connect its memorials with the days of old, and, save their traditionary legends, no story to tell of its fortunes in ancient times. The sentiment is, no doubt, selfish as well as anti-utilitarian; but, then, I must add that it is only occasional, and will so far be pardoned by all who know how delightful it is to take refuge in the indulgent twilight of tradition from the rugged realities of recorded story. At all events, a ramble in any of our old and especially mountainous tracts, will rarely lack abundant aliment for his thus modified sense of beauty, sublimity, or antiquarian fascination; and scenes have unexpectedly opened upon me in the solitudes of the hills and lakes of some almost untrodden and altogether unwritten districts, that have had more power to stir my spirit than the lauded and typographed, the versified and pictured magnificence of Killarney, or of Cumberland, of Glendalough, or of Lomond. It may have been perverseness of taste, or the unfitness of mood, or the influence of circumstance, but I have been filled with a feeling of the beautiful when wandering among noteless and almost nameless localities to which I have been a stranger, when standing amid the most boasted beauties with the appliances of hand-book and of guide with appetite prepared, and sensibilities on the alert. It is, I suppose, partly because the power of beauty being relative, a high degree of expectancy requires a proportionate augmentation of excellence, and partly because the tincture of contrariety in our nature inclines us to enact the perverse critic, when called to be the involuntary votary. This, in common with many others, I have often felt more so than during a casual residence, some short time even among the little celebrated, and, therefore, perhaps a little charming, mountain scenery of the country, which either has been or might be, called Leitrim of the Lakes; for a tract more pleasantly diversified with well-set sheets of water, it would, I think, be difficult to name. Almost every hill you top has its still and solitary lake, and almost every amphitheatre you enter, encompasses its wild secluded lake—not seldom bearing on its placid bosom some islet, linked with the generations past, by monastic or castellated ruins, as its seclusion or its strength may have invited the world-wearied anchorite to contemplation, or the predatory chieftain to defence.

On such a remote and lonely spot I lately chanced to alight on the course of a long summer day's ramble, among the heights and hollows of that lofty range which for a considerable space abuts on the borders of Sligo and Roscommon. The ground was previously unknown to me, and with all the zeal which novelty and indefiniteness can impart, I started staff in hand with the early sun, and the mists had melted from the purple of their cloud-like summits, was drawing pure and balmy breath within the lonely magnitudes of the hills. About noon, as I was casting about for some eminently happy spot to fling my length for an hour or two's repose, I reached the crest of a long gradual ascent, that had been a time tempting me to look what lay beyond; and, surely enough, I found beauty sufficient to dissolve my weariness, had it been tenfold multiplied, and to allay my pulse, had it throbbed with the violence of fever. An oblong valley girdled a lovely lake on every side, here with precipitous impending cliffs, and there with grassy slopes of freshest emerald, that seemed to woo the dimpling waters to their loving margins, and, as if moved with a like impulse, the wavelets met the call with the gentle dalliance of their ebb and flow. A small wooded island, with its fringe of willows trailing in the water, stood about a furlong from the hither side, and in the heart of its tangled brake, my elevation enabled me to descry what I called the remnants of a ruin—for so far had it gone in its decay—here green, there gray, as the moss, the ivy, or the pallid stone-time, had happened to prevail. A wild duck, with its half-fledged clutch, floated fearless from its sedgy shore. More remote, a fisher heron stood motionless on a stone, intent on its expected prey, and the only other animated feature in the quiet scene was a fisherman who had just moored his little boat, and having settled his tackle, was slinging his basket on his arm, and turning upward in the direction where I lay. I watched the old man toiling up the ascent, and as he drew nigh, hailed him, as I could not suffer him to pass without learning at least the name, if it had one, of this minor Amhara. He readily complied, and, placing his fish-basket on the ground, seated himself beside it, not unwilling to recover his strength, and recruit his scanty stock of strength almost expended in the ascent. "We call it," said he, in answer to my query, "the Lake of the Lovers, or sometimes, to such as know the story, the Lake of the Lovers, after the two over whom the tombstone is placed upon yon mouldering walls. It is an old story. My grandfather told me, when a child, that he minded his grandfather telling it to him, and for anything he could say, it might have come down to me farther. Had I time, I'd be proud to tell it to your honour, we seem a stranger in these parts, for it's not over long; but I have to go to the Hall, and that's five long miles off, with my fish for dinner, and little time you'll say I have to spare, though it be a hill nearly all the way." It would have been too bad to allow such a well-met chronicler to pass unpumped, and, putting more faith in the attractions of my pocket than of my person, I produced or produced instant my luncheon-case and flask, and handing him a handsome half of the contents of the former, made pretty sure of his company for a time, by keeping the latter in my own possession until I got him regularly launched in the story, when, to quicken at once his recollection and his elocution, I treated him to an inspiring draught. When he had told his tale, he left me with many thanks for the refection; and I, descending to his boat, entered it, and with the aid of a broken oar contrived to scull myself over to the island, the scene of the final fortunes of Connor O'Rourke and Norah M'Diarmid, the faithful-hearted but evil-fated pair who were in some sort perpetuated in its name. There, in sooth, within the crumbled walls, was the gravestone which covered the dust of him the brave and her the beautiful; and seating myself on the fragment of a sculptured capital, that showed how elaborately reared the ruined edifice had been, I bethought me how poorly man's existence shows even beside the work of his own hands, and endeavoured for a time to make my thoughts run parallel with the history of this once-venerated but now forsaken, and, save by a few, forgotten structure; but finding myself fail in the attempt, settled my retrospect on that brief period wherein it was identified with the two departed lovers whose story I had just heard, and which, as I sat by their lowly sepulchre, I again repeated to myself.

This lake, as my informant told me, once formed a part of the boundary between the possessions of O'Rourke the Left-handed and M'Diarmid the Dark-faced, as they were respectively distinguished, two small rival chiefs, petty in property, but pre-eminent in passion, to whom a most magnificent mutual hatred had been from generations back "bequeathed from bleeding sire to son"—a legacy constantly swelled by accruing outrages, for their paramount pursuits were plotting each other's detriment or destruction, planning or parrying plundering inroads, inflicting or avenging injuries by open violence or secret subtlety, as seemed more likely to promote their purposes. At the name of an O'Rourke, M'Diarmid would clutch his battle-axe, and brandish it as if one of the detested clan were within its sweep; and his rival, nothing behind in hatred, would make the air echo to his deep-drawn imprecations on M'Diarmid and all his abominated breed, when anything like an opportunity was afforded him. Their retainers, of course, shared the same spirit of mutual abhorrence, exaggerated indeed, if that were possible, by their more frequent exposure to loss in cattle and in crops, for, as is wont to be the case, the cottage was inconspicuously ravaged when the stronghold was prudentially respected. O'Rourke had a son, an only one, who promised to sustain or even raise the reputation of the clan, for the youth knew not what it was to blanch before flesh and blood—his feet were ever foremost in the wolf-hunt, or the foray, and in agility, in valour, or in vigour, none within the compass of a long day's travel could stand in comparison with young Connor O'Rourke. Detestation of the M'Diarmids had been studiously instilled from infancy, of course; but although the youth's cheek would flush, and his heart beat high when any perilous adventure was the theme, yet, so far at least, it sprang more from the deadly hostility that thrilled in the pulses of his father and his followers. In the necessary intervals of forbearance, as in seed-time, harvest, or other brief breathing-spaces, he would follow the somewhat analogous and bracing pleasures of the chase; and often would the wolf or stag—for shaggy forests then clothed these bare and desert hills—fall before his spear or his dogs, as he fleetly urged the sport afoot. It chanced one evening that in the ardour of pursuit he had followed a tough, long-winded stag into the dangerous territory of M'Diarmid. The chase had taken to the water of the lake, and he with his dogs had plunged in after in the hope of heading it; but, having failed in this, and, in the hot flush of a hunter's blood, scorning to turn back, he pressed it till brought down within a few spear-casts of the M'Diarmid's dwelling. Proud of having killed his venison under the very nose of the latter, he turned homeward with rapid steps; for, the fire of the chase abated, he felt how fatal would be the discovery of his presence, and was thinking with complacency upon the wrath of the old chief on hearing of the contemptuous feat, when his eye was arrested by a white figure moving slowly in the shimmering mists of nightfall by the margin of the lake. Though insensible to the fear of what was carnal and of the earth, he was very far from being so to what savoured of the supernatural, and, with a slight ejaculation half of surprise and half of prayer, he was about changing his course to give it a wider berth, when his dogs espied it, and, recking little of the spiritual in its appearance bounded after it in pursuit. With a slight scream that proclaimed it feminine as well as human, the figure fled, and the youth had much to do both with legs and lungs to reach her in time to preserve her from the rough respect of his ungallant escort. Beautiful indignation lightened from the dark eyes and sat on the pouting lip of Norah M'Diarmid—for it was the chieftain's daughter—as she turned disdainfully towards him.

"Is it the bravery of an O'Rourke to hunt a woman with his dogs? Young chief, you stand upon the ground of M'Diarmid, and your name from the lips of her!"—she stopped, for she had time to glance again upon his features, and had no longer heart to upbraid one who owned a countenance so handsome and so gallant, so eloquent of embarrassment as well as admiration.

Her tone of asperity and wounded pride declined into a murmur of acquiescence as she hearkened to the apologies and deprecations of the youth, whose gallantry and feats had so often rung in her ears, though his person she had but casually seen, and his voice she had never before heard. The case stood similar with Connor. He had often listened to the praises of Norah's beauty; he had occasionally caught distant glimpses of her graceful figure; and the present sight, or after recollection, often mitigated his feelings to her hostile clan, and, to his advantage, the rugged old chief was generally associated with the lovely dark-eyed girl who was his only child.

Such being their respective feelings, what could be the result of their romantic rencounter? They were both young, generous children of nature, with hearts fraught with the unhackneyed feelings of youth and inexperience; they had drank in sentiment with the sublimities of their mountain homes, and were fitted for higher things than the vulgar interchange of animosity and contempt. Of this they soon were conscious, and they did not separate until the stars began to burn above them, and not even then, before they had made arrangements for at least another—one more secret interview. The islet possessed a beautiful fitness for their trysting place, as being accessible from either side, and little obnoxious to observation; and many a moonlight meeting—for the one was inevitably multiplied—had these children of hostile fathers, perchance on the very spot on which my eyes now rested, and the unbroken stillness around had echoed to their gladsome greetings or their faltering farewells. Neither dared to divulge an intercourse that would have stirred to frenzy the treasured rancour of their respective parents, each of whom would doubtless have preferred a connexion with a blackamoor—if such were then in circulation—to their doing such grievous despite to that ancient feud which, as an heirloom, had been transmitted from ancestors whose very names they scarcely knew. M'Diarmid, the Dark-faced, was at best but a gentle tiger even to his only child; and, though his stern cast-iron countenance would now and then relax beneath her artless blandishments, yet even with the lovely vision at his side, he would often grimly deplore that she had not been a son, to uphold the name and inherit the headship of the clan, which on his demise would probably pass from its lineal course; and when he heard of the bold bearing of the heir of O'Rourke, he thought he read therein the downfall of the M'Diarmids, when he their chief was gone. With such ill-smothered feelings of discontent he could not but in some measure repulse the filial regards of Norah, and thus the confiding submission that would have sprung to meet the endearments of his love, was gradually refused to the inconsistencies of his caprice; and the maiden, in her intercourse with her proscribed lover, rarely thought of her father, except as one from whom it should be diligently concealed.

But, unfortunately, this was not to be. One of the night marauders of his clan chanced, in an evil hour, to see Connor O'Rourke guiding his coracle to the island, and at the same time a cloaked female push cautiously from the opposite shore for the same spot. Surprised, he crouched among the fern till their landing and joyous greeting put all doubt of their friendly understanding to flight; and then, thinking only of revenge or ransom, the unsentimental scoundrel hurried round the lake to M'Diarmid, and informed him that the son of his mortal foe was within his reach. The old man leaped from his couch of rushes at the thrilling news, and, standing on his threshold, uttered a low gathering-cry, which speedily brought a dozen of his more immediate retainers to his presence. As he passed his daughter's apartment, he for the first time asked himself who can the woman be? and at the same moment almost casually glanced at Norah's chamber, to see that all there was quiet for the night. A shudder of vague terror ran through his sturdy frame as his eye fell on the low open window. He thrust in his head, but no sleeper drew breath within; he re-entered the house and called aloud upon his daughter, but the echo of her name was the only answer. A kern coming up put an end to the search, by telling that he had seen his young mistress walking down to the water's edge about an hour before, but that, as she had been in the habit of doing so by night, for some time past, he had thought but little of it. The odious truth was now revealed, and, trembling with the sudden gust of fury, the old chief with difficulty rushed to the lake, and, filling a couple of boats with his men, told them to pull for the honour of their name and for the head of the O'Rourke's first-born.

During this stormy prelude to a bloody drama, the doomed but unconscious Connor was sitting secure within the dilapidated chapel by the side of her whom he had won. Her quickened ear first caught the dip of the oar, and she told her lover; but he said it was the moaning of the night-breeze through the willows, or the ripple of the water among the stones, and went on with his gentle dalliance. A few minutes, however, and the shock of the keels upon the ground, the tread of many feet, and the no longer suppressed cries of the M'Diarmids, warned him to stand on his defence; and as he sprang from his seat to meet the call, the soft illumination of love was changed with fearful suddenness into the baleful fire of fierce hostility.

"My Norah, leave me; you may by chance be rudely treated in the scuffle."

The terrified but faithful girl fell upon his breast

"Connor, your fate is mine; hasten to your boat, if it be not yet too late."

An iron-shod hunting pole was his only weapon; and, using it with his right arm, while Norah hung upon his left, he sprang, without further parley, through an aperture in the wall, and made for the water. But his assailants were upon him, the M'Diarmid himself, with upraised battle-axe, at their head.

"Spare my father," faltered Norah; and Connor, with a mercifully directed stroke, only dashed the weapon from the old man's hand, and then, clearing a passage with a vigorous sweep, accompanied by the well-known charging cry, before which they had so often quailed, bounded through it to the water's brink. An instant, and with her who was now more than his second self, he was once more in his little boat; but, alas! it was aground, and so quickly fell the blows against him, that he dare not adventure to shove it off. Letting Norah slip from his hold, she sank backwards to the bottom of the boat, and then, with both arms free, he redoubled his efforts, and, after a short, but furious struggle, succeeded in getting the little skiff afloat. Maddened at the sight, the old chief rushed breast-deep into the water; but his right arm had been disabled by a casual blow, and his disheartened followers feared, under the circumstances, to come within range of that well-wielded club. But a crafty one among them had already seized on a safer and surer plan. He had clambered up an adjacent tree, armed with a heavy stone, and now stood on one of the branches above the devoted boat, and summoned him to yield, if he would not perish. The young chief's renewed exertions were his only answer.

"Let him escape, and your head shall pay for it," shouted the infuriated father.

The fellow hesitated. "My young mistress?"

"There are enough here to save her, if I will it. Down with the stone, or by the blood——"

He needed not to finish the sentence, for down at the word it came, striking helpless the youth's right arm, and shivering the frail timber of the boat, which filled at once, and all went down. For an instant an arm re-appeared, feebly beating the water in vain—it was the young chief's broken one: the other held his Norah in its embrace, as was seen by her white dress flaunting for a few moments on and above the troubled surface. The lake at this point was deep, and though there was a rush of the M'Diarmids towards it, yet in their confusion they were but awkward aids, and the fluttering ensign that marked the fatal spot had sunk before they reached it. The strength of Connor, disabled as he was by his broken limb, and trammelled by her from whom even the final struggle could not dis sever him, had failed; and with her he loved locked in his last embrace, they were, after a time, recovered from the water, and laid side by side upon the bank, in all their touching, though, alas, lifeless beauty! Remorse reached the rugged hearts even of those who had so ruthlessly dealt by them; and, as they looked on their goodly forms, thus cold and senseless by a common fate, the rudest felt that it would be an impious and unpardonable deed to do violence to their memory by the separation of that union which death itself had sanctified. Thus were they laid in one grave; and, strange as it may appear, their fathers, crushed and subdued, exhausted even of resentment by the overwhelming stroke—for nothing can quell the stubborn spirit like the extremity of sorrow—crossed their arms in amity over their remains, and grief wrought the reconciliation which even centuries of time, that great pacificator, had failed to do.

The western sun now warning me that the day was on the wane, I gave but another look to the time-worn tomb-stone, another sigh to the early doom of those whom it enclosed, and then, with a feeling of regret, again left the little island to its still, unshared, and pensive loneliness.

A NIGHT AT SEA.

CHAPTER III.

THIS it is, thought he, as he rode slowly toward the hall, to build upon the affection of a child. She has left me in my age. I never crossed her yet in any wish or impulse of her heart, and for that she has broken mine! Unthankful girl! Poor, fond, romantic fool! Beauchamp was right!

After all, they must be checked and sentinelled. What, gone? Drumshambo Hall will be lonesome now; for she never, never more shall cross the lintel of my threshold. Wed privately, and wed into that family, as if on purpose to add gall to her unfilial desertion. Ah! shame, shame, shame!

Riding to the village, he made inquiry at every house where she was in the habit of visiting. No one had seen her. Knock after knock was plied, and door after door was closed upon augmenting anguish. At the Harp and Shanrock alone he was enabled to obtain a trace. Mr. Hifle's suspicious lodger had set off in a postchaise that very day.

"He axed meself," said Jack, the stable-boy, looking frightened, "if I knew whether he could get plinty o' post horses betune this and Killarney, goin' be the new line o' road; an' I'm sure it's little I thought there was any hurt in me tellin' him he could."

"Under what designation," said Hifle, "did he importune you in regard o' the horses?"

"He toul't me," said Jack, "that he wanted them to be at the lake again to-morrow."

"I seen the gentleman myself," said a beggar, who had just then approached and leaned upon his crutch, to hear the conversation at the inn-door—"I seen him myself in a po-chay wit' a lady, an they dhruvin' for the bare life along the quarry road. The lady was in a black veil, and with crimson linin' to her cloak; but I couldn't see her face, for she was lookin' down."

The crimson lining was decisive. Major O'Brien returned to his home, to spend a night of shame and agony. Next day, the whole village was buzz-buzz from end to end. Nobody was surprised at what had happened. Everybody had foreseen it long before. Major O'Brien was more to be blamed than pitied for his weakness and indulgence. Mothers scolded their daughters, and daughters trembled to meet their fathers' eyes. Such an event had never before disgraced the annals of the village. The commotion was extraordinary. Many an innocent billet was that day consigned to the flames, while the fair subject of general consternation was wishing that the rattling of the carriage wheels could roll like thunder, and that its speed could emulate the lightning.

Meantime, the Lieutenant entered the parlour in which his daughters were, some reading, and some at play.

"Go to your books," he cried in a voice of thunder, "you bane of the creation! Here's a pretty piece of work to-day, with your cousin O'Brien. What's that you're reading, Miss? 'Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded.' Virtue fiddle-stick"—(flinging the book into the fire, and giving the fair reader such a hint as turned her ear the colour of a rose)—"these fellows are never so thoroughly mischievous as when they begin to prate of virtue. Novels, forsooth—let me catch a novel or poem at Mizen Lodge, from this day forward. One of these fellows is enough to poison a whole community. A set of idle, scribbling scoundrels, that should be pressed from first to last, or sent to the colonies. And what harm if it were men who read them, with whom such things pass in at one ear and out at another? But you, who have got wits instead of brains, where there is no trash so light and flimsy that it does not stick. Go to your books; and take care how I find a novel or a verse among them."

The ladies retired, and the Lieutenant went grumbling to his own apartment.

Mr. Courtenay was the only person who showed on this occasion a proper philosophical firmness. He exerted himself at first to discover whether the marriage had actually taken place, and on finding that the matter was past remedy, he very sensibly began to look around for some new quarter in which he might open a fresh battery of shrubs, visits, and exotics, with some prospect of success.

Major O'Brien, to the surprise of his daughter and of all their friends, was implacable exactly in proportion to his former indulgence. He gave Eliza her fortune, but refused to hold any communication whatever with the offending parties; so that after employing all the influence in their power to effect a reconciliation, they were obliged to give up, for the present, all hope of being able to attain it.

It was not till after the birth of her second child, that Mrs. O'Connor received any token of remembrance from her offended parent. In the mean time, experience, the great instructor of the heart, had taught her to feel all the imprudence of the step which she had taken. She did not know, herself, how strong was her attachment to her father and his home, until her long separation from both had let her into the secret. She could not have imagined that the former, who loved her from her infancy with so much tenderness, could persevere so resolutely in excluding her from his house, and his long-continued alienation began at last to prey upon her health and spirits. From this time forward, all her desires were turned to a reconciliation, and devoted as she was to her husband and her children, the want of peace between her heart and home excluded every other happiness. Her wishes, however, proved entirely vain; day after day went by, and no signs of hope appeared from Drumsambo Hall.

One autumn morning, Master Harmond O'Connor (for he was named after his grand-papa) not yet two years old, was playing at their cottage door. His little sister Nancy, who had made her appearance some months before, was lying in her mamma's arms, and listening, with great placidity, to words of fondness which she could not comprehend. Casting her eyes upon the avenue, what was Mrs. O'Connor's astonishment, to observe her father's veteran servant, Adam Dobe, riding leisurely up the walk. Did he come with terms of pardon from the hall? How her heart bounded at the thought! The faithful old soldier alighted at the sight of his young mistress, and seemed moved even to tears. He would never have been weary of looking at the children. He did bring a message from Major O'Brien, and a trying one to both parents. Without expressing any wish to see his daughter or her husband, he proposed that they should wholly resign into his hands young Harmond O'Connor, on whom he was willing to settle the inheritance which his mother had forfeited by her disobedience. The proposal was not to be refused. In the hope that it was only the commencement of a general peace, Mrs. O'Connor embraced her first-born, and with an aching heart beheld him depart for the hall with Adam Dobe.

Not hearing any more for several years either from her parent or her child, Eliza determined on making an effort to remind the former of the feelings with which he once regarded her. Her husband had been for a long time urging her to leave the neighbourhood, in which they could remain no longer with safety to the future circumstances of their still numerous family; and it was his anxiety to depart that screwed her courage to the attempt, which she could otherwise have hardly brought her mind to venture on. The incident may appear a very homely one, but it is too well known to our neighbours to be altered with impunity in any of its circumstances.

Major O'Brien (be it known to the universe) had, what is called at the dinner-tables of New Auburn, a partiality for fresh trout, which, when prepared under his daughter's superintendence, was indeed his favourite dish. One morning Mr. O'Connor brought in a fine one, which he had taken in our lake. The idea occurred to Mrs. O'Connor of sending it as a present to her father. Perhaps he would receive it! Perhaps the remembrance, all trifling as it was, the associations which it would awaken, might melt the iron heart, and make it run over with pity and forgiveness for his offending and repentant child. He might remember the time when he would not have tasted it if it had been prepared by any other hand, and he might long once more for the cheering voice, and bright and happy smile, that shed sunshine on their lonely meals. She fancied, while the tears rolled down her cheeks as she placed it in the neat willow-basket, between layers of the fresh grass, that she already saw the messenger returning with words of comfort and of love—that she heard her father's voice inviting her to come home and prepare the feast with which she had furnished him, to be once more his darling and the light of his old age.

When it was ready, Jacky Donovan, still as wild and as ragged as ever—a straw hat, without either leaf or crown, upon his head, and his feet unincumbered by either shoe or stocking, was charged with its conveyance to the hall.

"You need not tell him from whom it comes, you know," said Mrs. Connor, in a gentle tone, "until he asks you."

"Oh! I'll engage I won't, ma'am—not a word."

Major O'Brien was in the act of issuing from the hall-door when Jacky Donovan, with the basket in his hand, made his appearance on the gravel plot, and stood waiting at a respectful distance. The Major, who seemed, in the years that had passed since Miss O'Brien's departure, to have doubled all that went before, did not for a time observe him. His frame was dwindled down to an extraordinary thinness, his face and carriage had lost the blustering hilarity which was once their characteristic, and thought and care were evident in his looks, his movements, and the accent of his voice.

"Adam," he said, turning to the old servant who followed him from the hall, "take Mr. Harmond out to ride, and take care he doesn't get the reins into his own hands; no good ever came of that in any sense."

Adam Dobe withdrew.

"Come here, come here," the Major continued, beckoning the messenger with his cane; "what have you got in that basket? Hey! a trout—and a fine one too. No matter—cover it up—times are changed."

He leaned on his crutch, and gazed with a melancholy eye upon the ground. So long did the mournful reverie continue that Jack, who had too much shrewdness to interrupt it, was tired of kneeling by the basket, in which the speckled fish lay yet exposed.

"Hey! are you there yet?" cried the Major, suddenly awaking from his dream. "Take it away—take it away—I have no business of it."

"I thought your honour would take it," said the boy.

"Well—well, if you desire it, carry it into the house—though a mouthful of it would be heavier to me than lead; they'll find some use for it within, I dare say. Here—here's some money for you—"

"Oh, please your honour, I was bid not to take any money."

"Bid! why, who sent it then?"

Jack looked downward as if at a loss, then brought his tattered hat from behind his back, looked all round it as if he expected to find his answer written on it, and at length, restoring it to its former position, looked earnestly in the Major's face, and said:

"Why, then, 'twas one your honour knows well, an' that's Mrs. O'Connor."

The Major seemed stunned; he was affected by the incident, which he now thoroughly understood, and the cane trembled beneath his weight, as he endeavoured to suppress all appearance of emotion; but the mountain of hoarded anger in his breast was not to be displaced by a single shock. The stern and resentful mood returned at length, and waving his hand two or three times, with an air and tone that showed too plainly he was not to be prevailed upon, he said:

"Take it back to her—take it back."

When Eliza, who had spent the interval between praying and looking out for the return of her messenger, perceived that her present had been rejected, she sought her husband and said with a spirit-broken air:

"I am ready now to go with you where you please, for all hope is at an end; he has hardened his heart against us."

Soon after, without further incident, they left the neighbourhood, where they were neither seen nor heard of for more than a dozen years. Meanwhile, Major O'Brien, weary of his country residence, which he feared would grow at last too lonely for his resolution, went to reside in —, accompanied by his grandson.

It was on the twentieth birth-day of the latter, that a regatta was appointed to take place on the noble river which flowed through the city in which he dwelt. On the day before, the populous establishment of Mizen Lodge was thrown into commotion by the appearance of Nash, Mr. Harmond O'Connor's servant, with a note of invitation to young Henry Beauchamp, offering him a berth in the yacht, if he had any wish to see the sailing. Accordingly, he set out on the morning before the regatta, after being dressed up by half a score of his yet unmarried sisters, in the very zenith of the fashion. In spite of all his father's care, young Beauchamp had contracted a fault, which a single word may render familiar to the eyes and mind of every Irish reader. Before we mention that obnoxious word, it may be right to give him all his praise. He was an obedient son, and as attentive and gentlemanly in his deportment towards his sisters as if he were not their brother. He was cheerful, and unassuming in company—danced a quadrille with as much care as if he were discharging a duty—and he had, for aught his practice showed to the contrary, a religious and well regulated mind. But he had one fault—he was a country dandy—what the wits about our neighbourhood call "a very nice young gentleman, for a small tea-party." But with the exception of this fondness for an awkward imitation of city fashions, Henry Beauchamp had not a fault that you could name.

Behold him, then, with feelings of mounting anticipation, on the high road leading to the city, a spirited blood horse beneath him, and the prospect of an ardent welcome from his city friends to cheer him on the way. Behind him, in a lively compound of the footman and the sailor, rode Nash, Harmond O'Connor's servant, who had brought the invitation to Mizen Lodge.

"And so you say, Nash," said the youth, resting the knuckles of his right hand upon the knee, so as to let the elbow project with an air of sans souci, and the silk lash of the delicate riding whip ascend at angle of seventy-five above the horizon—"so you say yachting is all the fashion now in —?"

"Iss, sir," said Nash, gathering up his chin as he answered with a spruce and smart accent, "a new figary, sir, that has taken the jettlemen. Nobody is seen at a race-course now, sir, much less at a cock-fight. Not'n but a jot now, sir, goes down wit de jettlemen."

"And Mr. Harmond is very fond of it?"

"Iss, I declare, sir. Oh yes!—more especially since the other jettlemen, in compliment of his spirit in winning so many cups, made him one o' the stewards this year, in preference to people that thought themselves of greater consequence. I declare Mister Henry, I think he'd live and die aboard the jot. Tis the only fau't the Major has to lay to him, an' he does all he can to cure him, but to no purpose. He can't refuse him the money when Mister Harmond asks for it, although he's flinging it faster down the river than his grandfather ever received it. An' then as for books or business, or anything else, sorrow one ha'p'orth does he mind, high or low, since he took to the jotting. And what harm if it was only the expense, but he never goes aboard that the Major doesn't wish him good-bye, as if he was never to see him more. I declare, sir, sometimes, when he does be talkin' of the Erin, as he calls her, you'd think he was out of his mind. But there, Mr. Henry, there's the fleet an' all for you."

They had by this time arrived at the summit of a hill, from which a noble prospect opened on their view. Before them was the city, with its populous streets, its spires, and pinnacles. On one side was the spacious river, where a dozen vessels of pleasure, distinguished from the other shipping by their light and graceful equipment, were riding at anchor, with pennons flying at the masts and shrouds. The strand and quays adjoining were alive with boatmen, ship-carpenters, young gentlemen in blue frieze jackets and check shirts, superintending the workmen, in addition to the customary population of a city river-side. Giving a shake to his horse's reins at this animating sight, young Beauchamp trotted briskly forward. As he entered the city, his eye was caught by a placard posted against a dead wall, bearing the attractive title of the "— Regatta," and comprising Harmond O'Connor's name amongst the list of stewards. It was already noon, and the flags, from one extremity of the street to the other, were crowded with promenaders; young ladies in every fashion which had figured in the metropolis for the last five years, flanked by officers of the garrison in undress, or idle gentlemen of the town, seeming witty to all, perhaps, but those who were near enough to hear what they were saying. To Henry Beauchamp, who had spent all his life in the country, and knew no more of the city than what he had read in "Holinshed's Chronicles," there was little in the scene before him to correspond with his chivalrous historical associations, or with the records of Spartan valour, which are contained in the annals of the place, and which made him look on the inhabitants with a species of veneration, as if he expected to find a Kildare in every dandy, and a Margaret Fitzgerald under every Leghorn bonnet. Here a young gentleman, whose shape bore a nearer resemblance to a tailor's block than it did to the Apollo Belvedere, strode solitary and carefully down the street, as if he had been employed by the man of thimbles to exhibit an exquisite dress at so much per diem. Here another, with hat thrown gaily on one side, and a mass of hair sufficient for a helmet's crest on the other, turned laughing to a party of ladies, and switching his cane by his side remarked that "the sky seemed to threaten a change," with an air that made it appear to distant spectators as if he were giving utterance to one of the best things in the world. And here a conversation passed between a drawing-room window and an open carriage, which gave to the public a great deal more information concerning the affairs of the speakers, than they might have found in the mirror of fashion. Our "country dandy" viewed his brethren of the town with a species of consternation. He wore no ringlets—his bust was more the shape of a human being than of an inverted sugarloaf; he felt as if everybody's eyes were fixed upon himself, and every glance detected something ridiculous in his appearance. It was, therefore, with a feeling of relief that he alighted at a hall-door which bore the name of Major O'Brien, and gave his horse to Nash, while he intimated, by a modest knock, his desire to be admitted.

From this time every step, and every sight and smell, was a subject of amazement. Smell, we have said, for a marine store could scarcely have emitted an effluvia more strongly impregnated with the odour of pitch, tar, and resin, than did the fashionable residence of Major O'Brien. Adam Dobe, who, in addition to his mixture of military and domestic costume, had now superadded a sailor's jacket and check shirt, received him at the door with a look of the deepest caution.

"You're welcome, Master Beauchamp," he said in a whisper, "hush! hush!"

"Is there anybody ill, Adam?" (in the softest whisper.)

"Hush! hush!" said Adam, laying his finger on his lips, and gathering his brows, while he pointed in silence to the stairs.

Supposing that either the Major or his cousin must have met some serious accident, Henry Beauchamp trod softly up the carpeted stair, making many reflections on the vanity of human pursuits, and more than all of human pleasures. Beneath, he saw a hall hung with water-proof cloaks, south-westerns, fearnoughts, etc., and a handsome painted blind, half drawn up at the window on the first landing-place, gave him a view of an extensive back yard, with a gate-way opening to the river. In this he beheld some newly finished sails hung out to dry, a pot of tar simmering over a wood fire, and a number of oars, spars, blocks, and various articles of rigging scattered on the ground. Ascending higher, he was met by the old Major, now grown white with age, and propped on a crutch as he stood waiting to receive him before the open door of the drawing-room. He too had a finger laid upon his lips, as if to preclude discourse. It is poor Harmond, then, thought Beauchamp, that has suffered.

Major O'Brien gave him his hand in silence, and led the way to the drawing-room, whither he was followed by his visiter; the latter emulating, as closely as he could, the noiseless movement of the Major's crutch and carpet shoes.

"You are welcome to town," said Major O'Brien, in a whisper; "have you breakfasted?"

"Oh, yes."

"You had a warm ride. How are your father and sisters?" (Still in a low whisper.)

"They are all quite well, sir."

"Did Nash put up your horse? He is very careful. You needn't be afraid of him. This is your first trip to town, I believe, Henry?"

"It is."

During all this time, Beauchamp was looking round for some clue to this mysterious silence. He was afraid to ask for Harmond. The window-blinds were down both in the front drawing-room and in another apartment, if that could be called a second room, which was separated from the former only by a pair of folding doors. Through the open arch, young Beauchamp soon beheld an object which set his doubts at rest. It was the body of Harmond O'Connor, whether wholly lifeless, or nearly so, he could not tell, extended on a sofa in a sailor's dress, and faintly distinguished in the diminished light. Beauchamp was sadly shocked.

"There he is," said Major O'Brien, still in a whisper, observing the eye of his nephew fixed with a look of grief upon his grandson—"there is the fruit of yachting."

"How did it happen, Major?"

"As all the disasters that yachting ever brought upon him hitherto. It was in vain that I always spoke to him, that I represented to him the frivolous, not to say culpable nature of such pursuits, risking life, lavishing expense, wasting precious time, and all for the sake of such haubles as those," (pointing to some prize cups which stood upon the sideboard.) "I have been doomed to feel revived in him the pangs his mother gave me. At five this morning the yacht arrived at the anchorage, and there he has lain since."

The Major leaned forward on his crutch, and Beauchamp, wishing to direct his attention from thoughts which seemed to give him pain, said:

"I have heard many assert that, after all, yachting is of some service; that it has the same effect in forwarding the very arduous art of ship-building, that racing has in improving the breed of horses. If we owe it to Newcastle and Doncaster that the English race-horse excels the Arabian in fleetness, why may not the fashion of yachting enable us, at some some future day, to claim the glory of possessing the swiftest vessels, as well as the bravest sailors in the world?"

"My deary Henry," said the Major, "let those amuse themselves in improving the art of ship-building who are able to afford it. Harmond never could. I am almost beggared by his pitch and tar, and the inevitable consequences of such pursuits—betting and dissipation—of time, I mean, for, thank heaven, it never went farther with him, but that is bad enough."

At this a low murmur from the dead man made Beauchamp start aghast upon his chair.

"Steady, my darling, steady!" cried Harmond, as he turned upon the sofa. "Now, Nash! mind the foresheet! there, she comes round, the pet! haul taught! that's it—belay—look to your jib!"

The Major lifted his hands.

"There 'tis—there 'tis for you," he exclaimed; "at it even in his dreams! Not even in his sleep will he be content to spend an hour upon dry land! I talk of the expense and dissipation—yet even that is not the whole of my affliction. No—no, I could be content to see all go to ruin, as I know it surely will, if not in my lifetime, yet most assuredly when he has Drumahambo Hall in his own hands—for never, never will he be brought to take care of his estate; but this is not the whole of what I have to fear—oh, no!—I am also tormented with the terrible conviction that his yacht will be his death, that some morning or another I shall hear of his body and the staves of his detestable cockle-shell being washed ashore together, somewhere between our city and the Heads."

"Closer to wind!" exclaimed the sleeper, with an anxious tone, "closer to wind, or the Puffin will leave us to lee-ward! That's right! that's it—there she runs ahead—now for it—now for the flag-boat—now, Nash, or never!"

"This sleep," said the Major, "cannot do him much good. I will wake him up to speak to you, since he is making no better use of his time."

"Now, Nash—mind your hand—don't let the Seagull get inside us—success, my darling—never mind—Nash, back your foresail! there she spins about! Ha! scoundrel!"

At this instant the Major laid his hand on Harmond's arm. The latter sprang from the sofa, and collared his grandfather with the left hand, while with the right he continued to act as if managing his yacht.

"—How durst you touch my hand?—Nash, haul your foresail taught—belay!—Ha!—What!—Who's this?—Where am I?—Where's the Erin?—Grandfather!"—(he gazed around the room)—"Oh, bless me, 'twas a dream!—I thought I was on board the Erin in a race. Ha! Harry—so you got my note—how are you?—how are all the ladies?—your father, and Amelia?—All well—that's right—I like to hear it—right before the wind. Harry, I'm glad you came—'twill be a noble match. Well, grandpapa, how are you? What, trembling on your chair as usual? Up until one in the morning—starting at every noise, and fancying it your hopeful grandson's knock—then down again desponding in your seat, and listening to every breeze that shook the window-frame—as if it sung his dirge; was it not so that yesternight was passed?"

"Ah, Harmond—Harmond!—that yacht will be the death of you!"

"The death of me! The darling!—She has saved my life a thousand times. Where would I have been the night of the storm in September last, I'd like to know, if it were not for her?"

"You'd have been in your bed, where you ought to be, you mad-cap."

"I'd have been at the bottom of the river. There was not a boat but herself that could live five minutes in such a gale."

"You forget, you foolish rake, that if it were she brought you out of the danger, it was she brought you into it."

"Bless you, no, grandpapa, it was I took her into it."

"It is all one. If she be not your death, she will be your ruin. Must everything be given up for that piece of painted timber? Education neglected—talents misapplied—abilities that might enable you to be of service to your dependents and your country frittered away upon a good for nothing plank—"

"A good for nothing plank! Come, I like that. The Erin, that has won five cups, a good for nothing plank!—Come—that is good!"

"No pains—no prudence—no care taken to prepare yourself for the management of a property. If there were no other evil than the mere waste of time, I do not know, Harmond, how you can reconcile it to your conscience. All time here is given us, as our land and gold, for use, not for abuse—for thrift, not unthrift. What you are to inherit from me might enable you, with moderate diligence, to render a whole district of a county prosperous and happy. What you have inherited from nature might, with the same degree of cultivation, assist in raising the character of your native land, and in promoting her advantage. Whereas now—Eh? What in the name of wonder is he after now?"

While the Major made this speech, young O'Connor, absorbed by the idea of the coming gala, had placed a chair in the centre of the room, and, with an abstracted air, described around it the course which he proposed adopting on the following day.

"The Puffin"—he said, in a fit of musing—"the Puffin we shall leave behind with ease—and the Kelpie also—the Seagull is the only one I fear—she ran us hard enough in spring—Ah, sir, I beg your pardon—you were speaking—?"

"I was—I might as well be speaking to the mast of your yacht. Will nothing put sense into that head?"

"Oh, sir, what should we both want with it? Time enough for me to look for sense when I have an estate to mind—and that, I hope, (laying his hand upon his grandfather's shoulder,) is as many years distant yet as I have hairs upon my head."

"Ah, but it isn't, you rogue—and you know it isn't. No, Harmond, you are shortening my days, and you know you are."

"Your days, sir! you are stouter at this moment than I have seen you look these ten years back."

"Ah, no—indeed I am not—and 'tis all your fault, and the fault of that villainous boat. Come hither, Harmond—now promise me, my boy—come here—now promise me you will give up this yachting. Don't turn away and shake your head, but promise. That's my good lad! Now, will you sell the yacht?"

"Ah, sir, you never saw the Erin in a stiff breeze."

"You will sell her, won't you?"

"To see her—(oh, 'tis a sight for an emperor!) on a fresh autumn day with all her canvas spread, and a whole gale of wind setting in from the nor'-west"—

"You will sell her, Harmond, won't you?"

"—With a fine swell roaring on her windward bow, shrouds like harp-strings, singing in the wind, and a luff like the tremor of a summer lake, just whispering 'close enough to wind,' to the broad and full-swollen mainsail. And then the ecstasy to see a rival on the course before, while we skim the breakers like a gull. What vessel, Nash? The Seagull! Is it she? Come, then, dear Erin!—Up with the jib!—Away!—Now, blow ye winds—blow strong—there—there she gathers away! Ha! there she dashes back the saucy brine—hold on! hold on!—we have her the next tack—the world to nothing—hold on, my darling!—Nash, the foresail!—there she spins about—blow, breezes, blow—our gunwale sips the foam—all hands to leeward!—there, she gains upon her!—how are you? how are you? Any commands to the west?—Closer to wind—there, there they go—close—side by side—an egg-shell would be crushed between—the Erin scooping every breath of wind from her canvas, and leaving her with mainsail flapping on the lee—there—there—we run ahead—good-bye! Will you take a tow?—Good-bye! Good-bye! Good-bye!"

And laughing, and suiting the action to the word, as if he were really acting the scene which he described, he retreated as he spoke, waving his hand in triumph to his grandfather, and running down stairs.

"After him, Harry, for pity's sake," exclaimed the Major—"was ever such a water rat? I dare swear if he were anatomised, you would find him fish to the very spine. The contest of wind and water has the same effect on him that they say the moon at full has on a lunatic's brain—it sets him crazed beyond self-government—after him, Harry—and strive to let him catch a little of your prudence—but, alas! that is not a tenth so contagious as his folly. I must let him keep the yacht; for, I do believe, if the wind sung loud in his ear, and he had no other means of courting danger, he would take old Molly's washing-tub."

"My grandfather," said Harmond, to young Beauchamp, as they gained the street together, "my grandfather wonders that I am not more attached to home, and yet what does he do to make me so? It is true, he has loaded me with favours, and means, I believe, to load me with much more; but, oh, good Harry, that lonesome—lonesome house! Why, man, I should die of the vapours if it were not for the Erin, that he abuses. Nature gave me friends and family, parents and brethren, ay, and sisters too (though I have never seen them in the compass of my memory,) and he debars me from their society. To gratify a useless, and a worse than useless inveteracy of resentment, he continues to shut me out from the most innocent, yet to me the most desirable earthly enjoyment that can possess the heart of man—the society of natural friends."

"Is it long," said Beauchamp, "since you have seen your mother?"

"So long that even the outline of her figure is but faintly impressed upon my memory."

"Why not steal a visit to them? What is the Erin good for, if she will not carry you so far?"

"Long since I would have done so, but I do not even know their residence, though I have often striven to learn. It is something, at all events, to know that they are comfortable—though that is all I can ascertain."

"And is the Major so inveterate still?"

"'Tis wonderful—past belief. He has even thrown out many hints that the property shall come to me, saddled with the condition that I am to perpetuate the exile which he has imposed upon his daughter."

"That's hard."

"You are better off, Beauchamp. You have always lived amidst your family."

"Why do you muse?"

"The cause is so astonishing, that I think you will hardly credit me when I reveal it."

"Come here, and I will tell it you in private."

They were by this time walking in one of the principal streets of the city, when Harmond drew his friend into a confectioner's shop, at the door of which a number of officers of the garrison in undress, and some exquisites of the town were standing, talking and laughing aloud, and seeming to have no weightier business on hand than that of catching nods from the fair promenaders who passed by, or flinging halfpence into the street for the pleasure of seeing the beggars scramble for them in the gutter.

"I am not superstitious," said Harmond, as he drew his friend after him into a small alcove behind the shop, and took a seat at a little table where some light refreshment had been laid as a lure for idlers—"I am not superstitious, and yet I am afraid that what I have to say will make you think me so—I have heard of the German double-goer, and the Irish fetch, and I believe in neither, although I have seen my own."

Beauchamp gazed on him.

"Yes," he continued, "I have seen my Dromio. I saw him two days since, as like myself in figure, face, and hue, as I am to my shadow in that mirror. I saw him first at the—race-course—you know I kept a racer before I got the Erin—he won the sweepstakes from me by a neck; I saw him afterwards at a steeple-chase near your neighbourhood—there I beat him, but he was close behind me. I saw him again in a billiard-room, behind this very apartment, where he beat me once again—(I am indeed but an indifferent gambler)—and last of all I saw him two days since, as I have said, upon the quay."

Henry Beauchamp turned round, and looked upon his friend as if he apprehended that something had occurred to derange his wits.

"I assure you," said Harmond, "that I speak a serious truth."

"My pulse, as yours, doth temperately keep time,
And makes as healthful music."

If he intend, as I suppose he does, to take a part in the regatta, to-morrow, I am determined to solve his mystery, whatever it may be."

On the following morning, at the first glimpse of day, Harmond O'Connor was at young Beauchamp's bed-side.

"Up, Harry, up! or you will lose the tide, it is on the turn already; a spanking gale from the west, and most of the hands on board the fleet already. I'll go before, and see all ready for you."

Beauchamp arose. While he dressed in haste, Harmond softly opened the door, through which he should pass into his grandfather's room, and from thence into the lobby.

"Now for nice steering," he said in a whisper, as he looked back on Beauchamp; "I must not wake the old gentleman, or I shall have half-an-hour's lecture on the advantage of a double reef."

He closed the door, and crept on tip-toe over the carpet, yet not so softly but he woke the watchful Major.

"Who's there?"

"'Tis I, sir."

"Harmond, my dear Harmond, where are you going?"

"To the regatta, sir, of course."

"What sort of a day is it, Harmond?"

"A fine fresh morning, sir."

"Ay, I know what you mean by a fine fresh morning; put back the curtain—mercy! why 'tis blowing a storm! Surely, Harmond, you don't mean to go out to-day?"

"Indeed I do, and to win a cup to-day."

"Harmond, is there anything that could induce you to give up this wretched amusement, as you call it, that makes my life one unvarying round of torture?"

Harmond paused for a little time, and then answered in a serious tone—

"There is, sir, one thing."

"Name it, and it is yours, if you say the half of what I possess."

"Recall my mother."

"Ha!"

"Recall and forgive my parents, and restore peace to a family, that your resentment only tends to keep divided and unhappy."

The Major sat up, and leaned for some moments against the head of the bed.

"Never!" he exclaimed with vehemence; "never, while I breathe! and it is daring in you to mention the name of—she is your mother, so I shall not wound your ears with what I was about to say."

"She is your daughter, too, sir."

"She is—she was my daughter; sir, it is bold of you to use the liberty I gave you thus. She was my daughter. From her very infancy I doted on her—I gave her all she sought—I never (would I had!) I never thwarted her by word or act—I trusted in her gratitude—her love, as freely as a child could do in the affection of a parent—and she forsook me. Never while I exist will I forgive her."

"Not forgive her, sir! Oh, sir, you surprise me; such a word as that comes very ill from so gray a head as yours. Sir, if she were a stranger to your blood and name, and had inflicted on you the deepest injury, it would be your duty to forgive her. But she is not a stranger to your blood—she is not your enemy—she is your child—your daughter—your only, and once your loved one—and she has never injured you—never designedly injured you. My mother, sir, may have been rash—she may have been unwise—but I am sure she loved you—and I am sure, wherever she is, she loves you still. Oh, sir, let no one have to tell, that he has heard an old man say, that he never would forgive his daughter."

"Boy," said the major, "you take up a hasty and unintended phrase. I do forgive Eliza; I declare, in the presence of our common parent (and that is not a trivial invocation,) that I have no resentment towards her in my heart; but recall, receive her as of old, I never will!"

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT]

REJECTED.

I LOVED her dearly; she knew it well
For, when on the Continent,
She wrote me an answer, neat and precise,
To every letter I sent.

I didn't expect that she'd pip her "i's,"
Or carefully cross her "t's,"
For the best of women will overlook
Such bagatelles as these.

When mine grew warm, her notes grew cold,
And she piped in another key,
She signed herself, "y'r's, truly, dear Sir,"
I — everlastingly!

But so it went on; and she came home,
To talk of Balzac and Sand,
And vow in the best of imperfect French,
That she hated the vulgar land.

She had learned to frown and to say cross things,
To hope that I didn't smoke,
To tell me canary colored gloves
Were out of fashion; I spoke

Of the bright old days, but she lit her fan,
And said with some discontent,
That since she read Fichte, she was sick
Of my mawkish sentiment.

Then I grew silent—affecting—fool!
Le grand seigneur, in turn,
Hoping to conquer her keen disdain
By being taciturn.

She only said she regretted much,
"That person" had lost his tongue,
And laughed out one of those vile stage laughs
Of which Victor Hugo has sung.

One midnight at Lady Humdrum's routs,
She said it was rather warm,
And wished I would promenade round the room,
"And would I give her my arm?"

"And heart too, Elly," I said and sighed,
And I blushed like a rose in June,
(Or something like that,) "A jelly she'd have,"
And, "would I fetch her a spoon?"

'Twas cutting I knew, but I obeyed,
And, sitting beside her, thought
Of our sweetheart days, ere her little heart
In the trap of the world was caught.

I chanced it—I did—I told her all,
I whispered it in her ear;

And she turned to me with a—"Did you say,
But fifteen hundred a year?"

I said I hadn't a sixth of that,
Her answer synonymed "bosh;"
I took my tooth pick, and trifled awhile,
And saw that 'twould never wash.

So I rose and handed my darling girl
To Alderman Marrowfat,
Gave half a crown to John in the hall,
And, having unpawned my hat,

I took my way. But a week ago,
(How fast the years go bye,)
I saw her and him in Clarendon-street,
(She grew most enormous!)

And they chaffed for mutton. I hung my head,
With a shame that I could not still,
But I blessed the fate that left me alone,
To breast the tide and the hill.

A WATERY SUBJECT.

HY is it that of the whole surface of this globe, we may consider that the three-fourths are covered by water, and that only one-fourth is in a condition to be permanently inhabited by human beings? Is there any great object in nature served by this? Is there any law of nature which would prevent the proportion being one-fourth water to three-fourths land or even less water? In fact, what, after all, is the great use of water upon the large scale in nature?

First of all, although three-fourths of the globe are now covered with water, there is no reason to suppose that it has been always so. On the contrary, it is quite certain that the proportion between land and water has changed very much and very frequently; that the whole continent of Europe was at one time the bed of an immense sea, which probably there was a great continent where the Pacific Ocean is now spread; that even Old Ireland was once not merely what Admiral Yorke wished her to be, forty-eight hours under water, but probably many thousand years in that condition; and that the great tract of limestone which occupies all the centre of the country, is nothing more than a collection of the skeletons of shell-fish; her first inhabitants, which by time and pressure, have been converted into the hard material of which we build our houses, and which we burn into lime. There is thus no particular reason why there should be three times as much water at present as land, but it is easy to show that water on the great, as well as on the small scale, is of paramount importance in nature.

Water is a portion of the food of all living beings. In the case of animals, the bodies from whence they derive nutriment are so varied and so complex, that to illustrate the peculiar part which water plays in each, would occupy too much space. In all our drinks, even in ardent spirits, there is a very large quantity of water, and our solid food very seldom contains less than nine-tenths of its weight of water. The living body is even less solid. A man weighing 150 lbs. would, if perfectly dried, weigh not more than 10 lbs., the other 140 lbs. being water. It is to the existence of this quantity of water that we owe to the elasticity, the softness, and pliability of the different portions of our frame, the animal tissues being, when dry, hard and brittle as dry glue.

The nutrition of vegetables furnishes a beautiful and simple example of the use of water in nature. The body of the vegetable, the proper wood, may be considered as being composed of water and of charcoal; and hence, when we heat a piece of wood until we decompose it, the water is expelled, and carbon or charcoal remains behind. In order to grow, a plant must, therefore, get water and charcoal in a form fit for its use, that is, in such a form as it can make food of, and digest them. For this, the carbon is supplied in the carbonic acid which the air contains, and the water in the state of vapour which the air contains also, and which is continually descending, under the form of dew and rain, to moisten the leaves and the roots of the plants, when it has been absorbed into the ground. All the water which is absorbed by plants is not assimilated, or digested; a great part is again thrown out by the surface of the leaves; for, precisely as the air which an animal expires from the lungs in breathing is loaded with vapour, so is there a process of perspiration from the surface of the leaves, which are the lungs of plants. For the formation of substances which are peculiar to certain plants, other substances are required as food; thus, most plants require nitrogen, which is accordingly furnished abundantly in atmospheric air; others must have access to sulphur, in order to flourish; but this depends, as it were, upon particular branches of manufacture in which the plant is engaged; for its own support, for making wood, and the tissue of its leaves and vessels, it uses only water and carbonic acid.

The conversion of water into steam or invisible vapour by boiling, is one of the best known facts in science; but, by a little attention, we can observe that this change takes place at almost all temperatures, although much less rapidly. Thus, if a little water be laid in a plate, it is soon dried up, and wet clothes, by being hung up in the air, are very soon completely dried. Even below the temperature at which water freezes, it still evaporates; and thus, when a fall of snow is succeeded by a continued frost, the snow gradually disappears from the fields without having melted, evaporating while yet solid. From the surface of all the water of the globe, therefore, there is continually ascending a stream of watery vapour; but as the proportion of sea is so much greater than that of land, we may look upon the ocean as being the source of the watery vapour of the air upon the large scale.

Now, watery vapour is lighter than air, and hence the vapour, as soon as formed, ascends in the air like a balloon, until it arrives at a part of the air which is of its own specific gravity. The air in these higher regions is extremely cold, and the vapour can no longer maintain itself under the form of invisible steam: it is condensed, and would immediately fall back to its source as rain or hail, but for a singular property which it acquires at the moment of being vapourized. When water evaporates, it becomes highly electrified, and could attract a feather, or other light bodies, like a stick of sealing-wax which has been rubbed briskly on a woollen cloth. Now, the vapour which passes off is electrified also; and while in this state of electricity, it, on arriving at the colder regions of the air, cannot condense, to form liquid water. The minute particles of the water repel each other too violently, in virtue of their electricities, to form drops, but they constitute the great loose collections of clouds which diversify so much the appearance of our sky. The clouds being thus highly electrical, and being very light, are attracted by the tops of mountains and high lands, or by elevated buildings; and, giving off their electricity, the particles of water coalesce, to form drops which descend as rain. In this country the air is so damp that in general the discharge of the electricity of the clouds takes place quietly and silently; but in summer, and in dry climates, it produces the vivid flashings and injurious effects of the lightning, and the re-echoed rattle of the thunder-clap.

When water is cooled, it diminishes in bulk like other bodies; but at a particular temperature it deviates from the general law of contraction, and by doing so, becomes, perhaps, the most striking example of providential design that is to be met with in organic nature. Cold water is specifically heavier than warm water, in consequence of the contraction it has undergone, and hence will sink in it, as water would sink in oil. Now, if we consider the surface of a lake exposed to the cooling action of a wintry wind, the water which is first cooled becomes heavier, and, sinking to the bottom, is replaced by the warmer water, which floats up to the top; there is thus a current established of cold water descending and of warmer water rising up. This continues until all the water in the lake has been cooled down to the temperature at which its specific gravity is greatest, which is about 40 degrees, or about eight degrees above the point at which it begins to freeze. The action of the cold wind continuing, the water at the surface is still further cooled; but now, in place of contracting, it expands—instead of becoming heavier, it becomes lighter, and remains floating upon the surface. It is then still further cooled, and finally, its temperature being reduced to 32 degrees, it freezes, and a layer of ice is formed on the surface of the lake. This ice, and the cold water next to it, are impermeable to heat; it actually serves as a blanket to the water at 40 degrees which is below, preventing the escape of the heat, and retaining it at that temperature, sufficient for the purposes to which it is subservient; for at the temperature of 40 degrees, the life and enjoyments of all the various tribes of animals and vegetables which reside permanently under the surface of the water are perfectly secured, at least for a very considerable time; the water holding dissolved a quantity of oxygen for the animal respiration, and the vegetables living on the carbonic acid which is formed by the respiration of the fish. (On the approach of spring, the warmer air, and the rays of the more elevated sun, act directly on the surface of the ice, and each portion of water formed by melting, becoming heavier, sinks, so as to expose the ice itself to the source of heat. Thus the ice is rapidly dissolved, and after a few days the lake throws off its wintry aspect altogether.

Now, if water did not possess this peculiarity of being heaviest at the particular temperature of 40 degrees—if it contracted according as it was cooled, up to the moment of freezing, as almost all other liquids do, what would be the result? The cold wind acting on the surface of the lake, and the water becoming heavier by being cooled, the circulation would continue until all the water had been cooled to the point at which it freezes. The ice would then form indifferently in all portions of it, at the bottom and in the centre, as well as on the surface; and by the continued action of the source of cold, the wind, the whole mass of water in the lake would be frozen into a solid block of ice. The watery sap in the vessels of the aquatic plants, the blood in fishes and other animals inhabiting the water, would be equally frozen, and all these living beings consequently killed. Further, on the approach of summer, by the first heating action of the air and sun, a layer of ice, of a few inches thick upon the surface, would be melted, but the water thus produced would, by being impenetrable to heat, prevent the great body of ice below from being affected. Just as, in reality, the cold water at the surface prevents the warmer water below from being cooled, so then it would prevent the colder ice below from being warmed; and hence the heats of summer passing over without the melting process extending beyond a few feet in depth, the first cold days of the next winter would solidify all again.

In every country, therefore, where at present water is frozen at all in winter, we should have there established the reign of perpetual frost. By the presence of such large masses of ice, the temperature of the ground would be so much reduced, that, in place of the rich herbage of our meadows, and the luxuriant produce of our corn fields, we should have our country yielding a scanty support to wandering herds of deer, in the mosses and lichens that could be scraped up from beneath the snow. The oaks, the beeches, the horse-chestnuts, which give such beauty to our sylvan scenery, would disappear, and the monotony of wilderness of the Scotch fir and of the spruce would be varied only by patches of stunted birch. The countries nearer the tropics would be gradually brought into the same condition, by the depression of their mean temperature; and thus, in a short time, after water had ceased to possess this peculiar property, the whole surface of the globe would be reduced to the condition of which we now happily only read in the tales of the arctic voyagers; and all commerce, manufactures, and civilization, would be banished from the earth. Of such value is this little peculiarity of water!

A property of water, which, however, unlike the former, it shares with all other liquids, is, that when it freezes it gives out a large quantity of heat; and that conversely, in order that ice may melt, it must obtain, from some other source, a quantity equally considerable. Consequently, water freezes and ice melts very slowly; and that it should melt thus slowly, is of essential importance in animated nature. If in spring or summer, when vegetable life is in activity, when the development of leaves, of flowers, and fruit, is at its greatest energy, and all the vessels of the plant are distended with its nutritious juices, were it suddenly exposed to cold, the sap would be frozen, and by the expansion of the ice the vegetable tissues torn to pieces, and the plant killed. In the thin extremities, as in the leaves, such is the effect of the frost of a single night; but as the fluids, yielding but gradually up their latent heat, solidify very slowly, the injury does not extend so far as to be beyond the remedial powers of the plant itself. In another way, however, the peculiar latent heat of water is of still more importance. If there was no large collection of water on the globe, the change of seasons would be amazingly more rapid and more remarkable than they at present are. A change in the direction of the wind, the alteration which a few weeks should effect in the position of the sun, would transfer us from the depths of the severest colds of winter to the summer heats. These colds and heats would also be much greater than they at present are, and an approximation to this actually occurs in countries far distant from the sea. The central districts of Europe and of Asia have what are termed continental climates to distinguish them from ours, which is called insular. Their summers are hotter, their winters are much colder, and the spring and autumn seasons of passage, which with us might be said to occupy most of the year, are in those countries of only a few weeks, or even a few days' duration. In fact, when on the cessation of summer the first cold winds tend to bring on the winter, and to bind up our lakes in frost, the first portion of water frozen becomes, by giving up its latent heat, a source of warmth which tempers the chilly air, and retards its action on the remainder. The water freezes thus, very slowly. The vegetables and certain classes of animals, feeling the cold of winter thus gradually coming on, prepare to meet it without injury. The motion of the sap in the one, that of the blood in the other class of living beings, becomes slower, and, dropping its leaves and fruit, the tree retains but its firm trunk, within which its energies are preserved for the ensuing season; whilst the hedgehog, the viper, the frog, and other animals, retire to their hiding-places, and, in a state of almost lifeless stupor, remain until the warmth of the succeeding spring calls them to renewed existence.

In the formation of the insular climate which we possess, another power of water, however, equally or perhaps more influential, can be traced. There issues continually from the ocean at the equator, as the earth revolves, a current of water considerably warmer than that which bathes our shores. This current, becoming sensible first in the Gulf of Mexico, is called the Gulf Stream; it passes obliquely across the Atlantic, floating on the colder water of the ocean, which tends in a direction nearly opposite to replace it, and thus diffuses over the coasts of North America and Europe the heat which it had absorbed within the torrid zone. The northerly winds, which would bring down a sudden winter on us, are therefore tempered by passing over the warmer surface of the ocean; whilst the hot winds from the south, which, on the approach of spring, might make too premature a change, expend, in passing over the great expanse of sea, a portion of their heat; and thus the transition in both directions is rendered more gradual and harmless.

These are but a few of the important duties which are allotted to water in its place in nature. It in other respects presents an equally interesting subject of examination, and it is one to which we shall return. From its value as the great agent of nutrition to the vegetable world, and the necessity of a supply of it to animals; from its power in modifying the appearance and structure of a country, changing land into sea, and elevating banks where deep water had been before, the philosophers of old looked upon water as the origin of all earthly things, as being above all others the element of nature. It is not so: water is not an element.

DERRY.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century Sir Henry Dockwray founded the city of Londonderry, from which time it was esteemed a place of considerable importance. During the various sanguinary events which darken the page of Irish history, it underwent many mutations of fortune, but into the events which led to those, or the results, it is not the province of this journal to enter.

From no other place that we know of can so just a conception be formed of the manner in which the chief towns and cities throughout the country were fortified in former times—as the walls, which are rather more than a mile in circumference, though built in the year 1617, are still in a good state of preservation; and the gates and bastions still present much the same appearance as they must have done at the time of the siege. The walls, which form a noble terrace, and are now the great promenade for the fashionables of the city, consist of a thick rampart of earth, faced with stone, and flanked with bastions—a parapet breast-high running round them. They are from fourteen to thirty seven yards in breadth, and from twenty to twenty five feet in height. Within the walls are four main streets, the centre forming a kind of diamond or square, and at the termination of each a massive archway and gate, similar to that represented above, to two of which portcullises were attached.

The view of the city of Londonderry from a little distance is extremely fine. From the magnificent sweep which the Foyle takes around it, it appears as if standing on an island, completely separated from the mainland. It is built on a hill—on the very summit of which stands the Cathedral, with its towering spire, and being surrounded with high battlemented walls, has the appearance of a regular fortification.

TRUMMERY ROUND TOWER.

OME very interesting monuments of antiquity, situated at Trummery, county Antrim, are represented above. The west gable of the church a few years since was almost entire; in it was the only window the edifice possessed, having a high pointed arch. The door was near the centre of the south side, as a broken choked up archway clearly demonstrates. A few feet of the east gable only remain. Behind the gable, at its junction with the corner of the church, rose the tower, a cylinder of graceful proportions, about sixty feet high, crowned with a cupola. There were two great entrances into the tower—the first, a low, narrow, strong archway of red freestone, opening on the south, through which was the entrance to the church; at the east gable a door led into the tower. The second entrance or doorway was directly over the archway.

In the adjoining townland, at a short distance, was the Fort of Inialochlin, which commanded the oft disputed pass of Kilwarlin; it is said this fort was garrisoned by an army in 1641. Tradition says, those troops, bringing some field pieces to an adjoining eminence, beat down the church; from the situation of the tower there was no possibility of escape, consequently a great breach was made in the side next the church, but only in the outer half of the tower wall. Nature, as if willing to hide the breach from the eye of the curious visitant, bestowed on it a luxuriant covering of ivy, which gave it a truly romantic appearance. Upwards of thirty years since some person wantonly destroyed the roots of this "ascetic" plant, as a modern poet has styled it, and this once venerable monument of antiquity became a mass of ruins.

SUIL DHUV, THE COINER.

BY GERALD GRFFIN.

CHAPTER XIV.

ARTER of an hour elapsed, during which es suffered a degree of the torture of the poor, the story of whose fortunes had betrayed him a forgetfulness of his own personal safety, and whom, for his innocent agency in his misfortune, James was once or twice inclined, notwithstanding his Christian principles, to wish in a worse way. His agony of suspense, however, was only ended for that of despair, when he beheld Suil iv returning in haste with the form of a female mourning, which he was not long in recognising, going on his shoulder, stretching her hands back in silence, towards the house, and struggling faintly, but very vainly. When they came near, he perceived the occasion of her silence. A heavy on handkerchief was tied over her mouth.

Loose the gag now, Awney," exclaimed Suil iv—"nobody will hear her squalls now. Stay, do it myself." And setting down his wretched burden, he slipped the knot of the handkerchief, as turgid and blackening face and staring eye of prisoner advertised him of the necessity of some expedition. The instant the obstruction was removed, a shriek, as wild and piercing as female terror ever uttered, burst from the disfranchised throat, and died away in the horrid gurglings of suffocation, as the ruffian, startled by the sound, gripped the poor girl's throat hard, cursed, swore at her, and even had the brutality to clench his rough fist, and raise it as if to strike her on the face.

"Come, gi' me the horse here, Maney. Be silent, I warn you, if you value your life!"

"I do not value it, ruffian!" she exclaimed, renewing her cries for assistance—"I will not stir! Stand back, coward and villain that you are! Oh, have I no friend in hearing? Am I quite deserted? Oh, Heaven, hear me!"

"Here, put this loody about you, miss, and be quiet, that's what you'll do," said Suil Dhuv, attempting again to force her on the horse, while the animal becoming restive at the fearful sounds with which his ears were assailed, increased his difficulty and his impatience.

"Lilly Byrne!" exclaimed the exasperated Coiner, "do you remember the note that warned you from the sally grove. It is the same friend that wishes to save you now."

"I want no friendship like this. If danger threatens me, let me meet it by my mother's side—let me perish under my own roof. I will not stir from this! I will not go with you!"

"You shall, by —!"

"I will not stir! Help, Heaven! Oh, Heaven, do not forsake me now! Oh, my Lord, whom I have served, must this happen while your lightnings are about me? Oh, hear me, my last and first friend! Do not forsake me; strike the ruffian—or strike me from his horrid grasp. Ha! help—I am heard. They are coming—help—help!"

Heaven did hear her. A horseman dashing furiously toward them through the heavy rain intercepted the flight of the Coiner. It was Robert Kumba. He sprang from his horse, and called in a loud voice on his enemy to stand. Lilly, recognising him, with a cry of joy, ran towards him with outstretched arms.

A bullet from the holster pistol of the Suil Dhuv was swifter in its course than she. The space was empty where she should have found her lover, and, before she could distinctly comprehend the accident which had occurred, the arm of the ruffian had again encircled her waist.

Again she renewed her cries of fear and agony, and again they were heard and answered. The thick and husky voice of a man was heard at the upper end of the field, fulminating a volume of threats at some person who obstructed his passage, and who, by the fierceness and loudness of her shrieks and entreaties, showed that Lilly Byrne was not the only female sufferer in the affray. At the same instant James succeeded in liberating himself from the trammels in which Maney had bound him. He started to his feet, threw his arms out from his shoulders as if to assure himself of his recovered freedom, then, by way of an introductory feat to the exploits which he meditated, he clenched his fist, capered into the air with a "Hoop! whisk!" and descending with the whole weight of his person upon the gaping and astonished gold-finder, bestowed him a blow on the temple that speedily rendered him indifferent to the whole affair.

While he paused, a little awe-struck by the elevated pistol of the Suil Dhuv, the strugglers in the dark approached more near. The Coiner grew pale and red by turns as he recognised the voices.

"The very graves will give up their dead to save you after this," he exclaimed. "I believe you're unarmed. No matter. It was well I took care of the pistols and ammunition. Up! in spite of —"

"Drag—tear her from me!" roared the Palatine, calling to James, who was hurrying towards them, "she would abet the murderer! Let free my arms! Look! He is on horseback! he's gone!—escaped!"

"Do not go!—Oh, mercy!—husband! fly! have mercy on me! I will not quit him, ruffian!" The woman continued, struggling wildly, as James tore her from the old man and hurried her away to a distance from the place—"Oh, my good man, Heaven will bless you, and let me go and separate them? They are my husband and my father! Heaven bless you, and do! Heaven bless you and—You villain, let me go! They will murder each other!—Father! My father! Have mercy on me, father! Run! run for your life, Denny, honey, run!"

Before the first sentence of this speech was uttered the two enemies had confronted each other in silence. A pale, grim smile, which showed more ghastly in the reddish light of the now subsiding fires and the momentary flashes of the lightning, showed the deadly satisfaction the old man felt in the encounter. The hatred of his antagonist was no less apparent, but there was a degree of quivering insecurity about the muscles of his face which signified that the encounter perplexed at least as much as it gratified him.

"I thank Heaven, Macnamara, we are met at last," said the old man. "Give up that lady, and come with me, quietly."

Suil Dhuv elevated his pistol, sheltering the lock cautiously with his hand; but having only one shot remaining, he felt that it would be more prudent to husband it. "I do not want your life," said he; "stand o' one side, and let me pass."

"I warn you to stand back," said the old man. "In the name of the king, whose laws you have broken, I arrest you for a prisoner."

"You had better not mind it," said his enemy.

"Villain," continued the Palatine, "your hour is come. I took you into my house and into the bosom of my family, when the whole world besides had cast you off, and the gratitude you showed me was to render my condition as desolate as your own. I have hunted you out to bring your deeds home to your door—and the Almighty has delivered you into my hands at length."

"Yes," replied the ruffian warmly—"you took me into your house, to thrust me out again more destitute than ever. You threw temptations in my way that man could not resist, and beggared me for yielding to them. When I left your house, I had done you no injury—your benefits I had paid with my labour—I sought to do you none—I lived an easy life with my brother, and might be living with him still, if you and yours had not risen up against us to divide and persecute us. Ye murdered him among ye—and ye left me without a friend in the world. Take the fruits of your labour! You ruined me—I hated you—and I hate you still—but I am satisfied with the revenge I had—I tell you again I do not want your blood. You have but a little to spare, and if you'd keep that little, you'll stand aside and let me go my ways."

"Daring and hardened wretch!" exclaimed the Palatine—"you may well say you have been satisfied. If blood was wanted to content you, you have had enough."

"Come—come," said Macnamara impatiently "I don't understand you, but I have no time to bid you explain your meaning."

"Advance at your peril!"

"What rasin have you to me, Mr. Segur? I tell you 'tis better to let me go."

"No reason, certainly," exclaimed the old man—"give me back the old blind man you murdered first—and then give me my daughter—and you may go your ways in peace."

"Oh—poh! how do you know I had any call to the dark man—and as for Sally—sure there she's westwards in the fields; take her, and welcome. Keep out o' my way now, I'd advise you. Ha! ha!—Oh, if you think it's that I mind!" checking his horse, as the Palatine presented a pistol, and gathering the now insensible Lilly closer to him, as he prepared to set his foot in the stirrup.

"Poor, duped, deceived wretch!" cried the Palatine—"once more I bid you stand—Advance, and you are a dead man!"

"Poh—fire and—"

The oath was never finished. The old man discharged his weapon, and darted forward to prevent a return of the fire. The horse at the same instant reared back on its haunches so as to entangle the foot of the rider in the stirrup, and then plunging furiously forward, dragged him along the ground until both were out of sight. The young lady was snatched from beneath the very feet of the terrified animal, as they were about to descend upon her, by James; while the Palatine and the remainder of his party, who only now rode up, hastened in the track of the flying animal, with lighted faggots in their hands. They found the wretched man lying on his back on a heap of stones (some of which were smeared with blood and battered flesh), gasping in the agonies of death. He waved his hands and outstretched fingers before his face as the dazzling red-light of the crowded torches flashed upon his eye-balls. A frightful convulsion, first of terror, and then of hate, passed over his countenance, as the Palatine passed through the strong light and gazed down upon him, after which the working of his jaws grew more painfully stiff and difficult—his person writhed in agony—a shivering passed through his limbs—the death foam oozed over his teeth and lips—the spirit, that seemed to cling with a desperate consciousness to its clay, as its last hold, was forced abroad to encounter the ruin it had earned for itself—and the book of its mortal crimes and sufferings was closed and sealed for the judgment.

The silence which the fearful death of the murderer had imposed on the party who accompanied the Palatine, was unbroken for many seconds. They gazed on the shattered body and on one another, as if the extreme horror of the occasion had left them unable to form an unassisted conjecture on the course which should be pursued. The old man was the first who spoke.

"My part in this deed," he said, handing the discharged pistol to Mr. Cuthbert, who had just then ridden up, "may be called in question. I am your prisoner, and ready to answer for what I have done. Cover him! cover him! in mercy," he added, as one of the men stooped down apparently with the intention of removing the body—then flinging his own great coat over it, while he averted his eyes in strong dislike and compassion blended—a feeling which the pitiable appearance of the unhappy wretch, who had, but a few moments before, stood erect in the daring and dreadful defiance of desperate guilt, could not but excite even in the bosom of those whom he had most deeply injured—"I never, before this hour," the old man continued, "drew one drop of blood, knowingly, from the smallest creature the Almighty ever endowed with life—and I like not the look of this well enough to believe that I can be tempted to a second trial. If my human passion," he added, uncovering his head in the rain, and looking upward, "has had too large a part in the action which I have done—may He forgive and pity me."

"Why should you be uneasy?" said Mr. Cuthbert, "there was no other course left, and you only made justice certain."

The old Palatine shook his head, and replaced his hat upon his brow, while the remainder of the spectators raised the body for the purpose of removing it to the house of the nearest cottager.

Slowly, and in silence, they took their way toward Drumsclanlon. They could perceive, by the rapid manner in which the lights passed from window to window, that the confusion, occasioned by the occurrences of the last hour, had not yet subsided. The flagged floor of the hall was wet with the dripping of hats and great coats, and two or three of the guests, heedless of the pelting rain which still descended, were engaged in whispering consultation on the gravel plot outside. As they passed the kitchen door, they heard the voice of James Mihil, who, in the attitude of a Demosthenes, was employed with all his might in haranguing one of the Coiner's accomplices, the only one whom they had succeeded in apprehending.

"Indeed you never'll pass the next assizes, so you may make your mind aisy. Indeed, the hangman'll make his perquisites (perquisites) o' you, so he will."

"Don't be botherin' me, I tell you again, you fool."

"Botherin' you, indeed! I wondther is it I or the hangman that'll bother you most, you daaran villyan, to lay hands on the young missiz. An' that intricket little sprissawneen (small fellow) that put the gag upon my mouth, what look we had not to lay hold of him! Fool, inah? I wondther is it yourself'll look most like a fool when I'm readen your last speech on a bit o' whitey-brown paper, in the Irishtown, an' you cutten capers above on Gallows-green, with a hempen cravat about your neck, as proud as a paycock, spoken to nobody."

"I whist," said the prisoner, "if I did my mother's bidden this evenen, I wouldn't be where I am now. He's a fool that refuses the mercy of Heaven when it is offered him—but it's too late to speak about it now."

Mr. Cuthbert here broke in upon the dialogue to inquire after the wounded Kumba and Miss Byrne, who were both attended in separate apartments—and neither of whom had yet fully recovered from the insensibility into which their sufferings had cast them. During the few weeks that were suffered to pass away, before the former was sufficiently restored to bear a removal to his own house, no communication more direct than an inquiry at second hand, passed between the friends—and Kumba left the home of his mistress, without even the ceremony of a formal parting.

This heroic forbearance was prolonged for many years, during which, the character of the young "middle-man" appeared to have undergone a perfect change—a change which communicated itself to his circumstances, and to the property which he held. The dwelling-house gradually put on a more civilized appearance, the stones which covered the grazing land were removed and appropriated to the more advantageous use of fences and boundaries. The cattle began to look more sleek and comely, better pleased with themselves and with the world around them. The barn and granary groaned beneath their burthens, the stroke of the flail was heard incessantly throughout the autumn, and the grating of cartwheels over the well-gravelled avenue scarce ever left the ear at rest throughout the day. Notwithstanding all the hints that were dropped in his hearing, of the satisfaction which these improvements had given in a certain quarter, Kumba was careful to abstain from anything that could indicate a premature anxiety to revive the memory of departed hours, and he even chose, on Sundays, to attend a chapel which was near three miles from his residence, rather than hazard a renewal of the distractions, which his presence at the parish place of worship had in old times, so frequently occasioned to another as well as to himself.

Lilly, whose pure and gentle heart would have been content to find its sole worldly enjoyment in hearing of the happiness of one whom she loved with so disinterested an affection, was more pleased than grieved at this privation, and felt herself repaid for all the self-denial by the accounts which daily reached her (under the form of sly jokes and hints from witty visitors) of Kumba's welfare—and by an occasional exclamation from James, thrown out in an accidental way, of "what a fine man Master Robert was ridden into a fair in a mornen!"

Alas, for human nature! alas, for friendship! alas, for all that is sincere, and honest, and benevolent!—it would be, we fear, a mournful and humiliating task for the philanthropist, to analyze the motives even of the most seeming amiable actions that pass around him, and discover how few are affectionate, how few generous, how few are compassionate, how few are humble, even of those who act the parts, and imagine themselves to be what they appear. Our best friends, says a modern aphorist, have a jealousy even in their friendship, and if they hear us praised, will ascribe the commendation, if they can, to some interested motive. We appeal to the reader, whether he has not frequently found through life, that the most disagreeable intelligence has often reached him through the medium of his kindest and most sympathizing acquaintance—and whether, in the fulness of an extatic heart, when he sought that same kind friend, for the purpose of communicating to him a piece of sudden good fortune which he had experienced, he has not often been met by some chilling doubt, some friendly cautious hint, which has humbled his vain heart, and

"—though that his joy were joy,
Yet threw such changes of vexation on it
As it might lose some colour—" and showed him, at the same time, that the friends whose sorrow went before his own in the hours of despondency and disappointment, yet lingered far behind him in the sympathy of gratulation. We shall not stop to calculate the number of those whose generosity might safely undergo a test so severe, and perhaps, so uncharitable.

Neither shall we examine whether the worthy Mrs. Hasset was one of the many whose benevolence passes current and unsuspected, even by themselves; or whether she were influenced by any other impulse than that which she herself believed to be the sole motive of her conduct; a feeling of unalloyed good-nature and neighbourly kindness; when, arming herself against the inclemency of a mistling April morn, in cloak, pattens, and hood, she took her early way to Drumsclanlon, to communicate and condole with the old lady and her daughter, on what she conceived to be a very heart-rending piece of news.

"A moist, soft, mornen, it is, Ma'am," exclaimed a voice that was familiar to her, as she slipped off her pattens on the steps of the hall door. "Herself is in the kitchen garden, westwards, walken with Miss Lilly; but I'll run an' call her to you, Ma'am."

"Do so, James. How is she?"

"Ah, then, only poorly," James replied, leaning on the end of the hoe with which he had been clearing away the grass tufts from the gravel plot, and tossing his head with a mournful significance. "The deafness is growing worse with her, an she can't knit, nor do a ha'porth, the eyesight is so bad. They got a sort of a little po-chay for her, a thing like a chair for all the world, only wheels—with wheels to it, so as that I draw her about a piece every mornen—but I fear it's all no use. They got new spectacles too, in place o' the eyes; but when our legs, an' our ears, an' our eyes are going from us, in course o' nature, the art o' man wouldn't make us new ones."

Having pronounced this profound apostrophe, James hurried towards the garden, while Mrs. Hasset adjourned to the parlour, where she occupied herself, until James's return, in regulating the furniture, whisking the dust from the chimney ornaments, and lecturing the housemaid for her negligence.

The lady of the mansion was, in the meantime, seated with her daughter in a small thatched summer-house in the garden. Age and sorrow had laid a heavy and visible hand upon her frame; and it was with some difficulty that even Lilly Byrne could at all times succeed in awakening her attention, so as to arouse her from the lethargic state into which the wasting of nature's resources had reduced her.

"Come, now, you must walk, mother," said Lilly, passing her arm beneath that of the drooping lady, and lifting her from the rustic seat; "the rain is over, and the sunshine will do you good. Only as far as the sun-dial and back again."

They proceeded along the walk, the old lady leaning on her daughter, and supporting herself on the other side with the gold-headed oak stick, which had for many years been the companion of her husband's walks. The change which had taken place in the person of her daughter was also considerable. Her shape, though less pliant and sylph-like, had more of the majesty of womanhood about it, her step was firmer and more easy, and her features, less delicate of tint than in her early days, were covered with a peaceful serenity that told of conquered sorrow, and the unruffled calmness of a resigned spirit; like a battle field over which returning peace had thrown her mantle of rustic quiet and abundance, without concealing the graves of buried hopes, and vanquished passions, that gave a sombre interest and solemnity to its loveliness.

"What was it the visitors said yesterday," Mrs. Byrne inquired, in a faint tone, "that made you all laugh, Lilly? You have not told me that yet, though I asked you three times."

Lilly looked confused and hesitated, and her mother, by a feeble, melancholy smile, showed that she understood the cause of her embarrassment.

"I'll not ask you, Lilly," she continued, speaking with difficulty. "I understand he is greatly changed. I wish I could see you happy with him, Lilly, before I die."

Before her daughter could reply, James had entered the garden. The talent of this domestic did not lie in a very perfect discrimination, and it was a fault which involved him in many a gentle fracas with his "young mistress," that he could at no time govern his voice to the proper tone while addressing Mrs. Byrne. He knew she was deaf, and, once convinced of the necessity of speaking aloud, and being wholly unacquainted with the effect of his own voice above a certain familiar key, his gentlest communications frequently operated on the nerves of the old lady with the influence of a galvanic shock. At the present moment, while she was looking with some faint slyness of eye on the changing countenance of her daughter, he approached her, unperceived by either, and placing his lips close to her ear, thundered into it, "Misthris Hassett, ma'am, that's wanten you, av you please."

Both ladies turned suddenly, and beheld James standing with his usual earnest gaze fixed upon them.

"I often spoke to you about that, James," said Lilly—"One would think you took a pleasure in startling my mother. Tell Mrs. Hassett, your mistress will feel obliged by her walking into the garden for a few minutes."

"I will, Miss."

"Take a pleasure!—Ah, fie! Miss Lilly, I didn't think you'd say that at all. I'm heartbroken with it for a story; what am I to do at all? If I speak small, I'm toul't to speak up, an' if I speak up, I get crossness. Well, I'm going, Miss—'twas unknownst I done it. To the garden, I'll tell her?" and away he strode, humming to himself the popular distich,

"The finest diversion that's under the sun,
Is to sit by the fire till the praties are done."

In a few minutes the ladies were joined by their good-natured visitor, who, after the usual ceremonies of greeting had passed, proceeded, with a face of deep condolence and satisfaction, strangely yet visibly blended, to unburden her heart of its freightage of bad tidings.

"You have not heard the news?" she said, glancing at the eyes of both her auditors in turn.

"What news?"

"Well, I'm glad you have not yet heard it, for I was on there for fear some thoughtless person would have blundered it up before you, without any preparation. You, I am sure, Lilly," she continued, "have too much good sense to let it take hold of your mind."

Lilly paused for a few seconds while she looked upon the speaker and cloudless heavens, and then turning upon the communicatrix, she cast an eye as lightsome and as smiling as the blue expanse itself, she repeated her interrogatory.

"Robert Kumba," said Mrs. Hassett, dwelling on every word with the distinctness which the importance of the occasion warranted.

"Robert Kumba is going to be married!"

"What is it Mrs. Hassett says, my dear?" said Mrs. Byrne to her daughter.

"She says that Mr. Kumba is going to be married," ma'am," replied the latter, smiling, and adapting her voice more judiciously than James had done to the condition of the aged widow's auditory powers.

"Yes," Mrs. Hassett continued, a little annoyed by the perfect equanimity with which her distracting intelligence was received by the party she considered most interested, "I always suspected that it was not for nothing all those fine alterations were taking place about his farm. It was only yesterday evening I learned that he had proposed for Miss Jemima Blaney. She is a pretty girl, indeed, and has a nice ready-money fortune, but I know where Mr. Kumba might have a better choice. However, that's past and gone, now. If not a better, at least a fairer and more honorable one—that at least I will say. But youth—money and youth are everything with the men in these days—girls begin to be looked upon as old maids now, at an age when they would be happy to suffer to go into company in my time."

The conversation was again interrupted by the entrance of James, who now approached them with a double proportion of importance and astonishment in his look and manner. Not forgetful of his former error, he now communicated his intelligence to Lilly, in a whisper which was not lost upon the quick ears of Mrs. Hassett.

"Is it possible?" she exclaimed. "How sudden!"

"Not altogether so," said Lilly, endeavouring to command the agitation that made her frame tremble; "he wrote to me a few days since, and we appointed this morning to receive him."

"Well, I rejoice most sincerely at it, indeed—and I will not stay to encumber you with my presence—for I know how I felt on these occasions myself, in my young days—when poor Hassett—ah, well, good morning, Lilly, I'll not detain you"—then, turning back as if struck by a sudden thought—"it would be as well, perhaps, if you said nothing of that report, as it happens to be false—and it would only annoy that poor young man. Some malicious person has set it afloat, I dare say, to make us uneasy."

As the good lady left the garden, she was met by a gentleman in black, with a long skirted coat and slashed sleeves, a cravat neatly edged with the finest Flanders lace, a periwig of reasonable compass, surmounted by a small glossy hat, clocked silk stockings, and square-toed shoes, with neat small buckles—all, in fact, that could be esteemed characteristic of gravity and respectability united. He bowed to Mrs. Hassett as he passed, and entered the garden in some trepidation and anxiety.

"It is a bad sign to go a wooing in mourning," said the lady, shaking her wise head as she gazed after him. "I hope no harm will come of it."

The stranger, in the meantime, passed from the garden to the summer-house, in which Lilly Byrne and her mother were expecting him. Even his manly heart began to fail him when he caught the first glimpse of their mourning drapery through the scanty foliage of the spring boughs. The sorrows of the past—the afflictions, which his own wantonness had occasioned, rushed back upon his memory in a dark and overpowering torrent, and unnerved his resolution. Some slight motion in the arbour, however, recalled him, presently, to a sense of the necessity of self-possession; and, quickly arousing himself from his depression, he walked forward, without rinking the return of his evil recollections by a second pause.

It was an embarrassing meeting to all parties—for the will was always remain in a state of embarrassment where the judgment and the affections are at war, and neither can indicate the extent to which the other ought to be indulged. Nature, however, generally asserts her own right to dictate on such occasions.

Kumba, with his eyes cast down, had commenced a confused and hesitating speech about his "gratitude for the indulgence which—" when suddenly abandoning himself to his natural feelings, he flung himself with a burst of grief at the feet of the young lady, and exclaimed—"I cannot do it!—Oh, Lilly—Mrs. Byrne, say that you will forgive me?"

The tears of the penitent did not fall alone. Miss Byrne was compelled in her agitation to seek from her mother the support which it was her wont to afford to the old lady, while she exerted herself to recover some degree of calmness.

"Let us not distress my mother," she said, at length—"our answer to your letter must have shown you that our hatred was not inveterate. Ah, Robert," she continued with a smile—"we have both had cause enough to learn the wisdom of forgetfulness. Here is my hand. Let us talk no more of the past, I am glad to see you."

In this position of affairs, we may be pardoned for suffering a veil to fall over the group, as we fear, with all his benevolence, the reader would feel little interest in following the parties through the peaceful and unruffled history of the fortunes of their latter days.

In less than a year after this occurrence, our little heroine, Lilly Byrne, was rewarded for her constancy and her endurance. Robert Kumba was once more received as a welcome guest at Drumsanlon, and once more took his place at Lilly's work-table. Again Lilly resumed her stout flowered-silks, her cheeks recovered her bloom, and verified Mrs. Hasset's prediction that she would "forget all before she was twice married."

Mr. Cuthbert, unhappily, never recovered his money, but he had the satisfaction of lodging Maney in jail for the swindling. Mr. Shine (though at the evident risk of his own reputation) undertaking to appear in corroboration—and also of razing to the ground the hold of the gang, and telling the whole story (with no other variation than that he took care to make himself the hero of the night) once a year at Drumsanlon, when he came for Lilly Kumba's full bounds again the fair of Cork.

"I declare, miss—ma'am, I mane, and I ax pardon for the mistake," said James, as he wished the bride joy after the ceremony had passed, "I declare I had soom then inwardly, you see, that always told me this would be the way of it in the end—" and here he gazed at arm's length upon the gorgeous favour which enveloped his own hat. "To be sure, I was greatly frightened that night—but, says I, taken heart, what hurt? Av they don't burn the house, we'll get help in time, please Heaven; and I took care they shouldn't do that, for I made the thatcher put a big bit o' the luserathocaun (house-leak) in the thatch, so as av they were setting fire to it from this until to-morrow morning 'twould never light, any more than the stone wall itself."

A short space may suffice to tell the fortunes of the remaining characters of our history. The unhappy father, disappointed in all the expectations with which he returned to his native land, and unwilling to live in the ruined cottage where every object reminded him of some perished friend or vanished happiness of his youth, returned with his widowed daughter to Germany, regretting from the very core of his heart, the thirst of gain which had induced him to commit to the uncertain keeping of a stranger the charge of his domestic affections—affections which he knew not, until they were thus blasted, to have been so necessary to his peace of mind.

His daughter followed him willingly. From the moment of her husband's death, she never once uttered a complaint, never once upbraided her father with the part he had acted in the scene which we have just detailed, but seemed anxious by her resignation and her affectionate devotion to all his wishes, to blot away from his remembrance the record of her early disobedience and ingratitude.

In this she was very successful, and both lingered out the remainder of their days with as much quietude of spirit, as those who have nothing left on earth to wish or hope, can experience. They never spoke of home or past times—but their hearts had been too sorely smitten to permit them to seek refuge in the formation of new attachments from the memory of the old and lost. Their life was lonely, therefore, though peaceful.

The tale of SUILL DHUV owes its origin to an incident related in an old Magazine, which fell into the hands of the writer, at an early age. A traveller in a lonely part of some country or another, stopped to dine at an inn on the road side, and afterwards resumed his journey. Towards midnight, his horse having lost a shoe, he knocked at a blacksmith's forge, to have the evil remedied. The latter grumbled much at being disturbed, at such an hour, but was silent when the traveller handed him a guinea for his trouble. Touched by this liberality, the blacksmith bade the former turn back, as there was danger on the road. The traveller replied that he was well armed and had no fear. The blacksmith became urgent, and finding he could not prevail, bade the traveller look to his pistols. The latter, to his astonishment, found the charges of both were drawn! The blacksmith then showed him the horse's hoofs, and let him see that the clenching of the nails had been filed away, evidently, with the intent of disabling the animal from continuing the journey, beyond a certain point. At the request of the traveller, both defects were remedied, and the latter, in opposition to the urgent entreaties of the blacksmith, continued his journey. About a mile from the forge he was encountered by a highwayman, who seized his horse's bridle, and bade him deliver up his money. The traveller rapidly desired the robber, on the peril of his life, to let go the rein. The latter laughed at his threats. The traveller presented a pistol—the robber still mocked at him. The wayfarer at length fired, and shot his assailant through the heart. He then alighted, placed the body across the saddle-bow, and rode back to the forge, where, by a light, he discovered that the wretched highwayman was no other than the landlord of the Inn, who had been long in concert with the blacksmith, and made an easy prey of his guests by the practice of rendering their pistols useless. He fell a victim, in this instance, to his confidence in the infallibility of his own precautions, while the traveller owed his safety to the liberality he manifested at the blacksmith's forge.

THE END.

WINE SONG.

D RINK to me, sailor; out in the rough bay,

White rocks the mast in the face of the storm,

Black o'er the skirts of the narrowing headland,

See the great thunder-cloud scatters its form.

Ere dawn has a star for us,

Thou shalt be far from us,

Tempest tost, breaker cros't—fill, fill this chalice,

Here's wine that has smoked in the vats of Falerie,

Whose grapes caught the light and the sun in our valleys.

Drink to me, sailor. Fate shall soon sever us,

Here's to the future, however it shadows.

May ocean keep calms for thee, ports offer homes to thee,

Smooth be thy way as the streams of our meadows.

Children shall cry for thee,

Sweet wife will sigh for thee,

Watching the west for thy sail, dawn and even,

Watching how broods in the vastness above us,

Portents that speak of the issues of Heaven.

Drink to me, sailor; billows may buffet thee,

Dream not that thou alone bravest the lightning,

Breakers are round our hearths, tempests destroy our homes,

Dear eyes are darkling, sweet faces are whitening.

Here, are bright shores for thee;

Hark the gun roars for thee,

Up like a brave man and answer the warning,

Blessings shall follow the good ship that carries

That strong heart of thine to the rim of the morning.

THE SOUL.—The origin of the human soul is not to be found any where on earth. There is nothing mixed, concrete, or earthly; nothing of water, air, or fire in it. For these natures are not susceptible of memory, intelligence, or thought; have nothing that can retain the past, foresee the future, lay hold on the present; which faculties are purely Divine, and could not possibly be derived to man except from God.

OLD FRIENDS AND NEW ACQUAINTANCES.

PERHAPS our ignorance is never more clearly exposed than when we are called upon to account for some of the commonest facts that lie around us. Hundreds of thousands of people look daily through glass, without once thinking how it is made; eat honey, and never trouble themselves as to the secrets of its manufacture. Familiarity, we are told, breeds contempt, but we know that it leads to indifference. Boys who have been to school ten years ago well remember with what astonishment they learned from Sir Humphrey Davy that the little black house fly, when placed under a microscope, is transformed into a gorgeous being, plated with gold and caparisoned in vestments of subtle texture and brilliant dye. If their knowledge of the insect stopped with this discovery, we can add to it still. The history of the fly is a chapter of marvels. He is generally hatched in decaying vegetable substances, which accounts for the swarms of flies which infest stable-doors and dung-heaps in summer time. If the weather be warm, he leaves the egg at the end of six or seven days—a maggot-shaped creature, banded with thirteen rings, terminating in a pair of hooked jaws. In the second of these rings the bases of his future legs lie hidden; the rest are honey-combed with minute pores, that admit air into the system and maintain the circulation of the fluids. The insect in this state moves from place to place by the aid of a number of fine hooks, with which he grips the ground and pushes his body backward or forward. His appetite is terrible for so small a fellow. The effects of the great quantities of food he consumes become visible in a few days. When the worm falls into the chrysalis state, the rings become black and inflexible, motion is suspended, and, to all appearance, the little mass is dead. This is the season of metamorphosis. By slow degrees the terminal ring is projected from the trunk, and changed into a head; others become abdomen and thorax; wings and feet are developed, and the perfect fly, burnished and plumed, soars into the air.

Where do the flies go? Numbers of sensible people will be found to assert that they retire with the coming of winter into deserted houses, hollow trees, and lumber, where they await, in a state of hibernation, the return of spring. This notion, is to some extent, countenanced by the numbers of dead flies which are found attached to walls and ceilings of out-houses. It is utterly fallacious, however. The fly deposits its eggs, but never sees her progeny. By a singular provision of nature, it lives but one season, and is then swept away by disease. A small description of fungus fastens itself to the insect's body in the early stages of its growth, and continues to spread until it covers the entire trunk, and drives its roots into the vital parts of its victim. The presence of this fungus was first observed by De Geer, and Goëthe did not think it beneath him to devote a long chapter to its origin and operation. About the end of autumn, flies are frequently found adhering to glass or wooden surfaces, surrounded by a fan-shaped patch of white or greyish dust. To all appearance they are alive; the legs are extended, the trunk erect, the wings spread as if for flight. A close examination results in showing that the rings of the body are divided by interpolations of fungus, and that the organic tissues and juices have been devoured by the parasite, leaving the insect a perfect but empty shell.

It was long supposed that the adhesive power of the fly's feet was derived from atmospheric pressure; but it is now proved satisfactorily that it arises from the glutinous hairs which cover the insect's extremities.

We have all picked up mussels, and such as were adventurous enough to eat them were careful to avoid the poisonous tissue which fringes their mouth. The tissue, notwithstanding our apprehensions, is perfectly harmless, and may be swallowed with safety. By it the animal attaches itself to all sorts of solid substances, rocks, walls, driftwood, &c. The process is as follows: a mucous fluid is secreted in a gland situated at the base of the mussel's foot, whence it is expelled by muscular power, and spun into threads of astonishing tenacity. With these threads shoals of mussels have been found tied together in a compact mass which no common exertion can divide. At Bideford there is a bridge of twenty-four arches, which is kept together by filling up the interstices of the masonry with those molluscs. The tide is so furious that the bridge would have been swept away years ago were it not for those useful animals. In the building of Cherbourg, the French engineers met with great difficulty in consequence of the shifty and unstable character of the sea-rock; but this was overcome by pouring tons of mussels on the surface, and allowing them to knit a solid envelope around and above. As the courses of masonry were laid down, fresh supplies of mussels were poured in, and the walls became as firm as cliffs. The coral polypes, which have been described as "atoms of pulp, sluggish and seemingly helpless morsels of animated jelly, no bigger, individually, than the smallest flower that nestles in the hedge-bank," are the founders of the vast archipelago of reefs and islands that spreads over the Pacific Ocean. Along the coast of New Caledonia and New Holland, they have spun a reef four hundred miles long, at about forty miles distance from the shore. The numerous coral formations now observed have forced some naturalists to think that the basin of the Pacific will be soon filled up. It has been suggested that the industry of those creatures should be taken advantage of in the construction of breakwaters, moles, &c. That the plan may succeed is fairly shown by the following experiment. At Madagascar, a bunch of coral was secured to a rock three feet below the water surface; in seven months it had grown three feet vertically and laterally.

The diatomaceæ, a class of creatures so inconceivably small that a vessel of one cubic inch capacity would hold five millions of them, form the greater bulk of the ocean bed. Seen through a microscope of intense magnifying power, they present the appearance of a hoop of transparent flint, enclosing a yellowish substance. The ends of the hoop are closed by valves, which are richly coloured and veined. Tupoli powder is made from these flints. The Victoria barrier in the Arctic Ocean, four hundred miles long, by a hundred and twenty miles wide, is also composed of them; and they abound largely in all the mineral bodies scattered over the earth. They constitute about one in five hundred of genuine guano, and thus afford a test of its quality. Ice packs, drifting down from the pole, are permeated with those minute organisms; in a word, they have largely assisted in forming the crust of our earth, as we have it. In the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean, their presence fills the water for miles with streaks and patches of yellowish light. They form, it is supposed, the food of the Salpæ which infest the ocean to such an extent as to give the water surface the consistency of thick oil. On the coast of California, the ocean often assumes a deep vermillion colour, from the myriads of bright animalculæ which float about in its depths. Microscopic Medusæ impart a greenish tint to the Arctic Ocean. It is computed that within the compass of two square miles there are more of those creatures than eighty thousand persons could have enumerated, counting for six thousand years, at the rate of a million per week. This green water extends over twenty thousand square miles.

Captain Ross observed a range of cliffs, on the shores of Baffin's Bay, which appeared as if draped in bright crimson cloth. On investigating the phenomenon he found that the snow, which covered the rocks to the depth of twelve feet, swarmed with multitudes of reddish eggs, supposed to be deposited by an insect which also inhabits the glaciers of the Alps. Shrimps, half an inch long, inhabit the reservoirs of concentrated brine in the salt works at Lymington, where they feed upon crimson-coloured animalculæ; star-fish have been brought up from a depth of one thousand and three hundred fathoms, a depth at which those delicate organisms must have sustained the pressure of a ton and a-half to the square inch.

Animal life has been found to exist and flourish in boiling springs and hot sand. Insects live in the hot waters of the Geysers, and when snow falls in Canada, it is overrun for miles by a description of insect, which appears at no other season of the year. Clouds of dust, blown from the land, are often encountered at sea. These clouds have been proved to consist of millions of infusoria, blown, it is supposed, from the African coast. Dragon flies have been seen, skitting about the billows, about six hundred, and butterflies, twelve hundred miles from land. These latter are sometimes met with in enormous numbers near shore.

The law of adaptability, is curiously illustrated by the blind bats, rats, spiders, and fishes, found in the caves of Kentucky. As those animals inhabit dark places, it has been suggested, that eyes would be of no possible use to them, and nature therefore, denied them superfluous organs. The author of the "Transmutation of Species," endeavours to show that they are the same as their eyed brethren, but that they lost sight through disease, whilst others maintain, that the two species are separated by a gulf, too vast to be bridged by so specious a theory. Shrimps, quite blind, have been found in deep wells in the South of England. The night-jar, a bird which inhabits the deep caverns of South America, the mole of Eastern Europe, and even the beetles and spiders found in the caves near Trieste, are stone blind. In some the optic nerve has been shown to exist, but without any external eye, to render it of use to its possessor. Nearer to home, fresh marvels challenge attention. The green slime of our ponds and ditches presents to the microscope a wonderful aggregate of life, being composed of innumerable little organisms, each perfect in its way, and fitted to discharge its peculiar function. The milicerta, a creature so small that no dot, however finely made, can be small enough to represent its size, builds a house for itself. It collects brick and mortar, lays its ranges one above the other, like a skilled mason, and cements the joinings with artist nicety. A recent observer, describing this curious creature, says, "as might be supposed, with such duties to perform, the little animal is furnished with an apparatus quite unique—a set of machinery to which, if we searched through the whole range of birds, beasts, fishes, and then, by way of supplement, examined the five-hundred-thousand species of insects to boot, we should find no parallel. It collects the materials for its bricks by a rapid motion of long cilia, arranged about its head, and accumulates the little particles thus drawn down into a cup-shaped cavity in a part of its body, which may be called its chin, and in which, by continued rotation, aided probably by a viscid secretion, they are consolidated into a globular pellet, which, by a sudden inflection of the animal, is deposited, when made, in the exact spot in which it is wanted—the entire process occupying about three minutes per brick."

Not less wonderful in their peculiar way are the fungi, with which our walks in the woods and fields have made us tolerably familiar. The common mushroom is not a bad type of the whole species; but fungi do not always present the inverted cup-form, appearing sometimes in the shape of streaks and blotches, and even as trailing bodies. One group has been found attached to iron which had been red-hot a few hours before; others grow upon lead, and large collections were made amongst the cinders lodged in the vertical bands of the dome of St. Paul's. They are often extremely destructive, as by their penetrating power they pierce the strongest wood, reducing its fibre to powder. The dry-rot, so feared in dock-yards, is an example of the manner in which fungi render the labour and care of man profitless. There it eats its way through the stoutest beams and the staunchest planks. Fungi enter our houses and eat up our floors, until the wood rots and the air is loaded with impure exhalations. The potato blight is the work of a fungus which attacks the tissues and leaves of the plants, inducing decay wherever it spreads. Fungi are found at all depths and elevations—in the bottoms of the deepest mines, on the tops of the highest mountains. They flourish in damp walls, cast clothing, putrescent animal or vegetable matter, alike on the smoothest, the roughest, the warmest, and the coldest surfaces. They have been discovered even in the lens of microscopes, and on the surface of opium. One species penetrates the corks of wine-bottles, and renders the wine unpleasant and positively unwholesome. Some will send down branched threads which absorb the contents of the vessel into their system, and soon empty it of the slightest trace of moisture. A fungus, which looks like a patch of red mould, has broken out in the inside of loaves baked but a few hours; whilst another clings to oil casks, and sucks their contents through the sides. They are fatal to hops, roses, vines, corn, cereals—indeed, they have almost abolished the culture of the vine in Madeira. A West Indian wasp is born with a fungus attached to its back, where it grows until it becomes heavier than the insect on which it preys, and finally kills him.

COMMERCIAL BADLY.—A man was taken up lately for robbing a fellow-lodger. He said he commenced by cheating a printer, and, after that, everything really came easy to him.

A GREAT FILIBUSTER.

GENERAL William Walker's history, whose exploits in Central America caused so much disquietude, a few years ago, forms an exciting narrative as ever fell to the share of the biographer. The son of a Scotchman and a banker, the man rose by the force of his individual genius, from the quiet occupations of a counting-house, to the dictatorship of more than one republic, and the command of a band of adventurers who, with no inconsiderable desires for plunder or profit, united a fair share of the old world chivalry and enterprise.

Walker was born in the United States, in the year, 1824. We know little of his early life, but it seems that he received a fair education, and distinguished himself as an industrious pupil. He studied law and physic, at one or more of the American Universities; and finally took to divinity. It is admitted upon all hands, that he had deep religious convictions, and that he turned his attention to divinity with a whole-heartedness and earnestness which promised well for the future. At the age of nineteen he visited Europe, and studied physic at some of the German Universities. Those who recollect him at this period describe him as a thoughtful, but impulsive young gentleman, remarkable for generosity, but violent and capricious in his likings and dislikes. He was always ready to plan and lend a revolt of the students; and it is not too much to conjecture, that in these exercises he developed much of the predatory instinct which eventually brought him to an ignominious end. He lived a few years in Paris, where, it appears, he attracted no notice; and thence, inspired by his restless desire for change, returned to America, and commenced life on his own account, as the editor of a New Orleans Newspaper. Of his politics, we know nothing, but, it is probable, they suited the democratic leanings of his "gentle public;" for, a short time after, we find him editing a journal in San Francisco, where he became rather popular as a clever and outspoken publicist. Journalism, however, was clearly not his forte, and he had the good sense to abandon it. A man brave enough to face a band of assassins, will quail before a group of indignant subscribers, and Walker was ill fitted to fill a post in which he was required frequently to substitute for his own opinions the current tendencies of the day. In 1853, he relinquished the editorial chair, and, calling himself colonel, led a band of adventurers into the province of Sonora, in Mexico. He succeeded in expelling the authorities, and establishing a free republic, which, unfortunately, did not last long. The people became discontented with the new regime; the Mexican government took advantage of the crisis, and attacked Walker in the capital. The colonel fought with a courage and recklessness which often aided him in his hour of need; but he was driven out eventually, and the republic became Mexican property once more. Walker disappeared after his defeat for some time. At the end of six months, he reappeared suddenly on the scene, this time as a general, and then commenced a career which fascinated whilst it alarmed the politicians of the world.

The five independent Republics clustered together on the strip of land known as Central America, had been for some time in a state bordering upon anarchy. At last, matters wore a threatening and disastrous aspect. The republics went to war with each other, and atrocities of the most horrible kind were committed by the belligerents. Nicaragua, through which runs the line of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, was convulsed by the struggles of two rival candidates for the presidency. Chamorro was elected in preference to his rival Castillon, and some hope of peace dawned for a moment on the horizon. This was quickly dissipated by Castillon, who invaded the state at the head of about eight hundred men, and sat down before the capital which was held by Chamorro. The latter was an able strategist; and as Castillon had no heavy guns to batter the place, he was about to raise the siege, when Walker came to him with offers of assistance. The general was gladly welcomed; and it was stipulated that on compelling Chamorro to surrender, he should receive a grant of 50,000 acres of land. On the 28th June he landed in Nicaragua. On the following day he defeated a squadron of the enemy's cavalry, capturing several prisoners at the same time. On the 30th he offered battle to Chamorro, and the engagement being accepted, he was defeated and obliged to make a precipitate retreat. Fortunately for himself, the ground offered obstacles to the manoeuvres of cavalry, and he succeeded in carrying off the remnant of his bands, his tents, and baggage. Two months elapsed before his return. The first news he heard was that the rival presidents had both died, and that the reins of government had been assumed by General Corail. Walker lost no time in attacking this new foe, but was signally repulsed. Seeing that his small force was insufficient to beat the enemy, he resorted to a stratagem, which shows the extraordinary fertility of the resources possessed by this wonderful man. Vanderbilt had established a line of steamers, which, by ascending the river San Juan, passing through Lake Monagua, abridged the land route across the isthmus to ten or twelve miles. The line, the permanence of which was guaranteed by several governments, was of the utmost importance; but this consideration did not interfere with Walker's plans. He seized two of the steamers on the night of the 12th of October, ascended the river, and took Granada by surprise, the following day. Corail's troops were strong enough to drive him out, but their leader was indolent; and this fact, coupled with the determination shown by Walker to punish with death all who resisted his authority, established his power in the state. Corail himself recognised the general, and was rewarded for his compliance with the portfolio of Minister of War. The presidency was given to Palucio Rivas, on whom the burthen of the government was thrown, for special purposes, by Walker, who retained all the executive power to himself, whilst his proxy bore all the responsibility of the administration. In a few months this arrangement fell to pieces. Whether justly or no, the War Minister was charged with and convicted of treason, and Walker, in whose side he had long been a thorn, ordered him to be shot. The sentence was carried out with indecent haste. The execution excited considerable indignation even amongst the general's own partisans, but it was quickly forgotten in the crisis which immediately followed. Costa Rica was troubled by bands of filibusters, who crossed the frontiers and spread devastation in the state. The president collected troops to resist them; and Walker, fearing that this demonstration was aimed at himself, declared war against Costa Rica. Again he seized the transit steamers, and attacked the enemy, this time with less success. Various engagements were fought, but notwithstanding the expenditure of life on both sides, neither obtained any solid advantage. Whilst the general was thus occupied, Rivas fled to Leon, where he established himself, and raised the flag of revolt against his late master. The three republics of Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador, alarmed for their independence, formed a league to destroy the general. The latter was not dismayed by this fresh combination. He was elected president, encountered the allies, and almost annihilated them in a series of pitched battles. They were ready to despair when the Costa Ricans, this time capturing the transit vessels, took the forts defending the passage of the San Juan, and cut off the general's supplies. At last, he was shut up completely, and had decided on throwing himself on the mercy of the allies; but he contrived to win terms from them, guaranteeing his and his comrades' lives. On the 1st of May, 1857, he left Central America for the States. He had not given up all ideas of conquest at the time, and his ambition was fostered by the encouragement which reached him from all sides. An opportunity soon presented itself. Costa Rica and Nicaragua had gone to war, about some difficulties respecting the transit route, and both States were in a sad state of commotion. Walker seized the moment to collect two hundred followers, whom he induced to join his flag, by promises of extravagant rewards. He landed at Greytown, and was preparing to march forward, when Paulding, the American Commander on the station, arrested the general and his band, and sent them back to the States. So great was the terror inspired by the filibuster, that no sooner had the belligerent republics heard of his approach, than they forgot their differences, and united to resist their common foe; and an arrangement was concluded by which England and the States undertook the protection of the transit route thenceforward. But Walker was not to be deterred by this formidable difficulty. He assembled a fresh band of adventurers in Ruatan, one of the bay islands, which they reached in fruit vassels. With one hundred men he took Trincillo, in Honduras, and invited the population to throw off the yoke of the established government. On the 21st of August, 1859, the British war-ship Icarus compelled Walker to quit the town; and being chased by some Honduras regiments, he and his band were captured. He was immediately tried by court-martial and shot. So strongly was public indignation aroused by his acts, that the inhabitants sought to prevent his remains being decently interred. All accounts concur in stating, that he met his fate like a brave man, that he accepted the consolations of religion, and expressed lively sorrow for his misdeeds.

THE "FLOWER OF THE WELL."

A STORY OF MAY DAY.

AMONGST the many singular superstitions once so popular in the remote country districts, "skimming the well," on May morning, was not the least curious. With the first light of daybreak a person repaired to some famous spring, where, by taking the "cream" from the surface, whilst uttering a strictly conventional incantation, it was supposed that his or her neighbour's cows would cease to yield butter, their falling off being compensated for by the sudden increase in the yield of their own. The ceremony falls under the general name of pishogues, that is to say, charms, by which the "good people" were propitiated in behalf of the celebrant. Countless stories and legends have this odd custom for a common basis; and, as in all proceedings where the supernatural element is supposed to be invoked, fairies have been described as taking a share in the process.

Every one in Drumsbawn, from Bill Hagarty, whose forge stood at the east of the village, to Johnny Walker, the "tea-man," whose "general grocery and spirit establishment," was situate at the west, knew Grace Lanigan. She was a little, wiry-limbed, blear-eyed, old woman, who went about the village in a red hood and a check apron, her feet encased in a pair of high-sounding brogues. Grace betrayed in her attire a gipsyish fondness for plaids and bright coloured fabrics in consequence of which she was popularly known by the nick-name of "the ould dandy." Amongst her other peculiarities, she was passionately addicted to the use of a short, black pipe, which it was believed was scarcely absent from her mouth even when she slept. In all matters of witchcraft, spells, and charms, Grace was an able and illustrious proficient. She could tell fortunes by a process which these pages do not afford room to describe; she cultivated the house-look in the thatch of her cottage, and had a horse shoe nailed to the side-post, as a protection from the imps and elves that do mischief by night. No season of the year passed over without its special superstitious observance—Shrovetide, Midsummer, Halloween, each had its peculiar rite. Much has been written to fasten the charge of gross impiety on educated persons of the class to which Grace belonged; yet it is not too much to say that learning and logic are misused when thus applied, and that the world will persist in believing that the evil of our superstitions is more than counterbalanced by their poetry and imaginativeness.

Grace had once been well-to-do in the world, but dark days had befallen her. She had been a rich girl, and it was when her fortune was at its height that she had married a man who was a member of a family of broken party and petty action. It was not in vain she had brought her fortune to the altar, but the badness of the times and her own misfortune could not prevent her coming again to a condition of poverty and distress. In later years, as Mrs. Fennell followed her, Grace had left her a patch of land and a small house. These she had, and a thing more.

We omitted from this brief history, Nick Lanigan, her only son, a youth of some twenty summers, who had not done any good; and intended, if appearances meant anything, to carry out that useful programme to the end of his days. Nick stood nearly six feet in his vantage, and was as fine a specimen of the raw-bone type of manly beauty as could be found in the province. He had a head of red hair, and a pair of eyes which fell in two great shocks over his temples, and covered his scalp with a stiff crop resembling scrubbed brushwood. The lid of his right eye depended permanently to such an extent that it almost covered the orb below it, and had his face a winking expression which, in combination with the solemn grotesqueness of his mouth and the receding line of his chin, constituted a physiognomy at once ludicrous, hopeless, and impotent. Nick had the reputation of being a fool, and to some extent the popular belief was countenanced by his acts and sayings. It was said that he slept on the floor in a sack, and that no amount of instruction could induce him to remember the exact number of people in a shilling. He went hatless and shoeless in all weathers, turning up the ends of his trousers so as to expose a pair of lean calves, horribly coloured by exposure to fire and weather. Yet, in the main Nick was no fool, and what is better, no coward. He was wise enough to refuse all belief in his mother's spells and charms, and wicked enough to provoke her by expounding her pishogues. If only rebuked for a misdemeanour, he would place his back to the wall, and laugh like a tickled griffin until the tears started into his eyes, and his sides ached from shaking. But whenever his mother's displeasure sought an outlet in blows, Nick would "make" for the door, and betake himself to a neighbouring lime-kiln where he lived on roasted potatoes, often for three consecutive days, until the storm blew over.

At last, he sinned grievously against the parental authority, and was driven from the house with a volley of injunctions, "never to darken the door after during the rest of his mortal life." The expulsion cost the hopeless youth little anxiety. As he said himself, "he was used to it," and he returned to his old quarters with a sobriety of temper and an alacrity of pace which would have done honour to a greater philosopher. The cause of the fracas was this. One May-day, Grace, who had been mysteriously absent in the morning, returned home about noon, drew her creeper to the fire, and having lighted her black pipe, took a meditative smoke up the chimney. Mother and son were silent for many minutes—the one enjoying her pipe, the other profoundly engaged in the manufacture of bird-lime. Any one looking at the two would have guessed that no common anxiety lay at Grace's heart—in anxiety in which Nick had more share than he wished should be made public. Eventually, Grace began to rock herself from side to side, a proceeding which always gave Nick considerable displeasure, and often forced him to quit the house.

"Musha, mother," he asked, at last, lifting his head from the bird-lime and casting a malicious look at the old woman, "isn't that child asleep yet?"

Grace, who fully appreciated the force of the joke, raised her head for a moment, and slowly resumed her rocking movement.

"Nick," she said, after a short pause, "you must soon go out and turn a hand for yourself. Things is going to the bad—worse and worse—and if I can make out a bit an' sup for myself, it's more than I'll be able to do for you, you idlin' vagabone."

"Why, then, isn't your friends, the good people, goin' to befrind yez a bit, afther all yer thrubble to plaze them—eh, mother?"

Grace took a long whiff and knocked out the ash of her pipe on the hob. "Faix, avourneen, I believe they're just as hard up as ourselves, the crathurs, an' more's the pity."

"Musha, don't be runnin' away wid yer seven senses entirely, mother. Av coorse, *Ni ghul saoi gam locht, and that's nayther here nor there wid people that have oceans of goold and silver to do

* No one's without a failing.

as they likes wid. I'll be tell now, an' the cow runnin' as they as a cart wheel, yez didn't skim the milk this mornin'!"

Grace grinned profusely and crossed her arms on her breast. "It's not the first good thing a fool said," she answered, "and I did tery to skim the well this mornin', but I might as well be attin'goin' to prod the black moon with a knittin'-needle."

"Is she in her right mind at all?" said Nick, by way of an apostrophe addressed to a third party. "Horns and knittin'-needles, inah!"

"Yerra, you on all that, sure 'tis hard enough to get any on lers—lan into that red head of yers. Afther all my thrubble, I might as well be pratin' to the grille, as thyrin' to larn yez."

"Ah, thin, does yez hear her?" continued Nick, with a most unfilial interruption. "Isn't it as aisy for you to say, wanst for all in all, av yez skimmed the well this mornin'? Begor if yez didn't, give the cow a goold medal and pansion her off decently, this minute!"

"Haven't I told yez I was up and skimmed it, aisy enough, you basthoon?" shouted Grace, whose temper was visibly declining in the wrong direction.

"Now that's a plain answer," rejoined Nick, suppressing a laugh. Av yez said that at fast see all the thrubble yez spare yerself. Why thin, mother, now that yer comin' out reasonable, tell us all about it, won't yez?"

"Until yez bell it all over the parish, I suppose," said Grace, with a little bitterness.

"Is it me, mother! Dickons the word then. Yez'll hear iv it from me, I be bail."

Grace having been repeatedly re-assured that Nick would preserve her secret inviolably, and impelled by the natural desire we are fond to lighten our burthens by sharing them with others, took her place from her mouth and began as follows:—

"Yez see Nick, as the ould cow, bads scannin to her, was makin' up her mind to give up milkin' completely, I sez to myself that I'd see what could be done by settin' a charm to take away Biddy Grady's crame and butther and bring it back to ourselves. May mornin', you know, great a fool as you are, is the only time of the year to set the rale charm; so I got up before the cock was crowin', and set off to Tubber-ahina with the new skimmer in my pocket. An' when I got to the brink iv the well, lo and behold you! what was sittin' there forinst me on the top iv a bulrush but an ould crather about the hoith of a piggin! Arrah, yez should see his nose! 'twas as long an' as sharp as Paddy Crosby's shears, and on the top iv his shoulders he had a hump like a sergeant's knapsack. There he was sated as nate as tuppence, and as grand as a lord."

"Mornin' ma'am," sez he, winkin' at me wid his two eyes.

"Musha, the same to yerself, sez I, 'if there's no offence in wishin' it'."

"Troth an' there's not, ma'am," sez my ould laddo. 'Isn't it airly yer out?' sez he, agin."

"'Ever one to his taste,' sez I, as the lady said when she kissed her cow."

"Indeed," sez he, 'Indeed! Is it any harm to ask when yerself kissed yer cow last?'

"Oh, faix, as for that matther," sez myself, makin' answer to him, 'tis as the fit comes an' goes. It isn't every day a heifer can dhry her mouth,' sez I, wid a cambric handkercher."

"Thru for you, Mrs. Lanigan," says he, giving a twist atop iv the bulrush. 'Are yez makin' much by your butther those times?'

"As yez asked the kushition civil, agragal, sez I, I'd be sorry to deave yez. Why thin, I'm bate intirely this sayson. Yez might as well be milkin' a milestone as to persuade the cow to do her duty; an', sez I, followin' up the discourse, 'if somethin' don't turn up this mornin', I'll have to give up house and home, and go weedin', or bindin', or somethin' iv that sort."

"Skim away," siz he, 'skim away, Mrs. Lanigan, and the devil is in it,' says he, scratchin' his head, and takin' a pinch iv snuff. 'if yez don't do better nor yer doin'."

"More power to yez," sez I to him, dippin' the new skimmer into the well; and faith it was hardly wet, when I hears a great halloooin' over head, and on lookin' up, does yez see, what was there above me, flyin' about in the air, but two or three foine lee-lies, galavantin' wid aich other, and makin' the curiousest noise I ever heard. Well, whilst they kept gingle and turnin', all iv a sudden as Murty Regan's mare broke her leg, they set up a cry of 'Butther is goin', butther is comin'; alew!" I cocks my eye at thim, and sees stat, barrin' the quare way they had of butttherin' up and down, they were nate lookin' girls, dressed in poplin from top to toe, only that it was a bit thin and shaly from bein' washed so often. The ould gentleman that was forinist me was gone asleep when I wanted to ask him who they were, but jest straight at his back, I seen another couple iv boyos roostin' atop iv the adges. One iv them was smokin' a pipe a bit shorter than my own dudheen, and to see his ould shrivelled-up face workin' in and out as he tuk his draht, would make a milestone burst with laughter. But the thing that was wid in hanged anythin' I iver dhreent iv. Yerra, Nick, he had a and on his shoulders for all the world like a carrot, and out iv it was two horns, turned round and round like a cat's tail at the inds.

"Takin' yer smoke," says myself to the gossoon wid the pipe.

"Musha, who gave yer knowledge?" sez he, puttin' down the ashes wid the butt of his little finger. "Dickons shant me, Mike," sez he, turnin' to the other gossoon, "but those ignorantus will bate us clane out iv the country before shrovetide."

"Sure any one hearkenin' to yer would think 'twas the school-maester was spakin'," sez I, "barrin' he'd hang a dozen iv yer seed and breed in the ink-bottle at his button-hole."

"Didn't I tell yer, Mike?" sez he, turnin' round agin to the chap wid the horns. "We won't stand it no longer," sez he, takin' the pipe from his mouth. "And what ill wind blew yer here so airly, Mrs. Lanigan?" says he.

"I'd be sorry to deaseve yer," sez I, "though I wish it was some-one else put the kushun. Isn't it as plain as the pipe in yer ugly gob that 'twas no good wind dhruv me where you are?"

"Butther is goin', butther is comin'," cried the girls high above us.

"Does yer hear that, Mrs. Lanigan?" sez my neighbour—"are yer listenin' to that?" sez he, wid a grin that went from ear to ear. "if yer hasn't lost all yer teeth, skin the well, and take to yer shankers sez he 'or the devil remove the bit av butther ye'll see, whilst yer name's Grace."

"Tisn't the first time somebody, I wont minstion, gave a good advice," sez I and here's at yer; and wid that I dipped the skimmer agin into the well, but I might as well thry to lift the wather into a sieve, for it all ran out through the bottom."

"Begor, yer done for at last," sez the ould bosthoon, cacklin' to himself wid divarshin. "Thry it agin" sez he, there's many a slip 'tween the cup and the lip, Mrs. Lanigan, darlint."

"What makes the wather run through the skimmer," sez I, gettin' angry?

"Don't you see the reason," sez he—"arrah becase it won't stop in it, Mrs. Lanigan."

"Yer been to school, maester," sez I to him, "and by the same token, yer always sat on the windy side av the hedge, and the didn't hear much iv the larnin' ma bouchal."

"Ah, thin, Grace," sez he, lookin' as airyious as a bed poet, "there's a pair av us there, ai?" And wid that the pair of geese set up a screech of laughin' that set me dancin' in the tanthruma."

"Butther is goin'—butther is comin'," sez the ladies.

"Yer better out yer stick, Grace," says the ould fellow, "or skim the well at wast. Take another dip agragal, and who knows the luck yer may git."

"So I took him at his word, and put the skimmer down a second time, but keepin' out the tide wid a pitchfork, was divarshin to thryin' to take up the crane wid a skimmer that wouldn't hould chaney-alley."

"The boyos began laughin'," my dear, agin, and sis they, "Grace did yer meet 'er, a red haired woman this mornin'?"

"Troth, no," sis I.

"Did yer come across 'er a magpie?" sis they.

"Troth I didn't," sez I agin.

"Maybe you overlooked Nick's throwin' an ould shoe afther yer, as yer left the house," says the lad wid the horns.

"Begannys, yer right, my lucko," sez I, rememberin it all of a hape.

"Then" sez he, "yer might as well be bailen out the green ay wid a bottomless thimble. Lave it alone, scouable, and butther luck next time."

"The words was hardly out av his mouth when I hears a great halloo in the air, and on lookin' up, may I never turn another sod av turf if the air for a mile round wasn't thick wid furies, flyin' from all quarters, wid keelers of milk fastened to their backs. Arrah, to see them was a thrate worth walkin' a distance for. Some av them had tails, and some av them no tails at all; some av them had beards cockin' stiff out av their chins, and some had no more beard on thim than yerself, avic. You needn't be scrapin' yer chun, Nick, 'tis as bare as the dale table there. Such noses and faces I never seen before; and whilst they were batin' about the bushes, the girls set up the ould song agin, "Butther is goin'—butther is comin'." Immediately all the gossoons rowed the full of their keelers into a big tub, and sez one, "let Grace Lanigan look out now," sez he, "for if her oow was as ould as Methusala, she'll milk as much now as a pratytalk." Hearnin' this discourse, I made another dip iv the skimmer, and no sooner I missed it agin than Larry Hayes' cock (devil choke him) began crowin', and all the fairies vanished from my sight. So, Nick, darlint, look out for yerself, av yer have look at your side. I've towld yer all, look, stock, and barrel. There'll be no more milk, no more nothin'; troth I see—"

"Wait a bit, mother," exclaimed Nick, and as he spoke he took up a position between her and the door. "Have yer the skimmer about yer?"

"Faix I have, safe and sound, in my pocket, alanna."

"And did yer look at the bottom av it when yer set off to skim the well this mornin'?"

"Deed thin I didn't."

"Well, thin, look at it now, and ye'll find three round holes burned wid a red hould-fast in the bottom av it."

Grace held the skimmer between her eyes and the cloudy light that came through the window. A brief examination of the utensil verified Nick's statement.

"Ah, thin, who done this, alanna?" she asked, "ai, who done this? tell me."

"Musha, faith, mother, 'twas me, for the fun av it," replied her hopeful son.

Grace grasped the bent hoop which served for a tongs in her humble household, and rushed at her guilty offspring. Nick, who evidently anticipated such a movement, escaped from the house and stood "mopping and mowing" before the door. "And, mother does yer know why the ould cow's milk ran short? Shure yer ul never guess—faith, becase I dhrank it."

A suppressed scream was Grace's only answer. "While there's life in yer body," she shouted, "shun this house, I warn yer, mind, I warn yer;" and with these words she closed the door, and re-seated herself on the creepspeen.

Nick, we are told, stayed away for three weeks, and in his absence, so considerable was the increase in the yield of milk, that Grace recovered her temper, forgave her undutiful son, and thenceforth grew somewhat credulous in the potency of charms, though she clung faithfully to her old belief in the world of Faery.

TALES ABOUT PEACOCKS.

E are not going to write the natural history of the peacock. It has been done over and over again; and although proverbial philosophy has taught us that a good story cannot be told too often, another equally wise saw, with the sharpest possible teeth, has assured us that too much of one thing is good for nothing. And then, again, supposing that we felt any disposition to write learnedly about the gay plumed bird of Juno, and to enter into an anatomical inquiry respecting his bony structure, his nervous system, and the rest of it, our space would necessitate us so mightily to abridge, that we should ultimately become the modern illustration of an old Latin sarcasm, and, labouring to be brief, become obscure. And, lastly, we are not remarkable for an acquaintance with Natural History; and although our knowledge of ornithology may be sufficient to teach us the difference between a hawk and a heron, yet we do not profess to be great upon the subject; and have no stray letters of the alphabet attached to our name, duly conferred at any time, by any college, anywhere. All we propose to do is to gossip about the peacock.

A gay gallant is the peacock, as he struts about in the sunshine, his beautiful coat resplendent in the light, his sharp eyes looking about as if he courted praise, and felt that he deserved it. His form so graceful, as his long tail sweeps the ground like the train of a countess; or, as he sometimes stands before his less-endowed brethren, and spreads that tail of his in a gleaming semicircle, bright and gay, gleaming with its black disks and rings of gold. Yes; a noble fellow is the peacock. His small head crowned with a crest of feathers, choice and erect; his neck long and slender, tapering gracefully from the breast upwards; his back and wings of a light ash colour, mingled with black; his head, and neck, and breast of a greenish blue, with a gloss which, in the sunbeams, appears exceedingly brilliant; his eyes set between two stripes of white; the feathers of his tail of a changeable mixture of green, blue, purple, and gold. Standing thus before us, he is one of the most beautiful objects imaginable.

The earliest mention which we can trace of the peacock, is in the Book of Job. At what period that book was written, is itself uncertain, but there is little doubt that it is the most ancient book in the world—"All Men's Book," Carlyle calls it, and so it is a truly Catholic production. There in the strange mysterious story of the man of Uz, God himself challenges the patriarch to reply to, amongst other questions, this query: "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacock, or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?" Thus it would appear, even in those early days, when the world was young, the peacock was famed for his beautiful plumage, and had become an object of general admiration.

At a later period, when Solomon the Wise was king over Israel, and the fame of his doings was world-wide, peacocks but added to the attraction of his court. The glory of the Jewish people had culminated in their king, Solomon, whose wisdom surpassed the wisdom of the Egyptians, whose fame was in all nations round about; who had spoken three thousand proverbs, and composed a thousand and five songs; who had written of trees, from the cedar of Lebanon, to the hyssop which grew upon the wall; who was conversant with the habits and characters of beasts, and fowl, and creeping things, and fishes; who had received the congratulations of surrounding sovereigns; who had reared the temple at Jerusalem, employing in the labour thirty thousand men. Even Solomon, the jurisprudent, thought, it a desirable thing to have the gaudy peacock in his court, for once "in three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks." It is a high honour to the noble family of peacocks, that Solomon should have had them imported to his court, in order to gratify his taste for the beautiful productions of nature.

The recollection of the great Hebrew king leads us to think of another potent sovereign, who, in after days, by battle and victory, established his name for ever in the world's history, but who, in his moment of brilliant triumph, could afford to pay a tribute to the supremacy of Nature. We allude to Alexander the Great—that sovereign who wept for other worlds to conquer. Even this "monarch of all he surveyed," whose motto, in truth, might have been "Veni, vidi, vici," was so struck with the beauty of peacocks, that, when in India, on the banks of the river Hyarotis, he laid a heavy fine and punishment on any person who should, in any way, wound, injure, or disturb them.

About this time a pair of peacocks were carried to Athens as great curiosities. The rumour of their arrival spread all over Greece. It would appear that from distant parts the rich and noble took a journey to the classical city, and paid rather exorbitantly for a view of the wonderful birds. "Going to look at the peacocks in Greece" was a popular phrase of that period; "going to look at a peacock in the Gardens of the Dublin Zoological Society" is a popular saying of the year 1862.

So highly prized were peacocks in Greece, that the price of a pair then exceeded thirty pounds of our present money. At a later period, the Grecian ladies had the tail feathers of peacocks arrayed in their semicircular sweeps, and used them as fans; bright, beautiful, fans they were, with the brilliant colour and the glittering gold shining in the light, and the fashion contributed very greatly to the picturesque costume of those ancient dames.

When the city of the seven hills, in its turn, began to exercise influence over the world, and the Roman eagle came pouncing on the lesser birds of heaven, peacocks were highly esteemed in Rome. Rome, the mistress of the world, had grown voluptuous. Her nobles contended with each other in the empty vanity of titles and surnames; they invented or selected the most lofty and sonorous appellations—such as Reburus or Fabunius, Pagonius or Tyrrusius. They measured their rank and consequence by the loftiness of their chariots, the magnificence of their apparel, the novelty of their pleasures, and the delicacy of their food. A strong and especial regard had they for the latter. At the Roman tables, the birds, the squirrels, or the fish which appeared of an uncommon size, were contemplated with curious interest, and the scales were duly brought to ascertain their exact weight, and notaries were summoned to attest, by an authentic record, the truth of the marvellous event.

In those days it was fashionable among the great men at Rome to eat peacocks, not because peacocks were delicious eating, but because they were expensive. The manner in which the peacocks were prepared for table is uncertain: for it appears that, after the highest seasoning, their flesh is still black, tough, and when compared with that of other birds, but poor and insipid. But peacock was an aristocratic dish. It belonged to a class. The expense prevented the common sort from offering so costly a viand. It is said, that the man who first undertook to fatten peacocks for the markets made his fortune by the trade. Hortentius, the orator, was the Roman noble who first ordered them to be served up at his table as an article of food, and he became highly celebrated on this account. How long peacocks were considered a delicious and costly article of diet does not appear. In France, during the days of King Francis—of cloth of gold renown—these birds were still used at the entertainment of the great and noble. At a somewhat earlier period it seems that they were eaten in England, but at that time they were only introduced to garnish the festive board. The fashion then was to take off the skin of the bird, and having prepared the flesh with salt and spices, the skin was again drawn on, so that the bird appeared in full plumage, and in no wise injured by the preparation. Thus fitted up for service, it was kept for many years to be set on the table in full dress—its tail spread to full proportions, and a very marvel to behold—on all great occasions. At weddings, and other high times, they filled the beak and throat of the bird with cotton and camphor, which was set on fire for the entertainment of the company.

Our first peacocks were brought from the East Indies; and we are assured that they are still found in vast flocks in a wild state in Java and Ceylon. Ælian says they were brought into Greece from a barbarous country. Its introduction to the west was probably originally owing simply to the beauty of the bird. Aristophanes mentions Persian peacocks, and Suidas calls them "Median birds." Aufidius Hurio is charged by Pliny with being the first who fattened up the peacock for the feast of the luxurious.

The pea-hen seldom lays above five or six eggs in this climate before she sits. Aristotle, indeed, informs us that she lays twelve. It is by no means improbable that she may be thus prolific in other and more favourable climates, for it is certain that in their own native forests they are numerous beyond expression. The common age of the bird is twenty years, and not until the third year does it display its gay, beautiful, and variegated plumage. There are various descriptions of this bird, some of which are white, others crested; that which is called the peacock of Thibet is the most beautiful of the feathered creation, containing in its plumage all the most vivid colours, red, blue, yellow, and green, disposed in an almost artificial order, as if merely to please the eye of the beholder.

Buffon says: "Climate has not less influence on the plumage of birds than on the fur of quadrupeds. We have seen that the hare, the ermine, and most other animals, are subject to become white in cold countries, especially in winter; and now we find a species of peacock which appears to have experienced the same results from the same cause, and more important ones still; for this cause has produced a permanent race in this species, and seems to have acted more powerfully upon the feathers of this bird, since the whiteness of hares and ermine is but transient, taking place during the winter only, like that of the wood-hen and lapopus; but the white peacock is always white in summer as in winter, in Rome, as in Torneo; and this new colour has become so fixed, that from eggs laid and hatched in Italy come white peacocks."

Strangely beautiful is this description of peacocks. Although the birds be white, a creamy white, they still retain some vestiges of the gorgeous colouring peculiar to the species. They carry in their plumage the impression of the different colours, indicated by a whiteness more or less pure. These birds are highly valued, and produced a strikingly beautiful appearance in a group of gay plumed peacocks, bright with all the colours of the rainbow.

In the "French Encyclopædia," Sonnini says that the race of white peacocks is not essentially original to the north, for, in 1783, a pair of common peacocks produced at Gentili, near Paris, four young ones, two of which preserved the plumage of their parents, and two were entirely white. Nevertheless, Manduyt, who relates this fact, observes that there was no white peacock in the village nor in the environs. The same thing occurred, a few years before, in an estate equally near Paris. It then appears, that the whiteness of the plumage of the peacock is a simple accidental variety, which one cannot regard as forming a permanent race; and what seems to prove this still more is, that these white peacocks are very rare. A peacock bears the first rank among domestic fowls, as the eagle does among the birds of prey; for which reason the ancients consecrated the eagle to Jupiter, and the peacock to Juno. Young writes:—

"How rich the peacock! what bright glories run
From plume to plume, and vary in the sun!
He proudly spreads them to the golden ray,
Gives all his colours, and adorns the day;
With conscious state the spacious round displays,
And slowly moves amid the waving blaze."

FAVERSHAM ON HIS WAY TO FAME.

BY BLANCHARD JERROLD.

CHAPTER XXI.

COURTSHIP!" expostulates Mr. Clifton, addressing ourselves. "Am I courting Miss Faversham, who will have at least £400, per annum. I, the seedy tutor, who has missed his chance, and is now an adventurer, with plenty to say, depend upon it, but with no forum, no open page, no pulpit. You remind me of my family—well, it's true we quarter—but never mind, quarterings in these degenerate days will never tempt girls to halve their substance with classic beggars."

The reader will perceive that Mr. Clifton's courage has failed him already. He thought, when closetted in Arthur Mellon's room, that he had the courage to woo the lady calmly, and with calculation for her money. He would set his shield against her purse, get Henry Faversham to intercede, make a bold stroke, and trust to fortune for the rest. But, Clifton was a gentleman.

"Not very," Clara replied, we thought a little coquettishly.

"I grant, Miss Faversham," Clifton continued, "that it is difficult to prove even the existence of the subject upon which your book is based; but, granting that there is a spontaneous and sudden sympathy which springs up between some people when they first meet, a romance founded upon feeling at once so unselfish and so potent must surely prove amusing at least, if it have the least affinity to nature in it." Clifton was always fond of elaborating his phrases.

"I am sure, Mr. Clifton, I am not able to follow all your learned reasons. All I know is that the people talk in the book as I have never heard people speak in society."

"Oh! I say!" interposed Arthur Mellon, who felt that the conversation was about to become exceedingly dull, "let me finish my reading now, Mr. Clifton. Marston is coming to see me at two. We're to go to the Polytechnic together to hear Professor Poppies tell about the time when big tortoises ran about London."

Clara was not pleased with Arthur; nor, when Clifton had found a seat beyond the eye-range of Miss Faversham, did the tutor spare the pupil.

"Gertrude, or Love at First Sight," was taken up once more, and the pretty finger rested again against the rounded cheek, and the gnarled seat received the slender arm. New sensations passed into Clara's heart, and she held them there with pleasure. The hero of the book and the heroine took a new and more impassioned form. Her eyes wandered with keener eagerness than before over the pages of their sad story. The story was one with a moral, and to the elucidation of this moral the natural flow of life was twisted. It coursed not—as under our nose it courses usually—in flowing words or in arrow-straightness, but it took queer and sudden angles. It wandered here and there, to strange stoppages and perplexing interminglings, but, then, it showed virtue triumphant in the end; and so it was a highly moral book. The young people who had loved at first sight were subsequently exhibited at the head of a most uncomfortable home, amid a swarm of children, and with an empty cupboard. The husband was, as a matter of course, very tired of his wife; and she, not to be behind-hand in pointing an example, had a sneaking partiality for one of her lord's friends. These are, of course, the average issues of marriages that spring from love at first sight. But Clara is not in love with Mr. Clifton; why, then, need the sad story of Gertrude Dovelace depress her?

Mr. Clifton again told his friends that he had met the loveliest girl in Europe.

"Any tin?" Mr. Pontifex inquired, as he dipped into a spirit-lamp for a cigar-light, displaying to his opposite neighbours the most elaborate wrist-studs.

"Heaps!" was the curt reply of Mr. Clifton.

"What is she like?" pursued the exquisite Pontifex, with the air of a man not to be easily caught by female charms.

Here Clifton showed his good taste. He declined to describe Miss Faversham. Her image was something to him already, too sacred for presentment in club atmosphere. He was even sorry that he had satisfied his friend's curiosity about her fortune. He begged that the subject might be dropped at once—was generally voted "spooney"—and turned lightly off to discuss the debate of the previous evening.

The reader may be certain that Arthur Mellon was not slow to see all the benefits and indulgences he might derive from the evident pleasure Clara and Clifton mutually felt in hearing about each other. Clifton sent Miss Faversham books, with his compliments. They were generally, she owned, rather dull; but, then, she worried her little head readily with the endeavour to make something out of them—Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection," "Célebs in Search of a Wife," the "Life of Mrs. Fry." She laughed at serious Mr. Clifton, with his high-flown strict notions. Aye—she laughed now as she had laughed when she met him at her father's house.

And so Faversham's friends—some sneering and mocking, others making calculations against the chances of happiness, moved towards matrimony. Topley, the poorest of the band who boasted the acquaintance of Mr. Faversham, of course, as we have seen, married first. Namby's heart is still intact; but that stout citadel, guarded as it is by the mockery and disdain of the habitual jester, may fall some fine morning, when the guards shall be asleep at their posts. Indeed, Mr. Namby had been heard to remark, that the comic man was a very sensitive animal, who hid himself in his cloud of facetiæ, as the inkfish hides himself from his pursuers. Clowns have their tender passions, and who, pray, so devoted as Pantaloon? Love gathers his rosebuds where he may, and flutters under the motley, as through the white muslin of the school-girl; so there is hope for Namby yet, as there is hope for Mr. Jack Ashby. One never knows where a fever may break out. The sanitary doctor thrusts his sensitive nose up the courts and along the rents, and into the mews, but the Fun has escaped him. It is not here burning a beggar in his patches,—it is yonder where the great round tower stands bearing the proudest flag the breeze ever stirred. Under that flag in a quiet recess, where every finger is lifted to the lip, and every eye is moist; where the learning of a kingdom is gathered to offer pelf there has Fun found his prey. So love leaves no way untrodden. So love turns up in unexpected places, and whether he picks up the sovereign's sceptre or the cowherd's staff, blesses it.

The meetings of Mr. Clifton and Miss Faversham had not been many. They had been introduced at a party given by Mrs. Mellon (as the reader may deign to remember,) in the house of the lady's grave and respected father. Their last meetings are matters of yesterday. The new position which Mr. Clifton had assumed in the Mellon household had stiffened his relations with their attractive visitor. He had never been intimate with the Mellon family, so that when, through Miss Faversham's brother, he was introduced as tutor to the young hopeful of the house, he may be said to have entered it at a disadvantage. Moneyed people of the middle-class are so pleased to find persons of education whom they can have in their pay, and so, to appear to carry on the same scheme of life as the aristocracy, that they are apt to be haughty, and distant, and repelling to the cultivated people whom they employ to educate their children. This is the vulgarity of the middle-class which has moved the eloquent wrath of Sir Edward Lytton. The governess is better treated in the house of my lord duke than in that of the alderman. The alderman must make his power felt. He is compelled to say, daily, behold the mightiness of him who is head of the ward of Sherrysoken! Scullion, will you bow before his worship? Jeames, in the Clapham Hall, will you look reverently upon the mat as his worship passes to his coach? Governess, aspire not to eat at the same board with his worship. Know that this honour is reserved for Mr. Deputy Coppens, and gentlemen of his lofty kidney. It is true that your father was an Oxford gentleman of eminent culture; that the sweep of his master's gown rustled the autumn leaves of Addison's classic grove by majestic Magdalen. But, pshaw! the man left his widow a hundred a year, six children, and an unfinished manuscript on the value of learning. Look at his worship's banker's book, and be humble—very humble. Mrs. Mellon was not a sample of a city lady. We have already had occasion to observe that she affected a passionate taste for celebrities.

"I do so like clever men," she said to all her guests.

Mr. Mellon's opinion of the clever men whom Mrs. Mellon had invited was, that they were insufferable dullards and puppies.

"Give me a man who can talk sense, who has a date for everything, who knows what two and two make, and not your maudling talkers about infinite space, Browningism, Buskinism, and every confounded ism in the world."

Mr. Mellon, with these opinions planted in his city brain, had no great veneration—indeed, he had no respect for Mr. Clifton. When he paid this gentleman for services, Mr. Clifton became his servant, and consequently fell beneath the city man's level.

"My dear, Mr. Clifton is a very clever creature, I assure you. You don't understand these people. You, city men, are more solid—but—"

"But, ugh, my dear, a fig for their cleverness. This cleverness breeds genteel poverty, which we, practical men, are obliged to employ. This Mr. Clifton comes from Oxford. Well, is he worth his £100 a year to any firm? Answer me that."

"Money, money—always money. You are the most provoking creature alive. Chacun son metier."

"Eh! my dear?"

"Whenever I talk to you about something that is not mere matter of fact, you rattle your city money-box in my ears. I declare it is becoming quite unbearable."

And so the good couple went on. Mrs. Mellon had her little réunions of celebrities; and Mr. Mellon shrugged his shoulders and minded his whist.

Mrs. Mellon asked Mr. Clifton to her great annual ball. When he arrived, Mr. Mellon gruffly received him.

"My son's tutor," he said aside to an ex-deputy-sheriff near him. The ex-deputy-sheriff smiled with a patronizing air; as saying to himself—"Mr. Mellon invites these kind of people to his parties! Well, some people have no dignity." Mr. Clifton passed on, and crossed the ball-room to where Mr. Faversham, his sisters, and Mr. Ashby were laughing merrily. Faversham had introduced his friend Ashby. "What! not of the firm of Blank Lane in the city!" Mr. Mellon had exclaimed. On Mr. Ashby intimating his assent, the host gave him a hearty welcome. Mr. Faversham inferred from this cordiality that the lord of Jamaica Lodge "stood well," as the phrase runs, in the City. Mr. Clifton bowed to, and shook hands with Miss Faversham; and she merely said, "Good evening," and took up the thread of her vivacious conversation where she had dropped it. Mr. Faversham was inquiring when his sisters were returning home.

"Amiable creature!" said Miss Faversham, "the first question you ask us when you meet us is, how soon we are leaving. I am sure we don't trouble you much when we are in London."

"Pshaw!" cried Mr. Faversham.

"But I understand you are very much occupied in another quarter. I suppose that we shall shortly have to congratulate you." Miss Faversham was delighted at her brother's confusion.

"You talk riddles." Mr. Faversham moved haughtily away. Miss Faversham turned to see how Mr. Ashby would acquit himself. Poor fellow! he twisted his opera hat about; settled his cravat; examined his glove buttons. The young lady's wicked eyes were bent upon him. It was cruel sport, Mr. Clifton thought, as he watched the game.

"I believe you are a friend of Mr. Namby, who wrote that funny burlesque last year; are you not?"

"Very intimate friend."

"Then I'm afraid you must be a great quiz yourself. I'm sure you are."

Ashby looked more like a condemned criminal, who was expecting the drop to fall from under his feet.

"I should like to be behind a screen, and hear some of your good things, when all you clever gentlemen are together."

"I assure you, Miss Faversham—" Ashby stammered, turning his hat round between his fingers, like an embarrassed stable boy called upon for an unpleasant explanation.

"You cannot deny it; I know you can't. I'm really afraid of talking to you, satirical gentlemen."

Is the admiral afraid of the powder-monkey; is the cat afraid of the mouse? In pity, Miss Faversham, spare the lad, who is confounded more by the brilliants in your eyes, than by those which fall from your lips. He brilliant! Had he the wit of Sheridan, Wilkes, and Sidney Smith under his well-pomatumed hair, he could not have blundered out a remark that would hurt a fly.

"I don't pretend to anything of the sort, I assure you," Mr. Ashby stammered, presently. "I never had a line printed in the course of my life."

Here Clifton advanced, whatever emotion he felt on entering the room subdued by the young lady's graceful effrontery, he threw himself under the battery, to draw the fire off his weak friend. Mr. Ashby lost no time in securing a retreat, Miss Faversham tittered. She completed the contrast between the simple, bashful girl, reading a novel, under the lilacs in the square, and the society-lady, flirting her fan, and looking boldly into men's faces. She looked at everybody, saw Clifton, who now sat by her side. A partner claimed her for a waltz, and Clifton watched her as she laughed and talked in an undertone to him who clasped her waist. She had asked Clifton to take charge of her fan while she danced. He held it, clasped it, and crushed it. His eyes followed its owner round the room, but he caught no glance of hers directed towards himself. She talked in confiding tones, silvered with little peals of low laughter. Clifton's blood boiled. And pray, why should it boil? Where lay his right to complain? He bit his lip, and gave back the fan, when the young lady, flushed and out of breath resumed her seat at his side. She turned to her partner, who was lingering before her, raising his curls gently with his handkerchief from his heated brow, and said:—

"You dance divinely!"

The gentleman made a low bow, and shook his fragrant curls gallantly over Miss Faversham's lap. If this same gentleman had been left at that moment completely in Mr. Clifton's power and alone, it would have gone ill with him. Yet poor little Vacuum was not aware that he was in any manner doing harm to his neighbour. The boy never had the remotest idea, that the savage-looking gentleman on Miss Faversham's left, had any claims upon the young lady, neva! Little Charley Vacuum, never, when he parted his hair "down the middle" in his most bewitching style, had a wish "to cut any other fellow out, dem him!" He asked Miss Faversham, with the sleepest smirk, thrusting his accommodating elbow forward, whether she would take an ice? and when he had performed this jog trot, he made a low bow (it would have enchanted the Baron Nathan,) and tripped away, holding his hat under his arm, and smiling upon the company through his half-closed eyes as is the wont of all the great family of the Vacuums.

"Is your father quite well, Miss Faversham?" The most important conversations are opened with a common place. Miss Faversham glanced at her questioner, but not so boldly as she had glanced at the rest of the company.

"He is quite well, I thank you, Mr. Faversham?"

"And when do you return to the Grove?"

"Dear me, I suppose people are very anxious to be rid of me. It is hardly five minutes since my brother asked me the same question. Am I so very dull, then?" Could this be the same girl who was reading a few days ago in the squares, and whose colour came and went at every word. Clifton was serious. Miss Faversham said to Mrs. Mellon that he would have made an excellent clergyman to a cemetery.

"You pay the worst compliment to my taste, when you put such a construction on my question. Why should you not, as you have every right to do, why not accept the inquiry, as one suggested by fear?"

"That would be very vain, and presumptuous, and I am not vain, whatever faults I may have, and Henry says they are legion."

"Brothers never flatter. Do you still hate the country? I remember that when I had the pleasure of staying a few days with your father, you told me you had a horror of the country, with the ploughboy shoes, the freckles and the midges."

"Did I? I suppose the conversation flagged!"

"Then you were not in earnest?"

"Dear me, no; one says a thousand things every day one doesn't mean."

"You sneered at the poor, and all who strove to help them."

"Did I? It is very possible. You should have been more amusing."

"You sacrifice yourself for conversation then. Some people might take you at your word—au pied de la lettre."

"No people would who had a grain of sense."

The young lady battled bravely; but her hand was neither so light nor so cunning as on ordinary occasions. Mr. Clifton was a little too earnest. His earnestness had mastered his timidity.

"I remember," Mr. Clifton continued, "I remember your sister Ada, with that bouncing country baby in her arms."

"She was always a romp. I can hear her laughing and chattering now."

"I thought I never saw a prettier picture for an artist."

"Pray don't let us get on the fine arts, Mr. Clifton."

Clifton was at a stand still, and sat watching the handsome face of the fair mocking-bird. Was it possible that this self-possessed, splendid beauty, confident in the wealth of her attractions, was the modest, pale violet, he approached timidly in the square only a few days ago?

The young lady broke the silence.

"I have not seen you dance this evening, Mr. Clifton."

"I don't dance!"

"I think I can remember dancing with you the first time I had the pleasure of seeing you."

Mr. Faversham lounged up to join in the conversation.

"A dull evening," said Mr. Faversham.

"It's a quiet evening, Henry." Miss Faversham could not help it. She knew this was exactly the reply that would wound her brother, but she could not forbear.

Ada tripped up.

"Henry dear, do have a polka with me. I haven't danced with you—I don't know when."

"You foolish thing! do you think brothers care about dancing with their sisters?" Miss Faversham drew her younger sister towards her.

But Faversham was ready to dance with Ada; and the brother and sister appeared to enjoy the dance.

"She is quite an original, I assure you," Miss Faversham said.

"An original that ought to be copied all day long," was Clifton's gallant answer.

Miss Faversham smiled, and began to examine the features of her face. "I dare say you think me very conventional."

"Why so?" Mr. Clifton in his difficulty made reply with a question.

"I know you do."

"Indeed, Miss Faversham, I have never ventured to ask myself a critical question. What ladies please to do and think is right."

"Now, you are talking sentiment. I can't bear sentiment."

"Sentiment!"

Here young Vacuum approached, drawing on his gloves; and putting on his society simper.

"I think," he said planting a glass in his eye, and looking down his list—a very rude proceeding by the way—"I think I have the honor for the next."

(How very fortunate that Clifton and Vacuum were not left alone together that evening.)

"It is fortunate that you wrote down your engagement, Mr. Vacuum." Miss Faversham rose, and departed for her station in the quadrille. It was close to Mr. Clifton. Between the steps the young lady turned petulantly round, and addressing Mr. Clifton angrily, said:—

"You provoking creature, you have broken my fan."

Before he could excuse himself, the young lady was again in the maze of the dance. She did not return to her seat; nor could Clifton again approach her.

He was retiring with Mr. Faversham, and was delivering up the number of his hat when, glancing into the cloak-room he saw little Vacuum begging a flower from Miss Faversham's bouquet. Catching Clifton's eye, the lady bowed low, then turned in another direction. Clifton, walking home, resolved to be no longer the tutor of Master Arthur Mellon.

A RELIC OF CLONARD.

HIS now insignificant spot, which is situated near the river Boyne, county of Meath, was formerly a place of great splendour and considerable importance. It was heretofore called Chlainniríad, which signifies the retirement on the western height, and more anciently Rossfunchuill. However inconsiderable it appears at present, it was once famed as a bishop's see, and boasted of an abbey of regular canons, as well as of a nunnery for regular canonesses, dedicated to the Virgin.

St. Kyran, the son of Brethna and Dnsercha, who was called the son of the artificer, and in the year 548, founded the famous abbey at Clonmacnoise, in the King's County, having received a grant of that place, together with Inis-Aingin and one hundred churches in Meath, from Dermid, the son of Cervail, monarch of Ireland, a short time before his death, which took place in 549, bestowed Clonard upon St. Finian. Finian, who was of high descent, and eminent as a divine and philosopher, founded here an abbey, and dedicated it to St. Peter. He also established a school here, at which were instructed several men remarkable for learning and piety. In the year 548 he died of the plague.

From the annals of the abbey of Clonard we collect the following, as the most remarkable of the vicissitudes to which it was exposed. In the year 838 the Danes destroyed it and put the clergy to the sword. These ruthless invaders also destroyed it in 888. King Congalach, in 949, exempted it from cess and other charges. In 1136, the people of Brefney (now the county of Leitrim and part of Cavan) not only rivalled but surpassed the Danes in the barbarity of their conduct towards this religious house; for they not only ravaged and sacked the abbey, but acted with great cruelty to O'Daly, then chief poet of Ireland. They at the same time carried away the sword of St Finian. Donald O'Dom Fhiacha, lord of Teaffia, became a great penitent, and died here in 1141; a great part of the abbey, and all the library, was consumed by accidental fire in 1143. The abbey and town were despoiled and burnt in 1170, by M'Murcha, aided by Earl Strongbow and the English; and having been afterwards rebuilt, they suffered a similar fate in the year 1175, about which time Walter, son of Hugo de Lacy, erected a monastery here, under the invocation of Saint Peter, for Canons Regular of St Augustine. The nunnery was founded and endowed by O'Melaghlin, King of Meath, who dedicated it to the Virgin, before the arrival of the English. As to the bishoprick of Clonard, it was, before the year 1152, united to that of Trim and others, all of which were annexed to Meath about the commencement of the following century.

There is not at this day a vestige remaining of its former magnificence; and even the curious tomb which Seward and Archdall say trative of the neighbourhood where he spent his early days, accompanied by a view of his birth place, will be acceptable to our readers. The village of Auburn—

“Loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheer'd the labouring swain,
Where smiling Spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting Summer's lingering bloom delay'd”— once the residence of Goldsmith, or at least the scene of his youthful days, is situated in the county of Westmeath, about seven miles from Athlone, on the high road leading to Ballymahon; and though time has caused many alterations, yet the principal features of the landscape are the same, and many of the scenes described by the poet are still pointed out. Pallas is situated within one mile of Ballymahon. The walls of the house in which Goldsmith was born are yet standing, as shown in our illustration, but the whole is in a ruinous condition, the roof having long since fallen in. The scenery about Ballymahon is delightful, chiefly owing to the river once was here, has vanished by the ruthless plans of some modern vandal. The present church is a wretched looking edifice, and in still more wretched repair. It consists of an oblong rectangular choir, about fifty feet long by twenty-four broad, having a tasteless steeple fifty feet high at the west end, on one side whereof is placed an old corbel stone, with an antique-shaped head carved upon it.

A venerable font, of which the engraving on the preceding page is a sketch, is exceedingly curious. It is formed of limestone or marble, and on the inside of the shape of a convex hemisphere. The outside is an octagon, composed of square panels, beneath which are eight other panels that diminish in size towards the base. The upper panels are ornamented with biblical subjects.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

 HE strenuous efforts at present being made in Dublin to raise funds sufficient to defray the expense of erecting a statue to Oliver Goldsmith, induce us to believe that a few notes illus-

Inny, which runs through it under a bridge of five or six large arches, after falling over several ledges of rocks, among which are numerous large wooded islands, which, with the precipitous banks on each side of the river, form a landscape of great beauty, wanting neither mill, church, nor groups of cottages, to render it as interesting a spot, perhaps, as ever inspired or cherished the latent energies of a youthful poet. The house in which the poet was born is about two hundred yards from the road. Goldsmith thus describes it:

“Near yonder copse where once a garden smil'd,
And still where many a garden flower grows wild;
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose.”

From “The Three Pigeons,” the village ale-house alluded to by the poet in several of his works, and in front of which stood

“The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made.”

there is a beautiful view of the surrounding country.

GARRYOWL CASTLE.

F Garryowl Castle, county Cork, as it appears in the above illustration, not a trace is now visible. What time spared the hands of man ruthlessly swept away, and nought now remains to denote the existence of a once princely pile, save the traditions which still haunt the pleasant vale of Garryowl. The castle formed a portion of the patrimony of the O'Driscoll family, in whose possession it remained until a short period before the Union. About this time the property was claimed by a family named Davidson, the nearest of legitimate kin to the father of Florence O'Driscoll, the last inheritor of the castle. Their zeal for the ejection of Florence from his hereditary home, was heightened by a very strong political prejudice, and they pushed their claims with such pertinacity that the former was ejected, and although he had very powerful interest, including that of Mr. Foster, the Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, nothing could secure to him the possession of his patrimony. Mr. Davidson, who was a prejudiced and eccentric man, on the successful termination of his suit, immediately threw down Garryowl Castle, demolishing every vestige of the edifice, in the sage hope that he might thereby obliterate all traces of the former family. Florence's fortunes were not destined to flourish. When the Act of Union passed he lost a post which he held in the Customs, and quitting Ireland in disgust entered the Austrian service, and fell in one of the numerous campaigns of the day. As shown in the above sketch there were three shields over the door of the castle, surmounted with a label moulding. The central one bore the arms of O'Driscoll, while the two others presented the bearings of O'Sullivan and O'Neill.

A NIGHT AT SEA.

CHAPTER IV.

IR," answered Harmond, "that is a forgiveness that will not bear the probe. We often mistake for charity and pardon, the very satisfaction which we feel in the indulgence of our resentment."

"Tush—tush—sir!" cried the Major, pettishly; "you're but a child—a child, sir, and not qualified to judge in these matters. Society, sir—the customs of society must be respected."

"The customs of society!" said Harmond, in an indignant tone; "must they take precedence of the law of nature and of Heaven? Must we be the very slaves of custom?"

"Harmond," said the Major, "let no one ever seduce you into that wretched fancy, that the opinions of your fellow-creatures may be the subject of your contempt. Leave such notions as those to would-be philosophers, to selfish and whining sentimentalists, and others, who have too much genius to have any common sense or decent feeling. I never knew one of those lip-curlers, those scoffers at society, who was not at heart more thoroughly the slave of opinion, more sore about what was thought and said of him, more greedy after praise, and more anxious to be the common talk whether in love or blame, than any of the quiet folks, who incur their scorn by being good-natured enough to comply with the word in all that is indifferent. In love or blame, I say, for love of fame is often so diseased in character, and many of those soaring spirits, are so wretchedly dependent, after all, on the common opinion which they pretend to despise, that they had rather be the object of the world's disgust than its indifference; to be loathed, than be forgotten. He who despises society, is himself a more miserable object of contempt. His very scorn is a crime more odious than the silliest custom he contemns."

"Granting all this, sir," answered Harmond, "is it necessary for us, therefore, to comply with the world in what is not indifferent?"

"You seek," said the Major, "to coop me up into a corner, but you may spare your logic. Eliza has disgraced her name and mine. I will not sanction her ill-conduct by restoring her to the place which she freely chose to forfeit; as she has sown, so let her reap. The unhappiness that you reproach me with was not my choice nor fault, but hers."

"Perhaps not altogether hers, sir, after all. If I rightly understand my poor mother's character, she owed many of her failings to her education, to a favourite idea of your own, which left her too much from childhood to her own direction."

"That cut goes home!" said the Major, laying his hand upon his eyes; "you are bold in your surgery, Harmond; you can use the caustic freely."

"And if it be to heal, sir," said Harmond, taking his grandfather's hand in both his, "why are you angry? I speak of my mother and your child; they are powerful names—do not harden your heart against them. Forgive her, sir, I conjure you to forgive her, and let us be again united. Think what it will be, sir, to see them all around you—to have the bond of gratitude added to that of natural affection, and what is more, to have a Creator pacified, who must now look angrily upon your house."

The Major seemed for some moments to waver as he contemplated the picture which Harmond placed before him. At last he said—

"Why did she choose my enemy?"

"Ah, sir," said Harmond, "why had you an enemy for her to choose?"

"That may prove my fault, but it does not diminish hers."

"Say you forgive her, sir?"

"No, no!"

"Say that you forgive my parents?"

"No!"

"I will sell the Erin before night, and never set foot on fore-castle again."

"I will not say it!"

"Farewell, sir!"

"Stay—Harmond!—Harmond O'Connor, stay a moment!—the reef!—Don't forget the reef!" (The hall-door slapped to.) "He's gone! and without hearing me! The fellow will run into danger now, purely to spite me! Adam!" (He rung the bell.) "An obstinate—headstrong—Thomas!—Just his mother's manner—her wild and hairbrained spirit—and a little dash of her self-will along with it. Adam, run after Mr. Harmond, and tell him not to forget the reef upon his peril—and to be home early, that we may have some further conversation on the subject which we were speaking of this morning—make haste!" (Adam departed.) "Eliza! No!—the ingrate! never shall she cross the threshold of my door again!"

He dressed himself and remained sitting in his chair until the servant returned.

"Well, Adam?"

"I overtook him near the quay, sir."

"Well?"

"He said 'Pooh, pooh!' sir, when I talked of the reef; and when I gave him the rest of the message he laughed, and said he knew that was a trap, but that he was not to be caught with chaff."

"Very respectful, indeed. The fellow will certainly run in the way of danger, purely to be even with me. What sort of a morning is it on the water?"

"One of the boatmen, sir, told me it was likely to be a storm from the nor'-west."

"A storm!"

"A storm, sir," so he said."

"I am the wretchedest old man in Munster! I am sorry I was so harsh—he'll not return to-night—he may never return; and if he should not, what becomes of me?—Ay, there the wind begins to sing already—well—and the clouds are red in the east; a dreadful sign—and a sord over head—worse and worse—mackerel and mares' tails all across the zenith, so much I know of seaman's craft for my greater misery; I know the gloomier snatches of the science. Well, if he come safely home to-night and promise to give up the Erin—I'll—I'll—no! never, never will I again receive Eliza!"

"Come, Beauchamp, push along!" cried Harmond to his friend, as they hurried, in the dusk of dawn, through the narrow streets that led to the water-side. "'Tis a glorious morning, plenty of wind in hand, and promises of more."

"Harmond O'Connor!"

"Who called me? Did you hear a voice?"

"I thought so, but see no one."

"Harmond! Harmond O'Connor!"

"Again! Oh, there he is! For pity's sake, be quick, or we are saddled with a bore—a regular bore. 'Tis Mr. Ajax Mac Orient, an old neighbour and friend of my mother—a gentleman who would have every one he converses with to see with his eyes, hear with his ears, judge with his judgment, and feel with his feelings—a horrid fellow!—with a smattering of all the arts and science extant, and a knowledge of none, yet passing for a finished critic in all, upon the strength of an acquaintance with some hundreds of technical phrases. Oh! we are late—he is on us—and we are in for it."

"They were joined by Mr. Mac Orient, who carried in his hand some bulky substance resembling a stone."

"Harmond, how are you? How d'ye do, Beauchamp? Both bound for the regatta, eh?"

"Of course."

"Could a poor landsman hope for a passage to the rendezvous?"

"Oh, certainly. Boat, a-hoy!"

"Look here, Harmond, see what I found in the quarry near Mount Orient."

"Why, what is that?"

"Look close at it."

"I do; it seems to me like a lump of limestone."

"Ha,—ha,—you are pleased to say so. It is an amygdaloid, one of the most beautiful specimens I have ever seen. I have been making what our worthy seneschal Hifle calls a genealogical survey of the caverns and quarries about our neighbourhood, and have picked up some most extraordinary facts and specimens; did you know that the left end of the village is all one mass of trap!"

"No, I protest," said Harmond, "I had no idea of it."

"I believe, sir," said Beauchamp, not perceiving the significant gestures by which Harmond warned him not to set the pedant's tongue in motion, "that geology is a very fashionable science, now."

"Oh quite, sir; quite cut out the political economists. Geology will do very well a while; it has not yet found anybody to give it to all the world at one and sixpence a month. By the way, what do you think (to Beauchamp) of this little book on Ireland?—Ay, I see you don't like it—well, I can't agree with you there; the author, you will say, defends absenteeism. You don't like that; well now, I don't know but 'tis right; what do you think? How would you reason the point?"

"I think," said Beauchamp, "that the person who could regard as a matter of indifference the residence or non-residence of a landlord on his own estate, is not to be reasoned with. I would despair as utterly of leading such an individual to feel aright, as I would of teaching a blind man to perceive the beauties of a landscape, or a ploughman to appreciate the verse of Milton."

"Well, read her again, and if you don't agree with me—and, apropos of landscapes—look at that!—there's a true Claude Lorraine sun for you! Do you see that castle in the middle distance, balanced by the sloop upon the left? That's Cuyp all over; and there, there's Rysdael for you!"

"Where?" cried Beauchamp, turning suddenly.

"That small dark copse upon the right. And mark the effect of that fishing-boat dancing on the billows in the foreground."

"The forewater, you mean," said Harmond.

"Oh, I spoke technically. The sky is well enough, but the clouds a little too rocky; that mass in the horizon is hardly natural. Look there!—that herd of cattle on the slope, did you ever see anything so exactly after Morland?—only they are not scattered enough—they crowd too much to the left—that flock of sheep is better—now that's perfect!—and that country girl loitering at the stile to see us pass. Pousain himself could not exceed that—only that hill of furze comes in too close to the rape field—there's too much yellow—somewhat overdone—Gainsborough would have done it better—but there—there!—that makes up for all indeed—look, Mr. Beauchamp, look at that range of hills to the south."

"A very striking outline," said Henry, not wishing to appear too ignorant.

"Outline, did you say?—oh, no, I did not mean the outline—I think the outline is deficient—rather tame—not pointed enough—not enough of the volcanic character about it—a Salvator stroke here and there would be desirable—I only meant the tints—the colouring—the correctness of the aerial perspective—I'd defy Turner himself to out-do that. I don't like that bright gleam of sunshine on the hill behind the old castle, though it gives such force to the darkened outline of the ruin—it seems to be done too much for effect;—it is too dioramic to please me."

"How possessed is this man with his technical jargon," whispered Harmond, "when he makes art the original of his pictures, and nature herself the imitation! For pity's sake, do not say another word, or he will leave nothing without a daub."

By this time the rendezvous appeared in sight; it was a spacious creek within view of the village, which was crowded with visitors anxious to see the regatta. The shore was already filled with villagers and country people, who hailed the Erin as she came in sight with repeated cheers. Several of the yachts were at their moorings, and a turf-boat, anchored at a short distance from the shore, displayed the Commodore's flag at her masthead. A band of music stationed on board added to the gaiety of the scene. The village, strand, and neighbouring fields and heights were all buzz-buzz from side to side, and everything seemed to promise a day of unbroken pleasure.

We will not so far intrude upon the province of the fashionable journals as to furnish a detail of the day's amusements, our business being chiefly with those events which did not appear upon the surface of the proceedings. While Harmond, having got rid of Ajax Mac Orient, stood with the tiffin in his hand awaiting the report of the gun that was to be the signal for starting, he observed a small hooker, with sails and hull as black as night, draw near the little fleet, and keep hovering around them as if waiting likewise for the signal.

"Nash," said his master, "what hooker is that?"

"I don't know her, sir. I seen her before to-day, but nobody knows her."

"Beauchamp!" cried Harmond eagerly to his friend, and grasping his arm as he looked upon the boat—"I know it! It is my fetch! my double-goer!"

At this instant the shot was heard, and all the vessels started from their cables together. In a short time the race was between the Seagull and the Erin. The strange hooker pressed close behind, but seemed rather to stand upon and watch, than race with the other boats. When they approached the flag-boat which was stationed in the mouth of the river as a kind of goal, around which the vessels were to sail and return, they were all astonished to behold the hooker, instead of turning, stand boldly out to sea.

"Let the match go where it will," cried Harmond, "I will follow that fellow."

"Follow him! is it out to say, sir?" exclaimed Nash, with a look of utter amazement.

"Mind your business, sir, and hold your tongue," replied his master.

Nash clasped his hands, and seemed the image of despair. In an incredibly short time, both hooker and yacht were bounding over the billows of the broad Atlantic, Nash looking back to the majestic cliffs between which the river they had left disembogued its waters into a mighty sea, and even Beauchamp himself casting a less significant glance in the same direction.

"What do you mean to do, Harmond?"

"To follow him wherever he is going."

"Eh, master," said Nash, "how do you know where he's going? or is it a right boat at all that's there, only a chimera?"

"Hold your tongue, sir."

"We're lost! we're lost! we're lost!"

By this time the day had darkened, the wind grew fresher, and the indications of an approaching gale became momentarily more apparent. Harmond alone seemed, with the excitement, to have recovered his usual spirits and gaiety of temper.

"Come along—that's it my darling. There she dashes back the saucy brine—Ha! what's a hunter's back to that? Eh, Beauchamp? Oh, if we had the Major here for half-an-hour—Ho! ho! that's it, my sweetest!"

"Our captain rose with a look of dread,
On the plank he scarce can stand—"

"Up, boatswain, up, to the topmast head,
And see can you spy any land?"

"I have looked to the east—I have looked to the west,
Where the stormy winds do blow,
And I see but the sky that is raging above,
And the ocean that foams below,
Below!
And the ocean that foams below!"

"Ha—dash along, my darling! Well, Harry, was this your first time at sea?"

Nash groaned.

"If it isn't, 'twill be his last, I fear."

"Hold on—we're safe enough—the Erin will stand anything with that cockle-shell, at all events."

"Sad is our case amid tempest and wreck,
While the foamy breakers roar,
For we poor sailors are trusting to the deck,
While the land-lubber lies on shore,
Shore, shore!
While the land-lubber lies on shore!"

They continued the chase until the night began to fall. The hooker still kept some hundred yards ahead of the yacht until it became difficult to distinguish her rigging in the diminished light, notwithstanding the sable colour of her sails, which, as seamen know, by a feeble light, is much more easily discerned than white. Fortunately, the night, though rough, was not altogether dark, and occasionally, between the flying scuds of vapour, the full bright moon shot a hurried gleam upon the scene of tumult. Once, as he discerned in the glimpses of light the outline of the hooker far ahead, O'Connor strove to hail her, when the following conversation passed between them:

"Where are you bound?"

There was a pause, after which, between the bursts of the gale, they could faintly hear the hooker's answer:

"To the other world!"

"Who is your captain?"

"Death!"

"What vessel?"

"The Water-hearse."

At each of these answers Nash groaned and clapped his hands aloud.

"My poor father and mother!" he exclaimed. "Oh, the luck I had the day I ever entered your service, Mr. O'Connor! Oh, murder! murder! murder!"

"That's a pretty fellow," said Harmond, "whoever he is. That fellow's safe enough, at all events. He was never born to meet his death by drowning."

"I wish to my heart I was aboard of him, then," cried Nash.

The night advanced, the wind increased, and still the hooker held on her seaward course. Harmond perceived, however, that as soon as she had got to a safe distance from the clifted shore, she took a course almost directly southward, which he took care to imitate. Before midnight they had lost her. This circumstance did not add to their tranquillity. On their left appeared a stupendous iron-bound coast with its clifted headlands, and bays worked deep into the perpendicular rock, reverberating the roar of the now fully awakened ocean, while, on their right, the vast and angry waste of water presented a spectacle hardly less appalling. These perils were increased by the night, and the ignorance of every one on board of the nature of the coast by which they steered. They had, however, now no choice to make. The direction taken by the wind must be theirs and, fortunate for them, it was, that it continued since they left the mouth of the river to blow almost directly north. After midnight the storm increased to such a height that Harmond began to despair of making the land before morning. They were still driving onward with a speed resembling that of a racer at full gallop, when a sudden burst of moonlight revealed to them, at a considerable distance before, and on the left, the mouth of a bay which seemed to promise shelter from the fury of the roused up sea without. Shortening the sail of the yacht by lowering her peak, and steering for the bay, they ran into its tranquil waters just as the sun had risen above a magnificent range of hills which bounded the landward horizon. Within this bay, which was studded with islands, and skirted with shores of alternate crag and green and woodland, they discovered a second, less spacious than the first, but far more wild and beautiful, the shores still more diversified with rock and foliage, and fertile islets scattered with yet greater profusion around their track as they advanced. It was one of those singular landscapes on the Irish coast, in which the richest and most tranquil inland scenery is blended with all the wildness and magnificence of the seaside; one of those

"Glens, where ocean comes
To 'scape the wild wind's rancour,
And harbours, worthiest homes,
Where Freedom's sails might anchor."

"The question is now," said Harmond, as they came to anchor near the shore, where the water ran so smooth that a cockle-shell would have floated on it; "the question now is, what are we to do for breakfast?"

"Oh then, since we escaped last night," said Nash, "I'll engage we'll not die of starvation this morning, however."

While Harmond O'Connor and his companions are preparing to go on shore, we will return to Eliza O'Connor, respecting whose fortunes nothing has been told since her departure from our own neighbourhood. How entirely did it seem to her now, she had mistaken from the first the path to peace and happiness! She looked back now upon the past with that clear and sober gaze which affliction is almost certain to confer on minds that are not perverted by a wilful blindness, and it seemed to her as if the whole had passed under the influence of a species of intoxication. She wondered at herself as she discerned the selfish motive of acts on which she had even prided herself in prosperous days, and shuddered at many which she had considered wholly indifferent when they were performed. The experience which brought wisdom, brought her repentance also, and while she wept with bitterness over faults which now lay before her mind in all their deformity, she would not exchange her present sorrow for all the hoodwinked gaiety that she had lost.

The scenery through which she passed on her departure, was calculated to afford her some relief from the afflicting thoughts that had begun to weigh upon her health and spirits. A wild and broken road conducted them southward from the Killarney lakes. For many miles after the enchanting lake-prospects had been shut behind them, they found themselves encompassed by scenery of the most rugged and profitless description, mountains without sublimity, and valleys without beauty, breaking upon them in dreary succession, during the lapse of a summer day's journey. Sometimes, mounted on those shaggy ponies (a descendant of the Spanish Asturiones, and the only beast of burden to which these wilds are safely passable,) they toiled up the steepes of Esk, a portion of the gloomy range of glens and hollows which were termed, by ancient topographers, the Vallis Juncosa, and which, during the early English invasions, frequently afforded to the worsted natives a retreat regarded as inaccessible. Sometimes, in some wild mountain nook, they lighted upon a solitary cluster of farm houses, with gardens reclaimed from the waste, and affording subsistence to a remnant of the O'Sullivans or O'Sheas, of some ancient clean or family, who still preserve amid those deserts their independence, their poverty, their ignorance, their simplicity, their genealogical pride, unaltered. Sometimes a healthy mountain housewife, seated between her hampers, with kerchief tied round her laughing countenance, and blue mantle drawn round her shoulders, trotted by and challenged them in her native dialect to a race along the craggy road. Sometimes a herring gull or heron, floating gracefully through the fields of air above, indicated their near approach to the south-western coast, and at intervals the cry of a gannet, winging its way towards its nest in the lonely Skelig, startled the echoes among the barren excavations of the mountain. Sometimes, also, they encountered in the extensive solitude, the solitary figure of a priest, leading his pony down a slippery steep, and accompanied on one side by his clerk, laden with the bag of vestments, and on the other by a mountaineer, who had summoned him to administer the last rites of his religion to a dying relative. Towards evening, as they wound along within sight of the Sliev Miskiisk mountains on the right, some traces of a kindlier soil began to break upon their view. The fir and overgrown buckthorn no longer held solitary dominion in the wilds—the heath was diversified by the whiteblossomed mountain avena, the delicate London-pride, and sometimes by the yellow-flowered tormentil; clusters of the small shrubs became more frequent in the clefts of the rocks, and along the mountain sides. The road coiled among broken defiles, presenting a romantic intermixture of rock and foliage, of beauty and abruptness. Plantations, in which the symmetry of art was blended with the freedom, boldness, and luxuriance of nature, arose on either side of the narrow way, and the social sense was silently pleased without breaking the romantic dream which the enchanting solitude had occasioned. Once more the lake-haunting arbutus, which had not visited their sight since they lost, two mornings before, the last traces of the Killarney scenery, now waved its slender leaves and scarlet berries above them from some overhanging rock, and welcomed them again to a new region of beauty and delight. At length, their ponies, with drooping head, and more laborious step, descended towards the termination of the grass-grown avenue. The sun struck a level light through the top of some old oak or lofty yew upon the right, while the evening silence was broken by the full round note of the song-thrush, concealed in some shade. I thicket, or by the silvery trill of the wood-lark, which here, like the nightingale, prolonged its strain far into the night. The broken rays shot across their path between the trunks of the aged trees,—a fresher wind rustled amid the lichen and beeches, and that indescribable murmur, almost inaudible to the sense, and yet filling the whole air, which the ocean sends forth in its calmest hours, announced their approach to the sea-side. At length, the leafy screen vanished behind them, and the varied shores, the tufted points, and scattered islands of Glengarriff Bay, broke suddenly, in all their sunset beauty on Eliza's sight. Before, them the bright green waters of the great inlet, crossed by a glancing and yellow light from the distant mountain heights, now broke in glittering wavelets on a sunlit beach, and now rolled dark and silent at the foot of some aged rock. Far in the distance, a few boats might be seen dredging for coral-sand near the mouth of the bay, and more near, on a craggy island, a lofty battery suggested the stern image of war and ruin, in the midst of this delicious region of peace and of abundance.

Here, on the shores of this remote bay, did Mr. O'Connor fix his residence from the period of his departure from our neighbourhood, until that day on which Harmond and Beauchamp left home for the regatta. In the interim, great and serious changes had taken place in the establishment; their children were most of them grown up, while their means, at no period equal to their rank, were disappearing fast; Eliza's fortune, almost their sole possession, was not equal to the expenses of a family, no member of which could supply, either by his industry or talent, the absence of a more considerable income; and what was worse, while it lasted they felt little care about the future. O'Connor, who had the misfortune to be what is commonly called "good-natured," that is, a man without thought, and fond of his amusement, was good for little beside fishing, shooting, and telling stories after dinner; and his eldest son was even a more serious cause of uneasiness to both the parents; in him Mrs. O'Connor deeply felt the nature of the pain which she had herself inflicted on her father. He associated with the most worthless characters in the neighbourhood, and often remained for many months from home, without furnishing, either before his departure or after his return, any account of his motives in doing so; the issue was, that the household fell at length into decay, and borrowing, a bad remedy, was resorted to by Mr. O'Connor, in order to supply immediate wants. In this position affairs were placed at the time when Harmond, without knowing the situation of his parents, was pleading their cause with his grandfather.

On landing from his yacht, in company with Henry Beauchamp, Harmond proceeded toward a house within the distance of a few fields from the water-side, with the hope of obtaining fire and refreshment. As they walked along the narrow foot-path which traversed the grass, their attention was arrested by the following song, which they could hear distinctly on the other side of a hedge that separated them from the dwelling. The voice was so sweet and musical, that they stopped to hear the whole.

"Fare thee well, my native dell,
Though far away I wander,
With thee my thoughts shall ever dwell,
In absence only fonder."

Farewell, ye banks where once I roved,
To view that lovely river—
And you, ye groves, so long beloved,
And fields, farewell for ever!
Fare thee well, etc.

Here once my youthful moments flew,
In joys like sunshine splendid;
The brightest hours that e'er I knew
With those sweet scenes were blended—
When o'er those hills, at break of morn,
The deer went bounding early,
And huntsmen woke, with hound and horn,
The mountain echoes cheerly.
Fare thee well, etc.

Fare ye well, ye happy hours,
So bright, but long departed!
Fare ye well, ye fragrant bow'rs,
So sweet, but now deserted!
Farewell, each rock and lonely isle
That wake the poet's numbers,
And thou, oh, ancient holy pile
Where mighty Brian slumbers!
Fare thee well, etc.

Farewell, thou old romantic bridge,
Where morn has seen me roaming,
To mark across each shallow ridge,
The mighty Shannon foaming—
No more I'll press the bending oar,
To speed the painted wherry,
And glide along the woody shore
To view the hills of Derry.
Fare thee well, etc.

There's many an isle in Scariff Bay,
With many a garden blooming,
Where oft I've passed the summer day
Till twilight hours were glooming.
No more shall evening's yellow glow
Among those ruins find me—
Far, far from those dear scenes I go,
But leave my heart behind me.
Fare thee well, etc.

Fast, fast we ride by hedge and tree,
Fast fade thy loved bowers—
Still through the bursting tears I see Thy hills and hoary towers.
'Tis past! my last faint glimpse is o'er,
My last farewell is spoken,
I see those loved scenes no more,
My heart—my heart is broken!

Fare thee well, my native dell,
Thou'g far away I wander,
With thee my thoughts shall ever dwell,
In absence only fonder."

Still humming a verse of the song, a fine-looking boy, of about twelve or thirteen years of age, appeared at the little gate which stood between the strangers and the lawn, immediately before the house. On seeing Harmond, he opened the gate and ran hastily towards him.

"So you are come, at last," he said, taking his hand, and we thought we were never to see you any more—and you are just come in time, for there are keepers in the house these two days, and papa is gone off to uncle Edward's to hide, for fear he'd be taken to gaol—Mouser had six kittens, and mamma was obliged to stay in bed to-day, she was so sick for fear you were drowned last night in the great storm."

By the time he had got thus far in his budget of news, he began to perceive that he had mistaken his man, and, drawing back with a shy embarrassed look, was about to betake himself to flight. Harmond, however, encouraged him to remain until he had entrusted him with a message for the lady of the house.

They found in the interior of the dwelling all the symptoms of discomfort and perplexity which the lad's speech had led them to expect. Two surly men were pacing now and then from the kitchen to the hall, and looking as if they wished to make themselves as troublesome as possible, but did not know how to set about it.

"They are as cross as the cats," said the boy, in a whisper, to Harmond, to whom he seemed to have taken a liking, "because mamma refuses to give them whiskey. One of them told Nelly in the kitchen that he didn't care what they took out of the house so that they were only civil. By civil he means giving him money or whiskey; and that, you know, when he was put here to watch the goods; did you ever see such a rogue? But come away to a room, where you can change your dress, and my sister Ellen will have breakfast ready for you when you come back. I don't know whether mamma will be able to come down or no, but you will have breakfast at any rate."

They proceeded to the room, their new acquaintance conducting them and continuing his communicative conversation, while they made the necessary change in their attire.

"I was sure it was Redmond when I saw you," he said to Harmond; "I never saw anybody so like, and even the dress itself. He wasn't at home these two months, and mamma is afraid something has happened to him. I told mamma how like him you were, and she was greatly surprised, but she said it must be the dress that made me think it."

"And pray, tell me," said Harmond, "what is this place called?" "This? Oh, this is Glengariff; I'm surprised you don't know it; I thought everybody knew Glengariff."

"And what is your name?"

"Arthur O'Connor."

There needed no more to place the whole of the case before the eyes of Harmond. The roof beneath which Providence had thus singularly thrown him was the dwelling of his parents, and it was his brother who stood before him. Those who have never known or who long have wanted the sweetness of domestic intercourse, the inexpressible charm that is in the words brother, and sister, and parent, the confidence of sure and perfect intimacy in the heart which neither interested friendships nor worldly alliances can bring, those only can recognise in their own hearts the feelings that awoke in that of Harmond upon this discovery. He felt that pang of love—that yearning of the heart with which the faithful Joseph was affected when he longed to fling himself upon the neck of Benjamin, and weep aloud. The time, however, was not yet arrived for making the disclosure, so that he continued his questions with apparent unconcern.

"And have you any brothers or sisters?"

"Oh, yes, a great many, and cousins too. We have two cousins living with us now, James and Mary O'Connor. We have Big James and Little James, and Big Mary and Little Mary. That's the way we know 'em asunder, for some are cousins, and others brother and sister. 'Tis Big Mary, that's sister Mary, that's getting breakfast."

Returning to the parlour, they found, in the act of preparing breakfast, a fine young woman, whose dark hair and full intelligent eyes would have made a stranger pronounce her to be Harmond's sister. As they entered, Arthur whispered Harmond in the ear:

"That's Big Mary."

Blushing and laughing together, at the uncouth epithet which she overheard, and which certainly could only be comparatively appropriate, the young lady saluted the visitors, and with easy politeness apologized for the absence of Mrs. O'Connor, who, she said, was not yet ready to make her appearance. In the mean time she had given orders that the gentlemen should receive every accommodation which their cottage could afford, and a servant had already been despatched to summon the boatman to the house.

While Beauchamp warmed himself by the fireside, Harmond entered into conversation with his sister, in whom he was delighted to find both manners and information suited to her rank. The room now filled with young O'Connors of all sizes, every one of whose persons and countenances Harmond examined with an interest that gave amusement and gratification to his sister. At length a slow and apparently feeble step was heard descending the staircase. The door was opened, and a lady entered, who seemed about forty years of age, in a dark dress of the very plainest fashion, and with a look of the severest care imprinted deep upon her features. Instinctively Harmond walked across the floor to meet her and then stood gazing in her face until she should recognise him. She did so at first sight—but the fear of a mistake made her prolong the inquiring look until all doubt had disappeared. As every feature gradually became familiar to her recollection, the thoughts of early days came back upon her mind with a force and poignancy that were almost insupportable. She trembled as the certainty grew strong, the tears gushed into her eyes, and she raised her hands and cast herself upon his breast, she had scarcely strength to utter in the faintest voice:

"It is my child!"

"My mother! my dear mother!"

It was indeed his mother, but widely altered from the gay romantic girl who kept Drumshambo Hall alive with her wit and gaiety. The commotion which this scene created may safely be intrusted to the reader's imagination. It was heightened ere noon by the arrival of Redmond O'Connor, the owner of the hooker, whose resemblance to Harmond was now accounted for. The latter was in the most exulting spirits, and would have had the whole household come away at once and take his grandfather by storm. But Mrs. O'Connor, who now could form a better estimate of her father's character than in former times, was not so sanguine in her hopes.

"If it were difficult," she said "fifteen years since, to obtain his forgiveness for what was past, it will be more so now, when absence has diminished affection, and when resentment has taken firm and lasting root within his mind. For it is a certain truth, that the longer we cherish any feeling, whether good or evil, the more invincible it becomes. For the present let us enjoy with grateful hearts the delight of our re-union, and devise some means of rendering it permanent."

We will leave Harmond to become intimate with the friends to whom he was thus unexpectedly restored, and direct our attention to another quarter. On the second morning of the regatta, Major O'Brien, sleepless, wretched, and a prey to the cruellest suspense, was seated in his drawing-room, awaiting the return of Adam, whom he had despatched to the quay in search of news.

"If he has perished," said the Major, "I shall lose my wits; if he has escaped, I will disinherit him. A villain, to keep me two nights without a wink of sleep—poor fellow!—poor fellow!—perhaps I am talking of one over whom the waves are breaking at this moment. Oh, miserable man! Well, Adam, what's the news? did you hear nothing?"

"Nothing, sir."

"I am utterly undone. It were better for us both to have perished at Drumshambo."

At this instant a noise was heard in the backyard.

"Yeo ho! Adam! Ho! Yeo ho! Yeo ho!"

"Tis he! 'Tis Harmond! Heaven be praised! Run, Adam! Open the door—run—run—Good Heaven be praised for ever!—A scoundrel!—poor fellow!—a dog—a headstrong—poor—poor boy—so he is safe!—What, Harmond—my dear child! What, well? Quite well?"

"A little hungry, sir, that's all," cried Harmond, after he had liberated himself from his grandfather's embrace; "sharp air, sir, makes the appetite keen."

"You scoundrel, how dare you use me thus? My poor fellow, and are you very cold?—Adam, get breakfast quick! Oh, villain, I'll disinherit you! Did you get very wet? Well, come and tell me all about it while, Adam is getting breakfast. And, mind! take care and make it as horrible as possible, for I like to have the description made very horrible when all the harm is over. I remember, after the skirmish of Drumshambo—"

"There is no occasion, sir," said Harmond, "for any invention in the case. The plain truth is horrible enough."

"I suppose so—I warrant ye. I suppose it is, indeed."

"In the first place, every wave we passed after leaving the Heads behind us was something lower than the cathedral steeple."

"Eh? Bless me! Were you not swallowed up alive?"

"The night was black as the chimney-piepe."

"Dear! dear!"

"We heard the breakers roaring like lions on the cliffs within fifty yards of us—"

"My poor boy—"

"While none of us knew a single rock along the coast—"

"Oh, you villain."

"About midnight the storm began—"

"Come to the morning—come to the morning," said the old man, "Tis too horrible. What happened in the morning?"

"In the morning, sir," said Harmond, "we ran into a lonesome bay, as drenched as water spaniels, and hungry as kites. Indeed, I don't know what we should have done if it were not for a hospitable family living near the shore, who showed me, I must say, as much attention as if I had been one of themselves."

"Why what charming good sort of people they must be. Who were they?"

"But, unfortunately—and to this it is, sir, that I wish to direct your especial attention—I discovered that, like most persons who are distinguished by uncommon amiability, they are not so prosperous as could be wished."

Here Harmond, altering his tone and manner, and speaking with a seriousness that showed how deep an interest he felt in what he told, described the scene which he had witnessed at Glengarriff, related what he knew of the circumstances of the family, and concluded by so fervent an eulogy on the lady of the house, that the interest and sympathy of the Major were strongly awakened.

"I could not help feeling pity for her," said Harmond, "when I figured to myself the idea of so gentle and amiable a being reduced to the necessity of accompanying her husband to a common goal, and after having by her own extraordinary industry, educated all her children in the rank in which herself was born, condemned to see them cast upon the world, to struggle with the most abject poverty."

"Tis very hard—very hard, indeed," said the Major—"but how is it? Have they no friends? has she no relative who might assist her?"

"That, sir," said Harmond, "is what adds peculiar sharpness to her affliction. She has one wealthy, relative but he refuses even to receive her within his doors. In short," continued Harmond, turning suddenly, and taking his grandfather's hand—"I am but awkward at disguise or mystery. It was beneath my parents' roof that I found shelter from the storm."

"So! so!"

"It was my mother whom I found upon the brink of ruin, and who, overpowered by my persuasions, has consented to return along with me, to implore from her only parent the succour which she now can hope for nowhere else."

"Eliza has come with you, then?" said the Major, with a tranquillity of voice which did not promise well.

"She is now beneath this roof," said Harmond, somewhat daunted by the Major's unexpected coldness.

"Tell her," said the Major, without the least emotion, "to return the way she came. They shall have some money if they require it, but I will not see her."

Harmond, himself impetuous and liable to sudden impulses both of anger and of love, was totally unprepared for this cold, unmoved inveteracy of resentment. The Major's love for his daughter, as fervent as it once appeared, had always too much selfishness about it; and as his subsequent severity had all along been founded on a bad principle, it was, like all bad feelings, hard to be eradicated.

"The young man's wrath is like straw on fire,
But like red hot steel is the old man's ire."

So said one who knew something of the human heart, and the Major's case was no exception to the rule. Harmond felt his spirit sink at the thought of having subjected his mother to the pain of this unnatural reception, and in his fear on her account he grew more earnest in his entreaties.

"Do not, I beseech you, sir," he said, "inflict so cruel a blow upon your daughter's heart. Let it not be said or thought, that after having been separated from her for more than twenty years, you could be guilty of such a crime—I will call it—as that of turning her from your door without even hearing her prayer for your forgiveness."

"I tell you," said the Major, "I will hear nothing. If they want money they shall have it—but the sooner she goes home again the better."

Shocked to the soul, and naturally indignant at this speech, Harmond assumed his usual carriage, and addressed his grandfather with more firmness.

"I am sorry, sir," said he, "for all our sakes, that I was not able to prevail on you. I never will deliver to my mother such a message as you speak of. You are mistaken in her character, well as you ought to know it, if you suppose that she is mercenary."

She seeks your forgiveness and affection, and where those are denied, I fear your money would be an unwelcome substitute. But sir—" continued Harmond, and he paused for a long time, as if he felt the utmost difficulty in expressing what must be said—"I must not forget that I owe a duty to my parents. They have been visited by the hand of heaven, and they require my services, and they shall have them while I have an arm to hold a spade. If my mother leaves this house, I return with her."

The Major looked at him for a considerable time in silence, and seeming stunned by this new turn:

"Is this," he said, "your gratitude?"

"I feel," said Harmond, "all the weight of what I owe you. You have done all for me. You have been my kind and generous benefactor, and I owe you more of love and gratitude than countless ages can repay. But 'Honour thy father and thy mother' was written by the finger of the Omnipotent upon a table of stone, and delivered to the world amid menaces of wrath and promises of love, according as it should be violated or fulfilled. I dare not, even for you, resist the ordinance of nature and of heaven. Your claim is strong on my obedience, but the claims of those who gave me life and birth are stronger."

"If you leave me," said the Major, trembling, while his countenance grew red and pale with anger and apprehension, "you shall not possess a shilling that is mine."

To this his grandson made no reply.

"I will disinherit you," said the Major, bursting into passion, "if I were to take a beggar from the street to fill your place!"

"What is your's to keep, sir," answered Harmond respectfully, "is yours to give wherever you desire. It shall make no alteration either in my feelings of gratitude towards you for what is passed, or in my determination to do now what is clearly and obviously my duty."

"And you are determined then to forsake me?" said the Major, in a softened voice.

"I can only repeat what I have said already," answered Harmond, "that with my mother I return or stay."

There was a silence of some moments, during which the old man, who could not help secretly approving what irritated him almost beyond endurance, seemed deliberating within himself what course he should adopt. At length, approaching Harmond where he stood, and nudging him two or three times in the side with his elbow, he said

"Well, Harmond—you will promise me to sell the Erin?"

Harmond was silent.

"Do you mean to hesitate about it?"

"You know my terms, sir."

"Have you the effrontery now to talk of terms after what has passed since we spoke together last? Eh?"

"Ah, sir, this has lasted a great deal too long. Come—you must give me leave to sell the Erin, to live soberly at home, and be all that you can wish me."

"Harmond," said the Major, "it is vain to talk. Even if I should consent to this, the circumstances are now wholly changed. Eliza, your mother, is no longer what she was. She probably forgets me—as I have given her cause to do. Wrapped up in her husband and her children, she is altered now in mind; and it would wring my very heart to live with Eliza, and to find her grown indifferent to her father's affection."

"But what, sir," said Harmond, "if you could know with certainty that her separation—her exile rather—from your house and your affection, is preying, even to this hour, more keenly than ever on her heart—that not all the assiduities of a husband who dotes on her, and friends who second his exertions for her happiness, could ever restore even moderate quiet to her mind—that both her health and spirits are hourly suffering from the recollection of one unhappy step; that even still she murmurs the name of her father in her dreams, and often declares that she could die happy, if she only heard him say that he forgave her——"

"If this were true," replied the Major; "the possibility of such a thing has often in fancy crossed my mind, but I dismissed it as preposterous—for she who forsook, I said, could not regret me."

"Sir, it is true," said Harmond; "her melancholy on this score is the only fault of which her friends accuse her. Exact in every duty, this still prevents her enjoying peace of mind or heart. Dear grandfather," continued Harmond, taking the Major's hand in his,

"let me intreat you to be kind—be generous—be a father—bid me admit her."

For a considerable time the old Major remained with his hands pressed upon his eyes, as if debating the point with his own heart. At length he let go the hand of his grandson, and said in a low voice—

"Admit her."

In a few minutes after, Eliza was at her father's feet, and in another, in his arms. There was not one in all our neighbourhood that was not overjoyed at the reconciliation, however strongly they had reprobated the early disobedience of the now penitent daughter, nor did it want an appropriate celebration. On the fifth of September following, Drumshambo Hall was re-opened with great splendour to the surrounding neighbourhood, and Adam Dobe was busy at the flag-staff, at the same hour at which he had woke the echoes of the river nearly twenty years before. A gay procession of the villagers, headed by Hifle, the seneschal, smiling and kissing hands as sweetly as ever, presented to the Major a lexicographical address on his return, and in the evening the small demesne was crowded with the inhabitants of the village, rich and poor. There was racing in bags, and climbing of poles with purses at the top, and music and dancing, and feasting and firing of cannon, and all that could be done to make a village gay for a night. But what most attracted admiration was a board suspended between two oak trees, with a flag at either end, and the word "Drumshambo," in variegated lamps, surrounded by wreaths of olive and of laurel, illuminating the intervening space.

Nothing remains for us to add, except that the Erin is at present lying at the quay, within a mile of our village, where she may be seen by any one who is desirous to purchase her, and that Redmond O'Connor is gone to sea. In the education of the young O'Connors the Major seems anxious that his errors, with regard to that of his own daughter, should be carefully avoided, and that a judicious degree of restraint should be mingled with indulgence.

"I do not approve," said the Major, "of all that care which is taken in the present day to remove all occasion for laborious exertion in the acquisition of useful knowledge. Even if one could succeed in teaching geography on penny handkerchiefs, and conveying a notion of all the sciences in the shape of sixpenny toys, a most important part of mental education would still be wanted—the habit and facility of laborious application. If all labours be turned into play when they are young, the Epicurean feeling will haunt them in after life, and having early learned to turn business into pleasure, they may eventually choose to make pleasure their business. It was my own shallow views of education that laid the foundation of all our misery."

THE END.

WALL-FLOWERS.

 O D bless the Wall-flower, the poor plant that blows,
In ruined places—a Samaritan—
As welcome as the bubbling spring that waits,
In desert lands, the drooping caravan.

There's not a broken rent where ruin sits,
There's not a fissure which the wind doth know,
But God's good ministers, the happy winds,
With gracious hands and kind, its seeds do sow.

Hath it not morals? The poor Wall-flower speaks
Of the sweet benediction which descends
On broken efforts, labours profitless,
But aiming, earnestly, to noble ends.

Our tombs were dug a million years ago,
Eternity supplied the pick and spade,
We sink and die, but, somehow, good survives
That which Eternity itself hath made.

Like the sweet Wall-flowers, hearts and books conserve
Our memories holy, and our names arise
Each with a blossom round it, to attest
What God hath loved and taken to the skies.

Heaven bless the Wall-flower, fadeless be its bloom,
Its generation spread from clime to clime,
For in its lowly presence we have learned
A solace that doth mock the spoils of Time.

THE "CREAGHTS" OF ULSTER.

FROM a very interesting paper read before the Kilkenny Archaeological Society, in the year 1855, we are enabled to glean a few notes relative to the "Creaghts" of Ulster, which will be interesting to many. As the author of the paper to which we are indebted for the materials of our notes, remarks, at the commencement of the seventeenth century Ulster presented as marked a difference from the rest of Ireland as it has done in later times; but instead of being, as now, the most English part of Ireland, it was the most Irish. It was only in the reign of James I., upon the conclusion of the war carried on by Queen Elizabeth's forces, under Lord Mountjoy, against the Earl of Tyrone, that the country was opened up for a general plantation, and that it became colonized by the ancestors of the present settlers.

A glance at the map will show that this province is three parts surrounded by sea, and that the remaining boundary, or land frontier, of Ulster, which may be roughly defined by a line drawn from Dundalk to Ballyshannon, on the Bay of Donegal, gives the shortest traverse from sea to sea.

The western half of this line is occupied by the waters of Lough Erne, which form a complete defence from Ballyshannon to Belturbet, a distance of nearly fifty miles; while the chain of the Fews mountains, rising in front of Dundalk, along the outmost part of the Pale, covered a considerable portion of the other, or eastern half. The interval in the centre was protected by the counties Monaghan and Cavan, a district of low, wooded hills, interlaced with a perfect net-work of bogs and lakes, through which there was but one road—that by Carrickmacross, in the barony of Farney, which thence came to be called the "Gap of the North."

In the days of Queen Elizabeth Ulster was termed, by an Act of Parliament passed for extinguishing the name of O'Nial, "the most perilous place in all the isle." For their greater security the O'Nials, with much shrewdness and policy, instead of attempting to strengthen their country with castles, forbade any to be built. And, carrying out this plan of rendering their country untenable to an invader, for want of cover and supplies; they discouraged agriculture, and kept their people to a wandering, pastoral life. Their dwellings are described as having been made of wattles, or boughs of trees, covered with long turves or sods of grass, which they could easily remove and put up as they wandered from place to place in search of pasture, following their vast herds of cattle, with their wives and children, and removing still to fresh lands as they had departed the former. They lived, according to "Spenser's State of Ireland," chiefly on the milk of their cows. The aggregate of families that in one body followed a herd, was called a "creaght." In other parts of Ireland there was much of strictly pastoral life, in many respects similar, which was called "Boolying," in which the owners of cattle and their families passed much of the year in the wilds and mountains with their cows, but, unlike the nomadic population of Ulster, they seem to have had fixed habitations to return to. The evils flowing from this unfixed wandering life of the "Creaghts," must be very evident. It induced, of course, a natural indisposition to submit to positive regulations. The difficulties, however, of abolishing this mode of life were great. The freedom of the woods and wilds has charms which even those who have left civilization to taste of, find it difficult to abandon, and are known often to have preferred to all the luxury of settled life.

At the termination of the scenes which, in the course of the seventeenth century, formed an erasable spot of blood and venom on the history of Ireland, the commissioners for the government of Ireland, upon serious consideration, "perceiving the inconveniency of permitting the Irish to live in Creaghts, after a loose and disorderly manner," issued orders for the "fixing such persons upon lands proportionable to their respective stock, and enjoining them to betake themselves to tillage and husbandry." In case of refusal their cattle and stock was seized, and sold "for the best advantage of the Commonwealth."

Traces of the "Creaghts" are to be found down to the middle of the last century; not, perhaps, that the practice or mode of life continued to prevail to so late a period, but the term was still known, and in use to describe the little huts and cabins, in which many of the Irish still continued to dwell.

Thus Story, the historian of the Williamite war, speaking of the "wild Irish," some of whom he first saw at Newry, on his march to the Boyne, says: "Some call them 'Creaghts,' from the little huts they live in, which they build so conveniently with hurdles and long turf, that they can remove them in summer towards the mountains, and bring them down to the valleys in winter."

LIGHT AND DARKNESS.

A TALE OF THE ANTRIM COAST.

THE head land of Carric-a-rede, which projects a considerable way into the sea, on the coast of Antrim, and on the extremity of which there is a small cottage, built for a fishing station, is divided by a tremendous rent or chasm, supposed to have been caused by some extraordinary convulsion of nature. This chasm is sixty feet wide, the rock on either side rising about eighty feet above the level of the sea. Across this rent a bridge of ropes has been constructed, for the convenience of the fishermen who live on the island during the summer months. The construction of this bridge is very simple. Two strong ropes or cables are stretched from one chasm to another, in a parallel line, and made fast to rings fixed permanently in the rock; across these, planks, twelve inches wide, are laid and secured; a slight rope, elevated convenient to the hand, runs parallel with the footway; and thus a bridge is formed, over which men, women, and boys, many of them carrying heavy burdens, are seen walking or running, apparently with as little concern as they would evince in advancing the same distance on terra firma. It is thrilling in the extreme to witness from a boat on the water, persons passing and repassing at this giddy height, and a feeling of anxiety, closely allied to pain, is invariably experienced by those who contemplate the apparently imminent danger to which people are exposed, while thus lightly treading the dangerous and narrow footway which conducts them across the gulf that yawns beneath their feet. That nothing can exceed in grandeur and boldness the scenery which occasionally bursts on the view of the traveller along the coast of Antrim, from Belfast to the Giant's Causeway, has been generally admitted by all who have travelled it. The road is hilly in the extreme, but it presents one continued scene of fine, bold, picturesque, maritime landscape; the rocks in some places rising into precipitous cliffs, jetting headlands, noble promontories, and again, sloping down into beautiful bays and quiet harbours, the prospect to the right being one continued sea-view, with the Scottish coast, the Isle of Arran, and other lesser islands, in the distance; that to the left pleasingly diversified with hill and valley—here a spot well cultivated, and occupied with comfortable cottages—and this again, succeeded by a barren mountain, with scarcely a cabin, even of the most miserable description, to show that it is inhabited by human beings.

The stranger who wanders along the terrific masses of crag that overhang the green and flaming waters of the coast, feels a melancholy interest excited in his mind, as he turns aside from the more impressive grandeur of the scene, and gazes on the small stone heaps that are scattered over the moss on which he treads. They are the graves of the nameless few whose bodies have been from time to time rejected from the bosom of the ocean, and cast upon these lonely crags to startle the early fisherman with their ghastly and disfigured bulk. Here they meet, at the hands of the pitying mountaineers, the last offices of Christian charity—a grave in the nearest soft earth, with no other ceremonial than the humble peasant's prayer. Here they lie, uncoffined, unlamented, unclaimed by mourning friends, starting like sudden spectres of death from the depths of the ocean, to excite a wild fear, a passing thought of pity, a vain inquiry in the hamlet, and then sink in to the earth in mystery and in silence, to be no more remembered on its surface.

The obscurity which envelops the history of those unhappy strangers affords a subject to the speculative traveller on which he may give free play to the wings of his imagination. Few, indeed, can pass these deserted sepulchres without endeavouring for a moment to penetrate in fancy the darkness which enshrouds the fate of their mouldering tenants; without beholding the progress of the ruin that struck from beneath the voyager's feet the firm and lofty fabric to which he had confidently trusted his existence—without hearing the shrieks of the despairing crew, and the stern and horrid burst of the roused-up ocean, as it dealt the last stroke upon the groaning timbers of the wreck, and scattered the whole pile far and wide in countless atoms, upon the boiling surface of the deep. And, again, without turning in thought to the far away homes, at which the tale of the wanderers was never told—to the pale young widow that dreamed herself still a wife, and lived on from morn to morn, in the fever of a vain suspense—to the helpless parent, that still hoped for the offices of filial kindness from the hand that was now mouldering in a distant grave; and to the social fireside, over whose evening pastimes the long silence of an absent friend had thrown a gloom that the certainty of woe or gladness could never remove.

Among those nameless tombs, within the space of the last few years, the widow of a fisherman, named Reardon, was observed to spend a great portion of her time. Her husband had died young, perishing in a sudden storm, which swept his canoe from the coast side into the waste of sea beyond it; and his wife was left to inhabit a small cottage near the crags, and to support, by the labour of her hands, an only child who was destined to inherit little more than the blessing, the virtue, and the affections of his parent. The poor widow endeavoured to procure a subsistence for her boy and for herself, by gathering the kelp which was thrown upon the crags, and which was burned for the purpose of manufacturing soap from its ashes; while the youth employed his yet unformed strength in tilling the small garden that was confined by a quickset hedge at their cottage side. They were fondly attached, and toiled incessantly to obtain the means of comfort, rather for each other than for themselves; but, with all their exertions, fortune left them in the rearward of her favour. The mother beheld with a mother's agony the youthful limbs and features of her boy exhibit the sickly effects of the habitual privation and habitual toil: while the son mourned to see the feebleness of premature old age begin to steal upon the health and vigour of his parent.

In these difficulties, a prospect of certain advantage and probable good fortune induced the young man to leave his mother and his native country for some years. The distresses and disturbances which agitated that unhappy land pressed so heavily upon the fortunes of many families of the middle as well as the lower rank, that great numbers were found to embrace the opportunity of improvement which the colonization of the New World held out for their advantage. Among those who emigrated was the family under whom the Reardons held their little cottage; and with them it was that the young man determined to try his fortune in a happier region. Having arranged their affairs so as to secure his widowed parent against absolute poverty, they separated with many tears, the mother blessing her son as she committed him to the guardianship of Providence, and the son pledging himself to return to her assistance as soon as he had obtained the means of providing her the comforts necessary for her old age.

His success, though gradual, was complete. The blessings of the young Tobias fell upon the work of his hands, and his industry, because well directed, was productive, even beyond his expectations. Instead of lingering, like many of his fellow-exiles, in the seaport towns, where they were detained by illness, and that open-mouthed folly which persuades men that fortune may be found without the pain of seeking, young Reardon proceeded at once into the new settlements, where human industry is one of the most valuable and valued commodities. In a little time, he was enabled to remit a considerable portion of his earnings to his poor mother, and continued from time to time, to increase his contributions to her comfort, until at length the abundance of his prosperity was such, as to enable him to relinquish the pursuit of gain, and to fulfil the promise he had made at parting.

He did not return alone. With the full approbation of the poor widow, he had joined his fate to that of a young person in the settlement where he dwelt, whose dispositions were in every way analogous to his own, and who only excelled him in the superior ease and comfort of her circumstances. Previous to his return, he wrote to the poor widow, to inform her, that in less than two months from that time, with the blessing of Providence, her daughter-in-law, her two grand-children, and her son would meet beneath the roof of her ancient dwelling.

Fancy, if you can, the anxiety with which the poor widow looked out for this long-expected time. The assistance which the affectionate exile had been able to afford her was such as to raise her to a state of comparative affluence in her neighbourhood, and to render her independent of the hard and servile toil by which she had been accustomed to gain a livelihood. Her countenance was wholly changed in its appearance, and had the honour of being frequently selected for a night's lodging by her landlord's agent, and other great men, who passed through that lonely district. A few flowers sprung up in her sallow-fringed garden, which were not the less tenderly cherished, that the seeds from which they grew were transmitted from the emigrant's garden in the other hemisphere. Her life, up to the moment when she received this joyous letter, had been calmly and sadly happy. She looked forward, with a serene feeling of mingled hope and resignation, to the day of her son's return, and never once suffered the eagerness of her affection to outstep her gratitude to heaven, and her entire dependence upon the Divine will.

But, forgive a mother's fondness! There are few hearts in which the affections of the world and of nature are so entirely held under subjection by the strong hand of reason and of faith, that they cannot be moved to a momentary forgetfulness of duty, by a sudden and startling occasion. After the widow had heard the letter read, in which her son announced his approaching return, the quiet of her life was for a time disturbed. She thought of heaven, indeed, and prayed even more fervently than before; but the burning fever that possessed her heart showed that its confidence was qualified. In the hours of devotion she often found her thoughts wandering from that Being whose breath could still or trouble the surface of the ocean, far over the wide waters themselves, to meet the vessel that was flying to her with the tidings of bliss. She shuddered as she went, morn after morn, to the cliff head, and cast her eyes on the graves of the shipwrecked voyagers, which were scattered along the turf-mountain on which she trod. In the silence of the night, when she endeavoured to drown her anxieties in sleep, imagination did but overact the part which it had terrified her waking. Stormy seas and adverse winds—a ship straining against the blast, with her deck covered with pale and frightened faces, among which she seemed to detect those of her son and of his family—winds hissing through the creaking yards—and waves tossing their horrid heads aloft, and roaring for their prey. Such were the visions which beset the bed of the longing mother, and made the night ghastly to her eyes. When she lay awake, the rustling of a sudden wind among the green boughs at her window made her start, and sit erect in her bed; nor would she again return to rest until she had opened the little casement, and satisfied herself, by waving her hand abroad in the night air, that her alarm was occasioned by one of its fairest and most favourable motions. So indeed it was. The Almighty, as though to convince her how far she was from conjecturing aright the quarter from which calamity might visit her, bade the winds blow during the whole of that period in the manner which, had they been in her own keeping, she would have desired. Her acquaintances and neighbours all seemed to share in her anxiety. The fishermen, after they had drawn up their canoes at evening, were careful, on their way homeward, to drop in at the Widow Reardon's door, and let her know what vessels had entered the neighbouring river in the course of the day, or had appeared in the offing. She was constantly cheered with the assurance that fairer weather for a homeward-bound ship, or more likely to continue, was never known before. Still, nevertheless, the poor woman's heart was not at peace, and the days and nights lagged along with an unaccustomed heaviness.

One night in particular, towards the end of the second month, appeared to linger so very strangely that the widow thought the morn would never dawn.

An unusual darkness seemed to brood over the world; and she lay awake, gazing with longing eyes toward the little window through which the sun's earliest rays were used to greet her in her waking.

On a sudden she heard voices outside the window. Alive to the slightest circumstance that was unusual, she arose, all dark as it was, threw on her simple dress in haste, and groped her way to the front door of the dwelling. She recognised the voice of a friendly neighbour, and opened the door, supposing that he might have some interesting intelligence to communicate. She judged correctly.

"Good news! good news! Mrs. Reardon; and I give you joy of them this morning. What will you give me for telling you who is in that small boat at the shore?"

"That small boat!—what?—where?"

"Below there, ma'am, where I am pointing my finger. Don't you see them coming up the crag towards you?"

"I cannot—I cannot, it is so dark," the widow replied, endeavouring to penetrate the gloom.

"Dark! and the broad sun shining down upon them this whole day!"

"Day!—the sun! Oh, my Almighty Father! save me."

"What's the matter? Don't you see them, ma'am?"

"See them?" the poor woman exclaimed, placing her hands on her eyes, and shrieking aloud in her agony. "Oh! I shall never see him more! I am dark and blind!"

The peasant started back and blessed himself. The next instant the poor widow was caught in the arms of her son.

"Where is she? My mother! Oh, my darling mother! I am come back to you. Look! I have kept my word."

She strove, with a sudden effort of self-restraint, to keep her misfortune secret, and wept, without speaking, upon the neck of her long-absent relative, who attributed her tears to an excess of happiness. But, when he presented his young wife, and called her attention to the happy, laughing faces and healthful cheeks of their children, the wandering of her eyes and the confusion of her manner left it no longer possible to retain the secret.

"My good, kind boy," said she, laying her hand heavily on his arm, "you are returned to my old arms once more, and I am grateful for it; but we cannot expect to have all we wish for in this world. Oh, my poor boy! I can never see you—I can never see your children! I am blind!"

The young man uttered a horrid and piercing cry, while he tossed his clenched hand above his head and stamped upon the earth in sudden anguish. "Blind! my mother!" he repeated. "Oh, heaven! is this the end of all my toils and wishes? To come home, and find her dark for ever! Is it for this that I have prayed and laboured? Blind and dark! Oh, my poor mother! Oh, heaven! Oh, mother, mother!"

"Hold, now, my boy—where are you? What way is that for a Christian to talk? Come near me, and let me touch your hands. Don't add to my sorrows, Richard, my child, by uttering a word against the will of Heaven. Where are you? Come near me. Let me hear you say that you are resigned to this and all other visitations of the great Lord of all light. Say this, my child, and your virtue will be dearer to me than my eyes! Ah, my good Richard, you may be sure the Almighty never strikes us except it is for our sins, or for our good! I thought too much of you, my child, and the Lord saw that my heart was straying to the world, again, and he has struck me for the happiness of both. Let me hear you say that you are satisfied. I can see your heart still, and that is dearer to me than your person. Let me see it as good and dutiful as I knew it before you left me."

The disappointed exile supported her in his arms.

"Well, well, my poor mother," he said, "I am satisfied. Since you are the chief sufferer, and show no discontent, it would be too unreasonable that I should murmur. The will of Heaven be done! but it is a bitter—bitter stroke." Again he folded his dark parent to his bosom, and wept aloud; while his wife, retiring softly to a distance, hid her face in her cloak. Her children clung, with fear and anxiety to her side, and gazed with affrighted faces upon the afflicted mother and son.

But they were not forgotten. After she had repeatedly embraced her recovered child, the good widow remembered her guests. She extended her arms towards that part of the room at which she heard the sobs and moanings of the younger mother. "Is that my daughter's voice?" she asked—"place her in my arms, Richard. Let me feel the mother of your children upon my bosom." The young woman flung herself into the embrace of the aged widow. Young and fair, I am sure," the latter continued, passing her wasted fingers over the blooming cheek of the good American. "I can feel the roses upon this cheek, I am certain. But what are these? Tears? My good child, you should dry your tears instead of adding to them. Where are your children? Let me see—ah! my heart—let me feel them, I mean—let me take them in my arms. My little angels! Oh! if I could only open my eyes, for one moment to look upon you all—but for one little instant—I would close them again for the rest of my life, and think myself happy. If it had happened only one day—one hour after your arrival—but the will of Heaven be done! perhaps, even this moment, when we think ourselves most miserable, He is preparing for us some hidden blessing."

Once more the pious widow was correct in her conjecture. It is true, that day, which all hoped should be a day of rapture, was spent by the re-united family in tears and mourning. But Providence did not intend that creatures who had served him so faithfully should be visited with more than a temporary sorrow, for a slight and unaccustomed transgression.

The news of the widow's misfortune spread rapidly through the country, and excited universal sympathy—for few refuse their commiseration to a fellow creature's sorrow, even of those who would accord a tardy and measured sympathy to his good fortune. Among those who heard, with real pity the story of their distress, was a surgeon who resided in the neighbourhood, and who felt all that enthusiastic devotion to his art, which its high importance to the welfare of mankind was calculated to excite in a generous mind. This gentleman took an early opportunity of visiting the old widow, when she was alone in the cottage. The simplicity with which she told her story, and the entire resignation which she expressed, interested and touched him deeply.

"It is not over with me yet, sir," she concluded, "for still, when the family are talking around me, I forget that I am blind; and when I hear my son say something pleasant, I turn to see the smile upon his lips; and when the darkness reminds me of my loss, it seems as if I lost my sight over again!"

The surgeon discovered, on examination, that the blindness was occasioned by a disease called cataract, which obscures, by an unhealthy secretion, the lucid brightness of the crystalline lens, and obstructs the entrance of the rays of light. The improvements which modern practitioners have made in this science render this disease, which was once held to be incurable, now comparatively easy of removal. The surgeon perceived at once, by the condition of the eyes, that by the abstraction of the injured lens, he could restore sight to the afflicted widow.

Unwilling, however, to excite her hopes too suddenly or prematurely, he began by asking her whether, for a chance of recovering the use of her eyes, she would submit to a little pain?

The poor woman replied, "that if he thought he could once more enable her to behold her child and his children, she would be content to undergo any pain which would not endanger her existence."

"Then," replied her visitor, "I may inform you, that I have the strongest reasons to believe that I can restore your sight, provided you agree to place yourself at my disposal for a few days. I will provide you with an apartment in my house, and your family shall know nothing of it until the cure is effected."

The widow consented; and on that very evening the operation was performed. The pain was slight, and was subdued by the patient without a murmur. For a few days after the surgeon insisted on her wearing a covering over her eyes, until the wounds which he had found it necessary to inflict had been perfectly healed.

One morning, after he had felt her pulse and made the necessary inquiries, he said, while he held the hand of the widow :

"I think we may now venture with safety to remove the covering. Compose yourself now, my good old friend, and suppress all emotion. Prepare your heart for the reception of a great happiness."

The poor woman clasped her hands firmly together, and moved her lips as if in prayer. At the same moment the covering fell from her brow, and the light burst in joyous flood upon her soul. She sat for an instant bewildered, and incapable of viewing any object with distinctness. The first upon which her eyes reposed was the figure of a young man bending his gaze with an intense and ecstatic fondness upon hers, and with his arms outstretched as if to anticipate the recognition. The face, though changed and sunken since she had known it, was still familiar to her. She started from her seat with a wild cry of joy, and cast herself upon the bosom of her son.

She embraced him repeatedly, then removed him to a distance, that she might have the opportunity of viewing him with greater distinctness, and again, with a burst of tears, flung herself upon his neck. Other voices, too, mingled with theirs. She beheld her daughter and their children waiting eagerly for her caress. She embraced them all, returning from each to each, and perusing their faces and persons as if she would never drink deep enough of the cup of rapture which her recovered sense afforded her. The beauty of the young mother—the fresh and rosy colour of the children—the glossy brightness of their hair—their smiles—their movements of joy—all afforded subjects for delight and admiration, such as she might never have experienced, had she never considered them in the light of blessings lost for life. The surgeon, who thought that the consciousness of a stranger's presence might impose a restraint upon the feelings of the patient and her friends, retired into a distant corner, where he beheld, not without tears, the scene of happiness which he had been instrumental in conferring.

"Richard," said the widow, as she laid her hand upon her son's shoulder, and looked into his eyes, "did I not judge aright when I said that even when we thought ourselves most miserable, the Almighty might have been preparing for us some hidden blessing? Were we in the right to murmur?"

The young man withdrew his arms from his mother, clasped them before him, and bowed down his head in silence.

DRUGS AND DRUGGISTS.

SCARCELY a more curious chapter in the history of events could be written than one which would trace the beliefs and fashions which have obtained among the community with respect to the use of medicines. Taking up an old book the other day in a medical library, entitled "The Ladies' Dispensatory," we caught a glimpse of the ideas of our ancestors on this subject, which may compare—not much to our own advantage, we fear—with the practice of the big-medicine men of some remote African tribe. If our reader happen to have lived in the good old time—the Arcadian period of "merrie England," when, according to romantic writers, a few herbs and simples sufficed to medicine the "ills that flesh was heir to" in those robust days—"a falling sickness," we find, would have been treated with any of the following recipes, or with a succession of them. "The blood of a weasel, to be drunk; the liver of an ass roasted, eaten fasting; an ass's hoof burned, to be drunk; the brine excrescence growing on the coronet of a horse's hoof, bruised and drunk in vinegar; stones found in the belly of the swallow's first brood tied in a piece of buckskin and worn about the neck; gall of a sea-calf, to be drunk; gall of a beare; gall of a tortoise put in the nose." These are recipes taken exactly as they come from the book of domestic medicine of the days of Cromwell. If we consult the prescriptions of the regular physicians of that day, we find the same spirit running through the loathsome messes they gave to their patients. Fragments of all kinds of animals were favourite pièces de resistance with them, and next to those their blood formed the staple of their nostrums.

There was a higher class of prescription, however, then in use, which was evidently aimed at the superstitious feelings of the poor people drugged. The moss from a dead man's skull is recommended for a patient by Sir Kenhelm Digby; scrapings from human bones, poundings of a wolf's teeth, and even the hemp of a rope with which a man had hung himself are to be found among the remedies prescribed, less than two hundred years ago by learned Doctors of the College of Physicians. Our surgery was quite as bad. If a wound inflamed, we find even "verdigrise," a most virulent poison recommended as a cure. God must have been very merciful to the afflicted in those days, for man, in his gross ignorance, was certainly very cruel. Errors of this kind are traceable in the use of remedies down to the middle of the eighteenth century. After this time a marked amendment appeared in the British pharmacopoeia. Drugs proper took the place of disgusting refuse of animals, and the herbs of the garden gave place to medicines of a more potent nature. Prescriptions became less offensive, but we must question if they were quite as harmless as heretofore. The physician, as if to make up for the disuse of articles in his prescriptions calculated to strike terror into his patient's mind, loaded his recipes with every drug that he could well remember. Some of these prescriptions might almost be measured by the foot-rule, and often the ingredients were of so diverse a character, that, as a friend remarks, the object of the prescriber appears to have been to have aimed the remedy at his patient's complaint, as a timid householder would a blunderbus at a robber, in the hope that some of the projectiles at least would hit.

We got rid of these long prescriptions, it is true; but even at the present day the middle classes are be-drugged in a manner it is fearful to contemplate. The medical service of the country is mainly supplied by what is termed the general practitioner,—a gentleman who possesses the double licence of the College of Surgeons and the Apothecaries' Company. The latter society is nothing more than a company trading in drugs, and of course it is their interest to increase the consumption of their staples as largely as possible. The general practitioner is entitled by this act to make certain charges for the drugs sent to his patients, and this practice has now become general throughout the country. The public are, we fear, wholly to blame for this very objectionable practice. An attempt has been made by the medical profession to break through it by charging for time instead of physic, a much more sensible method of payment, and one calculated to save the patient from the infliction of unnecessary drugs; but this plan as yet has failed altogether, in the provinces, at least. People, as a rule, like to be drugged; they prefer the practitioner who takes active measures: they like something, they say, for their money, and they unfortunately prefer to pay for the coloured bottles of stuff that come into the sick chamber with such alarming rapidity, to paying the medical man for his time and skill. In the larger towns the patients are more reasonable, and see through the absurdity of putting the medical man under the necessity of supplying drugs that are often hurtful to them.

As a general rule, however, people like strong medicines, and will have them; hence the doctor, if he will live, must bow to the popular decision. The lower we go in the social scale, the stronger is this tendency to rely upon strong drugs to cure disease. We have only to glance over the pages of newspapers, to see the swarms of patent medicines which address themselves to the eye of the public. Every druggist thinks he is entitled to find out some specific for "all the ills that flesh is heir to;" and some gigantic professors in this art astound us by the magnitude of their operations. Mr. Holloway, to wit, sends out his pills by the ton weight; and Morrison, with his gamboge boluses, is equal to a persistent diarrhoea throughout the country. There is a tendency, however, in all things to right themselves, and the abuse of the drugging system has led to the adoption of a doctrine which is tantamount to a practical denial of the value of medicine altogether. It cannot be gainsaid that the upper classes of this country are deeply bitten with the doctrine of Homœopathy. Disappointed with the present routine system of medicine, they fly to one which appeals to their imagination. There is something truly wonderful in the power of remedies which they believe to act in billionth doses, and forthwith they give themselves up to the harmless treatment of nature; for, to say that any homœopathic dose can have any effect upon the human body, is more than we are at present prepared to admit.

The pleasure of doctoring one's self—no slight pleasure, as the practice of mankind shows—can be indulged in by its believers to their heart's content. The little cabinets of bottles and the hand-books of symptoms are at hand to minister to the belief that every man can be his own doctor. We have no doubt that, after the use of these pretty little trifles, people get well; for it is the tendency of the minor disturbances of health to right themselves. We may concede, perhaps, that the very belief in infinitesimal doses may have some effect towards a cure, for we know how great is the effect of the mind over the body; but this we know also, that where indisposition grows into downright illness, of a serious character, either of two things happen—the homœopathist varies his doses to allopathic proportions, or the patient has recourse to the legitimate practitioner. Nevertheless, we cannot help admitting that the very fact of the existence of homœopathy is a proof that there is something wrong or deficient in our present state of knowledge as to the action of drugs.

Whilst in every other department of medicine our advance has been great—whilst our knowledge of the minute structure of the body has been thoroughly elucidated by the use of the microscope—whilst the science of physiology has taught us the method of action of healthy structure—whilst pathology has gone far to teach us how disease alters the different structures and interferes with their functions—there is one department of medicine the advance of which has been entirely of a negative kind. Therapeutics, or the art which treats of the action of remedies, is very little advanced from what it was in the time of Galen. We cure ague with quinine, and give colour to the cheek by the aid of iron; we subdue delirium tremens with opium, and so forth, by the modus operandi of the action of these drugs upon the various organs; the effect we know no more really about than the big-medicine man of the North American Indians.

THE ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY.

"Nostri Plena Laboris."

REAT honour," says Arthur Young, writing in 1776, "is due to Ireland for having given birth to the 'Dublin Society,' which has the undisputed merit of being the father of all similar societies now existing in Europe. It was established in 1731, and owed its origin to one of the most patriotic individuals which any country has produced, Dr. Samuel Madan. For some years it was supported only by the voluntary subscriptions of members, forming a fund much under £1,000 per annum; yet was there such a liberality of sentiment in their conduct, so pure a love of the public interest apparent in all their transactions, as enabled them, with that small fund, to effect much greater things than they have done in later times, since Parliament has granted them regularly £10,000 a session."

Thus wrote, nearly a hundred years since, a talented and reliable observer, who was confessedly the originator of our modern system of agriculture, and, allowing his unbiassed testimony its full weight, a much higher antiquity is pleaded for the institution he so enthusiastically commends. A century before Arthur Young visited Ireland's Isle the Dublin Philosophical Society, or, as it was usually termed, "The Dublin Society," had been founded by the celebrated William Molyneux, who became its first secretary, and Sir William Petty first president. This association numbered among its members and contributors four, of the talented name of Molyneux, Robert Boyle, St. George Ash, William King, (who subscribes himself F.D.S., and sometimes S. (Socius) D.S.) and many other ingenious men, who, in conjunction with Locke, Shaftesbury, and their associates on the British side of the channel, were then laying wide and deep the foundations of inductive science. To this society, in 1683, Marsh, then Bishop of Ferns, presented his curious treatise on "Sounds," one of those remarkable essays on the imponderables that cast the light of knowledge far into the future. This communication, as also others, subsequently appeared in the Transactions of the Royal Society, with acknowledgment of the previous publication. The benevolent and judicious Madan, in 1731, renovated and extended the functions of the Dublin Society, with a view to more practical results; and accordingly in "the Proceedings" for 1764, before his death, it is entitled, "A complete repertory for practical knowledge." In 1749 a charter of incorporation was granted under the title, "The Dublin Society for promoting Husbandry and other Useful Arts in Ireland;" and, in 1820, the epithet "Royal" was affixed, on occasion of George IV. becoming patron of the institution.

Amid the accumulation of events and rapid lapse of time the sources of public benefits are often quite forgotten; and it may not be inappropriate to mention here that the culture of wheat in Ireland, as an article of export, was first extensively established under the advice and auspices of this society, encouraged by the opinions and statements of that patriarch of agriculture, Arthur Young. The observations of that sagacious inquirer on the public spirit, and self-reliance of this association in its earlier annals, are fairly applicable to its subsequent history up to this time, although the rather exaggerated contrast between expenditure of income and parliamentary grant does not equally apply to present circumstances. Indeed, public money was in those days sadly squandered and misapplied, and the unsound policy of "bounties" exercised a debilitating influence on the enterprise and self dependence of the masses—so that no legitimate analogy can be here instituted for the purpose of inferring the inexpediency of that pecuniary aid, now afforded by an Imperial Parliament to increase the acknowledged usefulness of an institution, which, during so long a period, and amid the multitude of distinguished associations fashioned after its exemplar throughout Europe, has maintained a firm and consistent position a-head of the national development—beckoning onward, still onward, to each grade of progress in agriculture, manufactures, sciences, and arts in Ireland.

The present Royal Dublin Society House, in which, under one coverture, all the diversified business is transacted, was formerly the palatial town residence of the Dukes of Leinster, and was purchased in 1815 for the sum of £20,000, arising chiefly from the funds of the Society. The first grant to the society from the Irish Parliament, in 1761, was £2,000, which, with varying amounts, increased to £15,500, in 1800. The first grant from the Imperial Parliament, in 1801, was £11,071, and liberal aid was continued for several subsequent years, until, in 1854, it was ultimately diminished, in inverse proportion to extending usefulness and necessarily increasing expenditure, to the inadequate amount of £5,500—i. e., after deduction of £500 for the Zoological Gardens, in the Phoenix Park, which are not otherwise connected with the society. Besides this annual grant, however, occasional sums have been voted for completion of the several buildings and departments. The income of the society from all sources—the parliamentary grant, members' fees and subscriptions, and receipts of cattle shows—now amounts to nearly £8,000 per annum. There are over 1,200 members, and the number is increasing, though too slowly for production of any marked financial advantage. The total receipts for all purposes for the six years ending April, 1861, amounted in round numbers to £57,000, of which fully one-third was voluntary contribution, a liberal and fair proportion, according to the practice of sundry other public endowments. The Lord Lieutenant for the time being is president of the society (by custom), and the vice-presidents, with the other members of the council, the honorary secretaries, and the various committees, number together over 100, who give their time and talents gratuitously to conducting the general business of the institution, which, without enumerating committees for special and occasional matters and sub-committees, is thus officially classified:—

1. Agriculture and Husbandry.
2. Botany and Horticulture.
3. Chemistry, applied to agriculture and rural economy.
4. Fine Arts.
5. Library.
6. Manufactures and Agricultural Museum.
7. Natural History, Geology, and Mineralogy.
8. Natural Philosophy and Mechanics.

The chief departments to which attention is requested are—the Library, with Reading and Conversation Rooms, School and Galleries of Art, Museum of Natural History, Botanic Gardens, Lectures, with Lecture Theatres and Laboratory, and Public Commercial Examinations, Monthly Evening Meetings during the Session for Scientific Discussion, and lastly, an Agricultural Museum, with two great Agricultural Exhibitions each year.

A few observations relative to the functions and requirements of these departments respectively are necessary. The Library contains thirty thousand volumes, one-fourth of which, inclusive of valuable Spanish and Italian books, and many tomes of costly illustrated literature, are stowed away in garrets under the bare rafters of the roof. There the noise of the city is muffled like the sound of a distant surf, and the book-worm may enjoy perfect solitude, without any intrusion, except of spiders, &c. Now, there are five large apartments on the library floor, only requiring fittings and the ordinary furniture to become available for a classified arrangement of this valuable collection, and an extended accommodation for readers, whether members or visitors—for the library is practically free to the public, the only introduction requisite being the entry of the name on the registry by a member, and members themselves claiming but one exclusive privilege—that of borrowing volumes. Indeed, it is a matter for mature consideration whether continuance of this privilege is compatible with the higher interests and objects of the establishment—the vexation and inconvenience of being debarred from reference, until too late for occasion, is too often experienced; and all books of statistical and scientific information, essential to acquisition and structure of systematic knowledge, ought not to be withdrawn even for a day. To draw a distinction between these and literature of a more evanescent character would prove difficult and unsatisfactory; and, in short, there will be no legitimate plea for continuance of the borrowing system when the proposed additional accommodation is supplied for readers of both sexes. Many ladies especially would be induced to take larger advantages of this valuable collection, in cultivation of literary and artistic pursuits, if suitable apartments were provided for their accommodation. One very large room, lately appropriated to the public, is already inconveniently crowded, chiefly by very young men, grateful to embrace the opportunities of acquiring useful knowledge to fit them for their existing or intended occupations in life. Valuable new publications are added to the library stock each year, such as are recommended by members, and have passed the approving sanction of the Library Committee; and the Members' Conversation-room is supplied with the principal scientific and literary serials of Europe and America. The Society's School of Art, traditionally famous for the painters and sculptors who were there taught the first principles of art, has been placed, since 1849, under the control and supervision of the Government Department of Science and Art of the Board of Trade, who have evinced much discrimination and care in the improvement of the school, the facility and cheapness of admission to which extend its diversified advantages to all diligent students of the poorer classes; but the master, though zealous and talented, is unable, with only one assistant, to compass all the divisions of instruction; and at least two additional instructors are essential for Moulding and Architecture, in order to eliminate the national taste, now displaying a prominent and decided leaning to Sculpture and the Constructive Art. For this a larger endowment would be necessary, and the school would be placed on a more satisfactory basis if its management was restored to the society, reserving only Government sanction in election of teachers. There is an honorary professorship of Artistic Anatomy attached to this department; but the addresses of the eminent professional gentleman who fills that office being only occasional, and not a sequential course, the results are as unprofitable as the impressions are transitory; and systematic instruction in the scientific portraiture of life would be more satisfactorily managed by inviting well-qualified persons to give from eight to twelve lectures on the subject during the month following each summer recess, for a certain fixed sum, with permission to publish same under approval of the "Fine Arts" Committee, but at the lecturer's pecuniary risk.

In the lawn of the institution is now being erected a building for a National Gallery, the idea of which sprang from the desire of the Irish people to commemorate the munificence of William Dargan in instituting on the society's premises the Great Exhibition of 1853, which was organized, and happily conducted to a prosperous issue, at the sole risk of that enterprising and high-spirited Irishman, who, notwithstanding a considerable excess of expenditure over receipts, has been really the gainer in the transaction by the triumphant success of his speculation in giving to the trade and manufactures of his country a development, impetus, and extension, the benefits of which are increasingly manifest in every branch of native industry. The President and Senior Vice-President of the Royal Dublin Society are constituted ex-officio two of the Governors of the National Gallery, intended to contain a choice collection of the works of ancient and modern artists, with sculptures, engravings, drawings, and models. It is rumoured that the removal to this building of the public library usually termed "Marsh's Library" has been determined on, but it is difficult to credit such a sample of Vandalism even in Ireland. Of this grand old collection, in prime preservation, and admirably catalogued, fully seventeen thousand volumes exhibit dates of publication from the earliest period of printing up to the middle of the seventeenth century, and of the remaining 1,000 volumes only about 300 are modern books. Marsh purchased Stillingfleet's library at the decease of that learned prelate, and in 1694, being then Archbishop of Dublin, he presented his own and Stillingfleet's collections, as a free library, to the City of Dublin, founding the institution within the precinct of St. Patrick's Cathedral, now being restored to its ancient splendour at the cost of a distinguished citizen. To this united collection was added three thousand valuable works in 1745, the bequest of Bishop Sterne. The books and manuscripts are chiefly mediæval in time and erudite in character, presenting a rare and curious collection of Patristic, Biblical, Historic, and Oriental literature, together with many volumes of Scandinavian and Celtic (or rather Hibernian) annals and antiquities, of especial interest just at this time, when the Archaeology of Northern Europe has in great part supplanted the classic studies of our forefathers. Archbishop Marsh was one of the few English in the 17th century who understood and appreciated our nation, and was honoured and esteemed in return; and his noble gift ought not to be transferred from its appointed and appropriate site, to become an appendage to a gallery of paintings, which should contain only a collection of works relating to subjects of pictorial illustration and art culture, as originally proposed by the committee of the "Dargan Testimonial." The National Gallery of Ireland, when connected by a corridor with the schools of art, will afford many and diverse opportunities of improvement to the pupils, subject to the permissive arrangements of the governors of the former institution; but want of funds must necessarily defer these desirable results to a distant period. The Natural History Museum, containing one of the finest collections of minerals in the empire, besides valuable assortments in ornithology, conchology, and other divisions of Natural History, has long been in an unsatisfactory state of confusion and disarrangement for lack of money, the outlay on the new structure having already amounted to nearly £12,000, of which sum about one half was supplied by voluntary contribution; and the completion of furniture and fittings, together with compilation and publication of an expository catalogue, will probably require £4,000. Both the Museum and National Gallery might now have been in complete working order, ministering to the public instruction and amusement, had the mode and material of structure been less expensive. And, after all, what is the shell to the kernel? Bricks, with cut stone quoins and interfenestral pilasters in low relief, and without niches, would have cost one fourth less, and presented a light and sufficiently ornate front, while the present buildings are bald and heavy, and not even in accurate conformity with the style of the Society House, a handsome structure in its way, though sombre-looking from the moist and smoky atmosphere. However, the execution of the work is highly creditable, and the thick and massive walls are strong enough to last as long as the Mausoleum of Hadrian. The Botanic Gardens of the Society, containing forty-three acres of a picturesquely diversified surface, watered by the beautiful stream of the Tolka, are situated in the Glasnevin suburb. These gardens are generally accessible during four days in the week, and have lately, by desire of the Government, been opened free to the public on Sundays, from 2 p. m. until sunset. That this privilege has been appreciated and not abused, is evidenced by the fact that Sunday visitors have hitherto averaged over five thousand, without a flower-stalk being broken. The department was undoubtedly organised for scientific and educational purposes, but in a certain sense the recreative falls fairly within the latter category; for, where the eye exultates in freedom over the graceful forms and bright tints of plants and flowers, the mind becomes gradually imbued with their innumerable modifications of beauty and utility, and a germ of instruction is sown of deep and felicitous meaning, however vaguely apparent to superficial observera. Assuredly, there is "a possession in seeing," for all who will appreciate the bounteous gift; and who is so presumptuous as to doubt that the habits and tastes of many of our working people, as keenly sensitive to the impress of nature's loveliness as to that neighbourly kindness which freely grants them participation in the privileges of the wealthier classes, will be both improved and exalted by their visits to those beautiful gardens on the day of rest, when withdrawal from weekly toils and cares yields both zest and healthful occasion for a quiet evening walk? It may be emphatically affirmed that with the Sunday opening of the Botanic Gardens the last trace of seeming exclusiveness has disappeared; and this time-honoured society now declares, as well by constitution as practice, that it holds both property and privileges in a generous trust for the public benefit, ambitious only to increase its wealth in order to extend its usefulness. The Gardens have been much improved of late by means of successive Government grants, but a botanical museum is yet wanting.

The Educational Department of the Society also includes lectures from several professors, scientific papers, and discussions thereon, and the general commercial examinations. In 1854 the staff of professors was withdrawn from the exclusive control of the Society by the Government, which very wisely extended the scope of industrial instruction, by determining that courses of lectures should be delivered every session at "the Museum of Irish Industry," as well as in the Theatre of the Society, on the respective subjects of—Physics, Chemistry, Botany, Zoology, Geology, and Analytical and Practical Chemistry. However, a temporary exception was made in two instances—the society being permitted to retain two professors of mineralogy and of agriculture (or agricultural chemistry), at salaries of £150. Now it is earnestly pressed on the consideration of Government, whether it would not be most desirable to leave these two professors in permanence to the society, requiring them, besides lectures, to afford class or catechetical instruction, their departments being sufficiently distinct from the other professorships, and particularly calculated to promote the two principal objects of the society, as originally constituted, viz:—development of the agricultural and mineral resources of Ireland. The agricultural and mineralogical museums are large and well filled, and there is an admirably furnished laboratory, suitably situated for the purposes of both these departments; so that every facility exists for communicating instruction in the chemistry of soils, the mechanics of culture, and in the nature and utilization of native minerals. The duties of the Professor of Agriculture also might be usefully extended to the veterinary art, so far as delivery of lectures each session on the anatomy, physiology and pathology of the domesticated animals used for food or labour, and the present professor possesses the requisite information and scientific ability for such purpose; but to re-establish a veterinary hospital, with its adjuncts of forges, stables, and dissecting rooms, would, for many reasons, be most unadvisable. Veterinary surgery in Dublin is now reputably and efficiently represented, which was not the case in 1800, when the society brought over from England Thomas Peall and George Watts to conduct a veterinary hospital on their premises, and introduce that branch of the healing art into Ireland. That object effectively accomplished, the society closed its school as soon as educated and skilled practitioners appeared in the professional market; and it would be preferable, both in a provident and utilitarian point of view, to concentrate the means and energies of the Royal Dublin Society on its existing and more than sufficing engagements, than to extend its educational and financial liabilities, with more ambition than judgment, to any branch of employment not requiring its practical interference. If pecuniary resources increased, the first object ought to be the more adequate payment of officials and their assistants. The salary of the Professor of Agriculture, for instance, might be fairly doubled, excluding altogether the system of fees for purposes of income, though small fees from pupils may be advisable in every department to test the value placed on instruction, and constitute a fund for chemicals, instruments, specimens, and other necessary appliances. It would increase considerably the efficiency and attractiveness of the various branches of instruction to enable the scientific staff to take in rotation short continental tours during the recess, for the purpose of noting the condition and arrangement of foreign institutions, and their progress in science and arts; thus, bringing these acquisitions to bear on their subsequent teaching, and in improvement of their respective departments. This plan has been occasionally tried with marked success, but insufficient means prevent its being systematically adopted. The society has likewise established annual examinations for prizes and general certificates of merit in those branches of knowledge connected with ordinary business and commercial pursuits. This is a department of growing usefulness, and is conducted by a select board of twelve members, gentlemen of eminence in science and useful literature, or in business. Last year thirty-eight candidates presented themselves, and prizes and certificates were awarded to thirteen. This season the number will, probably, be doubled, and it is gratifying to add, that the advantage has been extended to female candidates.

A series of scientific evening meetings are held each month during the session, for exhibition and explanation of mechanical inventions, and reading, and discussion of scientific papers, that have passed the cui bono ordeal of a committee appointed for that purpose; original essays on any subject of scientific or social importance are received, whether contributed by members or strangers, and a selection is published in the society's journal, which is forwarded (chiefly in exchange for British, Colonial, and Foreign serials) to all the leading scientific institutions of the world. Facility of access is given to these reunions, by permitting members to purchase tickets of admission for others at six-pence each, which together with voluntary contributions from members helps to defray the cost of refreshments at the close of the discussions. The increasing number of intelligent and inquiring young men of every class in society who anxiously seek admission, is a notable proof of the benefit arising from the scientific evening meetings; and if they opened at seven instead of eight o'clock, and closed at nine, with conversazione until half-past ten o'clock, it would probably be found more advantageous for all comers who are in earnest in their pursuit of knowledge. Straitened finances and unfinished apartments have been pleaded for not establishing stated conversaciones, at least two in each year, to which ladies should be admissible; but "where there's a will there's a way." It has been done on two occasions in compliment to British scientific associations visiting Dublin; and the unfulfilled obligation lies to debit of the members of the Royal Dublin Society from their female fellow citizens, many of whom are accomplished in science, literature, and art, and capable of appreciating the pleasing instruction and social intercourse of such reunions. It has been suggested that the society's large and commodious apartments could be made more generally available for the meeting of other scientific associations, who might admit one or two of the society members, ex-officio, on their committees, and assent to the household rules of the establishment; but for various reasons, just now unnecessary to detail, it is not likely that the change would be deemed advantageous, except, perhaps, by the "Chemical Society" and "Natural History Society."

The Agricultural Museum, formerly the stabling and granaries of Leinster House, is extensive and well suited for its diversified purposes, containing seeds, implements, models of agricultural buildings, specimens of fuel, of woods, etc., etc. This department might be rendered vastly more serviceable by publication of a catalogue, classifying and explicitly describing the numerous articles. One of the main objects enumerated in the charter of incorporation being the promotion of agriculture, two great agricultural shows each year, at the Easter and Christmas seasons, have been established, and are open to competitors from all parts of the United Kingdom, for cattle, poultry, farm produce, patent manures, and implements, and machinery having relation to household economics, as well as to agricultural processes, and the preparation of food. The exhibitions have no official connexion with those held by the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland in each of the four provinces in annual rotation, and with increasing success, for furtherance of the same important object. To this department the Government grant is only £250, of which £150 goes for the salary of the Curator of the Agricultural Museum, who also fulfils the onerous duties of superintendent of these exhibitions, the annual cost of which, inclusive of prizes, has now risen to nearly £1,500, exceeding the total amount of receipts arising from exhibitors' entries, admission fees, and the Government grant by £70 and upwards. The society also have lately raised some £4,700 by voluntary contributions for an Agricultural Hall, and are now soliciting the aid and sanction of Government in order to purchase a contiguous lot of ground for a Show

Yard, the lawn of the society, bounded by the main building, the Natural History Museum, the National Gallery, and on the fourth side open to Merrion-square, being unsuitable, and disfigured by the filth and debris of the exhibitions. This lawn ought manifestly be laid down in character with the choice bit of urban shrubbery in the opposite square. And with respect to establishing a Cattle Show Yard upon adjoining premises, any such project involves the expensive and most inexpedient postponement of inevitable ultimate arrangements, manifest to any mind of ordinary forecast; besides the additional ground is not sufficiently extensive for the purpose, though, from its convenient situation, contiguous to the Agricultural Museum and Hall, it would afford the requisite accommodation for machinery and implements, while the Hall might then be exclusively devoted to farm produce and horticultural as well as floricultural exhibitions. This plan also would admit of the Agricultural Hall being used during two months each year for a display of the progress of the art and manufactures of Ireland. The building is spacious and suitable in its structural proportions for that object, and the success of last year's exhibition justifies its stated repetition. A crowded cattle show with all its impedimenta, held twice a year in a situation between two of our aristocratic squares, in the handsomest quarter of a city rapidly progressing in architectural beauty and in the various appliances of social and æsthetic convenience is a positive nuisance, and will not be tolerated half a dozen years hence. Would it not be prudent to anticipate "the good time coming," and solicit the sanction and aid of parliament for temporary appropriation, during continuance of the cattle shows, of 4 acres of the Phoenix Park, adjoining the principal entrance? That situation, from its vicinity to the principal arteries of inland communication, would be the most convenient for Irish exhibitors, as well as also for British visitors and exhibitors, especially after construction of the proposed Metropolitan Railway, which is intended to link together all the railway approaches, encircling the suburban districts from the port of the Liffey and the North Docks to the southern harbour at Kingstown.

To these sketchy memorials of this distinguished and time-honoured association, a few closing observations may be added as to the requirements of its completer development and administration. It is only right and politic that an institution of such magnitude and social influence should be responsible to central control, with reservation of certain elective rights and privileges in interior management; and the expediency also is respectfully admitted of tightening the purse-strings of the government grant, should an indiscreet exercise of these privileges provoke public disapprobation; but no valid reason can be adduced why the annual grant should not be as liberal now, under the vastly increased demands of the progress of the country, (especially under the last decade,) as it was—say not even under a native parliament—but after the close of the great European wars, so late as 1817, when it was £10,000. In moot-ing this question, members and friends of the society do not pay sufficient regard to the altered social circumstances of Ireland, and are too much inclined to rest their hopes and dependence exclusively on the support of aristocratic and parliamentary interest. But the present generation has witnessed, with the decadence of many an ancient name, the uprise of a far greater number to influential position, founded upon force of character, experience, and wealth. Such constitute the advance party of all material progress, recruiting and energising the ranks of the aristocracy; and unprejudiced eyes must plainly see that property created by personal industry is the principal source whence flow the streams of beneficence and practical patriotism, not only in the British Islands but in every part of the empire. An institution so national in its objects, so efficient in its work, as the Royal Dublin Society, surely merits general support; and an appeal to the influential and wealthy of all classes would soon call forth pecuniary contributions sufficient in their amount and stipulated uses to fulfil the more immediate requirements in completion of buildings, furniture, and fixtures, as well as to convince any government by this practical expression of public opinion, that liberal expenditure in such matters is a wise economy on this side of the Channel as well as in England; and that it is both morally just and politically expedient to award the Royal Dublin Society an annual endowment somewhat more adequate to its long-tested and increasing capacity of usefulness in Ireland.

MACOLLOP CASTLE.

SITUATED on the banks of the Blackwater river, on the boundary of the county of Waterford, and midway between the towns of Fermoy and Lismore, a distance of about ten miles, stands the ancient ruin of Macollop Castle, consisting of a large round tower, with several smaller square ones flanking its intermediate base; it has a very picturesque appearance when viewed in almost any direction, but particularly across the river, from the spot where it is said Cromwell, in the year 1640, with an ill directed cannon shot, reduced it to its present dilapidated state. The situation of the modern house, which is plain and rather low, seems as if designed to give the castle the most advantageous appearance, while the church, which fills up the chasm in the centre, with a well planted hill screening the more distant mountains of Clogheen and Ariglin, completes one of the prettiest landscapes which imagination can convey to the mind. The lawn and adjacent low grounds are judiciously planted with well grown timber, and the river, which here enters the county of Waterford, and winds almost under the castle, adds much to the beauty of the scene.

ROSCREA.

ROSCREA, in the North Riding of the county Tipperary, of which the name, signifying a marshy situation, is descriptive of its early state, appears to have arisen from the foundation of a monastery here by St. Cronan, who flourished about the year 620, and was interred in the Abbey. In 942 the Danes from Limerick and the West approached the town, which had become a place of great importance prior to the close of the ninth century, at the time of its great fair, which was frequented by merchants from all parts of the kingdom, and even from the Continent. The inhabitants, however, being apprized of their design, marched out of the town to meet them, and after an obstinate conflict, in which 4,000 of their number were slain, entirely defeated them, and killed their leader. The town was destroyed by fire in 1133, 1147, and 1154, in the year preceding which latter it was plundered by the people of the district of Cashel. In 1213 King John erected a strong castle here to defend the town and neighbourhood against the incursions of Moriartach O'Brien, who had committed great devastations in this part of the country. Roscrea is situated on a small river which is tributary to the Brosna. The hills in the surrounding neighbourhood abound with picturesque scenery. The population of the town, according to the Census of 1861, was 3,543.

The Round Tower represented above is about 80 feet high, and is covered with a dome roof of wood. Around its base are two tiers of stone steps, and about fifteen feet from the ground is a circular arched doorway, above which, at a similar elevation, is a pointed window.

FACTS AND FANCIES ABOUT THE MONTHS.

MAY.

HERE is an enthusiastic description of this month given by the poet Spenser, in the time of Elizabeth, as well as by most of our olden poets, who speak of this season as one of sunshine and flowers, that ever led the footsteps of the joyous throng to dew-bespangled mead or flowering copse, in search of the early blossoms of May. Thus Herrick declares,

" 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation, to keep in,
When as a thousand virgins on this day,
Spring sooner than the lark to fetch in May."

This was, in fact, the great rural festival of our forefathers. At the first peep of day on May morning, the youth of both sexes hastened to the fields, and gathered the blossoming branches, which, when still further adorned with wreaths and flowers, were to constitute the ornamental bowers at the entrance of their cottages. In the verses of Herrick on the May-day of England (from which we have already quoted), there occurs the following description of the appearance of the houses and streets on the May-morning of his time :—

"Come, my Corinna, come; and comming make,
How each field turns a street, each street a park,
Made green and trimmed with trees; see how Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or branch; each porch, each doore, are this
An arke, a tabernacle is,
Made up of whitethorn neatly interwove,

As if here were those cooler shades of love.
 Can such delights be in the street
 And open fields, and we not see't?
 Come, we'll abroad, and let's obey
 The proclamation made for May,
 And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
 Come, my Corinna, come, let's goe a Maying!

These glowing descriptions of May are inapplicable to the early part of our month at the present time. To send our lads and lasses forth at early dawn to gather the blossoms of the aloe, (for the hawthorn is only just in full leaf, and but timidly ventures forth its flowers,) and to invite them to brave the cold and often frosty air to collect the scanty products of our woods and fields before sunrise, would be to offer them a sorry pastime, indeed, and one of which they might rue the effects on their health for the remainder of the season. To what cause, then, are we to attribute the change which appears to have taken place? Were our forefathers so hardy a race as to account a season similar to the commencement of our May, a fit period for their rural pleasures, and are we to suppose, that their description of the flowers and the sunshine is somewhat exaggerated in consequence of the difference of their feelings from ours, as well as of their propensity to copy the style of the southern poets? Or may we not rather believe, that the seasons themselves are changed since that time, so as to make the early descriptions of May thus unlike our own experience of the character of the month? The latter appears to be the true solution of the question; and when we remember that owing to the alteration of the style, the first of May is twelve days earlier than it used to be, this gives another reason why we must not look for a realization of the poet's description. The following is from Spenser:—

“Then came faire May, the fayrest mayd on ground,
 Deck'd all with dainties of her season's pryde.
 And throwing flowers out of her lap around:
 Upon two brethren's shoulders she did ride,
 The twinnes of Leda, which, on either side,
 Supported her like to their sovaine queene.
 Lo! how all creatures laught when her they spide,
 And leapt and daunc't as they had ravish't beene,
 And Cupid self about her fluttered all in greene.”

The name of this month is derived from the goddess Maia, a divinity who was worshipped under many names by the Romans, but whose chief title was “Bona Dea,” or the Good Goddess, as representing the Earth. Maia is the name given to the brightest star in the beautiful constellation of the Pleiades. The month of May is said to have been called by the Anglo-Saxons, “Trimilki,” “because in that moneth they began to milke their kine three times in the day.”

Although the early part of the month has much of the fickleness of April, and is often found too chilly and frosty to allow of the rapid progress of vegetation, yet, towards its close, the country begins to glow with the beauties of Spring, and to display the richness of verdure, and the profusion of flowers, which make that season so delightful. The hawthorn clothes the hedges with its multiplicity of fragrant blossoms; the freshness of its green leaves, and the snowy white of its flowers, affording a contrast that is peculiarly pleasing to the eye. The orchards present

“One boundless blush, one white-empurpled shower
 Of mingled blossoms;”

the sunny banks are gay with the bright blue flowers of the speedwell, and with numerous other little blossoms, which are scarcely noticed except by the practised eye of the botanist, but which all contribute to form the hues of that varied mantle with which the earth is covered. In some of our woods two very lovely and fragrant flowers may be met with—the lily of the valley, and the sweet-scented woodruff. The upright meadow crowfoot gives a golden hue to our pastures, which is diversified here and there by the pink blossoms of the meadow lychnis, or ragged-robin, and the more delicate ones of the lady's smock, or cuckoo-flower. The curious-looking “Arum,” or cuckoo-pint, is now in perfection, and is frequently plucked from its enveloping sheath for the amusement of children. Its broad leaves form an agreeable contrast with those of the hedge-geranium, the mouse-ear, scorpion-grass, etc. The cow-slip now attracts universal notice, and gives employment to the numerous groups of little folks who seek their pastime in the pleasant fields.

The months of May and June may be reckoned the most prolific in wild-flowers, for towards the close of the latter month the hay-harvest commences, and the pastures are shorn of myriads of blossoms, so that a comparative dearth of flowers ensues. As it would be quite impossible to name all the more important plants now in blossom, we shall direct attention to a few special favourites.

To begin with a modest, inconspicuous plant, but one that is so fragrant, and that preserves, and even increases, its fragrance so much in a dried state that it only requires to be known to be generally appreciated. The Sweet Woodruff (Asperula odorata) grows wild in dry, mountainous woods, and is also occasionally admitted into gardens, where its creeping roots spread and increase to a considerable extent. The leaves of this plant are a bright green, lanceolate, and grow light in a whorl round the stem. The regularity with which they form this whorl likens them to a the rowels of a spur; therefore, the plant was called “Wood-rowel.” Small flowers, of a pure white, appear in May, and are fragrant chiefly at night. These flowers are very numerous, and appear in panicles, generally three together. The fruit is rough, with ascending bristles. While drying, and for a long period afterwards, the whole plant has a delightful scent, which has been compared to new-mown hay, to bitter almonds, and to helectrope. This scent is peculiarly agreeable for perfuming clothes, etc., and is said to be occasionally used in flavouring wine. There is another kind of Woodruff, that is very likely to be mistaken for the former, though it blossoms rather later; it is the Small Woodruff, or Squinancy-wort, (Asperula cynanchica.) This species is perennial, whereas the Sweet Woodruff is an annual plant. The flowers are white or bluish coloured, growing in tufts at the end of the stalks. The name of Squinancy-wort was given because some ancient herbalist recommended the plant to be used outwardly, as well as inwardly, for the cure of the squinancy, or quincy. The botanical name Asperula is derived from asper (rough), in allusion to the unevenness of the leaves.

The Cranesbill and Storksbill families, best known as the Geranium tribe, are very common and pretty little plants. The most attractive species in the Cranesbill family is, perhaps, that very beautiful rose-coloured flower called Herb Robert (Geranium robertianum), now to be seen in blossom. The stems of this plant, as well as the leaves, are tinged with red, while the rosy petals are marked with white veins. The Meadow Cranesbill (Geranium pratense), is a very handsome plant, with large blue flowers marked with white veins; but, beautiful as it is, it cannot boast so rich a colouring as Herb Robert, nor does it better repay a close inspection. The common Dovesfoot Cranesbill (Geranium mollia), a soft, downy plant, with rose-coloured flowers, growing very commonly both in waste and cultivated ground. The Jagged-leaved Cranesbill (Geranium dissectum), which may be known from the last by the shape of the leaves, and the Dusky and the Shining Cranesbill may also now be seen. Several of the genera belonging to the Borage tribe now give us some of their earlier species. Among these, the common Comfrey (Symphytum officinale) is by no means despicable. It grows very commonly in ditches or on the margin of rivers. The roots of Comfrey are mucilaginous, and have been used for coughs. The young roots are sometimes eaten as asparagus, but they form a very poor substitute.

Perhaps most persons that have spent their youth in the country have delighted in gathering Wild Hyacinths (Hyacinthus non-scriptus) from the woods and sheltered spots where they grow. These flowers now put forth fragrant bells abundantly, and enliven the thickets with their cheerful blue colour. They resemble too much the Hyacinths of our gardens to need description. Hyacinths belong to the Asphodel tribe.

Nothing can be more common than the large purple Mallow (Malva Sylvestris). It is a way-side weed that seems to defy the dust and mire with which it is assailed, and to flourish where many a less hardy plant would immediately pine away and decay. Children know the plant well; for the striped blossoms are succeeded by a small green fruit, which they call “cheeses,” and which are by no means unpleasant to the taste. The mallow has an erect, branching stem, and roundish leaves, divided into about five shallow lobes. The flowers spring singly from the bosom of the leaves, and consist of five large petals, which are at first curiously twisted together, but when fully blown, spread out very widely. But it is the ripe fruit or "cheese," which presents so beautiful a structure as to cause us to linger over this very common plant. Dr. Lindley compares the parts, when cut through with a knife, to a vegetable star, and says that the kaleidoscope itself can produce nothing prettier except in colour. "Only compare a vegetable cheese," he remarks, "with all that is exquisite in marking, or beautiful in arrangement in the works of man, and how poor and contemptible do the latter appear! Not only when seeing it with the naked eye, are we struck with admiration at the wondrous perfection and skill with which so obscure a point in creation is constructed; but, when we behold fresh beauties constantly revealed as the microscopic power is increased, till at last, when the latter reaches its limit, we find ourselves still regarding a lovely prospect, the horizon of which recedes as we advance. Nor is it alone externally that this inimitable beauty is to be discovered; cut the cheese across, and every slice brings to view cells, and partitions, and seeds, and embryos, arranged with an unvarying regularity, which would be past belief did we not know, from experience, how far beyond all that the mind can conceive is the symmetry with which the works of nature are constructed." Among the prettiest of the numerous interesting plants that make their appearance this month, may be mentioned, the common Fumitory with tubular rose-coloured flower, tipped with black, growing in fields and in loose soil generally. There are the different kinds of Vetch and Clover, some of them extremely beautiful; the delicate Cuckoo-flower, profusely adorning our meadows, and softening the prevailing brilliancy of March marigold, and buttercups; the showy Iris springing up in marshy places; the pale Honeysuckle throwing its fragrance around from copse and hedge-row; and, more conspicuous than all, more characteristic than all, the Whitethorn, the Hawthorn, or May, full of buds and snowy flowers, pouring out a delicious perfume, and looking upon us, as it were, with its thousand meek eyes, to invite our celebration of the "Merry month of May."

The "grateful and obsequious Marigold," as George Wither, writing in 1635, calls it, blooms in May. The property of closing the petals at sunset, which is possessed by this plant, in common with others belonging to the same class (Syngenesia), has attracted the attention of several of our poets. Browne, in his "Pastorals," and Shakspeare in his "Winter's Tale," allude to the circumstance; and Chatterton mentions—

"The Marybuds, that shutteth with the light."

Virgil thus notices the marigold in the second eclogue of his "Beucolies":—

"Cassia and dill are added to the store,
With cowslips, marigolds, and many more,
In order wove, a garland to complete,
Adorned with every flower and every sweet."

Gay, in his burlesque "Pastorals," asks,

"What flower is that which bears the Virgin's name,
The richest metal joined with the same!"

Herrick, in his "Hesperides," quaintly accounts as follows for the yellow colour of the marigold;

"Jealous girls these sometimes were,
While they lived or lasted here:
Turn'd to flowers still they be,
Yellow, mark'd for jealousy."

The marigold is a native of the south of Europe, and was introduced and cultivated here about the year 1573. Its botanical name of Calendula, is supposed to have been derived from calenda, the Latin for the first day of every month, and to have been given to it on account of its long continuance in blossom. Gerard describes five sorts of marigold, which were known to him before the year 1597; but it would seem that they differed from each other only in consequence of accidental difference of soil or culture, and were not distinct species; for he says: "All these five, which formerly had so many figures, differ nothing but in the bignesse and littleness of the plant and flowers, and in the intenseness and remissness of their colour, which is either orange, yellow, or of a straw colour." The common species (Calendula sativa), he observes, was so much used in Holland, that "the yellow leaves of the flowers are dried and kept throughout Dutchland against winter, to put in broths, in physical potions, and for divers other purposes, in such quantities, that in some grocers or sellers of spices' houses are to be found barrels filled with them, and retailed by the penny more or lesse, in so much that no broths are well made without dried marigolds." The custom still prevails in Holland, and marigolds are greatly valued by all ranks of persons in that country. The flowers of this plant were formerly esteemed of use in various complaints, such as jaundice, measles, small-pox, etc., and patients suffering from pestilential fever were sometimes tormented with a plaster, made with the dry flowers in powder, lard, turpentine, and resin, applied to the breast, which was said to "strengthen and succour the heart infinitely!" The leaves were likewise used in salad, and were said to be a proper food for persons of a scorbutic habit. The principal medicinal use of the herb, however, appears to have been as an alleviation of ague, and we have testimony of its usefulness in this respect at this present day, when taken frequently in the form of tea. The petals, or rather the yellow florets which compose the ray of this flower, have an aromatic smell, and when chewed are found to be warm and somewhat pungent in taste; hence they derive their sudorific virtues, in which they are said to be scarcely inferior to saffron itself. The resemblance between the colour of marigold and saffron in the dried state is sufficiently near to allow of the former being used as an adulterant to the latter. Nothing can be more common or familiar than the marigold, and the provision which is made for its propagation will ever cause it to be so. The seeds are numerous, and sow themselves every year, even if the ground is frequently disturbed; so that where marigolds have once been there they will appear again and again, unless care be taken to eradicate them ere the seed is perfected. These self-sown plants, however, gradually degenerate and become smaller and weaker than those which are produced from annual sowings.

Towards the close of this month, except in seasons of peculiar severity, the trees have put on much of their clothing. Of these the acacias are the earliest—as the poplar, willow, and alder; next, the lime, laburnum, horse-chestnut, sycamore, and elm; and then the beech, oak, ash, and other trees. Of the latter, however, many present a wintry appearance until the warm weather of June has fully set in, and then the young and lively green foliage, particularly that of the "Lord of the woods, the long-surviving oak," looks still more beautiful, from being contrasted with the deeper hues of elms and other trees, which have for some time been in leaf.

"Rich in streaming gold," the Laburnum (Cytisus laburnum) is one of those beautiful productions of Spring, anticipated by the poet, in looking forward to the season when the trees

"Shall put their graceful foliage on again,
And, more aspiring, and with ampler spread,
Shall boast new charms, and more than they have lost."

This graceful tree is not a native of this country, but is found in a wild state in the woods of Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, etc., while Cytisus alpinus, a tree very near resembling the laburnum, is found chiefly in the Alps of Europe. There are about thirty species of the genus Cytisus, all hardy papilionaceous shrubs, inhabiting temperate regions, bearing ternate leaves, that is, leaves growing in threes, and with only one exception (Cytisus purpureus) yellow flowers. The Laburnum is an early blossoming tree, putting forth its "golden chains" at the latter end of this month, and presenting, with its numerous and long branches of pendant yellow flowers, a very showy appearance. This brilliant livery does not long adorn the tree, for the lawn or parterre soon receives showers of blossoms shed from its branches, and the long seed-pods are shortly found in their places. This tree might be cultivated as a timber tree with great advantage, for its wood is exceedingly tough and elastic, and whenever very hard and compact timber is required in small pieces, it is now used as superior to most other sorts of wood. The Romans valued it next to ebony, and in some of its qualities it is even to be preferred to that wood. Its natural colour is likewise good, and by the application of lime-water it may be rendered almost black. The Laburnum is one of those leguminous plants which yield poisonous seeds. In the latter has been discovered an active and deleterious principle, called "Cytium" or Cytisine," which is described as being a bitter, brownish-yellow, neutral, uncrystallizable substance, of which small doses killed various animals, amidst retchings and convulsions, and eight grains taken by a man in four doses brought on giddiness, violent spasms, and frequency of the pulse, lasting for two hours, and followed by exhaustion. It is said that even a garland of the flowers, if worn for some time, will occasion head-ache. The tree is a very hardy one, growing in almost any soil, but when young it is often spoiled by the gnawing of hares and rabbits, which feed on the bark in Winter, when other supplies of food fail. When it is desired to plant Laburnum on a large scale, the seed-pods should be collected, and dried thoroughly in an airy loft, then threshed, and the seeds preserved in bags or boxes till Spring. February is the month for sowing the Laburnum.

Such are a few of the facts and fancies of

"Fair enjewell'd May, Blown out of April,"

as Herrick has it. Pity it is there should be so much of truth in the Spanish aphorism, "It is not always May!"

MAY.

 PEN, sweet flowers, your eyes,
Earth's awake,
Rain droppeth from the skies,
The songs of throats rise,
In field and brake.
Come church-yard marigold,
Flower of the sun,
O pansies bloom,
O lilies break the fold,
Unbosom one by one,
And come!

Why daisies of the mead,
Quick, be up.
And let your lids be red,
Round every yellow head,
And dew-charged cup.
Puce honeysuckles blow—
Blow in the grass;
Mint, from the gloom,
Breath out your odorous woe,
As nymphs and shepherds pass,
And come!

Primroses, moist and pale,
Sun the hedge,
Spread sunshine down the vale,
Climb over park and pale.
The brooklets sedge
Is dark without your light.
Naiads do cry,
And bitterns boom,
Thro' all the gray day-light,
Till the sweet sun doth die,
Come, come!

May is upon the earth,
And above,
The swallow leaves the north,
Crickets sing on the hearth,
The world is love.
The furze is heaped with fire,
White thorns are gay,
Flowered is the broom,
The larks repair their choir.
For 'tis the month of May,
O come!

UNDER THE PESTLE.

EXTRAORDINARY prejudices have been current, from time immemorial, against the medical profession. There are people whom you cannot persuade to regard medicine otherwise than as a science of pure experiment, without fixed laws and data. Since Macbeth threw "physic to the dogs," down to last December, when the London Review roundly asserted that the profession knew in reality nothing of the operative process of medicine on the system, the poor doctors have been exposed to all sorts of ill-natured affronts on their skill and reputation. A worthy dramatic author gives us this morceau of dialogue between a dying father and a fond son.

"Son—You are very weak this morning, sir."

"Dying father—Very weak, my child."

"Apprehensive son—Shall I call in the physician, sir?"

"Dying father—No, thank'ee, I can die without the assistance of the faculty."

If medicine be, in fact, a science of experiment, our ancestors took care that in the event of unlucky results, the speculist should not altogether go unpunished. At Dijon, in 1836, Ducatiana tells us a physician was fined by the bailiff fifty golden franks besides being imprisoned, for not having completed the cures of some persons whose recovery he had undertaken. We are half inclined to think that just at present, when quackery is so prolific in promises of health to the weak and debilitated, the Dijon precedent might be acted upon with some profit to a large share of sufferers. Fine and imprisonment are bitter enough in their way, but what will the reader think of the following mode of rewarding "the friend of the family." M. de St. Foix tells us that in the sixth century, the beautiful Austugilda, Queen of Gontran, King of Burgundy, begged, as a dying request of her husband, that her two physicians should be slain and buried with her. Her majesty's wish was granted, and the three were laid in one tomb. From grave to gay leads us to notice the origin of the singular advice frequently given to persons whose health is deranged at morning from the effect of over indulgence on the previous night. "Take a hair of the same dog that bit you," is the jocular remedy, and it is thus explained. In 1719, M. Le Clerc, Conseil les Medecin du Roy, published "A Medical Essay on the Cure of Hydophobia," and at page 103, we find this passage: "Pour la cure de la playes, metter dessus du poil du Chien qui a mordu. C'est la remede de Paré." In the chivalrous ages, and indeed for a considerable period after, royalty and nobility did not think it beneath them to practise medicine. In the old romances, the knight's wounds are generally healed by princesses or ladies of high birth. In one of our oldest ballads, a knight dies for a lady, and when she unclaspeth his vizor and recognises him, she falls dead upon his shield. Smollet, in the fine body of foot notes with which he enriched his translation of "Don Quixote," dwells upon the custom. Indeed Cervantes, who was well up in all the canons of chivalry, delights in placing his hero in ludicrous situations, when he mistakes the attentions of serving-maids and innkeeper's wives for the well-merited offices of ladies of rank. Buchanan says the Scotch nobility were most skilful in the curing of wounds. Of James IV. he writes, that "he was very skilful in the management of bruises."

Montague, who has an incurable habit of snarling at every thing, thus rebukes the vagaries of the profession in his own day. "Are you out of sorts, that your physician has denied you the enjoyment of wine and of your favourite dishes? Be not uneasy, apply to me and I engage to find you one of equal credit, who shall put you under a regimen perfectly opposite to that settled by your own adviser; for so very fantastical is the practice of physic," adds our humorist, that I have seen a man starve himself until he actually fainted from mere inanition to get rid of a disorder, and afterwards be bitterly ridiculed by a different physician from his own, for having by his painful abstinence actually increased the disorder he had hoped to cure at the cost of such severe self-denial."

In 1893, the profession fell into so low an esteem in France, that the regular practitioners were superseded in their attendance on the unfortunate Charles VI. of France, by a magician. Magic had its votaries then as well as now, nor was all the intelligence that surrounded the court, able to resist its entrance. Mad. de Lussan says that the prince's cure was entrusted to an impostor, named, Arnaud Guillen, who undertook, "on the payment of ten thousand crowns, and a patent of nobility, to restore the king by the influence of magic." Whether this man's process in any way resembled that of Mr. Hume, we do not pretend to know, but one thing is plain, that he had enough ability to persuade every one about the king that he was in possession of the great secret of health, which he pretended to derive from a book entitled, "Samagorad." This book, the scoundrel asserted, had been given by the Almighty to Adam to console him for the death of Abel, whose melancholy end the patriarch bewailed with tears for better than a century. Preceded by a great flourish of trumpets, Guillen came to court. His nostrums, however, failed with the king, and a conspiracy was set on foot to assassinate him. In this emergency the fellow gave out that he had discovered a charm which oppressed the king's understanding, and it was too powerful to give way before his spells. At last, the common sense of the courtiers prevailed with his majesty, who ordered the pretender to be expelled the kingdom. Nevertheless, his story obtained credit, and the people learned to look on the king as one tormented by the malice of an infernal enemy. Towards the close of the fifteenth century, Lorenzo de Medicis, of Florence, died of a disease which it was said might have been cured had not Leoni, a celebrated physician of the place, depended too much on the efficacy of nature to work out her own remedies, and forbade the king the use of drugs. A rival professional first made this conjecture public, and with such success that the friends of the prince clamoured for Leoni's death. Piero, son of Lorenzo, a youth, who, when he was only seventeen had the reputation of being the most expert wrestler in Italy, undertook to avenge his father's death. Happening to meet Leoni, who was old and infirm, near the brink of a deep well, he contrived to hurl him into it. The unfortunate victim to his skill was speedily rescued, but the shock was too great, and when brought up it was found that life was extinct. Marvellous quaintly observes that no persons are so liable as physicians to quit their profession for other walks, and he gives a long list of celebrated men who abandoned medicine for poetry, history, etc. His theory is that, medical men read so much that their attention is ultimately diverted from the healing to the amusing professions. By the way, John Keats was an apothecary, and left the counter for the muse. Posterity will have no reason to regret the change, for if Keats persisted in following medicine, it is rather probable the literature of his country would never have been enriched with Endymion and Hyperion. Painters, it is notorious, are frequently in the habit of exchanging the brush for the pen. A hundred instances of this might be quoted. Thackeray was an artist for years. Could any canvas come up to "Vanity Fair?"

Jacques Coetier, a physician, was one of the very few persons about court who could combat the violent temper of Louis IX. The secret of his influence with the king lay in the restless pertinacity with which he lectured his royal patient on the horrors of death, of which the latter had no small dread. Coetier's brusque manner frequently offended the monarch, who threatened to disgrace and banish him. The physician's reply was characteristic:—"One of those days," said he, "you will send me packing, I suppose, as I have seen you act by your other servants; but, mark me, if you do you shall not live eight days after my departure." This line of argument had a potent effect on the king, who always kept him about his person, and was never tired of showering favours on him. Coetier, indeed, appears to have been an able and conscientious man, who did his best to alleviate Louis' sufferings. To assuage his melancholy, he contrived to have rural dances performed under the windows; and, when the king became too feeble to follow the chase, Coetier collected cats and huge rats, and amused the king by letting him see the animals attack and worry each other. For a long time the opinion prevailed in France that the Jews alone had preserved the true arcana of medicine; and Francis I. had such faith in the popular belief that he implored his old rival and enemy, Charles V., to send him a Hebrew doctor. The Emperor despatched a converted Hebrew physician, but him Francis would not confide in. He repeated his request to the court of Constantinople, for an "obstinate, unbaptized Israelite." This request was granted, and, the Jew, with the help of ass's milk, effected the monarch's cure. In an old French work, known as "Les Nouveau Cours de Cheneil," it is stated that the valuable qualities of antimony were first discovered by Sasilus Valentinus, who used to fatten his pigs by mixing certain proportions of it with their food. As an instance of professional fairness, it is related of the celebrated Dr. Anthony Storck that, before recommending the meadow saffron-root, he tried it on himself to such an extent that his life was despaired of. Meanwhile he discovered a neutralizing agent, and, having recovered, he afterwards administered the saffron with great success. Andrea Buccio, of Florence, has been justly styled the "Italian Radcliffe," for his astonishing penetration as to the seat and character of diseases, and his blunt way of healing his patients. On one occasion he was called in to see a woman of quality. Having felt her pulse, he asked her how old she was? "Four score," replied the lady. "And how long would you live?" asked the physician, quitting her hand, and rushing from the house. We turn again to Montague, to notice a crumb of comfort which he has in store for people afflicted with gout, ague, and rheumatism. "These," he says, "are symptoms of a long life; just as heat, cold, rain, and hail, are attendants on very long journeys."

In the original edition of the Spectator, which was first printed as a newspaper, one of the then popular quacks thus advertises his wares:—

"An incomparable pleasant tincture to restore the sense of smelling though lost many years, a few drops of which being snuffed up the nose infallibly cures those who have lost their smell, let it proceed from what cause soever. It admirably cures all obstructions in the olfactory or smelling nerves, comforts and strengthens the head and brain, and revives the smelling-faculty to a miracle, and perfectly cures so as to cause the person to smell as quick and as well as anyone in the world. Price 2s. 6d. a bottle; sold only at Mr. Payne's toyshop, at the Angel and Crown, at St. Paul's Churchyard, near Cheapside, with directions."

Also.

"An admirable confection which assuredly cures stuttering and stammering in children and grown persons, though never so bad, causing them to speak distinct and fine, without any trouble or difficulty; it remedies all manner of impediments in the speech, or disorders of the voice of any kind, arising from what cause soever, rendering those persons capable of speaking easily and free, and with a clear voice, who before were not able to utter a sentence without hesitation. Its stupendous effects, in so quickly and infallibly curing fluttering, stammering, and all disorders of the voice, and difficulty in delivery of the speech, are really wonderful. Price 2s. 6d. a pot, with directions. Sold only at Mr. Osborn's toyshop, at the Rose and Crown, under St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet-street."

"Loss of memory, or forgetfulness, certainly cured, by a grateful electuary, peculiarly adapted for that end: it strikes at the prime cause, which few apprehend, of forgetfulness, makes the head clear and easy, the spirits free, active, and undisturbed, corroborates and revives all the noble faculties of the soul, such as thought, judgment, apprehension, reason, and memory, which last, in particular, it so strengthens as to render that faculty exceeding quick, and good beyond imagination; thereby enabling those whose memory was before almost totally lost, to remember the minutest circumstance of their affairs, etc., to a wonder! Price 2s. 6d. a pot. Sold only at Mr. Payne's, at the Angel and Crown, in St. Paul's Churchyard, with directions."

To the preceding advertisements, we add another from the same paper, which prescribes for a complaint, more certain and more palatable remedies for the which may be found at the hospitable tables of this country.

"An assured cure for leanness, which proceeds from a cause which few know, but easily removed by an unparalleled specific tincture, which fortifies the stomach, purifies the blood, takes off fretfulness in the mind, occasions rest, and easy sleep, and as certainly disposes and causes the body to thrive and become plump and fleshy, if no manifest distemper afflicts the patient, as water will quench fire. It is also the best remedy in nature for all chronic diseases that take their rise from a bad digestion in the stomach, which this specific tincture infallibly rectifies, and thereby cures. It is pleasant to taste, and is sold only at Mr. Payne's toyshop (as before) Price 3s. 6d. a bottle, with directions." In a pamphlet published by Sir Stephen Theodore Jansen, Bart., in 1767, the respectable author affirms that a morbid substance, "which had lodged seven or eight years in a building at Southampton, infected some hundreds of persons, one half of whom miserably perished."

The anecdotal literature of medicine would fill whole libraries; we have culled the foregoing from some of the oldest sources extant, but the mines are not half exhausted. As a pendant to this paper, may be quoted the following epitaph on an unlucky physician—

"Hac sub humo, per quem tot jacuere jacet."

Which may be paraphrased—

"Interred lies our doctor, we must not deplore him, He's but where he sent all his patients before him."

AN APPEAL TO LENORA.

THE day is dark, the clouds are low,
The winds beat on the pane,
And over half the city spreads
The sombre world of rain.

Refuse me not, oh! dearest one,
Let blessed sympathy
Incline your heart, and mind, and soul,
To look and pity me.

Perhaps on days for ever gone,
Days which no changes steal,
From the hot records of the brain,
You felt the woes I feel.

Perhaps, like me, fate lowered on you,
And friendship false did prove,
And shelterless from sun and rain,
The earth was void of love.

Thou knowest well the human woe
That throbs but will not speak;
The burning pain that will not send
A tear drop to the cheek.

The nights that pass in ghastly dreams,
The days that big with woe
Pass on like tents of thunder cloud
O'er those who weep below.

And knowing this and knowing all,
Of suffering and wrong,
I kneel me down at those dear feet,
And in my hope am strong.

You, you alone of all I know,
Doth keep the sovereign balm,
Which fills my heart with blessedness,
And fills my breast with calm.

Lenora, O Lenora, love,
Let skies and tempests frown,
Let lightnings leap from roof to roof,
Across the wintry town.

If you be merciful the worst
That storm and rain can do
Will fall upon this weary frame
As gently as the dew

Then hear me, maiden, say not nay,
O fairest be not pained,
As one hath writ: "the quality
Of mercy is not strained."

O, by that sweetly marble brow,
And eyes of sunlight mellow,
Look pity on this wretched one,
And lend him your umbrells!

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT.

IN the reign of King Cormac, A.D. 220, there lived in the Emerald Isle a very hospitable farmer, whose name was Buiciodh Burghach. It is recorded of him in the old chronicles, "that so great and extensive was his hospitality that he made it his common practice to keep a mighty big cauldron always boiling over a beautiful turf-fire." This very extensive cauldron, though always kept in a state of bubble, bubble, boil, was at all times and seasons come-at-able, without toil or trouble, by every hungry passer-by. It was brimfull of the good things of this life, which, unfortunately, all flesh is not heir to; and every one who came near his hospitable dwelling was relieved free of all cost, had a hearty welcome to boot, and no questions asked as to whether the applicant was destitute and in want, old or infirm.

Now, the lands of this farmer and great grazer abounded in cattle of all kind. It is a fact upon record that he had at one time in his possession more cows than any dairyman that ever went before, or came after him. Burghach was a boy in high favour with the tip-tops of the times; for the nobility and gentry of Leinster, with their entire families and retinue, would often visit him to take pot-luck; and some of them there were (the spalpeens) who were not above spunging upon him for a precious long time. Hospitality has ever been the pride of an Irishman; but this extravagant display of it, as the reader may well suppose, very soon impoverished the means of the warm-hearted Burghach, for, in the course of a very few years, he was left with only seven cows and one bull, which is little enough, in all conscience, for an Irishman.

With this small remnant of his stock he privately removed one night, taking with him his wife and his beautiful foster-child, Eithne; and, after wandering about for some time, he at last settled upon the borders of a magnificent wood, in the county of Meath, near which was situate the princely palace of the great King Cormac. Here he built himself a snug little cabin with the loose stones and sods of turf which he found looking out for an owner. When the finishing-touch was put to it it was a perfect picture of a cabin:—

"It was white without, clane and warm within; Tioth, a comfortable crib for man to dwell in."

Now, it happened that one fine spring morning, early, Prince Cormac, with a splendid retinue, went out to divert themselves with a hunt in the wood; and the prince having, like Fitz-James of Scotland, left his followers far behind, he at last found that he was all alone by himself in a most lonely spot. Well, after wandering about for a long time, and to little purpose, good fortune at last directed him to the comfortable cabin of Burghach, and there he chanced to spy the beautiful Eithne, who was warbling a ditty whilst milking her cows, which, if rendered into English, might have ran as follows:—

"In the sweet spring time, when the days were fine,
And the lark from his bed rose early,
A smiling lass, through the waving grass,
Tripp'd light on the dew-drops pearly;
A youth there said, 'Will you go with me,
My love to share, and my bride to be?
Sorrow and want shall ne'er reach thee,
And you'll ne'er regret the day that we
First met in the morning early—

First met in the morning early."

"Oh! I'm too young, sir, to trust man's tongue,
When he woos in the morning early;
And sore afraid,' this maiden said,
'That you may not mean me fairly.'
But the youth to gain her heart was bent;
Though she strove to go—faith, she never went;
And at last she fondly blushed consent,
Which gave his heart most sweet content,
On a fine spring morning early—
On a fine spring morning early."

The fair Eithne had two vessels before her, in which she used to separate the thin milk from the richer and more substantial; for when she began to milk a cow, she disposed of the first part of the milk into one vessel, and the latter part, or the strippings, she poured into the other; which method she observed until she had gone over the whole seven, and when she had finished, she took up her vessels and carried them home. The prince followed her at a most respectful distance; for he could not help admiring the maiden for her sagacity and the niceness of her care, and was perfectly charmed with the modesty of her looks, and the fine shape and beauty of her person.

The fair Eithne did not remain long in the cottage; for she soon made her appearance again, bearing in her hands two empty vessels and a bowl, with which she tripped lightly over the green sward to a spring which was bubbling near at hand. She stooped over the brink of the spring, and, laded with the bowl, with the water that was near the surface she filled one vessel, and into the other she poured the water that was laded from the middle of the spring, which was cooler and clearer than the rest. When her vessels were full she returned home.

Cormac never took his eye off her, for he was as much struck at the elegance of her behaviour as at the soundness of her judgment.

Eithne soon made her appearance again; for, being the Cinderella of the establishment, she was obliged to perform all the menial drudgery. This time she appeared with a reaping-hook in her hand, and she had not proceeded far before she came to a spot which abounded with rushes; here she began to work, and when she had reaped a handful of them, she separated those that were long and green from those that were short and withered, and laid them in different heaps; which distinction she used until she had cut as many as she designed to carry.

The youthful prince, no longer able to control his inclination to converse with this fair being, rode gaily to her; and may be she wasn't struck with surprise and astonishment at seeing such a gallant chieftain in a place so unfrequented! The prince by the courtesy of his address and the kindness of his manner soon removed all her fears, assuring her that though she was alone, it would be unworthy the character of an Irishman to offer the slightest freedom to a maid so innocent and beautiful.

We are not aware that he had ever kissed the "blarney-stone;" but this we do know, that he perfectly bothered the heart of the poor little Eithne, when he praised her beauty, which, he said, "was more fit to garnish the court of a king than to be wasted amidst woods and wilds, like the neglected primrose."

"And now, my fair woodland flower," he said, when she had somewhat recovered from her surprise, "pray explain to me your reason for separating the milk, the water, and the rushes; for it's a notion I have, my pretty one, that there is some favoured swain for whom you wish to preserve the best of every thing by itself, and to distinguish by particular marks of your favour and esteem."

The maiden, with a blush rising in her face, which loveliest roscint never rivalled, answered, with native and becoming modesty, "That the person upon whom she always bestowed the choicest and best that she could procure, was one to whom she owed the best service of her life, and that to please him was her duty and most anxious care."

"Him!" said the prince; "and who may the fortunate youth be for whom so lovely a maiden cares so much?"

"His name is Burghach," replied the damsel.

"What! the noble, generous, warm-hearted farmer, who was eaten out of house and home for his hospitality?"

"The same, sir," replied the maid.

"Then your name, my sweet wild rose-bud, must be Eithne, and you are the daughter of the brave chief Dunlaing, who fell so nobly in his country's cause; and, if I mistake not, you are the foster-child of the good herdsman and his honest spouse."

"Sure, and you're as good as a witch," replied the pretty Eithne, looking sadly puzzled; "what you say is the true thing, however you came to the knowledge of it."

"Well," continued the enamoured youth, "Burghach has carefully tended his sweet wild flower, which shall be translated to a richer soil. I know, fair maid, your family and your fortune, and am so charmed with your modesty and the beauty of your person that I am vain enough to wish you mine."

"Men were deceivers ever——"

"I scorn to use deceptive arts to win so fair a maiden to my pleasure. Will you be mine, sweet maid—mine by the holy tie of wedlock? Come, make good the words of your own sweet song, and—"

"Fondly blush consent
On a fine spring morning early."

"Sir," she replied, "though a poor maid may justly be ambitious to be mated upon advantageous terms, yet I retain a duty to my good foster-father; so that I would not presume to dispose of myself without his consent to the greatest king in the universe—no, not even to our good King Cormac himself."

The prince applauded her resolution, and requested to be conducted to the cottage of the herdsman; and when he saw him he informed him of his design, and the sincerity of his passion, and engaged, upon the honour of a prince, to remove Burghach out of his solitary retirement, and bestow wealth and lands upon him suitable to the goodness of his heart, if he would consent that the beautiful Eithne would become his bride.

The private conference was soon brought to a close, and may be Burghach was not overjoyed at his good luck; not only on account of his lovely charge, but because he loved his prince, and knew that he would make the maiden happy.

Never in the palace of Tara did the harp sound more sweetly than when its chords were struck to celebrate the nuptials of the great King Cormac with Eithne, the lovely wild-rose of Meath.

THE SWALLOWS.

(FROM BERANGER.)

SOLDIER by the banks of Maur,
Bowed under exile's weary chains;
Cried: "Wandering birds ye come once more
From my dear native plains.
O swallows, whose dim pinions streak
With kindling gleams the sun's advance,
Bright birds, dear birds, will ye not speak
To me of my dear France?"

Have ye brought hither one fresh leaf,
From that green vale where I was born?
Where shine and shade alike are brief,
At eve or happy morn.
Beside the stream, where the lilies grow,
My mother's hut stands cheerfully;
Of that poor mother, gray and low,
Will ye not speak to me?

Perhaps your little nests were made
Under our vined and red-tiled eaves,
Even there, my mother's prayers were said,
In the gloom of the laurel leaves.
She, dying, thought she heard my feet
Haste down the brown road anxiously,
And listened, till her last heart's beat—
O speak of her to me.

Is my dear sister married yet?
Often I see in dreams at night
The village groups with bounding feet
Dance at her joyous marriage rite.
My old companions where are they?
With whom I fought for Liberty,
Under the grave stones, clay to clay,
Oh speak of them to me.

Perhaps the stranger's foot has crushed
On their poor tombs, Faith's offering,
Perhaps the foreign knaves have burst
My sister's heart, my sister's ring.
O swallows, swallows, tell them not,
When back ye fly o'er land and sea,
The bitter sadness of my lot,
But — speak of them to me."

THE NATURALIST IN CLARE.

Recent meeting of the "Natural History Society Dublin," some very interesting notes on the natural history of the west of Clare, by one of the corresponding members, furnish us with materiel brief notice of a portion of Ireland hitherto little explored by, or known to, the naturalist. Principal reason of this is its remoteness, as its communication with other parts of the country only extends as far as Ennis, and the cross-Galway Bay depends entirely on the weather. This terra incognita, with its limestone mountains and towering sea-cliffs, presents objects of interest in almost every branch of Natural History, and accommodation can be had at Miltown Malvey, Lahinch, Ennistymon, Lisdoonvarna, and Ballyvaughan, places conveniently situated for the views of the explorer. As the geological structure of a district has much to say to the welfare of man, we may mention that this western side of the county is composed of carboniferous limestone on the west and the superincumbent shales and girts of the coal-measures on the east. The line of boundary runs in an extremely tortuous course from the coast at Roadford on the north-west, to the Shannon at Killadysart on the south. In the southern portion of the county the limestone occupies the low ground and the coal-measures the high; but at the northern side, in the Burren district, the limestone rises into hills upwards of 1,000 feet in elevation, with terraced sides, the remarkable appearance of which at once stamps this district as being peculiar from any other in Ireland. The limestone is traversed by numerous joints, which cross each other and form fissures, which render the extensive bare and flat surfaces of the rock somewhat like that of a glacier. These fissures are the nurseries of many rare and beautiful plants. The hills are intersected by numerous valleys, glens, and deep gorges, with bold and precipitous cliffs. The aspect of the coal-measure district is much more dreary and monotonous, its form being that of an elevated and irregular plateau. The junction between the two formations is generally very conspicuous all along it, a coal-measure shale forming an abrupt escarpment overhanging the limestone. In the neighbourhood of Ennis several castles (which were evidently strongholds) are situated at intervals on or very near the line, so that in former days it was probably recognized as a boundary of property. We will now return to our subject, taking the bats first. Almost all the caves in Burren are the mouths of subterranean watercourses, discharging after great floods in wet weather, and consequently not at all suited for the hibernation of bats. Not long ago our informant learned that bats are seen flying about in the summer evenings in the most unfrequented and exposed parts of this Irish desert. The puzzle was, where did they hibernate? He came upon a cave on the 28th of last January, the entrance of which is a conical hollow, about ten feet deep, in the flat surface of the rock, all festooned with ivy, ferns, mosses, marchantia, etc. Arrived at the bottom of this he perceived a small horizontal passage, and, lighting his candle he entered, and with little difficulty found himself in a spacious chamber hung with fine stalactites, and with still finer stalagmites rising from the floor. It was tolerably dry, and after a long search he found one specimen. The Hedgehog, the Irish name for which is granioge, is very common over the coal-measure district, but very scarce on the limestones. The Badger and Stoat are very abundant on Burren, south-west of Ballyvaughan. The latter has been found at an elevation of more than 500 feet above the sea. The Marten appears to be now becoming very rare in Burren, where it was once very common, the skin some years ago being worth twenty-five shillings. The Otter is very abundant in the lakes and rivers of Clare, particularly at Inchiquin Lake and the Ennistymon river. The common fox is plentiful all through the wild parts of Clare. The varying hare (Lepus Hibernicus) occurs in great plenty over this district. Along the coast they are very fond of grazing close to the sea in the spring of the year. Amongst the more remarkable birds met in the district, may be mentioned the sea eagle, which formerly built in a precipitous cliff called Kinalia, near Glen Columbkille, and also used to frequent the cliffs of Moher. It is seldom if ever seen now. The raven, very common near the sea, a white variety, has been shot at the cliffs of Moher. The chough, also very abundant; the golden oriole, specimens of which were shot some years since at Roston, near Corrofin, and some fifteen years ago a small flock of them was seen on some crags near Ennis; the common bittern, shot several times in the county; the American bittern, killed near Ennis, and the American night heron, shot near Corrofin.

In conclusion we may observe that Burren at one time possessed more mammals than it now does. The heads and antlers of the red deer have frequently been found at Inchiquin Lake, near Corrofin, as also those of the wild ox. Mention of the wild ox of Burren is made in an old Irish poem, translated by Mr. Curry, and mentioned in a paper read by Dr. Wilde, before the Royal Irish Academy, in May, 1859. Fin Mac Cumhail was made prisoner by Cormac MacArt, King of Erin, who, however, consented to liberate him when a ransom of two of every wild animal in Ireland, a male and female, were brought before him on the Green of Tara. Cailte MacRonain, the foster-brother and favourite of the celebrated Irish general, undertook and accomplished this task within twelve months, and in this poem is said to have related to St. Patrick the result of his mission. Among the animals he mentions "two wild oxen from Burren." A foot note in the paper says—"Burren a wild district in Burren, county Clare, in which herds of cattle were very likely common at the time referred to. In the Leabhar-na-g-Ceart we read of '1,000 oxen from Boirinn' being part of the tributes of Cashel to the kings of Erin."

ON THE WATER.

"It is very dark, sir!" said he, with a tone as if of warning against the perils of going out to row at such a time. This

I was said to me

by a boat-master, who stood on his own raft or landing-place, at half-past eleven o'clock, one July night of last year.

I was sitting in my boat adjusting the vari-

it, looking to the before venturing out alone upon the silent river in the blackness of night. He held a lantern, the wick of which stood steady in the windless air, and scanned with no little interest my various preparations. The interest he expressed was genuine and unaffected, for a better-hearted fellow never owned a boat; indeed so strongly was he opposed to my present excursion, as to have stated plainly that no gig of his should go out on such an errand. "But she's (the boat) your own, and your life's your own, so I can't help it, but if you'll take my advice you'll not go to-night; besides, it's as dark as pitch, and you can't see nothing." He thought the jour-

and did not "see the fun of it;" in fact probably thought it preposterous that any but an ex-should even think of such a thing, much less expect to do it in safety;

for he it

Having rowed at night often before, I did not think it dangerous, and had, moreover, a becoming reliance on my own skill and strength. The "fun of it" is what I have to tell you, good reader.

from being self-deceived and a fellow victim in delusions he practised upon others. His gracious way of allaying the terrors, so flattering to himself, which were excited in the minds of his neighbours by these pretensions would strongly fortify their claims to respect. Nor were the lower orders only his gulls, as is evident from his having been employed to avert the mischief of an obvious incantation discovered when the image of the Queen Elizabeth was found in Lincoln's Inn Fields, "stuck full of pins" (doubtless not more than her Majesty herself was at times, to judge from her custom). This terrible omen was rendered insignificant, as Dee admits by himself, "in a godly and artificial manner," and to the great satisfaction of her Majesty and the council.

Let us leave the wizards and their dupes while I slip darkling along on the bosom of this river which floweth stealthily past their dwellings as of old, but now knoweth them not. The black mist hangs yet on the land, although seemingly more lightened by the lightning. I feel my way through it cautiously, the grim, hungry water hissing spitefully past, like a snake baffled of prey. The narrowing stream just shows its banks on either hand, but for any character or clear object discernible it might be the Nile or the Mississippi I am rowing upon. Here comes something at any rate, which will assure me against its being the Mississippi. A dull, rolling sound of large oars pulled heavily in a heavy boat mingles itself with irregular voices, the echoes of which shatter against the banks above as water against a cliff. A nearer approach shows a large boat, or shallop, bearing lights under a curtained canopy, beneath which are seated, at a table, a party of pleasure, now returning home. There are many ladies, one or two of whom seem asleep, and others restlessly talking with their companions of the party. One has nestled into a corner, and with hands on lap and chin on breast dozes her head, gently moving with the motion of the boat. Another rests her elbows on the table, and with hands supporting her face listens to the languid talk that passes between the others, three of whom are discussing a knotty point. Their voices, confused and half-inarticulate, reach me. One lies asleep at length on the benches of the boat. Here a gentleman whispers guardedly to his next neighbour, a lady, her face, down-looking and smiling, expresses pleased attention. The steersman seems more to heed the inmates of the cabin than his duty at the helm. All look exhausted, for the hour is late and their progress necessarily slow against the tide, which favours me. I lie off a bit and gaze at them, they unconscious of one so near; and I see into the cabin, and catch their half-heard voices. The whole incident, from its suddenness, strangeness, and look of luxurious languor and fatigue, is startling and picturesque. Slowly they labour by, passing on to the beat of their own oars, and casting a light on the black waters on either side, solemnly glide away, leaving me surprised and struck as a man might be who, rowing on the Tigris in old times, met Haroon-er-Raschid and his companions booning for Bagdad.

They had left the river still as before, the roll of their oars was out of hearing, only the light flashing down the reach betrayed their whereabouts as it shone upon trees and banks, making these start into existence swiftly, and as swiftly pass away,—when a low soft thrill filled the air, the beginning of which, to the ear was not. It was music that seemed to creep enroachingly, wrapping all in a vibrant circle of faint sound, that shrilly climbed and swung into a shiver of sorrow—an out-drawn strain as if the grief of all the land found utterance in one long sigh, melodious to pain, dolorous, protracted, sad, and ending on the verge of death with adieu—adieu—adieu—a death involved in murmurous, creaming silence.

They passed and left me darkling, startled, lonely, with an excited fancy that nigh compelled me to conceive this the Nile and that the barge of Cleopatra, sliding gently down the immemorial stream, wafting by music a slow farewell to Antony. A low wind that sings softly from the south brings those conceptions. Were it moonlight it were more in keeping yet; then I might be a boatman of Egypt, entranced with sound, resting on mine oar, whose blade glistens with silver, and drips a broken line of dimples upon the lighted stream, while far to south blazes low Canopus, master of the Nile, whose bright trail alone holds place against the long track the moon has drawn, she all the while lighting the eastern hills with an opal glory, the hills whose yon sides behold the Arabian gulf, and salute the morning even before Memnon. Silence did not disenfranchise me, but left me dreaming still, and only changed the theme of fancy.

Many forms and ways of river-life float before me, thus music-trammelled in the dark; ways in which men have passed their lives upon the waters, from the time when they first floated on an ox-hide down the stream of ancientest Oxus—till now when I myself, not less a dream, peradventure, than the past, float here stilly in the gloom. The slime-daubed basket of the Assyrian, and its loin-girt owner, rows past me. The Tunguses are here in a hollow tree chanting strange hymns to diabolic gods, as their heavy paddles wound the water. The high-stemmed Chinese slips on, pushing oar, gondola fashion, and the gondola herself, queen of pleasure-boats, glides stealthily past, darkening the dark water with a blacker shade. The Red Indian's birch canoe, lighter and swifter than any boat but my own, shows its double prow marked with lines of red and white. The half-frozen rivers of the north furnish their Esquimaux canoe and its master, who sits a perfect centaur in adaptation to his vessel, wielding a feathery two-bladed oar with both hands. Loiters by the mat-sailed Chinese flower-boat, laden with blooms that weigh upon the air half sickly. The double-prowed Red Indian boat is not more fantastic to my eyes than the double-bodied South Sea perigna—two boats covered with one deck. Past goes the heavy Scandinavian bark, the hollow trunks of two trees conjoined. This is in tone with my English blood, and the conception takes definite form and place, holding me a part of it. Let the Thames roll by while fancy bears me on to the distant Saxon river as it rolled two thousand years ago. Where am I now, but embarked with some remote ancestor of Saxon blood whose companions track down the stream to reach the far-off Baltic Sea?

A sound of oars again, but hard and strong in mightier hands than those that languidly haled the shallop past. I am lying back covered with a skin, for the night is cold and clear. We slide from time to time beneath overhanging rocks, whose sharp, lofty summits stand stark against an immensity of blue gloom arching overhead, and studded here and there with steadfast stars, that shake beams of light between my half-closed lids. The mighty shoulders of a sleeping comrade press my own; his studded baldrick lies athwart him like a snake. Beyond the stooping figures of the rowers, who rise and fall in cadence, appears the large form of the helmsman, seeming to move self-sustained after us, and immense in his white-skin coat of ox hide, rears himself gigantically against the trees and stars, now darkling and solid against the one, then a white spectral gliding attendant upon us in the shadows of the other. Music mixed itself inextricably with my dream, for one chanted with hollow voice a song of vengeance upon some—Romans he styled them—who shore the honey-coloured locks from the head of a maiden whose birth-place was far off, and afterwards sold her for a slave at Byzantium. Some one said to me, "Sing, Frith, sing to us;" and it seemed I sang to them something of dawn over the ice-fields, the snow, and the dark north, and the grinding flight of sledge-keels over the hardened sea.

The breathing of the rowers deepened, and came quick and hard as my voice caught them, and those who had erst been sleeping, rose upon an elbow to listen, repeating the burthen of my song. The chanting slowly ceased. Then one sat up and told us how he and others had crossed the sea westwards for seven days, with the wind following them, as angry Thor followed Loki for the slaying of Balder, when they came to an island, whence they sailed three days more in the same direction, and came to a bright land they called Greenland. Thence they turned southward, and ever hearing of new lands as new appeared, bore onwards many months to a country which grew hotter as they advanced. He had seen, he said, a large creature with a shield upon its back, and a breast-plate upon its stomach, that went upon its hands, and had the head of a snake; told us how going up a river for three weeks they found it nothing but mud, that slowly moved among gigantic rushes, almost impassable for their immense growth, haunted by enormous frogs, whose croaking was like the rattling of a heavy-laden wain. Then he spoke of a huge leech that came into their boat one night, and fastening upon a sleeping man, so sucked him, that when day broke he was no bigger than a dried fish. There some one grunted disbelief, and although he named the man, whom some of us had known, the teller gained no credence. The voices of my dream destroyed it, and instead of the starry sheep on the Saxon river, I awoke to find a sightless night, wherein was not even moonlight, however obscured and dim, or "damned with monstrous bars" of lowering cloud, but brooding overhead sullen gloom, a time for hopeless death. The very stream seemed dead, Lethean, and mournful, murmuring a slow rhythm, like a dirge, with dolorous rise and fall, a sad and irregular cadence.

Once more I rouse the dull echoes with the pulsing oar, till the leaping boat flies like a bird of night, whose instinct guides it unerringly over the gloomy river—

“Deepe, darke, uneasy, doleful, comfortlesse.”

Now, while speeding along, I could recall a thousand things connected with rowing in the dark, from the Egyptian Charon, whom the Greeks styled an infernal minister, in their clumsy confounding of theology with fact. With this might go the moonlight journeyings of the Greek troops to Troy, when the immemorial heroes reclined back, while some recounted the varied phases of the siege; the watch of Mohammed's sailors upon the Bosphorus, when they sat down before the doomed city of Constantine, and guarded the place against relief by sea; Columbus pacing his deck, in that marvellous quest for the unknown world, when men, and faith, and oceans and winds seemed warring against him. The tracking of unsearched rivers by the Spaniards, when El Dorado was the goal, was not more lonely and dark than this voyage of mine, although upon water that I know so well. I myself, in years past, have traversed the waters of this stream many a night, with friends, some of whom are now no more, but all of whom have left a pleasant memory with me; upon all these I might enlarge fully did the time permit. I might even dilate upon the voyages of busy Mr. Pepys, from Mortlake to London, a thing he thought venturesome, and thus record one, just a hundred and ninety-three years ago. “July 12, 1665.—Returned from Hampton Court—and so away to my boat, and all night upon the water, and home by two o'clock, shooting the bridge at that time of night.” Going through Old London Bridge “at that time of night” was, indeed, a dangerous exploit, notwithstanding the heavy wherry the good diarist used. Pepys used the river often, as was the custom of his day, and seems to have had great delight in doing so, nor always found himself in peril, as he states on the day previous to the above that he left Mortlake, “and all night down by water, a most pleasant passage.” All these times have passed, and it matters little, but to please the fancy in conceiving how the Londoners, in Henry the First's time, according to Fitzstephen, enjoyed themselves upon this stream by day, but had a great respect for it by night, never crossing it after dusk, even at Lambeth Ferry; or how Queen Elizabeth had moonlight parties with Essex and Raleigh; or how, again, Mary of Modena stood shivering and weeping on the very spot Fitzstephen names at Lambeth, stilling the cries of her infant, afterwards the first Pretender, when the wind blew, and the chill rain drifted, and her attendants came not to aid her in flight. Those miserable hours must have chilled the heart of the hapless lady, and dwelt long in her mind.

These things are all for the fancy, which grows active here in the darkness. I pace the water for an hour or two, most like a discontented spirit, up and down the short reaches restlessly. I am lying still and quiet in the little bay by Chiswick church, whose short tower is barely seen. This place has its memories also, for here lie buried Oliver Cromwell's daughter, Mary, Countess of Falconberg, and a much more notable person, the greatest of English humourist painters, sturdy William Hogarth. Sir John Chardin, the traveller, and Charles II.'s Duchess of Cleveland, lie here; so here may be truly said, “The wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.” While I linger here the land-mist has cleared off greatly, and there is an uncertain light about the sky, and the stars, seen through the tender haze, shine like powdered diamond dust, faint and palely brilliant. A little vagrant wind, that has lost its way in the great hollow vast, whispered past me, returned again and again, touched my cheek inquiringly, and fitted fitfully about.

From the church-tower comes a dead throb of the clock's warning to strike, and soon the sounds—one, two!—sing solemnly. The notes, mightily significant of bygone time, laid a burden upon the vibrant air, beneath which it shook, shuddering from shore to shore—sighed in ever-widening and incommensurable rings of sound that spread like a rippling circle, and died hollowly away. There is no more suggestive theme for imagination than the booming of a bell. How many generations have been carried from the little hamlet here to their graves while the solemn sound was heard! How many times have these been joy-bells or sorrow-bells! How many bridals and how many births have they announced with the same voices! How often, when the woods were all about this place, must the lonely watchers have heard the sound broken among trees! How often sick men, in close chambers of death, have counted stroke by stroke, and thought to hear no more! By these bells man is born and dies, comes to his work and goes to rest.

Barnes and Mortlake were not the only parishes on this water which were infested with dealers in the black art; though Dee and Kelly were considered Satan's prime agents. The books named contain in one place an entry of the expenditure of eleven shillings to the parish constable, “for conveying away the witches;” let us hope it was only across the water, which would, the old superstition had it, destroy their spells. It is a comfort for me to know they were conveyed away, as this present is the very hour for their pranks, to which I might well be a victim. As it is, I have yet seen nothing worse than an owl or a bat or two, familiars, doubtless, who wander masterless since the payment of that eleven shillings. Money well spent it was indeed.

The heavy church-bell that had rung two was followed by a tinkling and a querulous shower of petty clock-striking in every house; this is kept up for a few minutes, stragglers in the rear of time, rattling out their tiny notes breathlessly, and with a sudden distinctness that must have startled themselves. I go off again for a lonelier part of the river, the gray, light haze clearing more and more, until, after rowing with bent face for a few minutes, I suddenly look up, and find myself under a vast dome of glittering points—stars; the hollow of God's own crown, that arched from horizon to horizon, stretched measureless above, and seemed to overawe the world with beauty. A thousand and a thousand thousand stars crowded the canopy of darkest azure, black with depth unsearchable, yet wherever the eye rested, lighted with stars, that broke its deepest depths with light-dust, and revealed world on world in incomprehensible multiplicity; worlds like motes of dust in the sunbeam; jewels on the robe of God, that he has woven for himself, out of eternity, which here and there lie thicker in the folds that stretch over the firmament. The border of that great garment I saw not, but my soul and utmost being felt prostrate before this wonder of the universe, and strove to kiss the hem humbly in ecstatic adoration. Glory to God!—the unworded thought that formed itself within my brain was me, a stricken atom, made only to adore and live for ever in the thought adoring. If the river had opened beneath me for death, I could have died only with this thought. I had seen the glory of glories, the robe of God, and now I could die, a soul overborne with prayer and praise. Praising that I had been made to pray, and praying for a heart of gratitude, that I should have beheld the perfections of His handiwork, and should testify to his glory.

How long the spectacle absorbed me I cannot tell, but in time thin veils, like folded gauze, were formed here and there across the heavens; and the stars shone through streaks of lucid mist, which thickened to small clouds, and broke up the awful dome. I was still gazing, when the boat touched gently upon the bank, and swung, grating her keel in gravel, awaking me. Then I took the oars again, and rowed thoughtfully home, under the still and starry night. The clouds and I journeyed together, for an hour, before a mild western breeze, until they were drawn into a light, fleecy mass, like softest flower leaves, laid line over line, a canopy for all below, except, when to windward, a broad clear space was kept like a dark bend in which the low-lying stars gathered paler and paler minutely. Why did they pale? Their broad and purple setting grew azure and paler blue, failed through all grades of cerulean tint, until the sweet grayness of pure silver was attained. Amethystine red of faint wine-hue followed and held place awhile. The canopy which erst was light on dark, became dark on light, and its edges began to glitter, as burning charcoal glitters in a wind. Silver-gray and amethystine wine-red yielded to green, and I saw the stars—a golden hue they had—hiding themselves within a mist of light. The mist of light grew concrete and buried them within its bosom. All this time the canopy was steadfast, drawing a sharp edge against the wind and extending right over the plain from north to south. It was laid ply over ply, like armour or innumerable petals of a gigantic flower. It was God's own flower, indeed—the dawn—the dawn! that parted itself, expanding leaf after leaf, and fell away into a rose of sun!

CLOUGH-I-STOOKAN.

IN our last number we gave a view of the Bridge of Carric-a-Rede, in illustration of a tale related in connection with the coast of Antrim. As our limits will not permit us to give a minute description of many things well worthy of observation along a coast where of the sublime and stupendous, the wonderful and the grand, the tourist will find no deficiency, on our front page we give a view of Clough-i-Stookan, a huge limestone rock, at one period supposed to be the most northern point of Ireland. Oral history states, that in olden time all the rents of Ireland were paid at this place, and that the last Danish invaders embarked from here. Clough-i-Stookan presents one of the most curious and extraordinary objects that can possibly be conceived, the varied view which meets the eye attracting general interest and admiration.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

THIS eminent artist was born at Plympton, in Devonshire, July 16, 1723. He was the son of the Rev. Samuel Reynolds and Theophila Potter, his wife, and was the tenth of eleven children, five of whom died in their infancy. His father was obliged to eke out the small emoluments of his living by teaching a grammar school, and in this Joshua is supposed to have received the first rudiments of knowledge, amongst the rest, of the classics, though he did not during his after life give many evidences of classical learning. At a very early age he showed, like many other great painters, a strong inclination for art. His first attempts at drawing were from copies done by his sisters, and prints that he chanced to meet with amongst his father's books, particularly those in Dryden's Plutarch; but his greatest store lay in Jacob Cutt's book of "Emblems," which his mother, a native of Holland, brought with her from that country. When but eight years of age, he met with the "Jesuits' Perspective," and read it with such diligence and attention that he made himself complete master of it, and never after required any further instruction in this important part of an artist's education. He soon put the knowledge he thus acquired into practice, by making a drawing of the Grammar School at Plympton, which, being raised on stone pillars, afforded a good subject for illustration. He next began to sketch portraits of the members of his own family, and at last meeting Richardson's "Treatise on the Art of Painting," his vocation became fixed. His admiration for Raphael now became so great, that the master appeared to him "superior to the most illustrious names either of ancient or of modern times, a notion which he loved to indulge in all the days of his life."

He did not long continue to copy, however, but soon began to paint, and progressed so rapidly, that in a very short time he made his master jealous. There was an old woman in the house, a servant, and Reynolds painted her so well, that Hudson foresaw his fame and began to fear him. The portrait was placed amongst others in Hudson's gallery, and was so much admired and praised by visitors, that the artist came to the conclusion that, now that his pupil was his rival, he should get rid of him. Accordingly, a few days afterwards, a pretext for taking this step accidentally presented itself. Reynolds had been ordered to take a picture to Vanburgh's, the drapery painter. The evening came on wet, and he postponed his task until the following morning, which was quite time enough. Hudson, upon hearing this, dismissed him on the spot. He then removed to the house of his uncle, who lived in the Temple, and wrote his father an account of what had happened. From him he received directions to go home to Devonshire, which he did, after a stay of two years in London. He was accustomed in after life to congratulate himself upon this change in his position, as he thought he had acquired from Hudson all that was positively good in his teaching.

His talents were now sufficiently displayed to warrant the brightest auguries as to his future success in the profession upon which he had entered. He would never acknowledge, however, that he possessed any peculiar qualification for art, any more than for any other pursuit. He placed unbounded reliance in application and strength of will, and believed that these qualities would stead a man in any profession. In genius, in the sense of peculiar fitness for a particular occupation, he had no belief whatever. He thought that the same abilities which make a man a good lawyer or doctor, would make him a good artist. We doubt very much, however, whether in his opposition to the popular notion, that a man may be a genius in one thing, and a blockhead in every thing else, he did not run into the opposite extreme, of utterly contemning taste and inclination in the choice of a profession.

The next three years of his life were passed in Devonshire, partly in idleness, and partly in the desultory pursuit of his art. He was very much in the society of the country gentlemen of the neighbourhood, and, as far as field-sports and good dinners went, was kindly treated; but he always lamented the want of the opportunity for acquiring greater knowledge of the world and of men which would have been afforded him had he been residing in London. There can be no doubt, however, that one who kept his mind fixed so constantly and firmly upon the one great object of his life, success in his vocation, must have been laying up stores of knowledge and experience, from observation merely, in greater abundance than he himself dreamed of.

He did not, however, during this period, altogether neglect his pencil. He produced many portraits, which Northcote says were undoubted very fine, particularly one of a boy reading by a reflected light; and it is said, that when Sir Joshua saw some of these thirty years afterwards, he lamented that in that long interval he had made so little progress in art. He studied some of the works of William Gandy at Exeter, which made a great impression upon him. Some of them he thought equal to Rembrandt's; and he carried with him to Italy a deep recollection of their peculiarly solemn and forcible effect. He took great pleasure in repeating one of Gandy's observations: "That a picture ought to have richness in its texture, as if the colours had been cream or cheese, and the reverse to a hard and husky, or dry manner." In two years after he left Hudson he lost his father, on Christmas-day, 1746. He was a man of very fair learning, great innocence of heart, and was greatly beloved by his neighbours. To Joshua he had been invariably kind and affectionate beyond measure, and it must have been a great consolation for him to know that the care and anxiety which his son's education had cost him, had not been thrown away.

When Reynolds was two-and-twenty years old, he and his two youngest unmarried sisters took a house in Plymouth, and he began to devote himself to portrait painting. Many of his works of this class, however, are in the common-place style of Hudson, his master, and all other artists of the period. It was their invariable practice to paint portraits with one hand thrust into the unbuttoned waistcoat, and the other holding the hat, in order to avoid the insurmountable difficulty of drawing the hands correctly. There is a story told of Reynolds, that one of his sitters requested to be taken with his hat on his head; but what was his wife's astonishment on the picture being sent home, to discover that he had another hat under his arm. While in Plymouth, a young lady of great beauty, named Miss Chudleigh, who afterwards became famous as Duchess of Kingston, sat to him for her portrait, and he gained some notice also by painting some of the Abercorn family. His fame now began to spread beyond the limits of his own county, and he acquired the friendship and patronage of the third Lord Edgecumbe, and Captain, afterwards Lord, Keppel. He paid another visit to London, and resided in St. Martin's-lane, where he mixed largely in the society of artists. But his darling wish was to pay a visit to Rome, as he longed to gaze upon all the glories of art which it contained. It was not easy to accomplish this, but an unexpected opportunity of gratifying his desire was soon afforded him.

In May, 1749, his friend Captain Keppel was appointed commander of the fleet on the Mediterranean station, for the purpose of chastising the Dey of Algiers for his insults to British merchantmen, and he invited Reynolds to accompany him in his ship, the Centurion. Reynolds gladly accepted the offer, and they set sail on the 11th of May, 1749. Keppel displayed the greatest kindness towards him, and did everything to gratify his curiosity at every place where the ship touched. On the 24th of May he went ashore at Lisbon, and there witnessed a bull-fight, and many grand religious processions. On arriving at Algiers, he went ashore with the commodore, and was introduced to the Dey, who treated them with the greatest civility. The Algerine dispute having been satisfactorily arranged, the Centurion sailed to Port Mahon, in Minorca, where he took portraits of most of the officers of the garrison, and was received with great cordiality by General Blakeney, the commander, who entertained him every day at the Government House. His stay at Port Mahon was prolonged by a disagreeable accident. As he was taking an airing on horseback, the animal took fright, and threw him over a precipice. His face was severely injured, and part of his lip so much bruised that he was obliged to have it cut away. Three months afterwards he proceeded to Rome.

After visiting various other parts of Italy, Reynolds returned to England in October, 1752, and after a hurried visit to Devonshire, came to London, and established himself in St. Martin's-lane, as a professional artist. The boldness of his attempts, the freedom of his conceptions, and the brilliancy of his colouring, called down upon him the indignation of all the older artists, who looked upon him as an intruder, and an impertinent innovator: just as the old Austrian generals were enraged at Buonaparte's beating them contrary to established rule. None declaimed against him more loudly than his old master, Hudson.

In the year 1764, he first became connected with the famous literary circle which met in London in the latter part of the eighteenth century, the bon-mots of which have been so faithfully recorded by Boswell. He chanced to meet with the "Life of Savage" in Devonshire. He was delighted with the book, and longed to know the author, and shortly after met him at Miss Cotterell's, in Newport-street. He rose in Johnson's estimation to a place which he never afterwards lost, by the utterance of one shrewd remark. The ladies were lamenting the loss of a friend, recently deceased, to whom they had been under great obligations. "You have, however, the consolation of being relieved from the burden of gratitude." They were shocked at the selfishness of this suggestion, but Johnson took Reynolds's part, and, on going away, accompanied him home. A friendship was thus commenced which continued ever afterwards.

In the year 1758, Reynolds was making most money. His charge for a head was at first five guineas; he afterwards raised it to twenty; and he himself stated, that at one period his time was worth five guineas an hour. In the year 1760, the idea of an exhibition of the works of British artists was at length carried into execution, and in it those of Reynolds played a distinguished part. In the following year he purchased a fine house in Leicester-square, and furnished it gorgeously, adding a splendid gallery for the exhibition of his works. It was here that he received all the scholars, wits, and writers of the age. Of these reunions Allan Cunningham draws a delightful picture. "His table was now elegantly furnished, and round it men of genius were often found. He was a lover of poetry and poets; they sometimes read their productions at his house, and were rewarded by his approbation, and occasionally by their portraits. Johnson was a frequent and a welcome guest; though the sage was not seldom sarcastic and overbearing, he was endured and caressed, because he poured out the riches of his conversation more lavishly than Reynolds did his wines. Percy was there, too, with his ancient ballads and his old English lore; and Goldsmith, with his latent genius, infantine vivacity, and plum-coloured coat. Burke and his brothers were constant guests, and Garrick was seldom absent, for he loved to be where greater men were. It was honourable to this distinguished artist that he perceived the worth of such men, and felt the honour which their society shed upon him; but it stopped not here—he often aided them with his purse, nor insisted upon repayment.

Until the year 1768 there is little in Reynolds's life differing so much from the ordinary routine as to call for remark. Surrounded by the wisest and ablest men of the age, in the enjoyment of ample fame and wealth, his life flowed on in a smooth current.

In his sixty-fifth year, he lost the sight of his left eye, suddenly, while painting a likeness of the Marchioness of Hertford. He laid down his pencil, and never raised it more. This affliction preyed greatly on his mind. Though he several times afterwards appeared in public, he never was the same again. At last came the end. An enlargement of the liver, which bade defiance to the physician's skill, totally prostrated him, and on the 23rd of February, 1792, he died. He was buried in the Crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, and accompanied to the grave by many of the greatest of the land. He lies by the side of Sir Christopher Wren, and in the body of the church a statue, by Flaxman, has been erected to his memory.

CASTLEDERMOT.

THE ruins of the Abbey of Castle Dermot, county Kildare, are extensive and interesting. Its pointed arches are beautifully turned, and the noble and picturesque window, of which we give a representation in the above engraving, arrests the attention even of the passing traveller as he journeys forward. The aspect of the contiguous Round Tower, is also picturesque in a high degree.

The town of Castle Dermot lays claim to much higher antiquity than the city of Dublin, having been the residence of the ancient kings of Leinster, bearing the names of Dermot.

LOUGHREA.

THE town of Loughrea is situated on the shores of Lough Rea, county Galway, and was chiefly remarkable for its monastery, founded by Richard de Burgh, about the year 1300, for the order of Carmelites. After the dissolution it was granted to Richard, Earl of Clanricarde, ancestor of the present proprietor. A castle was erected here by the Earl of Ulster, at an early period, and the town, from its situation in the approach to Galway, was deemed of so much importance that it was fortified. According to the census of 1861, it contains 548 inhabited houses, and a population of 3,063. The neighbourhood of Loughrea abounds with pleasingly diversified scenery. The lake, which is about one mile in diameter, has three small islands of picturesque appearance, and its shores are enlivened by some pretty cottages, and embellished on the south and east with hills of beautiful verdure.

Of the Carmelite monastery to which we have alluded, there are still very extensive remains, and also of the old castle built by the De Burghs, which was for some time the residence of the Clanricarde family. There was anciently an hospital for lepers in the town, but little of its history is recorded, and even the site of it is unknown. On the summit of Monument Hill, near the town, is a circular enclosure, in which are seven stones, some of which are still standing erect, and others lying on the ground. In the centre is a small tumulus of earth, and near the base of the hill are vestiges of a circular entrenchment, within which are the remains of a Cromlech.

A CHAPTER IN FRENCH HISTORY.

ON the east of Paris stands the Place Royale. It is a square some five or six acres in extent.

The houses present a uniform appearance externally; they are large, and contain magnificent apartments—magnificent as to size, that is to say. For it was a gay square once, and, for a long time too, a very fashionable square, and so much so, indeed, as to render the surrounding neighbourhood fashionable.

The case is different with it now. Says a French author before us: "They are past, those days, when the Place was thronged by counts, marquises, and dukes, all scented and pomaded, each with his frills of lace and his embroidered coat, his sword by his side, and his hat with a flowing feather under his arm; they are past, those days, when it was the favourite lounge of laughing and perfumed young abbés in fair perukes, the favourite resort of court ladies in velvet masks, toying with the elegant little mirrors they carried, and sweeping the ground with their long silk trains." They are past indeed, those days, and the contrast which the Place affords in the present is great: "Here there is a drinking-shop, there the office of a professional letter-writer; here a small haberdasher hangs out wares more commonly second-hand than new, there a cobbler displays a row of clouted boots and shoes. The Hôtel Nicolai is occupied by a wood-merchant; the Hôtel Villedieu by the district municipality; the Hôtel Richelieu by a mercer, a tobacconist, and an attorney; the Hôtel Rohan by a wine merchant; the King's Pavilion by a dealer in old furniture." The last person of any note who lived in the Place Royale was M. Victor Hugo; he however, did so till not very long ago. What formerly was the Hôtel Guéméné belonged to him, and perhaps still does; at all events he was in the occupation of it when he was driven into exile. The French term "hôtel," we need scarcely remark, is not confined in its application to a place of entertainment for travellers, but is also employed, as here, to designate the town residence of a princely, or noble, or rich personage; its English equivalent in this sense being "house," as "Northumberland House," for instance.

So much for the Place Royale; which, indeed, we have been led to mention here, chiefly from the desire that the reader who knows modern Paris, or may consult a map of it, might be guided to the situation of the Hôtel St. Paul and the Hôtel des Tournelles, every trace of these having long since disappeared. The Place, in fact, is built on the very site of the latter: the other was in the immediate neighbourhood. Both were Royal Palaces, and it is mainly to show what a royal palace was, four or five hundred years back, that we have chosen them for the subject of this article.

The buildings and grounds of the Hôtel St. Paul became royal property by passing into the hands of Charles V. of France in his first acquisition, however, in the locality was made about the year 1360, when he was only Regent. The ground immediately adjacent to the Hôtel was of great extent, including within its outer wall upwards of twenty acres. The palace itself, however, was far from being of corresponding dimensions; indeed, according to our present idea of a palace, it could scarcely be considered a palace at all. It must rather have resembled a village; better still, it was like a farm-yard on a great scale. There were many distinct buildings, in general, not above two storeys high; some of them were connected with each other by galleries, but the majority stood isolated, with gardens and orchards round them. There were stables for horses, there were dove-cots for pigeons, there were dens for lions; there were the ovens and the buttery; there was the falconry; there were ponds for fish, there were yards for poultry; there were barracks for the royal guards and men-at-arms; while round all these confused and heterogeneous dependencies ran the outer wall we have mentioned, flanked with many towers. The royal apartments stood on the side nearest the Seine, which bounded the whole on the south. They consisted of a grand dining-hall, a council chamber, a reception room, a study, a wardrobe, an oratory, a chapel, and a great bed room; the last requiring indeed to be a pretty large chamber, if it was to be in proportion to the bed, that being ten or twelve feet wide, like the great bed at Ware. The Queen, the Dauphin, and the Princes had each a separate lodging, similar to that of the King, as the number and appropriation of the rooms, but on a smaller scale.

The adornment and furniture of these regal habitations would now be considered, in many respects, very poor and scanty, but in others sufficiently splendid. The portion of them most highly decorated was the chimney, an immense, projecting, and overhanging structure, in which a whole party might seat themselves to hear the winter tale told by the trouévre, or the romance chanted by the minstrel. It was delicately carved by the sculptor, the painter coloured it elaborately with vermilion, and blue, and gold. The keys of the time were also of high workmanship, the locksmith of the fourteenth century expending almost as much pains on his productions as does the goldsmith on his in our day. But nearly every thing else was in a very rude state, and what we should consider comfort was altogether unknown. The walls were generally only white-washed; for, though they were sometimes relieved by armorial bearings, and other designs in finer colours, tapestry and hangings of silk or gilt leather were not introduced till later. The floors were of variously-coloured tiles; in winter they were thickly strewn with straw. Great bunks, opening sometimes with doors, and sometimes with a lid, served instead of our presses and chests of drawers. The seats were of different kinds. There were chairs, meant only for persons of the highest rank, and therefore placed on the elevated dais—things of solid wood, and almost immovable from their weight, with very high backs, on which almost always a coat of arms was blazoned. There were benches some twenty feet long, carved perhaps with no little skill, but hard and irksome, though sometimes rendered places of honour by being placed on a platform with a step or two. There were forms of a smaller and portable size, over which, by way of luxury, carpets would be thrown. Finally, for the Queen, but for her alone, there was something really like an easy chair, it being stuffed with hair and covered with red leather of Cordova, and ornamented with gilt nails and silk fringes. In the chief bed-rooms were dressers (dressoirs), a kind of sideboard with several shelves, on which glittered vessels of silver, and gold, and crystal, vases, and cups, and chalices, and pots for sweetmeats and preserves. The bed, which was raised high from the floor, had curtains of silk or brocade, coverlets of ermine fur lined with light cloth, sheets, then called in French chemises, of gauze or starched crape, and two or three huge square pillows. Beside the bed stood a table, on which was placed the cas de nuit—that is, a small tray of eatables in case of nocturnal appetite. We may remark that in great French houses this tray was generally provided within the last hundred and fifty years. Louis XIV. had his regularly.

To sum up in one word, the interior of a king's palace five centuries ago, was a very true expression of the spirit and manners of the age; it was a wonderfully incongruous mixture of magnificence and meanness, of minute attention to small things, and of total indifference to greater; of coarseness and refinement, of taste and barbarism, of luxury and discomfort. As the image Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream prefigured, by the diversifying of the several metals and the miry clay which composed it, a variety of successive kingdoms, so perhaps might the strange habitation of Charles V. be taken to symbolize the contemporary state of the French monarchy, and of French society generally in his time.

But, let us now, in imagination, rebuild this palace, and repeople it as it was peopled early in the fifteenth century; premising, that in doing so, we shall chiefly follow a trustworthy French author, whom, however, we shall not name, seeing that, though his name is no secret, he chooses to write under an assumed and rather affected title.

The jacquemart of St. Paul's parish church strikes noon, and noon is the dinner hour in these old times. The gates are shut, and guard is mounted by the royal archers, clad in leathern jerkins and iron caps or "pots," their bows on their shoulders, and their arrows at their girdles. For no one must intrude while the king dines, were it only because of the silver plate now produced; there are bold thieves about. It was but yesterday that a woman was buried alive—oh, the good old times!—for having stolen an enamelled box belonging to the queen, that Isabel of Bavaria. Let us enter the dining-hall:—The king is already in his great chair at the middle of the horse-shoe table; the banquet is served, a banquet composed of dishes as enormous as they are curious; the pastry rises in fortresses bristling with towers, or undulates in the form of hills and valleys, or takes the shape of statues; the flesh-meat is in profusion, and every joint appears with an accompaniment of game. To see those quarters of beef and mutton half-buried under plover and woodcocks, pigeons and ortolans, one would say that a feast had been prepared for ogres and giants. Look at that peacock, it might be supposed still alive, and, unpeacock-like, swimming in a lake—the lake is of green sauce—so well has Master Taillevent, the chief cook, preserved intact the golden plumage, the proud head and neck, the brilliant tail. Do you scent the rose-water? Everything, soups and meats, vegetables, and sweets, is bathed in it. Sweets? Yes, and twenty kinds of them, too; for they are in great request, and, though America has not yet been discovered, so that we have no sugar, honey supplies the place of it. There is honey even in the wine, which, warmed and spiced, has become hippocras. Pages bring cups of gold; the grand butler tastes the beverage, to prove that he has not poisoned it, as the chief baker and the grand steward taste the bread and the viands. A grace before meat has been said, and another will be said after; but also, during the repast, a clerk of the chapel-royal reads aloud from the Scriptures, or it may be that to-day Master Salmon, the king's secretary, will deliver the moral reflections he has made on questions which his majesty has deigned himself to propound. There are no women present, not one; "and thus," says our author, maliciously: "the silence of the guests is complete;" for the men, if perchance they do not very attentively listen to the clerk, think that teeth alone, and not tongues, should be in use at present.

Dinner at last is over, and the party leave the table and the hall. Horses are now caparisoned for riding, or for the tilt-yard; or arms and armour are furnished, or the falcons are hooded for hawking, or dogs are coupled for coursing. The queen and her ladies are in her private chamber embroidering and spinning, and talking gaily of the next tournament, and of what knight was the best lance at the last. The king, accompanied by his fool, to amuse him, convenes his councillors, dictates his ordinances, regulates the general affairs of his realm, or he shuts himself up with his clergy, and seeks absolution for his sins; or, in his treasury, looks over his jewels and other precious things, like him in the nursery rhyme, who "Was in his counting-house counting out his money;"

or, in his library, he turns over some heavy manuscript bound in wood and velvet, with clasps of silver. In the last case he perhaps reads a page or two, but his chief attraction is found in the illuminations, due to the pencil of his painter, Gringonneur, who, however, is occupied at this moment in colouring a pack of cards, which "devil's books," it is said, were first published in this reign. The king, be it observed, possesses no fewer than eight hundred and fifty volumes, an enormous collection, the greater part of which is kept in the Tour de la Librairie at the Louvre. The greater part of it is now in England probably, the Duke of Bedford, when regent in France for our Henry VI., having purchased, in 1427, the whole then, together, for the sum of twelve hundred livres.

So much for an imaginary sketch of those times. Let us now review the real history of two old palaces and their neighbourhood.

The king whom we have seen at table in the Hotel St. Paul, was the unfortunate Charles VI. In that palace, on the 20th October, 1842, after many years of great suffering, he died. It will be remembered how, when hunting in the forest of Mans, he was suddenly accosted by a wild-looking being, whose appearance and address had such an effect upon him, that ever after his mind was unsettled—a thing not much to be wondered at considering the superstitions of the age—and that he, as well as others, took the fellow for an apparition. The truth of the matter probably is, that the apparition was nothing more than a hired instrument employed for political purposes, just as it is probable that the pretended St. John, who, about a century later, appeared at Linlithgow, to James IV. of Scotland, to warn him against entering on his proposed war with England, was simply an instrument in the hands of the sagacious party who anticipated a disastrous conclusion to that war, and whose foresight was soon proved by what issued on the field of Flodden.

It was not, however, only mentally that the unhappy Charles suffered. For the last ten years of his life he had never once been allowed to leave this Hotel St. Paul, not even at any lucid interval; and here, abandoned by all, friends, children, and wife, he actually suffered physically at times from wanting the mere necessities of life. "With the howlings of his insanity were often mingled groans extorted by his hunger." It is to be hoped, for the honour of England, that this was not the case latterly, and that the Duke of Bedford, who had installed himself in the Hotel des Tournelles, on the other side of the way, showed more humanity to the deserted prince than his own family and subjects had done. He at all events showed due respect to the royal corpse, accompanying the funeral of Charles to St. Denis "in a black mantle, and as chief mourner," English archers acting as a guard of honour, and the banner of England waving beside the fleur-de-lis.

Fourteen years later, Isabel, of Bavaria, the bad wife of this poor king, died in the same Hotel St. Paul, unwept and unhonoured by any one. Here, too, in 1515, died Louis XII.; but for him the people wept, and his memory they honoured. "Would we had again the time of the good King Louis!" they would say with a sigh afterwards, and till Henry IV. came. Nor was this wonderful. "Under the administration of this king," says a recent writer, "France prospered; the treasury was always full, the obligations of the state were punctually met, the taxes were reduced, justice was reformed, and the small thenceforth had recourse against the great."

This was the last king who cared for the old palace. His successor, Francis I., began to dispose of it only four years after his father's death, by selling off part of the buildings it contained. By the year 1551, the whole property was alienated from the Crown; and the adjacent Bastille, one reason for the construction of which had been the defence of the royal residence, frowned in vain on the work of demolition that immediately commenced. In a few years all its walls had been levelled, all its ditches and ponds filled up, all its "pear-trees, apple-trees, cherry-trees, and vines" uprooted; and a maze of streets, covering all the space it had occupied, and some of them, such as the Rue des Lions, still suggestive, by their names, of the ancient scene, were ere long crowded with a population forgetful of the Hotel de St. Paul.

We turn to its neighbour, the Hotel des Tournelles, so called from the number of small towers upon its outer wall. It dated from about the year 1390; but it was to the Regent Bedford it was indebted for its fortune, good or bad as it may be considered, of becoming a favourite residence of French royalty. The duke enlarged and beautified it so much that Charles VII. and his successors generally preferred it to its opposite rival. The crafty and superstitious Louis XI. was wont to occupy it as often as he ventured to exchange the security of Plessis-les-Tours for the uncertainties of Paris; and here that false mirror of chivalry, Francis I., held his glittering and vicious court. It was not so large as the Hotel St. Paul, though its enclosure contained "twelve galleries, two parks, and seven gardens;" and there is less to be said of its own history than of the events which happened in its immediate vicinity. To these, then, we shall confine ourselves.

It was in the Rue St. Antoine, under the windows of the Hotel des Tournelles that, in 1559, the famous tournament was held in which Henry II. lost his life. He received in his right eye a splinter from the lance of the Count de Montgommeri, or "Mum-degrumbi," as some writers call him (whose family, by the way, we believe was connected with the ancestors of that modern jousting late Earl of Eglintoun), and died next day of the wound, after having had the goodness to pardon the Count for the accident. His queen, however, the too celebrated Catherine de Medicis, was not so magnanimous; she persecuted Montgommeri relentlessly; and, in his absence, for he contrived to escape at the time, had him condemned to death, and executed in effigy, as the assassin of her husband. Relentlessly, we say, for it was not till fifteen years had elapsed that he at last fell into her hands: he was taken, after a desperate resistance, in the time of Domfront, tried, and we need scarcely add, condemned; then he was frightfully tortured, and finally beheaded. It would seem almost impossible, from all the circumstances, that there could have been any foul play on his part at the tournament, yet the suspicion of treachery and design was common enough at the time; and the notorious astrologer, Nostredamus, patronized as he was by Catherine herself, narrowly escaped being burned as a wizard, for having distinctly foretold the violent death of the king; or rather, perhaps, for his supposed connexion with a presumed conspiracy to effect it. As a curiosity, we may translate literally the obscure quatrain which was thought to prophesy the occurrence:

"The young lion will overcome the old,
In battle-field, by single duel;
In golden cage will thrust out his eyes;
'Two wounds in one; then to die; a cruel death."

The "golden cage" was explained—after the event of course—to mean the gilded helmet which the king wore; and altogether the lines were held by the credulous to be remarkably explicit. So easy is it to find fulfilment for an impostor's predictions, provided only they be sufficiently vague, and all but intelligible nonsense.

But the tourney of chivalrous times, "the gentle passage of arms," was not the kind of encounter for which the immediate vicinity of the Hotel des Tournelles acquired a bad celebrity; it was as being a chosen spot for duelling, and for duelling in its worst shape, that it was for a long time notorious. Here, for instance, in 1578, three favourites of Henry III., whose infamous names we shall not mention, met in mortal combat three other courtiers well worthy of such steel as theirs. And mortal, indeed, that combat was. Two of the six, these two being boys of eighteen, were killed on the spot; a third died of his wounds next day; and a fourth about a month after!

The still more celebrated duel took place on the same scene, in which Bussy d'Amboise was killed; and for being concerned in which, Montmorency-Bouteville and his cousin Count Deschapelles, were beheaded six weeks after, at the common place of execution. This happened in 1627, under the administration of Richelieu, who had resolved to put down duelling by the strong arm of the law. Whether the Cardinal merits unreserved praise for his sternness towards the duellist nobility, or whether, especially in this case, he was influenced by private or political motives, remains a question. This, however, is certain, that by his inflexible severity duelling in France then received somewhat of a check; and it might be well perhaps, for that country, in the present day, if, on higher principles than his probably were, his enactments, or at least the spirit of them, were revived.

Only for about fifty years did the Hotel des Tournelles survive its neighbour the Hotel St. Paul: under Henry IV. the last remnant of it disappeared, to yield its site, as in the other case, to the plans of street-builders and architects. As we have already said, the degraded Place Royale now occupies a portion of that site, and the quarter is very different in these days from what it was in days of yore. Still, royalty has not altogether deserted the quarter; the Place, which at the revolution had its name changed first to 'Place des Fédérés,' and afterward to 'Place des Vosges,' regained its old dignity in 1814, and saw a new statue of marble erected in it to replace the former one of bronze, which the revolutionists had removed, and probably converted into sou pieces. The present statue, like the other, is of Louis XIII., that feeble king, who was a good confectioner, a good gardener, a tolerable barber, and a passable cook; who could compose music a little, and paint a little—and do several other things a little; so that, according to an epitaph proposed for him—

"He would have had a hundred virtues as a valet;
He had not one as a master."

The circumjacent district, the "Marais," as it is called, from having once been a marsh, is one of considerable industry; and though one would think that peaceable and timid folk would think it rather two near the politically inflammable Faubourg St. Antoine; it is also a favourite retreat of the retired tradesmen, the small annuitant, the quiet families who have seen better days, and some richer people of the old school. Its industry is chiefly applied to the production of what are called articles de Paris; that is to say, bronzes, mirrors, time-pieces, jewellery, toys, and the like; cabinet-making, and especially cabinet-making of the finer kind, also employs many hands here, amongst whom there is a large proportion of Germans.

Our subject has been two old palaces; our object, leaving the reader to moralize on the pictures for himself—has been to exhibit, first, some striking contrasts which old times present to new, and secondly, some odd incongruities which existed in the old times themselves. With one more instance of the latter, we shall close; it relates to the Bastille, which, as will have been seen, may almost be considered to have formed part of the Hôtel St. Paul.

That the Bastille was a fortress and a state prison, and what kind of a fortress and prison it was, are things generally known. Farther, that as being a fortress, and the citadel of Paris, it should occasionally be chosen as a place of deposit for the royal treasures, will seem to have been natural enough, even should the fact be new. But that such a place as the Bastille should ever have been deliberately selected for the scene of extraordinary festivity, may perhaps be new to some, and must, we should think, seem unnatural indeed. So it was, however, in 1518, under Francis I.; we have an account of a magnificent banquet given in the Bastille by that monarch, on which occasion the walls of the inner court "were covered with cloth of his colour," and "twelve hundred torches made the night seem like the day."

SONGS OF OUR LAND.

SONGS of our land, ye are with us for ever,
The power and the splendour of barons pass away;
But yours is the might of some far flowing river,
Though Summer's bright roses or Autumn's decay.

Ye treasure each voice of the swift passing ages,
And truth, which time writeth on leaves or on sand;
Ye bring us bright thoughts of poets and sages,
And keep them among us, old songs of our land.

The bards may go down to the place of their slumbers,
The lyre of the charmer be hushed in the grave,
But far in the future the power of their numbers
Shall kindle the hearts of our faithful and brave.

It will waken an echo in souls deep and lonely,
Like voices of reeds by the summer breeze fanned;
It will call up a spirit for freedom, when only
Her breathings are heard in the song of our land.

For they keep a record of those, the true hearted,
Who fell with the cause they had vowed to maintain:
They show us bright shadows of glory departed,
Of love that grew cold, and the hope that was vain.

The page may be lost and the pen long forsaken,
And weeds may grow wild o'er the brave heart and hand;
But ye are still left, when all else hath been taken,
Like steams in the desert, sweet songs of our land.

Songs of our land, ye have followed the stranger,
With power over ocean and desert afar,
Ye have gone with our wanderers through distance and danger,
And gladdened their path like a home-guiding star.

With the breath of our mountains in summers long vanished,
And visions that passed like a wave from the sand,
With hope for their country and joy from her banished,
Ye come to us ever, sweet songs of our land.

The spring time may come with the songs of her glory,
To bid the green heart of the forest rejoice,
But the pine of the mountain, though blasted and hoary,
And the rock in the desert, can send forth a voice.

It is thus in their triumph for deep desolations,
While ocean waves roll or the mountains shall stand,
Still hearts that are bravest and best of the nations,
Shall glory and live in the songs of their land.

SELF-MADE.

PERHAPS in the history of successful men, born poor and surrounded at every step with the difficulties with which poverty besets genius, there does not exist a more extraordinary biography than that of James Ferguson. Many men have succeeded in educating themselves into fame by the positive force of abilities which could not be kept down, and the culture of which rested mostly with themselves. Of this class were Kirke White, and John Keats, who died, while yet a boy, after giving the world a fragment of a poem, whose life must be coeval with that of the language which it enriches. But Ferguson was a man of different stamp and calibre. They set to work with their brains, and the machinery was ready to hand; he had absolutely to produce the tools with which he dug and picked his way into eminence. His story may appear marvellous to those who are constantly finding apologies for inaction in the unfavourableness of the conditions by which they are surrounded; we shall hear him relate it himself, such as he penned it a few years before the termination of a career whose brilliancy was only equalled by its usefulness.

James Ferguson was born in the year 1710, a few miles from Keith, an inconsiderable village in the north of Scotland. His father was a very poor man, who rented a few acres of miserable land, and had to make a hard fight for his own and his children's bread, with the world. Without means to send them to school, he did not neglect to educate them as best he could. In the evenings the family used to assemble round the fire, and then the old man, weary after his day's toil, would teach them to read and write on pieces of slate, for books were a luxury even then, and Scotland had not yet laid the foundation of her cheap literature. James was the only member of the little group who shot up to a boy without acquiring the means of reading, and as he soon became ashamed of his ignorance he put all his energies to the test, to master the difficulties of an old spelling-book, given him by a kind friend. The task was difficult and disheartening, and he felt inclined to give it up when an old woman, a neighbour, came to his aid and helped him out of his embarrassments. His father was astonished, in a short time, to hear him read and spell correctly, and as a reward for his industry contrived by sheer economy to send him to the Grammar-school of Keith for three months. "This," says Ferguson, "was the only education I ever received." His taste for mechanics arose, he tells us, from an odd accident. The roof of the house was decayed and sunk in; and he was astonished to see his father raise it with the aid of a prop, lever, and upright spar. For a moment he contemplated his father's physical strength with the mechanical power he had called into requisition; but a slight examination convinced the boy-philosopher that he was wrong, and he sat down patiently to find out the mysteries of the plane and lever for himself. In the course of his inquiries he invented a rude lathe, of which he produced correct diagrams. These he carried to a gentleman, proudly imagining, like the country gentleman that came up to London with the discovery of a comet which had been blazing away for nights over Lancashire, that the knowledge was new to everyone but himself. He was quickly undeceived; but the disappointment, instead of depressing, served to stimulate him, and gave his mind a wider and deeper range. Meanwhile his father, who was growing infirm, saw with regret that he could not afford to let him waste his time pass in experiments, for bread is a prime necessity in the homes of the poor, and science had to yield to necessity. James was to throw by his machines for the herding of sheep and oxen. As he was frequently obliged to sit out all night, he began to study the stars, and in this way acquired an amount of astronomical knowledge, which seems almost incredible under the circumstances. A few years passed away, and he entered the service of a worthy farmer named Glashan, an intelligent man, and one to whom he owed the great encouragement he received. Glashan was amused to see his servant lie down, wrapped in a blanket, in the open fields at night, and holding between his eyes and the stars a thread on which were strung a quantity of beads. Surprise, however, gave way to admiration, when he saw him map out the position of his beads, each representing a star, upon a sheet of paper. When James explained to him that his object was to define the positions and distances of the stars, this good man warmly espoused his cause, and in order that he should not lack time to follow his studies in the day-time, often did his duty on the hills and moors at night. "I shall always have a respect for the memory of that man," is Ferguson's remark in relating this part of his life. Business brought the lad into contact with a Mr. Gilchrist, a gentleman of some scientific attainments, and to him he showed his rude star charts. Gilchrist was astonished by those performances, and in his turn amazed James, by telling him that the earth was round. He did him good service also by lending him maps, and furnishing him with drawing materials, none of which lay idle in the busy hands of his protégé. Whilst engaged with them, "Glashan," he says, "gave me more time than I could reasonably expect, and often took the threshing-fail out of my hands, and worked himself, while I sat by him in the barn, busy with my compasses, ruler, and pen."

Ferguson finishes a map and takes it, always securing his master's concurrence in every step, to Mr. Gilchrist. As he passes by the grammar school, he sees "a genteel-looking man," a Mr. Cantley, painting a sun-dial on the wall. As he stops to observe him, the schoolmaster comes out and asks what Ferguson has got under his arm. The boy exhibits his maps, with which the others are vastly delighted. Mr. Cantley offers to teach him to make sun-dials, and Ferguson leaves him with a deep sense of his gentlemanliness and intelligence, and a strong wish to cultivate his acquaintance further. At Mr. Gilchrist's he meets with a Mr. Thomas Grant, to whom he is introduced. Mr. Grant looks over his maps, takes a great interest in the boy, and offers him a home in his house, where he shall have the benefit of the instructions of his butler, Mr. Cantley. As Ferguson "had conceived a high opinion" of the latter, he accepts the offer, and when his term of servitude with Glashan has expired, he goes to Mr. Grant, where every attention is shown him. Mr. Cantley, the butler, he pronounces "the most extraordinary man I was ever acquainted with, or perhaps ever shall see, for he was a complete master of arithmetic, a good mathematician, a master of music on every known instrument, except the harp; understood Latin, French, and Greek; let blood extremely well; and could even prescribe as a physician upon any urgent occasion." This is indeed an extraordinary list of accomplishments for a butler in a country gentleman's house, in the north of Scotland. Moreover, Cantley was self-educated, and his pupil goes to the length of saying, that with great propriety "he might have been termed, God Almighty's scholar." Under the care of this prodigy, James rapidly acquires a knowledge of several useful branches of learning; and he is beginning to study geometry, when Cantley leaves Mr. Grant for a situation in the household of the Earl of Fife. The pupil is inconsolable, and cannot be prevailed upon to stay after him; so he returns to his father's house, where he is made a present of Gordon's Geographical Grammar. There is no figure of a globe in it, he tells us, although it contains a description of globes, and their use; and by a careful study of their details, he succeeds in making one for himself. It is necessarily rude—a lump of wood coated with paper; but it is the first he ever saw, and he is "ravished with delight" to find that with it he can solve his most perplexing problems. Problems, however, will not feed hungry mouths, notwithstanding they may stuff speculative brains; and once more the iron poverty drives him from home into the service of a miller. This new venture turns out badly. The miller is fond of tippling, and spends the best part of his time in the public-house, leaving to James the almost undivided labour of caring the mill. The boy, too, is almost starved, and when locked up for the night is glad to eat oatmeal moistened with water. Globes and theories he will not abandon, so at the end of a year he leaves the miller to his tipplings, and enters the service of Dr. Young, an iron-fisted, Jew-hearted physician. Dr. Young tells the lad that he will do a score of fine things for him, and the latter, with the natural credulity with which youths listen to the worst impostors, becomes his labouring-man. He is kept hard at work, and is "never shown a book," becomes disabled from over-toil and exhaustion, and is bled by his master—a singularly humane way of restoring a sinking constitution. At the end of three months he resigns his place, and is refused his wages by his scoundrel of a master, on the plea that he had not fulfilled his half year's engagement. James tells us that at the time he left this skin-flint Sangrado, he had been working for a fortnight, as much as possible, with one hand and arm, being unable to lift the other. Again, he returns home to lie down ill for two months, and have the recovery of his left arm despaired of. Dr. Young, that ornament of his profession, knows that he is suffering, and that his is the only professional aid within reach; but that individual does not concern himself with the case for a moment, and our hero is very bad, when glorious Cantley comes a distance of twelve miles to his bedside, and helps him on his legs. He is very weak, he tells us, has lost all appetite, and confines himself to a draught of milk once a day.

Eye and brain, however, are as active as ever, and to amuse himself he makes a wooden clock, which kept time pretty well. His materials are not the choicest, for the bell is the neck of a broken bottle, yet it strikes clearly enough, and he is rejoiced with the success of his experiment. All at once, a new question perplexes him, he wants to know how a watch goes without weight or line, and regrets it never occurred to him to ask Mr. Cantley. One day he sees a gentleman riding past the house, and out he goes and begs he will let him examine his watch. The stranger is charmed with the lad's ingenuousness, and puts it into his hands. The spring-box and chain puzzle him greatly, and he cannot understand how the spring operates until the stranger tells him to twist a piece of whalebone closely round his finger, and then allow it to uncoil. This clears up the mystery, and rich in his new knowledge, he sits down to make a wooden watch, with a whalebone spring! The watch, when finished, like the perpetual motion, professed to have been discovered by Mr. Dundreary, won't go with the balance on, though when that is removed, the wheels run quickly enough. As he is teasing his invention to remedy this striking defect, a clumsy neighbour comes in, takes the watch in his careless hands, drops it through sheer inattention, and then walks on it in the effort to pick it up. Old Ferguson, always a preacher of forbearance, is sully put out, and threatens to beat the neighbour, even James confesses that so mortified was he by this disappointment that he never afterwards attempted to construct that great novelty in the manufacturing world—a wooden watch with a whalebone spring. All his trouble, however, does not go waste. He takes his clock, globe, and maps to Sir James Dunbar of Durn, trudging seven miles with his burthen afoot, and interests that gentleman so much that he is commissioned to clean all the clocks in the house. He succeeds satisfactorily, and "then begins to pick up some money in that way about the country," making Sir James's house his home by the special invitation of the owner. On the piers of the gate were a pair of stone globes; Ferguson looked at them, and here is his own account of what he did: "On one of them I painted with oil colours a map of the terrestrial globe, and on the other a map of the celestial, from a planisphere of the stars, which I copied on paper from a celestial globe belonging to a neighbouring gentleman. The poles of the painted globes stood towards the poles of the heavens; on each the twenty-four hours were placed round the equinoctial, so as to show the time of the day when the sun shone out by the boundary, where the half of the globe at any time enlightened by the sun was parted from the other half in the shade, the enlightened parts of the terrestrial globe answering to the like enlightened parts of the earth at all times. So that whenever the sun shone on the globe one might see to what places the sun was then rising, to what places it was setting, and all the places where it was then day or night throughout the earth." We believe those ingenious globes are still preserved at Durn.

Lady Dipple comes to visit Sir James Dunbar, and a windfall drops into the lap of our poor astronomer. Her ladyship is taken with the globes, and employs James to draw patterns (in his humility he will not say designs) for needlework on aprons and gowns. The aristocratic example is, of course, followed by the ladies of the neighbourhood, and he is getting rich, so numerous are his commissions. His father shares his good luck—another instance of the many eminent men who have not forgotten their parents with their poverty. All the while he cannot leave off star-gazing and measuring the celestial distances with the old bead-string. He even constructs a celestial globe for himself, marking the tracks of the planets with an accuracy, which subsequent experience confirmed. So real to him is his experience that he sometimes imagines he sees the ecliptic in heaven, "among the stars, like a broad circular road for the sun's apparent course," and further, he fancies the paths of the planets to resemble the narrow ruts made by cart wheels, sometimes on one side of a plain road, sometimes on the other." There also comes to Sir James's a Mr. Baird, son-in-law of Lady Dipple, who invites him to come to his house where he shall have free access to his library and all facilities of drawing. Thither he goes for eight months, and learns to paint portraits with some fidelity; and there he finds it is much easier to draw from the life than from any picture whatever, as nature is more striking than any imitation of it. Lady Dipple thinks he will make his fortune as a painter; Mr. Baird thinks the rural gentry ought to subscribe a sum sufficient to start him in Edinburgh, but the project fails. Her ladyship is annoyed, but offers him bed and board in her house for one year, which she subsequently extends to two, if he will go to Edinburgh. He sets out for the metropolis, and carries an introduction to Mr. John Alexander, the painter, who disinterestedly offers to teach him to paint in oils, if he will serve him for seven years, and induce his friends to maintain him for that period. He goes to Dr. Keith, to whom he makes an open breast of his difficulties. The doctor advises him to draw in Indian ink on vellum, sits to him for a portrait, and sends him with it, and a letter of recommendation to the Lady Jane Douglas. He is well received, and paints her and her mother's portrait, in the identical room in which Napier invented his logarithms, and which the Lady Jane tells him he may use as often as suits him, if he thinks the association would inspire him. Business begins to pour in upon him, and he is rapidly accumulating his earnings, by an art which supported him professionally for six-and-twenty years. On a sudden he gets a violent inclination to study anatomy, surgery, and physic, which drives all thoughts of astronomy away for a season, and under the impression that he was qualified to act as a medical practitioner, he settled down near his father's place to heal the population. He brings with him a good store of medicines and plasters, but they do not sell—he obtains no practice, and, at the end of a few months, he goes to Inverness, where he resides as a painter for a year-and-half. Then the old passion for astronomy seizes him again, and, after considerable labour and trouble, he projected the Astronomical Rotula, which was engraved by Cooper, of Edinburgh, and published by subscription. This invention continued to be a standing, remunerative property, until 1752, when the style was changed, and it lost its total value. He next begins the construction of Orreries, the machinery of which is entirely modelled on his own designs; of two or three he makes presents, the others sell and attract general notice from their simplicity and perfection. The Royal Society opens its arms to him, and one night he goes down with the president, Martin Folkes, to exhibit a machine showing the moon and the earth's path in the heavens. Thenceforward his life, as a scientificist, is an unbroken success. "It is now thirty years," he says, "since I came to London, and during all that time I have met with the highest instances of friendship from all ranks of people both in town and country, which I do here acknowledge with the utmost respect and gratitude; and particularly the goodness of our present gracious sovereign, who, out of his privy purse, allows me fifty pounds a year, which is regularly paid without any deduction." Soon after he is elected a member of the Royal Society, and enjoys an honour which was thought worthy of being conferred on Newton—admission without initiatory or annual fees. George III. delights to honour him, and he is an occasional visitor at the palace, where the king converses with him upon scientific subjects. It is generally thought he is poor, and mammon, appreciative of merit, loads him with presents, anonymous and professed, but on the 16th November, 1776, he dies quietly, and, to the astonishment of all, bequeaths £6,000 to his family. Such is an outline of the career of James Ferguson, who raised himself by application as much as by talent from the position of a herd-boy to the private guest of a great monarch. We have written in vain if the moral of his life is not enough obvious already.
